

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

In presenting this volume to the German nation, we will not claim their approbation from the partiality they have shown to British Literature;—we will not point out to them the great utility of having the most elegant tone of English conversation for their instruction in the language; wherefore should we paint the delighting image of their identifying themselves with a sphere of individuals, whose manners and customs are so deeply tinged with originality and peculiarity of character; and invite them to consider John Bull entering their society in his own dress, touched off with his own high humour, and even with all his faults, calling upon the good-natured smile of all around him? The shades of Addison, Garrick, Steele would arise in offended pride, to hear their names once more invoked to serve the office of commendation to works which have already stood the test of nations, and out-lived the hand of time: no, their worth needs no interpreter, it speaks itself too plainly.

Yet with all the riches of the British Drama before us, we have found ourselves embarrassed to present our readers with a full specimen of its treasures; and, how plentiful soever this harvest may be, there still remains a great store behind; we wait only the fiat of the public to recommence our labours.

We refrain from entering into a detail of the many inglorious causes of the decline of the stage these last two centuries, and will content ourselves with merely pointing it out, as a reason for our work's containing very few pieces written since that time.

It is but natural for us to have a desire to become more familiarly acquainted with the man whose writings have tended to amuse or instruct us; and hence our wish, not only to have free admission to his study, but also to follow him into the circle of his acquaintance, and sit with him at his fire-side surrounded by his family. It is here we can judge the human heart, and observe, if the precepts, inculcated on his readers, have been the guide of his own actions; and whatever be the result of our examination, it must interest our feelings and be a good exercise for ourselves. We have, therefore, endeavoured to give a faithful account of the public and private life of the authors whose writings are to be found in this volume.

The opinions of the English with respect to their own authors, how much soever they may differ from those of another nation, will answer as a point of opposition, and may assist the reader in his own critique. Each piece is, therefore, preceded by reasons, more or less cogent, to add to or diminish its lustre; and these have been carefully selected from the writings of the greatest British critics, who may have noticed them, tempered by a few observations of our own.

The English nation has, of late years, become an object of curiosity to foreigners; and numerous has been the intelligent class of inquiring travellers, who have published their more or less true accounts of this people. How favourable soever may have been their opportunities for examining into the true spirit of the people, though the most prominent and general points of character may have been fully represented in their narration yet, from the particular circumstance of their being foreigners, they could not penetrate fairly into the minutiae. A series of writings, which brand the vicious with the mark of shame and punishment, and level the shaft of irony and laughter at folly, while they encourage and support real virtue and good sense, explained and put in their true light, with as much impartiality as human nature will allow in speaking of one's own country, must open a good field for the display of character. Hence the whole is accompanied with notes, explanatory of the localities and such circumstances as are liable to a double interpretation.

We cannot conclude this preface better than by laying before our readers a passage from the "lectures on Rhetoric and Belles Lettres," by that excellent critic Dr. Blair. In the third volume, when comparing the French and English comedy, he says, "from the English there we are naturally led to expect a greater variety of original characters in comedy and bolder strokes of wit and humour than are to be found on any other modern stage. Humour is in a great measure the peculiar province of the English nation. The nature of such a free government as ours, and that unrestrained liberty which our manners allow to every man of living entirely after his own taste, afford full scope to the display of singularity of character and to the indulgence of humour in all its forms. Whereas in France the influence of the court, the more established subordinations of ranks and the universal observance of the forms of politeness and decorum, spread a much greater uniformity over the outward behaviour and characters of men. Hence comedy has a more ample field and can flow with a much freer vein in Britain, than in France."

ADDISON.

JOSEPH ADDISON was born May 21, 1672, at Milston, of which his father was then Rector, near Ambrosebury in Wiltshire. He was early sent to school, there, under the care of the Rev. Mr. Naish; from whence he was removed to Salisbury school, and then to the Charterhouse, under the tuition of the learned Dr. Ellis. Here he first contracted an intimacy with Mr. Steele, which continued almost to his death. At fifteen he was entered of Queen's College, Oxford, and in about two years admitted to the degrees of bachelor and master of arts in that college; at which time he was celebrated for his Latin poems, to be found in a second volume of the Musae Britannicae, collected by Addison. Being at the university, he was upon the point of ceding to the desires of his father and several of his friends, to enter into holy orders; but having, through Mr. Congreve's means, become a favourite of Lord Halifax, he was prevailed upon by that nobleman, to give up the design. He successively filled the public stations, in 1702, of Commissioner of the Appeals in the Excise; 1707, Under-Secretary of State; 1709, Secretary of Ireland, and Keeper of the Records in Ireland; 1713 (the grand climacteric of Addison's reputation, Cato appeared) Secretary to the Lords' Justices; 1714 one of the Lords Commissioners of Trade; and at last, 1717, one of the first Secretaries of State. Dr. Johnson says, "For this employment he might justly be supposed qualified by long practice of business, and by his regular ascent through other offices; but expectation is often disappointed; it is universally confessed, that he was unequal to the duties of his place. In the House of Commons he could not speak, and therefore was useless to the defence of the Government. In the office, says Pope, he could not issue an order without losing his time in quest of fine expressions." He solicited his dismissal with a pension of 1500 pounds a year. He married the Countess Dowager of Warwick, 1716; and is said to have first known her by becoming tutor to her son. Johnson says, "The Lady was at last prevailed upon to marry him, on terms much like those, on which a Turkish princess is espoused, to whom the sultan is reported to pronounce, 'Daughter, I give thee this man for thy slave.' The marriage made no addition to his happiness; it neither made them nor found them equal." In 1718—19, he had a severe dispute on The Pterage Bill with Steele, who, inveterate in his political opinions, supported them in a pamphlet called The Plebeian, which Addison answered by another, under the title of The Old Whig. Some epithets, let drop by Addison, answered by a cutting quotation from Cato, by Steele, were the cause of their friendship's being dissolved; and every person acquainted with the friendly terms on which these two great men had lived so long, must regret, that they should finally part in acrimonious opposition. Addison died of an asthma and dropy, on the 17th June, 1719, aged 48, leaving only one daughter behind him. The general esteem in which his productions, both serious and humorous in The Spectator, The Tatler, and The Guardian are held, "pleads (as Spenser says), like angels, trumpet-tongued, in their behalf." As a poet, his Cato, in the dramatic, and his Campaign, in the heroic way, will ever maintain a place among the first-rate works of either kind.—And a good man's death displays the character of his life. At his last hour, he sent for a relation of his, young Lord Warwick, whose youth he supposed might be influenced by an awful lesson, when, taking hold of the young man's hand, he said "See in what peace a Christian can die!" and immediately expired.

CATO,

ACTED at Drury Lane, 1715. It is one of the first of our dramatic poems, and was performed 18 nights successively; this very successful run for a tragedy, is attributed by Dennis, who wrote a very bitter critique upon Cato, to proceed from Addison's having raised prejudices in his own favour, by false positions of preparatory criticism; and with his having poisoned the town by contradicting, in The Spectator, the established rule of poetical justice, because his own hero, with all his virtues, was to fall before a tyrant. Johnson says, "the fact is certain; the motives we must guess. Steele packed an audience. The danger was soon over. The whole nation was, at that time, on fire with faction. The Whigs applauded every line, in which liberty was mentioned, as a satire on the Tories; and the Tories echoed every clap, to shew, that the satire was unfelt." It was ushered into notice by eight complimentary copies of verses to the author, among which, one by Steele, leads the van; besides a prologue by Pope, and an epilogue by Dr. Garth: Dr. Johnson, with the abovementioned persons, nay, even Dennis's gall, has marked this tragedy as a British classic, and a succession of audiences for above a century has proved, that it has deserved "Golden opinions from all sorts of people." Johnson observes, "Of a work so much read, it is difficult to say any thing new. About things on which the public thinks long, it commonly attains to think right; and of Cato it has been not unjustly determined, that it is rather a poem in dialogue than a drama; rather a succession of just sentiments in elegant language, than a representation of natural affections, or of any state probable or possible in human life. Nothing here excites or engages emotion; here is no magical power of raising phantastic terror or exciting wild anxiety. The events are expected without solicitude, and remembered without joy or sorrow. Of the agents we have no care. Cato is a being above our solicitude, a man of whom "the gods take care," and whom we leave to their care with heedless confidence. To the rest, neither gods nor men can have much attention; for there is not one amongst them, that strongly attracts either affection or esteem. But they are made the vehicles of such sentiments and such expressions that there is scarcely a scene in the play, which the reader does not wish to impress upon his memory.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A Hall.

Enter PORTIUS and MARCUS.

Per. THE dawn is overcast, the morning
low'rs,

And heavily in clouds brings on the day,
The great, th' important day, big with the fate
Of Cato and of Rome—our father's death
Would fill up all the guilt of civil war,
And close the scene of blood. Already Caesar

Has ravag'd more than half the globe, and sees
Mankind grown thin by his destructive sword:
Should he go further, numbers would be wanting
To form new battles, and support his crimes.
Ye gods, what havoc does ambition make
Among your works!

Marc. Thy steady temper, Portius,
Can look on guilt, rebellion, fraud, and Caesar,
In the calm lights of mild philosophy;
I'm tortur'd, e'en to madness, when I think
On the proud victor: ev'ry time he's nam'd
Pharsalia rises to my view!—I see
Th' insulting tyrant, prancing o'er the field, Strew'd with Rome's citizens, and drench'd
in slaughter;

His horses hoofs wet with patrician blood!
Oh, Portius! is not there some chosen curse,
Some hidden thunder in the stores of heav'n,
Red with uncommon wrath, to blast the man
Who owes his greatness to his country's ruin?

Por. Believe me, Marcus, 'tis an impious greatness,

And mix'd with too much horror to be envied:
How does the lustre of our father's actions,
Through the dark cloud of ills that cover him,
Break out, and burn with more triumphant brightness!

His sufferings shine, and spread a glory round
him;

Greatly unfortunate, he fights the cause
Of honour, virtue, liberty, and Rome.

Marc. Who knows not this? But what can Cato do

Against a world, a base, degen'rate world,
That courts the yoke, and bows the neck to Caesar?

Pent up in Utica, he vainly forms
A poor epitome of Roman greatness,
And, cover'd with Numidian guards, directs
A feeble army, and an empty senate,
Remnants of mighty battles fought in vain.
By heav'n, such virtues, join'd with such success,
Distracts my very soul! our father's fortune
Would almost tempt us to renounce his precepts.

Por. Remember what our father oft has told us:

The ways of heav'n are dark and intricate;
Puzzled in mazes, and perplex'd with errors,
Our understanding traces them in vain,
Lost and bewilder'd in the fruitless search;
Nor sees with how much art the windings run,
Nor where the regular confusion ends.

Marc. These are suggestions of a mind at ease:—

Oh, Portius, didst thou taste but half the griefs
That wring my soul, thou couldst not talk thus coldly.

Passion unpitied, and successful love,
Plant daggers in my heart, and aggravate
My other griefs.—Vere but my Lucia kind—

Por. Thou seest not that thy brother is thy rival;

But I must hide it, for I know thy temper.

[Aside.
Now, Marcus, now thy virtue's on the proof,
Put forth thy utmost strength, work ev'ry nerve,
And call up all thy father in thy soul:
To quell the tyrant love, and guard thy heart
On this weak side, where most our nature fails,
Would be a conquest worthy Cato's son.

Marc. Alas, the counsel which I cannot take,
Instead of healing, but upbraids my weakness.

Love is not to be reason'd down, or lost
In high ambition and a thirst of greatness;
'Tis second life, that grows into the soul,
Warms every vein, and beats in every pulse:
I feel it here: my resolution melts—

Por. Behold young Juba, the Numidian
prince,

With how much care he forms himself to glory,
And breaks the fierceness of his native temper,
To copy out our father's bright example.
He loves our sister Marcia, greatly loves her;
His eyes, his looks, his actions, all betray it;
But still the smother'd fondness burns within
him:

When most it swells, and labours for a vent,
The sense of honour, and desire of fame,
Drive the big passion back into his heart.
What, shall an African, shall Juba's heir
Reproach great Cato's son, and show the world
A virtue wanting in a Roman soul?

Marc. Portius, no more! your words leave slings behind them.

Whene'er did Juba, or did Portius, show
A virtue that has cast me at a distance,
And thrown me out in the pursuits of honour?

Por. Oh, Marcus! did I know the way to ease

Thy troubled heart, and mitigate thy pains,
Marcus, believe me, I could die to do it.

Marc. Thou best of brothers, and thou best of friends!

Pardon a weak, distemper'd soul, that swells
With sudden gusts, and sinks as soon in calms,
The sport of passions. But Sempronius comes:
He must not find this softness hanging on me.

[Exit.

Enter SEMPRONIUS.

Sem. Conspiracies no sooner should be form'd

Than executed. What means Portius here?
I like not that cold youth. I must dissemble,
And speak a language foreign to my heart.

[Aside.
Good morrow, Portius; let us once embrace,
Once more embrace, while yet we both are free.
To-morrow, should we thus express our friendship,

Each might receive a slave into his arms.
This sun, perhaps, this morning sun's the last,
That e'er shall rise on Roman liberty.

Por. My father has this morning call'd together

To this poor hall, his little Roman senate
(The leavings of Pharsalia), to consult
If he can yet oppose the mighty torrent
That bears down Rome and all her gods before it,
Or must at length give up the world to Caesar.

Sem. Not all the pomp and majesty of Rome
Can raise her senate more than Cato's presence.
His virtues render our assembly awful,
They strike with something like religious fear,
And make ev'n Caesar tremble at the head
Of armies flush'd with conquest. Oh, my Portius!

Could I but call that wondrous man my father,
Would but thy sister Marcia be propitious
To thy friend's vows, I might be blest indeed!

Por. Alas, Sempronius! wouldst thou talk of love

To Marcia, whilst her father's life's in danger?
Thou might'st as well court the pale, trembling vestal,

When she beholds the holy flame expiring.

Sem. The more I see the wonders of thy race,
The more I'm charm'd. Thou must take heed,
my Portius;

The world has all its eyes on Cato's son;
Thy father's merit sets thee up to view,
And shows thee in the fairest point of light,
To make thy virtues or thy faults conspicuous.

Por. Well dost thou seem to check my ling'ring here

On this important hour—I'll straight away,
And while the fathers of the senate meet
In close debate, to weigh th' events of war,
I'll animate the soldiers' drooping courage
With love of freedom, and contempt of life;
I'll thunder in their ears their country's cause,
And try to rouse up all that's Roman in them.
Tis not in mortals to command success,
But we'll do more, Sempronius; we'll deserve
it. [Exit.

Sem. Curse on the stripling! how he apes his sire!

Ambitiously sententious—But I wonder
Old Syphax comes not, his Numidian genius
Is well dispos'd to mischief, were he prompt
And eager on it; but he must be spurr'd,
And ev'ry moment quicken'd to the course.
Cato has us'd me ill; he has refus'd
His daughter Marcia to my ardent vows.
Besides, his baffled arms and ruin'd cause,
Are bars to my ambition. Caesar's favour,
That show'rs down greatness on his friends,
will raise me

To Rome's first honours. If I give up Cato,
I claim, in my reward, his captive daughter.
But Syphax comes—

Enter SYPHAX.

Syph. Sempronius, all is ready;
I've sounded my Numidians, man by man,
And find them ripe for a revolt: they all
Complain aloud of Cato's discipline,
And wait but the command to change their master.

Sem. Believe me, Syphax, there's no time
to waste:

Er'n while we speak, our conqueror comes on,
And gathers ground upon us ev'ry moment.
Alas! thou know'st not Caesar's active soul,
With what a dreadful course he rushes on
From war to war. In vain has nature form'd Mountains and oceans to oppose his passage;
He bounds o'er all;
One day more
Will set the victor thund'ring at our gates.
But, tell me, hast thou yet drawn o'er young Juba?

That still would recommend thee more to Caesar,
And challenge better terms.

Syph. Alas! he's lost!
He's lost, Sempronius; all his thoughts are full
Of Cato's virtues—But I'll try once more
(For ev'ry instant I expect him here),
If yet I can subdue those stubborn principles
Of faith and honour, and I know not what,
That have corrupted his Numidian temper,
And struck th' infection into all his soul.

Sem. Be sure to press upon him ev'ry motive.
Juba's surrender, since his father's death,
Would give up Afric into Caesar's hands,
And make him lord of half the burning zone.

Syph. But is it true, Sempronius, that your senate

Is call'd together? Gods! thou must be cautious;
Cato has piercing eyes, and will discern
Our frauds, unless they're cover'd thick with art.

Sem. Let me alone, good Syphax, I'll conceal
My thoughts 'a passion ('tis the surest way);
I'll bellow out for Rome, and for my country,
And mouth at Caesar, till I shake the senate.

Your cold hypocrisy's a stale device,
A worn-out trick: wouldst thou be thought
in earnest,

Clothe thy feign'd zeal in rage, in fire, in fury!

Syph. In troth, thou'rt able to instruct grey hairs,

And teach the wily African deceit.

Sem. Once more be sure to try thy skill
on Juba.

Meanwhile I'll hasten to my Roman soldiers,
Inflame the mutiny, and, underhand,
Blow up their discontents, till they break out
Unlook'd for, and discharge themselves on Cato.
Remember, Syphax, we must work in haste;
Ob, think what anxious moments pass between
The birth of plots, and their last fatal periods!
Oh, 'tis a dreadful interval of time,
Fill'd up with horror all, and big with death!
Destruction hangs on ev'ry word we speak,
On every thought, till the concluding stroke
Determines all, and closes our design. [Exit.

Syph. I'll try if yet I can reduce to reason
This headstrong youth, and make him spurn at Cato.

The time is short; Caesar comes rushing on us—

But hold! young Juba sees me, and approaches!

Enter JUBA.

Juba. Syphax, I joy to meet thee thus alone.
I have observ'd of late thy looks are fall'n,
O'ercast with gloomy cares and discontent;
Then tell me, Syphax, I conjure thee, tell me,
What are the thoughts that knit thy brow in frowns,

And turn thine eye thus coldly on thy prince?

Syph. 'Tis not my talent to conceal my thoughts,

Or carry smiles and sunshine in my face,
When discontent sits heavy at my heart;
I have not yet so much the Roman in me.

Juba. Why dost thou cast out such un-gen'rous terms

Against the lords and sov'reigns of the world?
Dost thou not see mankind fall down before them,

And own the force of their superior virtue?

Syph. Gods! where's the worth that sets
these people up

Above your own Numidia's tawny sons?
Do they with tougher sinews bend the bow?
Or flies the jav'lin swifter to its mark,
Launch'd from the vigour of a Roman arm?
Who like our active African instructs
The fiery steed, and trains him to his hand?
Or guides in troops th' embattled elephant Laden with war? These, these are arts, my prince,

In which your Zama does not stoop to Rome.

Juba. These all are virtues of a meaner rank:
Perfections that are plac'd in bones and nerves.
A Roman soul is bent on higher views.
To make man mild, and sociable to man;

To cultivate the wild, licentious savage,
And break our fierce barbarians into men.
Turn up thy eyes to Cato;
There may'st thou see to what a godlike height
The Roman virtues lift up mortal man.
While good, and just, and anxious for his friends,
He's still severely bent against himself;
And when his fortune sets before him all
The pomps and pleasures that his soul can wish,
His rigid virtue will accept of none.

Syph. Believe me, prince, there's not an African

That traverses our vast Numidian deserts
In quest of prey, and lives upon his bow,
But better practises those boasted virtues.
Coarse are his meals, the fortune of the chase;
Amidst the running stream he slakes his thirst;
Toils all the day, and at th' approach of night,
On the first friendly bank he throws him down,
(Or rests his head upon a rock till morn;
Then rises fresh, pursues his wonted game;
And if the following day he chance to find
A new repast, or an untasted spring,
Blesses his stars, and thinks it luxury.

Juba. Thy prejudices, Syphax, won't discern
What virtues grow from ignorance and choice,
Nor how the hero differs from the brute.
Where shall we find the man that bears af-liction,

Great and majestic in his griefs, like Cato?
How does he rise against a load of woes,
And thank the gods that threw the weight
upon him!

Syph. 'Tis pride, rank pride, and haughtiness of soul;

I think the Romans call it stoicism.
Had not your royal father thought so highly
Of Roman virtue, and of Cato's cause,
He had not fall'n by a slave's hand inglorious;
Nor would his slaughter'd armies now have lain
On Afric's sands, disfigur'd with their wounds,
To gorge the wolves and vultures of Numidia.

Juba. Why dost thou call my sorrows up afresh?

My father's name brings tears into my eyes.

Syph. Oh, that you'd profit by your father's ills!

Juba. What wouldst thou have me do?

Syph. Abandon Cato.

Juba. Syphax, I should be more than twice an orphan,

By such a loss.

Syph. Ay, there's the tie that binds you!
You long to call him father. Marcia's charms
Work in your heart unseen, and plead for Cato.
No wonder you are deaf to all I say.

Juba. Syphax, your zeal becomes importunate;

I've hitherto permitted it to rave,
And talk at large; but learn to keep it in,
Lest it should take more freedom than I'll give it.

Syph. Sir, your great father never us'd me thus.

Alas, he's dead! but can you e'er forget
The tender sorrows,
And repeated blessings,
Which you drew from him in your last farewell?

The good old king, at parting, wrung my hand
(His eyes brimful of tears), then, sighing, cry'd,
Pr'ythee be careful of my son!—His grief
Swell'd up so high, he could not utter more.

Juba. Alas! thy story melts away my soul!
That best of fathers! how shall I discharge
The gratitude and duty that I owe him?

Syph. By laying up his counsels in your heart.

Juba. His counsels bade me yield to thy direction.

Syph. Alas! my prince, I'd guide you to your safety.

Juba. I do believe thou wouldst; but tell me how.

Syph. Fly from the fate that follows Caesar's foes.

Juba. My father scorn'd to do it.

Syph. And therefore died.

Juba. Better to die ten thousand thousand deaths,
Than wound my honour.

Syph. Rather say your love.

Juba. Syphax, I've promis'd to preserve my temper.

Why wilt thou urge me to confess a flame
I long have stifled, and would fain conceal?

Syph. Believe me, prince, though hard to conquer love,

'Tis easy to divert and break its force.

Absence might cure it, or a second mistress
Light up another flame, and put out this.

The glowing dames of Zama's royal court
Have faces flush'd with more exalted charms;
Were you with these, my prince, you'd soon forget

The pale, unripen'd beauties of the north.

Juba. 'Tis not a set of features, or complexion,
The tincture of a skin, that I admire:

Beauty soon grows familiar to the lover,
Fades in his eye, and palls upon the sense.

The virtuous Marcia tow'rs above her sex:
True, she is fair, (oh, how divinely fair!)

But still the lovely maid improves her charms
With inward greatness, unaffected wisdom,

And sanctity of manners; Cato's soul
Shines out in ev'ry thing she acts or speaks,

While winning mildness and attractive smiles
Dwell in her looks, and with becoming grace,

Softens the rigour of her father's virtue.

Syph. How does your tongue grow wanton in her praise!

But, on my knees, I beg you would consider—

Juba. Ha! Syphax, isn't not she?—She moves
this way;

And with her Lucia, Lucius's fair daughter.

My heart beats thick—I pr'ythee, Syphax, leave
me.

Syph. Ten thousand curses fasten on them both!

Now will the woman, with a single glance,
Undo what I've been lab'ring all this while.

[Exit.]

Enter MARCIA and LUCIA.

Juba. Hail, charming maid! how does thy beauty smooth

The face of war, and make ev'n horror smile!
At sight of thee my heart shakes off its sorrows;

I feel a dawn of joy break in upon me,
And for awhile forget th' approach of Caesar.

Marcia. I should be griev'd, young prince,
to think my presence

Unbent your thoughts, and slacken'd them
to arms,

While, warm with slaughter, our victorious foe
Threatens aloud, and calls you to the field.

Juba. Oh, Marcia, let me hope thy kind concerns
And gentle wishes follow me to battle!
The thought will give new vigour to my arm,
And strength and weight to my descending sword,
And drive it in a tempest on the foe.

Marcia. My pray'rs and wishes always shall attend
The friends of Rome, the glorious cause of virtue,
And men approv'd of by the gods and Cato.

Juba. That Juba may deserve thy pious cares,
I'll gaze for ever on thy godlike father,
Transplanting, one by one, into my life,
His bright perfections, till I shine like him.

Marcia. My father never, at a time like this,
Would lay out his great soul in words, and waste
Such precious moments.

Juba. Thy reproofs are just,
Thou virtuous maid; I'll hasten to my troops,
And fire their languid souls with Cato's virtue.
If e'er I lead them to the field, when all
The war shall stand rang'd in its just array,
And dreadful pomp, then will I think on thee.
Oh, lovely maid! then will I think on thee;
And in the shock of charging hosts, remember
What glorious deeds should grace the man, who hopes

For Marcia's love. [Exit.

Lucia. Marcia, you're too severe:
How could you chide the young, good-natur'd
prince,

And drive him from you with so stern an air;
A prince that loves, and dotes on you to death?

Marcia. How, Lucia! wouldst thou have me sink away

In pleasing dreams, and lose myself in love,
When ev'ry moment Cato's life's at stake?

Lucia. Why have I not this constancy of mind,

Who have so many griefs to try its force?
Sure, nature form'd me of her softest mould,
Enfeebled all my soul with tender passions,
And sunk me ev'n below my own weak sex:
Pity and love, by turns, oppress my heart.

Marcia. Lucia, disburden all thy cares on me,
And let me share thy most retir'd distress.
Tell me, who raises up this conflict in thee?

Lucia. I need not blush to name them,
when I tell thee

They're Marcia's brothers, and the sons of Cato.

Marcia. But tell me whose address thou fa-vour'st most?

I long to know, and yet I dread to hear it.

Lucia. Suppose 'twere Portius, could you blame my choice?—

Oh, Portius, thou hast stol'n away my soul!
Marcus is over warm; his fond complaints
Have so much earnestness and passion in them,
I hear him with a secret kind of horror,
And tremble at his vehemence of temper.

Marcia. Alas, poor youth!
How will thy coldness raise
Tempests and storms in his afflicted bosom!
I dread the consequence.

Lucia. You seem to plead Against your brother Portius.

Marcia. Lucia, no;
Had Portius been the unsuccessful lover,
The same compassion would have fall'n on him.

Lucia. Portius himself oft falls in tears before me,

As if he mourn'd his rival's ill success;
Then bids me hide the motions of my heart,
Nor show which way it turns. So much he fears
The sad effect that it will have on Marcus.
Was ever virgin love distress'd like mine.

Marcia. Let us not, Lucia, aggravate our sorrows,
But to the gods submit th'event of things.
Our lives, discolour'd with our present woes,
May still grow bright, and smile with happier hours.

So the pure, limpid stream, when foul with stains
Of rushing torrents, and descending rains,
Works itself clear, and, as it runs, refines,
Till, by degrees, the floating mirror shines,
Reflects each flow'r that on the border grows,
And a new heav'n in its fair bosom shows.

[Exit.

ACT II.

SCENE I.—The Senate-house.

Flourish. SEMPRONIUS, LUCIUS, and Senators discovered.

Sem. Rome still survives in this assembled senate.

Let us remember we are Cato's friends,
And act like men who claim that glorious title. [Trumpets.

Luc. Hark! he comes.

Trumpets. Enter CATO, PORTIUS, and MARCUS.

Cato. Fathers, we once again are met in council;

Caesar's approach has summon'd us together,
And Rome attends her fate from our resolves.
How shall we treat this bold, aspiring man?
Success still follows him, and backs his crimes;
Pharsalia gave him Rome, Egypt has since Receiv'd his yoke, and the whole Nile is Caesar's.

Why should I mention Juba's overthrow,
And Scipio's death? Numidia's burning sands Still smoke with blood. 'Tis time we should decree

What course to take. Our foe advances on us,
And envies us ev'n Libya's sultry deserts.

Fathers, pronounce your thoughts: are they still fix'd

To hold it out, and fight it to the last?
Or are your hearts subdu'd at length, and wrought,

By time and ill success, to a submission?

Sempronius, speak.

Sem. My voice is still for war.
Gods! can a Roman senate long debate

Which of the two to choose, slav'ry or death?
No; let us rise at once, gird on our swords,

And, at the head of our remaining troops,
Attack the foe, break through the thick array
Of his throng'd legions, and charge home
upon him.

Perhaps some arm, more lucky than the rest,
May reach his heart, and free the world from bondage.

Rise, fathers, rise! 'tis Rome demands your help;
Rise and revenge her slaughter'd citizens,
Or share their fate;—

To battle!

Great Pompey's shade complains that we are slow;

And Scipio's ghost walks unreveng'd amongst us.

Cato. Let not a torrent of impetuous zeal Transport thee thus beyond the bounds of reason;
True fortitude is seen in great exploits,
That justice warrants, and that wisdom guides;
All else is tow'ring frenzy and distraction.
Lucius, we next would know what's your opinion.

Luc. My thoughts, I must confess, are turn'd on peace.
Already have we shown our love to Rome,
Now let us show submission to the gods.
We took up arms, not to revenge ourselves,
But free the commonwealth; when this end fails, Arms have no further use. Our country's cause,
That drew our swords, now wrests them
from our hands,
And bids us not delight in Roman blood,
Unprofitably shed. What men could do,
Is done already: heav'n and earth will witness,
If Rome must fall, that we are innocent.

Cato. Let us appear nor rash nor diffident;
Immod'rate valour swells into a fault;
And fear, admitted into public councils,
Betrays like treason. Let us shun them both.
Fathers, I cannot see that our affairs
Are grown thus desp'rate: we have bulwarks round us;

Within our walls are troops inur'd to toil
In Afric's heat, and season'd to the sun;
Numidia's spacious kingdom lies behind us,
Ready to rise at its young prince's call.
While there is hope, do not distrust the gods;
But wait at least till Caesar's near approach
Force us to yield. 'Twill never be too late
To sue for chains, and own a conqueror.
Why should Rome fall a moment ere her time?

No, let us draw her term of freedom out
In its full length, and spin it to the last,
So shall we gain still one day's liberty:
Ant let me perish, but, in Cato's judgment,
A day, an hour, of virtuous liberty,
Is worth a whole eternity in bondage.

Enter JUNIUS.

Jun. Fathers, e'en now a herald is arriv'd From Caesar's camp, and with him comes old Decius,

The Roman knight: he carries in his looks Impatience, and demands to speak with Cato.

Cato. By your permission, fathers—bid him enter. [Exit Junius.]

Decius was once my friend, but other prospects
Have loos'd those ties, and bound him fast to Caesar.

His message may determine our resolves.

Enter DECIVS.

Dec. Caesar sends health to Cato—

Cato. Could he send it
To Cato's slaughter'd friends, it would be welcome.

Are not your orders to address the senate?

Dec. My business is with Cato; Caesar sees
The straits to which you're driv'n; and, as he knows

Cato's high worth, is anxious for your life.

Cato. My life is grafted on the fate of Rome.
Would he save Cato, bid him spare his country.
Tell your dictator this; and tell him, Cato

Disdains a life which he has power to offer.

Dec. Rome and her senators submit to Caesar;
Her gen'als and her consuls are no more,
Who check'd his conquests, and deny'd his triumphs.

Why will not Cato be this Caesar's friend?

Cato. These very reasons thou hast urg'd forbid it.

Dec. Caesar is well acquainted with your virtues,

And therefore sets this value on your life.

Let him but know the price of Cato's friendship,
And name your terms.

Cato. Bid him disband his legions,
Restore the commonwealth to liberty,
Submit his actions to the public censure,
And stand the judgment of a Roman senate.
Bid him do this, and Cato is his friend.

Dec. Cato, the world talks loudly of your wisdom—

Cato. Nay, more; though Cato's voice was ne'er employ'd

To clear the guilty, and to varnish crimes,
Myself will mount the rostrum in his favour,
And strive to gain his pardon from the people.

Dec. A style like this becomes a conqueror.

Cato. Decius, a style like this becomes a Roman.

Dec. What is a Roman, that is Caesar's foe?

Cato. Greater than Caesar: he's a friend to virtue.

Dec. Consider, Cato, you're in Utica,
And at the head of your own little senate:
You don't now thunder in the capitol,
With all the mouths of Rome to second you.

Cato. Let him consider that, who drives us hither.

'Tis Caesar's sword has made Rome's senate little,
And thinn'd its ranks. Alas! thy dazzled eye
Beholds this man in a false, glaring light,
Which conquest and success have thrown
upon him;

Didst thou but view him right, thou'dst see him black

With murder, treason, sacrilege, and crimes,
That strike my soul with horror but to name
them.

I know thou look'st on me as on a wretch
Beset with ills, and cover'd with misfortunes;
But, by the gods I swear, millions of worlds
Should never buy me to be like that Caesar.

Dec. Does Cato send this answer back to Caesar,

For all his gen'rous cares and proffer'd friendship?

Cato. His cares for me are insolent and vain:
Presumptuous man! the gods take care of Cato.
Would Caesar show the greatness of his soul,
Bid him employ his care for these my friends,
And make good use of his ill-gotten pow'r,
By shelt'ring men much better than himself.

Dec. Your high, unconquer'd heart makes you forget

You are a man. You rush on your destruction
But I have done. When I relate hereafter
The tale of this unhappy embassy,

All Rome will be in tears. *[Exit, attended
Sem.]* Cato, we thank thee.

The mighty genius of immortal Rome
Speaks in thy voice; thy soul breathes liberty
Caesar will shrink to hear the words thou utter'st
And shudder in the midst of all his conquests

Luc. The senate owns its gratitude to Cato,
Who with so great a soul consults its safety,
And guards our lives, while he neglects his own.

Sem. Sempronius gives no thanks on this account.

Lucius seems fond of life; but what is life?
'Tis not to stalk about, and draw fresh air
From time to time, or gaze upon the sun;
'Tis to be free. When liberty is gone,
Life grows insipid, and has lost its relish.
Oh, could my dying hand but lodge a sword
In Caesar's bosom, and revenge my country,
By heav'n, I could enjoy the pangs of death,
And smile in agony!

Luc. Others perhaps
May serve their country with as warm a zeal,
Though 'tis not kindled into so much rage.

Sem. This sober conduct is a mighty virtue
In lukewarm patriots.

Cato. Come, no more, Sempronius;
All here are friends to Rome, and to each other.
Let us not weaken still the weaker side
By our divisions.

Sem. Cato, my resentments
Are sacrific'd to Rome—I stand reprov'd.

Cato. Fathers, 'tis time you come to a resolve.

Luc. Cato, we all go into your opinion:
Caesar's behaviour has convinc'd the senate,
We ought to hold it out till terms arrive.

Sem. We ought to hold it out till death;
but, Cato,

My private voice is drown'd amidst the senate's.

Cato. Then let us rise, my friends, and strive to fill

This little interval, this pause of life
(While yet our liberty and fates are doubtful)
With resolution, friendship, Roman bravery,
And all the virtues we can crowd into it;
That heav'n may say, it ought to be prolong'd.
Fathers, farewell—The young Numidian prince Comes forward, and expects to know our counsels. [Exeunt Senators.

Enter JUBA.

Juba, the Roman senate has resolv'd,
Till time give better prospects, still to keep
The sword unsheath'd, and turn its edge on Caesar.

Juba. The resolution fits a Roman senate.
But, Cato, lend me for awhile thy patience,
And condescend to hear a young man speak.
My father, when, some days before his death,
He order'd me to march for Utica,
(Alas! I thought not then his death so near!)
Wept o'er me, press'd me in his aged arms;
And, as his griefs gave way, My son, said he,
Whatever fortune shall befall thy father,
Be Cato's friend; he'll train thee up to great
And virtuous deeds; do but observe him well, Thou'lt shun misfortunes, or thou'lt learn to bear them.

Cato. Juba, thy father was a worthy prince,
And merited, alas! a better fate;
But heav'n thought otherwise.

Juba. My father's fate,
In spite of all the fortitude that shines
Before my face in Cato's great example,
Subdues my soul; and fills my eyes with tears.

Cato. It is an honest sorrow, and becomes thee.

Juba. His virtues drew respect from foreign climes:

The kings of Afric sought him for their friend;

Kings far remote, that rule, as fame reports
Behind the hidden sources of the Nile,
In distant worlds, on t'other side the sun;
Oft have their black ambassadors appear'd,
Loaden with gifts, and fill'd the courts of Zama.

Cato. I am no stranger to thy father's greatness.

Juba. I do not mean to boast his power and greatness,
But point out new alliances to Cato.

Had we not better leave this Utica,
To arm Numidia in our cause, and court
Th'assistance of my father's powerful friends?
Did they know Cato, our remotest kings
Would pour embattled multitudes about him;
Their swarthy hosts would darken all our plains,
Doubling the native horror of the war,
And making death more grim.

Cato. And canst thou think Cato will fly before the sword of Caesar!
Reduc'd, like Hannibal, to seek relief
From court to court, and wander up and down
A vagabond in Afric?

Juba. Cato, perhaps
I'm too officious; but my forward cares
Would fain preserve a life of so much value.
My heart is wounded, when I see such virtue
Afflicted by the weight of such misfortunes.

Cato. Thy nobleness of soul obliges me.
But know, young prince, that valour soars above
What the world calls misfortune and affliction.
These are not ills; else would they never fall
On heav'n's first fav'rites, and the best of men.
The gods, in bounty, work up storms about us,
That give mankind occasion to exert Their hidden strength, and throw out into practice

Virtues which shun the day, and lie conceal'd
In the smooth seasons and the calms of life.

Juba. I'm charm'd whene'er thou talk'st; I pant for virtue;

And all my soul endeavours at perfection.

Cato. Dost thou love watchings, abstinence, and toil,

Laborious virtues all? Learn them from Cato:
Success and fortune must thou learn from Caesar.

Juba. The best good fortune that can fall
on Juba,

The whole success at which my heart aspires,
Depends on Cato.

Cato. What does Juba say?

Thy words confound me.

Juba. I would fain retract them.

Give them me back again: they aim'd at nothing.

Cato. Tell me thy wish, young prince; make not my ear

A stranger to thy thoughts.

Juba. Oh! they're extravagant;

Still let me hide them.

Cato. What can Juba ask,

That Cato will refuse?

Juba. I fear to name it.

Marcia—inherits all her father's virtues.

Cato. What wouldst thou say?

Juba. Cato, thou hast a daughter.

Cato. Adieu, young prince; I would not hear a word

Should lessen thee in my esteem. Remember
The hand of fate is over us, and heav'n

Exacts severity from all our thoughts.

It is not now a time to talk of aught

But chains, or conquest; liberty, or death.
[Exit.]

Enter SYPHAX.

Syph. How's this, my prince? What, cover'd with confusion?

You look as if yon stern philosopher
Had just now chid you.

Juba. Syphax, I'm undone!

Syph. I know it well.

Juba. Cato thinks meanly of me.

Syph. And so will all mankind.

Juba. I've open'd to him
The weakness of my soul, my love for Marcia.

Syph. Cato's a proper person to intrust
A love tale with!

Juba. Oh, I could pierce my heart,
My foolish heart!

Syph. Alas, my prince, how are you chang'd of late!

I've known young Juba rise before the sun,
To beat the thicket, where the tiger slept,
Or seek the lion in his dreadful haunts.

I've seen you,
Ev'n in the Libyan dog-days, hunt him down,
Then charge him close,

And, stooping from your horse,
Rivet the panting savage to the ground.

Juba. Pr'ythee, no more.

Syph. How would the old king smile,
To see you weigh the paws, when tipp'd with gold,

And throw the shaggy spoils about your shoulders!

Juba. Syphax, this old man's talk, though honey flow'd

In ev'ry word, would now lose all its sweetness.
Cato's displeas'd, and Marcia lost for ever.

Syph. Young prince, I yet could give you good advice;

Marcia might still be yours.

Juba. As how, dear Syphax?

Syph. Juba commands Numidia's hardy troops,

Mounted on steeds unus'd to the restraint
Of curbs or bits, and fleetier than the winds:
Give but the word, we snatch this damsel up,
And hear her off.

Juba. Can such dishonest thoughts
Rise up in man! Wouldst thou seduce my youth
To do an act that would destroy mine honour?

Syph. Gods, I could tear my hair to hear you talk!

Honour's a fine imaginary notion,
That draws in raw and inexperienc'd men
To real mischiefs, while they hunt a shadow.

Juba. Wouldst thou degrade thy prince into a ruffian?

Syph. The boasted ancestors of these great men,

Whose virtues you admire, were all such ruffians.

This dread of nations, this almighty Rome,
That comprehends in her wide empire's bounds
All under heav'n, was founded on a rape;
Your Scipios, Caesars, Pompeys, and your Catos
(The gods on earth), are all the spurious blood
Of violated maids, of ravish'd Sabines.

Juba. Syphax, I fear that hoary head of thine
Abounds too much in our Numidian wiles.

Syph. Indeed, my prince, you want to know the world.

Juba. If knowledge of the world makes men
perfidious,

May Juba ever live in ignorance!

Syph. Go, go; you're young.

Juba. Gods, must I tamely bear
This arrogance unanswer'd! thou'rt a traitor,
A false old traitor.

Syph. I have gone too far. [Aside.]

Juba. Cato shall know the baseness of thy soul.

Syph. I must appease this storm, or perish
in it. [Aside.]

Young prince, behold these locks, that are grown white

Beneath a helmet in your father's battles.

Juba. Those locks shall ne'er protect thy insolence.

Syph. Must one rash word, the infirmity of age,

Throw down the merit of my better years?
This the reward of a whole life of service! —
Curse on the boy! how steadily he hears me!

[Aside.]
Juba. Is it because the throne of my forefathers

Still stands unfill'd, and that Numidia's crown
Hangs doubtful yet whose head it shall enclose, Thou thus presum'st to treat thy prince with scorn?

Syph. Why will you rive my heart with such expressions?

Does not old Syphax follow you to war!
What are his aims? to shed the slow remains,
His last poor ebb of blood in your defence?

Juba. Syphax, no more! I would not hear you talk.

Syph. Not hear me talk! what, when my faith to Juba,

My royal master's son, is call'd in question?
My prince may strike me dead, and I'll be dumb;
But whilst I live I must not hold my tongue,
And languish out old age in his displeasure.

Juba. Thou know'st the way too well into my heart.

I do believe thee loyal to thy prince.

Syph. What greater instance can I give?
I've offer'd

To do an action which my soul abhors,
And gain you whom you love, at any price.

Juba. Was this thy motive? I have been too hasty.

Syph. And 'tis for this my prince has call'd me traitor.

Juba. Sure thou mistak'st; I did not call thee so.

Syph. You did indeed, my prince, you call'd me traitor.

Nay, further, threaten'd you'd complain to Cato.
Of what, my prince, would you complain to Cato?

That Syphax loves you, and would sacrifice
His life, nay more, his honour, in your service?

Juba. Syphax, I know thou lov'st me; but indeed

Thy zeal for Juba carried thee too far.
Honour's a sacred tie, the law of kings,
The noble mind's distinguishing perfection,
That aids and strengthens virtue where it meets
her,

And imitates her actions where she is not:
It ought not to be sported with.

Syph. Believe me, prince, you make old Syphax weep
To hear you talk—but 'tis with tears of joy.
If e'er your father's crown adorn your brows,
Numidia will be blest by Cato's lectures.

Juba. Syphax, thy hand; we'll mutually forget
The warmth of youth, and frowardness of age:
Thy prince esteems thy worth, and loves thy person.

If e'er the sceptre come into my hand,
Syphax shall stand the second in my kingdom.

Syph. Why will you o'erwhelm my age with kindness?

My joys grow burdensome, I shan't support it.

Juba. Syphax, farewell. I'll hence, and try to find

Some blest occasion, that may set me right
In Cato's thoughts. I'd rather have that man Approve my deeds, than worlds for my admirers. [Exit.

Syph. Young men soon give, and soon forget affronts;

Old age is slow in both—A false old traitor!—
These words, rash boy, may chance to cost thee dear.

My heart had still some foolish fondness for
thee,

But hence, 'tis gone! I give it to the winds:
Caesar, I'm wholly thine.—

Enter SEMPRONIUS.

All hail, Sempronius!

Well, Cato's senate is resolv'd to wait
The fury of a siege, before it yields.

Sem. Syphax, we both were on the verge of fate;

Lucius declar'd for peace, and terms were offer'd

To Cato, by a messenger from Caesar.

Syph. But how stands Cato?

Sem. Thou hast seen mount Atlas:

Whilst storms and tempets thunder on its brows,
And oceans break their billows at its feet,
It stands unmov'd, and glories in its height:
Such is that haughty man; his tow'ring soul,
'Midst all the shocks and injuries of fortune,
Rises superior, and looks down on Caesar.

Syph. But what's this messenger?

Sem. I've practis'd with him,
And found a means to let the victor know,
That Syphax and Sempronius are his friends.
But let me now examine in my turn;
Is Juba fix'd?

Syph. Yes—but it is to Cato.

I've tried the force of ev'ry reason on him,
Sooth'd and caress'd; been angry, sooth'd again;
Laid safety, life, and interest in his sight;
But all are vain, he scorns them all for Cato.

Sem. Well, 'tis no matter; we shall do without him.

Syphax, I now may hope, thou hast forsook
Thy Juba's cause, and wishest Marcia mine.

Syph. May she be thine as fast as thou wouldst have her.

But are thy troops prepar'd for a revolt?
Does the sedition catch from man to man,
And run among the ranks?

Sem. All, all is ready;
The factious leaders are our friends, that spread
Murmurs and discontents among the soldiers;
They count their toilsome marches, long fatigue,

Unusual fastings, and will bear no more

This medley of philosophy and war.

Within an hour they'll storm the senate-house.

Syph. Meanwhile I'll draw up my Numidian troops

Within the square, to exercise their arms,
And, as I see occasion, favour thee.

I laugh to see how your unshaken Cato

Will look aghast, while unforeseen destruction
Pours in upon him thus from every side.

So, where our wide Numidian wastes extend,
Sudden th' impetuous hurricanes descend,
Wheel through th' air, in circling eddies play,
Tear up the sands, and sweep whole plains away.

The helpless traveller, with wild surprise,
Sees the dry desert all around him rise,
And, smother'd in the dusty whirlwind, dies. }

[Exeunt.

ACT III.

SCENE I.—The Palace.

Enter MARCUS and PORTIUS.

Marc. Thanks to my stars, I have not rang'd about

The wilds of life, ere I could find a friend;
Nature first pointed out my Portius to me,
And early taught me, by her secret force,
To love thy person, ere I knew thy merit,
Till what was instinct, grew up into friendship.

Por. Marcus, the friendships of the world are oft

Confed'racies in vice, or leagues of pleasure;
Ours has severest virtue for its basis,
And such a friendship ends not but with life.

Marc. Portius, thou know'st my soul in all its weakness;

Then, pr'ythee, spare me on its tender side;
Indulge me but in love, my other passions
Shall rise and fall by virtue's nicest rules.

Por. When love's well tim'd, 'tis not a fault to love.

The strong, the brave, the virtuous, and the wise
Sink in the soft captivity together.

Marc. Alas, thou talk'st like one that never felt

Th' impatient throbs and longings of a soul,
That pants and reaches after distant good!

A lover does not live by vulgar time:
Believe me, Portius, in my Lucia's absence
Life hangs upon me, and becomes a burden;
And yet, when I behold the charming maid,
I'm ten times more undone; while hope, and fear,

And grief, and rage, and love, rise up at once,
And with variety of pain distract me.

Por. What can thy Portius do to give thee help?

Marc. Portius, thou oft enjoy'st the fair one's presence;

Then undertake my cause, and plead it to her
With all the strength and heat of eloquence
Fraternal love and friendship can inspire.

Tell her thy brother languishes to death,
And fades away, and withers in his bloom;
That he forgets his sleep, and loathes his food,
That youth, and health, and war, are joyless
to him;

Describe his anxious days, and restless nights
And all the torments that thou see'st me suffer

Por. Marcus, I beg thee give me not an office
That suits with me so ill. Thou know'st my temper.

Marc. Wilt thou behold me sinking in my woes,
And wilt thou not reach out a friendly arm,
To raise me from amidst this plunge of sorrows?

Por. Marcus, thou canst not ask what I'd refuse;

But here, believe me, I've a thousand reasons—

Marc. I know thou'lt say my passion's out of season,
That Cato's great example and misfortunes
Should both conspire to drive it from my thoughts.

But what's all this to one that loves like me?
O Portius, Portius, from my soul I wish
Thou didst but know thyself what 'tis to love!
Then wouldst thou pity and assist thy brother.

Por. What should I do? If I disclose my passion,
Our friendship's at an end; if I conceal it,
The world will call me false to friend and brother. [Aside.]

Marc. But see, where Lucia, at her wonted hour,
Amid the cool of yon high marble arch,
Enjoys the noon-day breeze! Observe her, Portius;

That face, that shape, those eyes, that heav'n of beauty!

Observe her well, and blame me if thou canst.

Por. She sees us, and advances—

Marc. I'll withdraw,
And leave you for awhile. Remember, Portius,
Thy brother's life depends upon thy tongue.

[Exit.]

Enter LUCIA.

Lucia. Did not I see your brother Marcus here?

Why did he fly the place, and shun my presenee?

Por. Oh, Lucia, language is too faint to show
His rage of love; it preys upon his life;
He pines, he sickens, he despairs, he dies!

Lucia. How wilt thou guard thy honour,
in the shock
Of love and friendship? Think betimes, my Portius,

Think how the nuptial tie, that might ensure
Our mutual bliss, would raise to such a height
Thy brother's griefs, as might perhaps destroy him.

Por. Alas, poor youth! What dost thou think, my Lucia?

His gen'rous, open, undesigning heart
Has begg'd his rival to solicit for him!
Then do not strike him dead with a denial.

Lucia. No, Portius, no; I see thy sister's tears,
Thy father's anguish, and thy brother's death,
In the pursuit of our ill-fated loves:

And, Portius, here I swear, to heav'n I swear,
To heav'n, and all the powers that judge mankind,

Never to mix my plighted hands with thine,
While such a cloud of mischief hangs upon us;
But to forget our loves, and drive thee out
From all my thoughts—as far as I am able.

Por. What hast thou said?—I'm thunder-struck—recall
Those hasty words, or I am lost for ever.

Lucia. Has not the vow already pass'd my lips?

The gods have heard it, and 'tis seal'd in heav'n.
May all the vengeance that was ever pour'd
On perjur'd heads o'erwhelm me if I break it!

Por. Fix'd in astonishment, I gaze upon thee,
Like one just blasted by a stroke from heav'n,
Who pants for breath, and stiffens, yet alive,
In dreadful looks; a monument of wrath!

Lucia. Think, Portius, think thou see'st thy dying brother

Stabb'd at his heart, and all besmear'd with blood,

Storming at heav'n and thee! Thy awful sire
Sternly demands the cause, th' accursed cause
That robs him of his son:—farewell, my Portius!
Farewell, though death is in the word—for ever!

Por. Thou must not go; my soul still hovers o'er thee,

And can't get loose.

Lucia. If the firm Portius shake
To hear of parting, think what Lucia suffers!

Por. 'Tis true, unruffled and serene, I've met
The common accidents of life; but here
Such an unlook'd-for storm of ills falls on me,
It beats down all my strength, I cannot bear it.
We must not part.

Lucia. What dost thou say? Not part!
Hast thou forgot the vow that I have made?
Arc not there heavens, and gods, that thunder o'er us?

But see, thy brother Marcus bends this way;
I sicken at the sight. Once more, farewell,
Farewell, and know thou wrong'st me, if thou think'st,

Ever was love, or ever grief, like mine.

[Exit.]

Enter MARCUS.

Marc. Portius, what hopes? How stands she? am I doom'd

To life or death?

Por. What wouldst thou have me say?

Marc. Thy downcast looks, and thy disorder'd thoughts,
Tell me my fate. I ask not the success
My cause has found.

Por. I'm griev'd I undertook it.

Marc. What, does the barbarous maid insult my heart,

My aching heart, and triumph in my pains?

Por. Away, you're too suspicious in your griefs;

Lucia, though sworn never to think of love,
Compassionates your pains, and pities you.

Marc. Compassionates my pains, and pities me!

What is compassion when 'tis void of love?
Fool that I was to choose so cold a friend
To urge my cause!—Compassionates my pains!
Pr'ythee what art, what rhet'ric didst thou use
To gain this mighty boon?—She pities me!
To one that asks the warm returns of love,
Compassion's cruelty, 'tis scorn, 'tis death—

Por. Marcus, no more; have I deserv'd this treatment?

Marc. What have I said? Oh, Portius, oh forgive me!

A soul, exasperate in ills, falls out
With every thing—its friend, itself—but, hah!

[Shouts and Trumpets.]
What means that shout, big with the sounds of war?

What new alarm?

[Shouts and Trumpets repeated.]

Por. A second, louder yet, Swells in the wind, and comes more full upon
us.

Marc. Oh, for some glorious cause to fall in battle!

Lucia, thou hast undone me: thy disdain
Has broke my heart: 'tis death must give me
ease.

Por. Quick, let us hence. Who knows if Cato's life
Stands sure? Oh, Marcus, I am warm'd; my
heart
Leaps at the trumpet's voice, and burns for glory.

[Exeunt. Trumpets and shouting.]

SCENE II.—Before the Senate-house.

Enter SEMPRONIUS, with the Leaders of the Mutiny.

Sem. At length the winds are rais'd, the storm blows high!
Be it your care, my friends, to keep it up
In all its fury, and direct it right,
Till it has spent itself on Cato's head.
Mean while, I'll herd among his friends, and seem

One of the number, that, whate'er arrive,
My friends and fellow-soldiers may be safe.

[Exit.]
1 Lead. We are all safe; Sempronius is our friend. [Trumpets.]
But, hark, Cato enters. Bear up boldly to him;
Be sure you beat him down, and bind him fast;
This day will end our toils.
Fear nothing, for Sempronius is our friend.

Trumpets. Re-enter SEMPRONIUS, with CATO, LUCIUS, PORTIUS, MARCUS, and Guards.

Cato. Where are those bold, intrepid sons
of war,
That greatly turn their backs upon the foe,
And to their general send a brave defiance?

Sem. Curse on their dastard souls, they stand astonish'd! [Aside.]

Cato. Perfidious men! And will you thus dishonour
Your past exploits, and sully all your wars?
Why could not Cato fall
Without your guilt? Behold, ungrateful men,
Behold my bosom naked to your swords,
And let the man that's injur'd strike the blow.
Which of you all suspects that he is wrong'd,
Or thinks he suffers greater ills than Cato?
Am I distinguish'd from you but by toils,
Superior toils, and heavier weight of cares?
Painful pre-eminence!

Sem. Confusion to the villains! all is lost!
[Aside.]

Cato. Hence, worthless men! hence! and complain to Caesar,
You could not undergo the toil of war,
Nor bear the hardships that your leader bore.

Luc. See, Cato, see the unhappy men! they weep!

Fear and remorse, and sorrow for their crime,
Appear in ev'ry look, and plead for mercy.

Cato. Learn to be honest men, give up your leaders,
And pardon shall descend on all the rest.

Sem. Cato, commit these wretches to my care;
First let them each be broken on the rack,
Then, with what life remains, impal'd, and left
To writhe at leisure, round the bloody stake;
There let them hang, and taint the southern wind.

The partners of their crime will learn obedience.

Cato. Forbear, Sempronius!—see they suffer
death,

But in their deaths remember they are men;
Lucius, the base, degen'rate age requires Severity.

When by just vengeance guilty mortals perish,
The gods behold the punishment with pleasure,
And lay th' uplifted thunderbolt aside.

Sem. Cato, I execute thy will with pleasure.

Cato. Mean while, we'll sacrifice to liberty.
Remember, O my friends! the laws, the rights,
The gen'rous plan of power deliver'd down
From age to age by your renown'd forefathers
(So dearly bought, the price of so much blood):
Oh, let it never perish in your hands!

But piously transmit it to your children.
Do thou, great liberty, inspire our souls,
And make our lives in thy possession happy,
Or our deaths glorious in thy just defence.

[Exeunt Cato, etc.]

1 Lead. Sempronius, you have acted like yourself,
One would have thought you had been half
in earnest.

Sem. Villain, stand off; base, grov'ling, worthless wretches,
Mongrels in faction, poor faint-hearted traitors!

2 Lead. Nay, now you carry it too far,
Sempronius!
Throw off the mask, there are none here but friends.

Sem. Know, villains, when such paltry slaves presume
To mix in treason, if the plot succeeds,
They're thrown neglected by; but, if it fails,
They're sure to die like dogs, as you shall do.
Here, take these factious monsters, drag them forth
To sudden death.

1 Lead. Nay, since it comes to this—
Sem. Dispatch them quick, but first pluck out their tongues,
Lest with their dying breath they sow sedition.

[Exeunt Guards, with the Leaders of the Mutiny.]

Enter SYPHAX.

Syph. Our first design, my friend, has prov'd abortive;
Still there remains an after-game to play;
My troops are mounted;
Let but Sempronius head us in our flight,
We'll force the gate where Marcus keeps his guard,
And hew down all that would oppose our passage.

A day will bring us into Caesar's camp.
Sem. Confusion! I have fail'd of half my purpose:

Marcia, the charming Marcia's left behind!
Syph. How! will Sempronius turn a woman's slave?

Sem. Think not thy friend can ever feel the soft
Unmanly warmth and tenderness of love.

Syphax, I long to clasp that haughty maid,
And bend her stubborn virtue to my passion:
When I have gone thus far, I'd cast her off.

Syph. What hinders, then, but that thou find her out,
And hurry her away by manly force?

Sem. But how to gain admission? For access
Is giv'n to none but Juba and her brothers.

Syph. Thou shalt have Juba's dress and Ju-ba's guards;
The doors will open, when Numidia's prince Seems to appear before the slaves that watch
them.

Sem. Heav'n's, what a thought is there! Mar-cia's my own!

How will my bosom swell with anxious joy,
When I behold her struggling in my arms,
With glowing beauty, and disorder'd charms,
While fear and anger, with alternate grace,
Pant in her breast, and vary in her face!
So Pluto seiz'd off Proserpine, convey'd
To hell's tremendous gloom th' affrighted maid;
There grimly smil'd, pleas'd with the beauteous
prize,

Nor envy'd Jove his sunshine and his skies.

[Exeunt.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—A Chamber.

Enter LUCIA and MARCIA.

Lucia. Now tell me, Marcia, tell me from thy soul,
If thou believ'st 'tis possible for woman
To suffer greater ills than Lucia suffers?

Marcia. Oh, Lucia, Lucia, might my big swoln heart
Vent all its griefs, and give a loose to sorrow,
Marcia could answer thee in sighs, keep pace
With all thy woes, and count out tear for tear.

Lucia. I know thou'rt doom'd alike to be belov'd

By Juba, and thy father's friend, Sempronius:
But which of these has pow'r to charm like Portius?

Marcia. Still I must beg thee not to name
Sempronius.

Lucia. I like not that loud, boist'rous man.
Juba, to all the bravery of a hero,
Adds softest love and sweetness: he, I own,
Might make indeed the proudest woman happy.

Lucia. But should this father give you to Sempronius?

Marcia. I dare not think he will: but if he should—

Why wilt thou add to all the griefs I suffer,
Imaginary ills, and fancied tortures?

I hear the sound of feet! They march this way!
Let us retire, and try if we can drown
Each softer thought in sense of present danger:
When love once pleads admission to our hearts,
In spite of all the virtues we can boast,
The woman that deliberates is lost. [Exeunt.]

Enter SEMPRONIUS, dressed like JUBA, with Numidian Guards.

Sem. The deer is lodg'd, I've track'd her to her covert.

Be sure you mind the word, and, when I give it,
Rush in at once, and seize upon your prey.
How will the young Numidian rave to see
His mistress lost! If aught could glad my soul,
Beyond th' enjoyment of so bright a prize,

—'T would be to torture that young, gay barbarian.
—But hark! what noise! Death to my hopes!

'Tis he,
Tis Juba's self! there is but one way left—
He must be murder'd, and a passage cut
Through those his guards.

Enter JUBA, with Guards.

Juba. What do I see? Who's this that dares usurp

The guards and habits of Numidia's prince?

Sem. One that was born to scourge thy arrogance,
Presumptuous youth!

Juba. What can this mean? Sempronius!

Sem. My sword shall answer thee. Have at thy heart.

Juba. Nay, then, beware thy own, proud, barbarous man.

[They fight; Sempronius falls.]

Sem. Curse on my stars! Am I then doom'd to fall

By a boy's hand, disfigur'd in a vile
Numidian dress, and for a worthless woman?
Gods, I'm distracted! this my close of life!

Oh, for a peal of thunder, that would make
Earth, sea, and air, and heav'n, and Cato tremble!

[Dies.]

Juba. With what a spring his furious soul broke loose,

And left the limbs still quiv'ring on the ground!
Hence let us carry off those slaves to Cato,
That we may there at length unravel all
This dark design, this mystery of fate.

[Exit Juba; his Guards taking those of Sempronius as Prisoners.]

Enter LUCIA and MARCIA.

Lucia. Sure 'twas the clash of swords; my troubled heart

Is so cast down, and sunk amidst its sorrows,
It throbs with fear, and aches at ev'ry sound.
Oh, Marcia, should thy brothers, for my sake—
I die away with horror at the thought!

Marcia. See, Lucia, see! here's blood! here's blood and murder!

Ha! a Numidian! Heav'n preserve the prince!
The face lies muffled up within the garment,
But, ah! death to my sight! a diadem,
And royal robes! O gods! 'tis he, 'tis he!
Juba lies dead before us!

Lucia. Now, Marcia, now call up to thy assistance

Thy wonted strength and constancy of mind;
Thou canst not put it to a greater trial.

Marcia. Lucia, look there, and wonder at my patience;

Have I not cause to rave, and beat my breast,
To rend my heart with grief, and run distracted?

Lucia. What can I think, or say, to give thee comfort?

Marcia. Talk not of comfort; 'tis for lighter
ills:

Behold a sight that strikes all comfort dead.

Enter JUBA, unperceived.

I will indulge my sorrows, and give way
To all the pangs and fury of despair;

That man, that best of men deserv'd it from me.

Juba. What do I hear? and was the false
Sempronius

That best of men? Oh, had I fall'n like him,
And could have been thus mourn'd, I had been happy. [Aside.]

Marcia. 'Tis not in fate to ease my tortur'd breast.

Oh, he was all made up of love and charms!
Whatever maid could wish, or man admire:
Delight of ev'ry eye; when he appear'd,
A secret pleasure gladden'd all that saw him.
Oh, Juba, Juba!

Juba. What means that voice? Did she not call on Juba? [Aside.]

Marcia. He's dead, and never knew how much I lov'd him;

Lucia, who knows but his poor, bleeding heart,
Amidst its agonies, remember'd Marcia,
And the last words he utter'd call'd me cruel!
Alas! he knew not, hapless youth, he knew not Marcia's whole soul was full of love and Juba!

Juba. Where am I? Do I live? or am indeed
What Marcia thinks? All is Elysium round me!

Marcia. Ye dear remains of the most lov'd of men,
Nor modesty nor virtue here forbid
A last embrace, while thus—

Juba. See, Marcia, see,
[Throwing himself before her.]
The happy Juba lives! he lives to catch
That dear embrace, and to return it too
With mutual warmth and eagerness of love.

Marcia. With pleasure and amaze I stand transported!
If thou art Juba, who lies there?

Juba. A wretch,
Disguis'd like Juba on a curs'd design.
I could not bear
To leave thee in the neighbourhood of death,
But flew, in all the haste of love, to find thee;
I found thee weeping, and confess this once,
Am rapt with joy, to see my Marcia's tears.

Marcia. I've been surpris'd in an unguarded hour,
But must not now go back; the love, that lay Half-smother'd in my breast, has broke through all its weak restraints, and burns in its full lustre.
I cannot, if I would, conceal it from thee.

Juba. My joy, my best lov'd, my only wish!
How shall I speak the transport of my soul?

Marcia. Lucia, thy arm. Lead to my apartment.

Oh, prince! I blush to think what I have said,
But fate has wrested the confession from me;
Go on, and prosper in the paths of honour.
Thy virtue will excuse my passion for thee,
And make the gods propitious to our love.

[Exeunt Marcia and Lucia.]

Juba. I am so blest, I fear 'tis all a dream.
Fortune, thou now hast made amends for all
Thy past unkindness: I absolve my stars.
What though Numidia add her conquer'd towns
And provinces to swell the victor's triumph,
Juba will never at his fate repine:
Let Caesar have the world, if Marcia's mine.

[Exit.]

SCENE II.—Before the Palace. A March at a Distance.

Enter CATO and LUCIUS.

Luc. I stand astonish'd! What, the bold
Sempronius,

That still broke foremost through the crowd
of patriots,

As with a hurricane of zeal transported,
And virtuous ev'n to madness—

Cato. Trust me, Lucius,
Our civil discords have produc'd such crimes,
Such monstrous crimes, I am surpris'd at nothing.
—Oh, Lucius, I am sick of this bad world!
The daylight and the sun grow painful to me.

Enter PORTIUS.

But see where Portius comes: what means this haste?

Why are thy looks thus chang'd?

Por. My heart is griev'd:
I bring such news as will afflict my father.

Cato. Has Caesar shed more Roman blood?

Por. Not so.

The traitor Syphax, as within the square
He exercis'd his troops, the signal giv'n,
Flew off at once with his Numidian horse
To the south gate, where Marcus holds the watch;

I saw, and call'd to stop him, but in vain:
He toss'd his arm aloft, and proudly told me,
He would not stay and perish like Sempronius.

Cato. Perfidious man! But haste, my son, and see

Thy brother Marcus acts a Roman's part.

[Exit Portius.]

—Lucius, the torrent bears too hard upon me:
Justice gives way to force: the conquer'd world
Is Caesar's! Cato has no business in it.

Luc. While pride, oppression, and injustice reign,

The world will still demand her Cato's presence.
In pity to mankind submit to Caesar,
And reconcile thy mighty soul to life.

Cato. Would Lucius have me live to swell
the number

Of Caesar's slaves, or by a base submission
Give up the cause of Rome, and own a tyrant?

Luc. The victor never will impose on Cato Ungen'rous terms. His enemies confess
The virtues of humanity are Caesar's.

Cato. Curse on his virtues! they've undone his country.

Such popular humanity is treason—
But see young Juba; the good youth appears,
Full of the guilt of his perfidious subjects!

Luc. Alas, poor prince! his fate deserves compassion.

Enter JUBA.

Juba. I blush, and am confounded to appear Before thy presence, Cato.

Cato. What's thy crime?

Juba. I'm a Numidian.

Cato. And a brave one too. Thou hast a Roman soul.

Juba. Hast thou not heard of my false countrymen?

Cato. Alas, young prince!
Falsehood and fraud shoot up in ev'ry soil,
The product of all climes—Rome has its Caesars.

Juba. 'Tis gen'rous thus to comfort the distress'd.

Cato. 'Tis just to give applause where 'tis deserv'd:

Thy virtue, prince, has stood the test of fortune,
Like purest gold, that, tortur'd in the furnace,

Comes out more bright, and brings forth all its weight.

Enter PORTIUS.

Por. Misfortune on misfortune! grief on grief!

My brother Marcus—

Cato. Ha! what has he done?
Has he forsook his post? Has he giv'n way?
Did he look tamely on, and let them pass?

Por. Scarce had I left my father, but I met
him

Borne on the shields of his surviving soldiers, Breathless and pale, and cover'd o'er with wounds.

Long, at the head of his few faithful friends,
He stood the shock of a whole host of foes,
Till, obstinately brave, and bent on death,
Oppress'd with multitudes, he greatly fell.

Cato. I'm satisfy'd.

Por. Nor did he fall, before His sword had pierc'd through the false heart of Syphax.

Yonder he lies. I saw the hoary traitor
Grin in the pangs of death, and bite the ground.

Cato. Thanks to the gods, my boy has done his duty.

—Portius, when I am dead, be sure you place
His urn near mine.

Por. Long may they keep asunder!

Luc. Oh, Cato, arm thy soul with all its patience;

See where the corpse of thy dead son approaches!
The citizens and senators, alarm'd,
Have gather'd round it, and attend it weeping.

Dead March. CATO meets the Corpse. LUCIUS, Senators, Guards, etc. attending.

Cato. Welcome, my son! Here lay him down, my friends,

Full in my sight, that I may view at leisure
The bloody corse, and count those glorious wounds.

—How beautiful is death, when earn'd by virtue!
Who would not be that youth? What pity is it
That we can die but once to serve our country!
—Why sits this sadness on your brows, my friends?

I should have blush'd if Cato's house had stood
Secure, and flourish'd in a civil war.

Portius, behold thy brother, and remember
Thy life is not thy own when Rome demands it.
When Rome demands; but Rome is now no
more.

Oh, liberty! oh, virtue! oh, my country!

Juba. Behold that upright man! Rome fills his eyes

With tears, that flow'd not o'er his own dear son. [Aside.]

Cato. Whate'er the Roman virtue has subdu'd,
The sun's whole course, the day and year, are Caesar's:

For him the self-devoted Decii died,
The Fabii fell, and the great Scipios conquer'd:
Ev'n Pompey fought for Caesar. Oh, my friends,
How is the toil of fate, the work of ages,
The Roman empire, fall'n! Oh, curs'd ambition!
Fall'n into Caesar's hands! Our great forefathers
Had left him nought to conquer but his country.

Juba. While Cato lives, Caesar will blush to see

Mankind enslav'd, and be asham'd of empire.

Cato. Caesar asham'd! Has he not seen Pharsalia!

Luc. 'Tis time thou save thyself and us.

Cato. Lose not a thought on me; I'm out of danger:

Heav'n will not leave me in the victor's hand.
Caesar shall never say, he conquer'd Cato.
But oh, my friends! your safety fills my heart
With anxious thoughts; a thousand secret terrors

Rise in my soul. How shall I save my friends?
'Tis now, O Caesar, I begin to fear thee!

Luc. Caesar has mercy, if we ask it of him.

Cato. Then ask it, I conjure you; let him
know

Whate'er was done against him, Cato did it.
Add, if you please, that I request it of him—
That I myself, with tears, request it of him—
The virtue of my friends may pass unpunish'd.
Juba, my heart is troubled for thy sake.
Should I advise thee to regain Numidia,
Or seek the conqueror?—

Juba. If I forsake thee

Whilst I have life, may heav'n abandon Juba!

Cato. Thy virtues, prince, if I foresee aright,
Will one day make thee great; at Rome,
hereafter,

'Twill be no crime to have been Cato's friend.
Portius, draw near: my son, thou oft hast seen
Thy sire engag'd in a corrupted state, Wrestling with vice and faction: now thou seest me

Spent, overpower'd, despairing of success;
Let me advise thee to retreat betimes
To thy paternal seat, the Sabine field;
Where the great Censor toil'd with his own hands,

And all our frugal ancestors were bless'd
In humble virtues, and a rural life;
There live retir'd, pray for the peace of Rome;
Content thyself to be obscurely good.
When vice prevails, and impious men bear sway,

The post of honour is a private station.

Por. I hope my father does not recommend
A life to Portius that he scorns himself.

Cato. Farewell, my friends! If there be any of you,

Who dare not trust the victor's clemency,
Know there are ships prepar'd, by my command,
That shall convey you to the wish'd-for port.
Is there aught else, my friends, I can do for you?
The conqueror draws near. Once more, farewell!
If e'er we meet hereafter, we shall meet
In happier climes, and on a safer shore,
Where Caesar never shall approach us more.

[Pointing to his dead Son.]

There the brave youth, with love of virtue fir'd,
Who greatly in his country's cause expir'd,
Shall know he conquer'd. The firm patriot
there,

Who made the welfare of mankind his care,
Though still by faction, vice, and fortune cross'd,
Shall find the gen'rous labour was not lost.

[Dead March. Exeunt in funeral Procession.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—A Chamber.

CATO solus, sitting in a thoughtful Posture;
in his Hand, Plato's Book on the Immor*ality of the Soul. A drawn Sword on the Table, by him.*

Cato. It must be so—Plato thou reason'st well—

Else whence this pleasing hope, this fond desire,
This longing after immortality?

Or whence this secret dread, and inward horror,
Of falling into nought? Why shrinks the soul
Back on herself, and startles at destruction?

'Tis the divinity that stirs within us;

'Tis heav'n itself that points out an hereafter,
And intimates eternity to man.

Eternity! thou pleasing, dreadful thought!

Through what variety of untried being,
Through what new scenes and changes must we pass?

The wide, the unbounded prospect lies before me:

But shadows, clouds, and darkness, rest upon it.
Here will I hold. If there's a power above us
(And that there is, all nature cries aloud Through all her works), he must delight in virtue:

And that which he delights in must be happy.
But when, or where?—this world was made for Caesar:

I'm weary of conjectures—this must end them.

[Laying his Hand on his Sword.]

Thus am I doubly arm'd: my death and life,
My bane and antidote, are both before me.

This in a moment brings me to an end;

But this informs me I shall never die.

The soul, secur'd in her existence, smiles

At the drawn dagger, and defies its point.

The stars shall fade away, the sun himself

Grow dim with age, and nature sink in years,

But thou shalt flourish in immortal youth,

Unhurt amidst the war of elements,

The wreck of matter, and the crush of worlds.

What means this heaviness that hangs upon me?

This lethargy that creeps through all my senses?

Nature, oppress'd and harrass'd out with care,

Sinks down to rest. This once I'll favour her,

That my awaken'd soul may take her flight,

Renew'd in all her strength, and fresh with life,

An off'ring fit for heav'n. Let guilt or fear

Disturb man's rest, Cato knows neither of them,

Indifferent in his choice to sleep or die.

Enter PORTIUS.

But, ha! who's this? my son! Why this intrusion?

Were not my orders that I would be private?

Why am I disobey'd?

Por. Alas, my father!

What means this sword, this instrument of
death?

Let me convey it hence.

Cato. Rash youth, forbear!

Por. Oh, let the pray'rs, th' entreaties of your friends,

Their tears, their common danger, wrest it
from you!

Cato. Wouldst thou betray me? Wouldst thou give me up

A slave, a captive, into Caesar's hands?

Retire, and learn obedience to a father,

Or know, young man—

Por. Look not thus sternly on me;

You know, I'd rather die than disobey you.

Cato. 'Tis well! again I'm master of myself.

Now, Caesar, let thy troops beset our gates,

And bar each avenue; thy gath'ring fleets
O'erspread the sea, and stop up ev'ry port;
Cato shall open to himself a passage,
And mock thy hopes.—

Por. [Kneeling] Oh, sir! forgive your son, Whose grief hangs heavy on him. Oh, my father!

How am I sure it is not the last time

I e'er shall call you so? Be not displeas'd,

Oh, be not angry with me whilst I weep,

And, in the anguish of my heart, beseech you
To quit the dreadful purpose of your soul!

Cato. Thou hast been ever good and dutiful. [Embracing him.]

Weep not, my son, all will be well again;
The righteous gods, whom I have sought to please,

Will succour Cato, and preserve his children.

Por. Your words give comfort to my drooping heart.

Cato. Portius, thou may'st rely upon my conduct:

Thy father will not act what misbecomes him.

But go, my son, and see if aught be wanting

Among thy father's friends; see them embark'd,

And tell me if the winds and seas befriend them.

My soul is quite weigh'd down with care,
and asks

The soft refreshment of a moment's sleep.

Por. My thoughts are more at ease, my heart revives— [Exit Cato.]

Enter MARCIA.

Oh, Marcia! Oh, my sister, still there's hope

Our father will not cast away a life

So needful to us all, and to his country.

He is retir'd to rest, and seems to cherish

Thoughts full of peace.—He has dispatch'd me hence

With orders that bespeak a mind compos'd,

And studious for the safety of his friends.

Marcia, take care that none disturb his slumbers. [Exit.]

Marcia. Oh, ye immortal powers, that guard the just,

Watch round his couch and soften his repose,

Banish his sorrows, and becalm his soul

With easy dreams; remember all his virtues,

And show mankind that goodness is your care!

Enter LUCIA.

Lucia. Where is your father, Marcia, where is Cato?

Marcia. Lucia, speak low, he is retir'd to rest.

Lucia. I feel a gentle dawning hope

Rise in my soul—We shall be happy still.

Lucia. Alas, I tremble when I think on Cato!

In every view, in every thought I tremble!

Cato is stern and awful as a god;

He knows not how to wink at human frailty,

Or pardon weakness, that he never felt.

Marcia. Though stern and awful to the foes of Rome,

He is all goodness, Lucia, always mild;

Compassionate and gentle to his friends;

Fil'd with domestic tenderness, the best,

The kindest father; I have ever found him

Easy and good, and bounteous to my wishes.

Lucia. 'Tis his consent alone can make us
blest.

But who knows Cato's thoughts?

Who knows how yet he may dispose of Portius,
Or how he has determin'd of thyself?

Marcia. Let him but live, commit the rest to heav'n.

Enter LUCIUS.

Luc. Sweet are the slumbers of the vir-tuous man!

Oh, Marcia, I have seen thy godlike father;
Some power invisible supports his soul,
And bears it up in all its wonted greatness.
A kind, refreshing sleep is fall'n upon him:
I saw him stretch'd at ease; his fancy lost
In pleasing dreams; as I drew near his couch,
He smil'd, and cried, Caesar, thou canst not hurt me.

Marcia. His mind still labours with some dreadful thought.

Enter JUBA.

Juba. Lucius, the horsemen are return'd from viewing
The number, strength, and posture of our foes,
Who now encamp within a short hour's march;
On the high point of yon bright western tower
We ken them from afar; the setting sun
Plays on their shining arms and burnish'd helmets,
And covers all the field with gleams of fire.

Luc. Marcia, 'tis time we should awake thy father.
Caesar is still dispos'd to give us terms,
And waits at distance till he hears from Cato.

Enter PORTIUS.

Portius, thy looks speak somewhat of importance.

What tidings dost thou bring? Methinks I see
Unusual gladness sparkle in thy eyes.

Por. As I was hasting to the port, where now
My father's friends, impatient for a passage,
Accuse the ling'ring winds, a sail arriv'd
From Pompey's son, who, through the realms of Spain,

Calls out for vengeance on his father's death,
And rouses the whole nation up to arms.
Were Cato at their head, once more might Rome

Assert her rights, and claim her liberty.

[A groan is heard.
But, hark! what means that groan?—Oh,
give me way,
And let me fly into my father's presence!

[Exit.

Luc. Cato, amidst his slumbers, thinks on Rome,
And, in the wild disorder of his soul,
Mourns o'er his country.—Ha! a second groan—

Heav'n guard us all!

Mar. Alas, 'tis not the voice
Of one who sleeps; 'tis agonizing pain—
'Tis death is in that sound—

Re-enter PORTIUS.

Por. Oh, sight of woe!

Oh, Marcia, what we fear'd is come to pass!
Cato has fall'n upon his sword—

Luc. Oh, Portius,
Hide all the horrors of the mournful tale,
And let us guess the rest.

Por. I've rais'd him up,
And plac'd him in his chair; where, pale and faint,
He gasps for breath, and as his life flows
from him,
Demands to see his friends. His servants,
weeping,

Obsequious to his order, bear him hither!—

Mar. Oh, heav'n! assist me in this dreadful hour,
To pay the last sad duties to my father!

CATO brought on in a Chair.

Juba. These are thy triumphs, thy exploits, O Caesar!

Luc. Now is Rome fall'n indeed!

Cato. Here set me down—

Portius, come near me—Are my friends embark'd?

Can any thing be thought of for their service?
Whilst I yet live, let me not live in vain—

Oh, Lucius, art thou here?—Thou art too good—

Let this our friendship live between our children—

Make Portius happy in thy daughter Lucia.

Marcia, my daughter—

Oh, bend me forward!—Juba loves thee, Marcia.
A senator of Rome, while Rome surviv'd,
Would not have match'd his daughter with a king—

But Caesar's arms have thrown down all distinction—

I'm sick to death—Oh, when shall I get loose
From this vain world, th'abode of guilt and sorrow!

And yet, methinks, a beam of light breaks in
On my departing soul. Alas, I fear I've been too hasty!—Oh, ye powers, that search

The heart of man, and weigh his inmost
thoughts,

If I have done amiss, impute it not—

The best may err, but you are good, and—
Oh!—

[Dies.

Por. There fled the greatest soul that ever warm'd

A Roman breast:—Oh, Cato! oh, my friend!
Thy will shall be religiously observ'd.

But let us bear this awful corpse to Caesar,
And lay it in his sight, that it may stand,
A fence betwixt us and the victor's wrath:
Cato, though dead, shall still protect his friends.

From hence, let fierce contending nations
know,

What dire effects from civil discord flow:

'Tis this that shakes our country with alarms,
And gives up Rome a prey to Roman arms;
Produces fraud, and cruelty, and strife,
And robs the guilty world of Cato's life.

[Exeunt.

CONGREVE.

WILLIAM CONGREVE, descended from the Congreves in Staffordshire, who trace their ancestry as far back as before the conquest, first saw the light at Bardsa, near Leeds, Yorkshire, 1672. He was educated first at Kilkenny; and afterwards sent to the university in Dublin, under the direction of Dr. Ashe. His father, who was only a younger brother, and provided for in the army by a commission on the Irish establishment, had been compelled to undertake a journey thither in consequence of his command, being desirous his study should be directed to profit as well as improvement, sent him over to England, and placed him at the age of 16 as student in the Temple. Here he lived for several years, but with very little attention to statutes or reports. His disposition to become an author appeared very early; Johnson says, "Among all the efforts of early genius, which literary history records, I doubt whether any one can be produced that more surpasses the common limits of nature than the plays of Congreve." His first dramatic labour was The Old Bachelor, acted in 1693. This piece introduced him to Lord Halifax, the Mæcenas of the age, who, desirous of raising so promising a genius above the necessity of too hasty productions, made him one of the commissioners for licencing hackney-coaches. He soon after bestowed upon him a place in the Pipe-office, with one in the Customs of 600 pounds a year. 1694 Congreve produced The Double Dealer. The next year, when Betterton opened the new Theatre in Lincoln's-Inn Fields, he gave him his comedy of Love for Love. The Biographia Dramatica says, "This met with so much success, that they immediately offered the author a share in the profits of the house, on condition of his furnishing them with one play yearly. This offer he accepted: but whether through indolence or that correctness which he looked on as necessary to his works, his Mourning Bride did not come out till 1697, nor his Way of the World till two years after that." He had been involved in a long contest with Jeremy Collier, a furious and implacable non-juror, who published A Short View of the Immorality and Profaneness of the English Stage, in which he had very severely attacked some of Congreve's pieces: this, added to the ill success his Way of the World, though an exceeding good comedy, met with, completed his disgust; and he made a resolution of never more writing for the stage. Johnson says, "At last comedy grew more modest, and Collier lived to see the reward of his labour in the reformation of the theatre." In 1714, Congreve was appointed Commissioner of Wine Licences, and 17. Dec. same year was nominated Secretary of Jamaica, making altogether a yearly income of 1200 pounds. Johnson says, "His honours were yet far greater than his profits. Every writer mentioned him with respect; and, among other testimonies to his merit, Steele made him the patron of his Miscellany, and Pope inscribed to him his Translation of the Iliad. But he treated the Muses with ingratitude; for, having long conversed familiarly with the great, he wished to be considered rather as a man of fashion than of wit; and, when he received a visit from Voltaire, disgusted him by the despicable foppery of desiring to be considered not as an author but a gentleman; to which the Frenchman replied, 'If he had been only a gentleman, he should not have come to visit him.'" He died at his house in Surrey Street, in the Strand, January 29, 1728. Our limits will not allow us to give Johnson's account of this author; but every one agrees in considering him surprisingly eminent in his Theatrical pieces; at the same time, when he quitted this tract, he evidently failed; and, although his Miscellaneous Poems will ever maintain a respectable place in British literature, his crown was too closely wreathed for these to add one leaf to his poetical fame.

THE 'MOURNING BRIDE,

ACTED at Lincoln's-Inn Fields. 1697. This is the only Tragedy our author ever wrote, and it met with more success than any of his other pieces. Although Dr. Johnson accuses it of bombast and want of real nature; notwithstanding Dibdin says, that it is overcharged with imagery, as his comedies are with point, and if we try to conceive it, it is with an aching imagination, that may raise astonishment, but must destroy pleasure; it is to be considered that, "the poet's eye in a fine phrenzy rolling," in embodying "airy nothing," raises his mind so high above the things of this world in his look "from earth to heaven," that his conceptions appear too bold for a cool, criticising genius. It is certain, that the language of passion, in real life, is boisterous and elevated; and, in persons of a certain cast, may go a step farther than what in cooler moments would appear simple nature; and Dr. Johnson's criticism is evidently unprepared, for he says himself, he had not read Congreve's plays for many years. Could the great critic have been raised by the same feelings that actuated Congreve in composing his tragedy, it is very sure, he would not have pronounced so severe a sentence. We have not the smallest pretension to call in question the opinions of so great a man as Johnson on this play; knowing his attention was entirely directed to chasten the taste of the age; but we do think (if we can judge by our own feelings), that he must have felt a secret delight himself in reading this piece; and hope we do not overstep the bounds of modesty in declaring the story to be extremely pleasing, affecting, and well told; the language, although extremely elevated, may be allowed to be this side of bombast, expressing the ideas perhaps in an impassioned manner; but we believe not beyond the limits of poetical nature; and will content ourselves with sometimes being astonished for pleasure. Dr. Johnson declares, that, "If he were to select from the whole mass of English poetry the most poetical paragraph, he knows not what he could prefer to an exclamation in this tragedy ('No, all is hush'd, and still as death—'tis dreadful!') to: 'Thy voice—my own affrights me with its echoes!'" Johnson continues, "He who reads these lines enjoys for a moment the powers of a poet; he feels what he remembers to have felt before; but he feels it with great increase of sensibility; he recognises a familiar image, but meets it again amplified and expanded, embellished with beauty, and enlarged with majesty".

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A Room of State.

The Curtain rising slowly to soft Music, discovers ALMERIA in Mourning, LEONORA waiting. ALMERIA rises and comes forward:

Alm. Music has charms to sooth a savage breast,
To soften rocks, or bend a knotted oak.
I've read that things inanimate have mov'd,
And, as with living souls, have been inform'd,
By magic numbers and persuasive sound.
What then am I? Am I more senseless grown

Than trees or flint? O, force of constant woe!

'Tis not in harmony to calm my griefs.

Anselmo sleeps, and is at peace; last night

The silent tomb receiv'd the good old king;

He and his sorrows now are safely lodg'd

Within its cold, but hospitable bosom.

Why am not I at peace?

Leon. Dear madam, cease,

Or moderate your grief; there is no cause—

Alm. No cause! Peace, peace there is eternal cause,

And misery eternal will succeed.

Thou canst not tell—thou hast indeed no cause.

Leon. Believe me, madam, I lament Anselmo,
And always did compassionate his fortune:
Have often wept, to see how cruelly
Your father kept in chains his fellow king:
And oft at night, when all have been retir'd,
Have stol'n from bed, and to his prison crept,
Where, while his gaoler slept, I through the grate

Have softly whisper'd, and inquir'd his health,
Sent in my sighs and pray'rs for his deliverance;
For sighs and pray'rs were all that I could offer.

Alm. Indeed thou hast a soft and gentle nature,

That thus could melt to see a stranger's wrongs.
O, Leonora, hadst thou known Anselmo,
How would thy heart have bled to see his sufferings!

Thou hadst no cause but general compassion.

Leon. Love of my royal mistress gave me cause,

My love of you begot my grief for him;
For I had heard that when the chance of war
Had bless'd Anselmo's arms with victory,
And the rich spoil of all the field, and you,
The glory of the whole, were made the prey
Of his success,

He did endear himself to your affection,
By all the worthy and indulgent ways
His most industrious goodness could invent;
Proposing, by a match between Alphonso,
His son, the brave Valencian prince, and you,
To end the long dissension, and unite
The jarring crowns.

Alm. Why was I carried to Anselmo's court?
Or there, why was I us'd so tenderly?
Why not ill treated, like an enemy?
For so my father would have us'd his child.
O, Alphonso, Alphonso!

Devouring seas have wash'd thee from my sight,
No time shall rase thee from my memory;
No, I will live to be thy monument:
The cruel ocean is no more thy tomb;
But in my heart thou art interr'd; there, there,
Thy dear resemblance is for ever fix'd;
My love, my lord, my husband still, though lost!

Leon. Husband! O, heav'ns!

Alm. Alas! What have I said?

My grief has hurry'd me beyond all thought.
I would have kept that secret; though I know
Thy love and faith to me deserve all confidence.

Leon. Witness these tears—

The memory of that brave prince stands fair
In all report—

And I have heard imperfectly his loss;
But fearful to renew your troubles past,
I never did presume to ask the story.

Alm. If for my swelling heart I can, I'll tell thee.

I was a welcome captive in Valencia,
Ev'n on the day when Manuel, my father,
Led on his conqu'ring troops, high as the gates
Of king Anselmo's palace; which, in rage,
And heat of war, and dire revenge, he fir'd.
The good king flying to avoid the flames,
Started amidst his foes, and made captivity
His fatal refuge—Would that I had fall'n
Amidst those flames—but 'twas not so decreed.
Alphonso, who foresaw my father's cruelty,
Had borne the queen and me on board a ship
Ready to sail; and when this news was brought
We put to sea; but being betray'd by some

Who knew our flight, we closely were pursu'd,
And almost taken; when a sudden storm
Drove us, and those that follow'd, on the coast
Of Afric: There our vessel struck the shore,
And, bulging 'gainst a rock was dash'd in pieces,
But heav'n spar'd me for yet much more affliction!

Conducting them who follow'd us, to shun
The shoal, and save me floating on the waves,
While the good queen and my Alphonso perish'd.

Leon. Alas! Were you then wedded to Alphonso?

Alm. That day, that fatal day, our hands were join'd.

For when my lord beheld the ship pursuing,
And saw her rate so far exceeding ours,
He came to me, and begg'd me by my love,
I would consent the priest should make us one;
That whether death or victory ensu'd,
I might be his, beyond the pow'r of fate:
The queen too did assist his suit—I granted;
And in one day was wedded, and a widow.

Leon. Indeed, 'twas mournful—

Alm. 'Twas—as I have told thee—

For which I mourn, and will for ever mourn;
Nor will I change these black and dismal robes,
Or ever dry these swoln and wat'ry eyes;
Or ever taste content, or peace of heart,
While I have life and thought of my Alphonso. [Loud shouts.

Leon. Hark!

The distant shouts proclaim your father's triumph. [Shouts at a distance.

O cease for heav'n's sake, assuage a little
This torrent of your grief; for much I fear
'Twill urge his wrath, to see you drown'd in tears,

When joy appears in ev'ry other face.

Alm. And joy he brings to ev'ry other heart,
But double, double weight of woe to mine;
For with him Garcia comes—Garcia, to whom
I must be sacrificed, and all the vows
I gave my dear Alphonso basely broken.
No, it shall never be; for I will die
First, die ten thousand deaths.—Look down, look down, [Kneels.

Alphonso, hear the sacred vow I make;
And thou, Anselmo, if yet thou art arriv'd
Through all impediments of purging fire,
To that bright heav'n where my Alphonso reigns,
Behold thou also, and attend my vow:

If ever I do yield, or give consent,
By any action, word, or thought, to wed
Another lord; may then just heav'n show'r down
Unheard-of curses on me, greater far
(If such there be in angry heav'n's vengeance)
Than any I have yet endur'd.—And now [Rising.

My heart has some relief: having so well
Discharg'd this debt, incumbent on my love.
Yet one thing more I would engage from thee.

Leon. My heart, my life, and will, are only yours.

Alm. I thank thee. 'Tis but this: anon, when all

Are wrapp'd and busied in the general joy,
Thou wilt withdraw, and privately with me
Steal forth to visit good Anselmo's tomb.

Leon. Alas! I fear some fatal resolution.

Alm. No, on my life, my faith, I mean no ill,
Nor violence.—I feel myself more light,

And more at large since I have made this vow.
Perhaps I would repeat it there more solemnly.
Tis that, or some such melancholy thought;
Upon my word, no more.

Leon. I will attend you.

Enter ALONZO.

Alon. The lord Gonzalez comes to tell your highness

The king is just arrived.

Alm. Conduct him in. [Exit Alonzo.
That's his pretence: his errand is, I know,
To fill my ears with Garcia's valiant deeds;
And gild and magnify his son's exploits.
But I am arm'd with ice around my heart,
Not to be warm'd with words, or idle eloquence.

Enter GONSALEZ.

Gon. Be ev'ry day of your long life like this.
The sun, bright conquest, and your brighter eyes,
Have all conspir'd to blaze promiscuous light,
And bless this day with most unequal lustre.
Your royal father, my victorious lord,
Laden with spoils, and ever-living laurel,
Is entering now in martial pomp the palace.
Five hundred mules precede his solemn march,
Which groan beneath the weight of Moorish wealth.

Chariots of war, adorn'd with glitt'ring gems,
Succeed; and next, a hundred neighing steeds,
White as the fleecy rain on Alpine hills;
That bound and foam, and champ the golden bit,

As they disdain'd the victory they grace.
Prisoners of war in shining fetters follow:
And captains of the noblest blood of Afric
Sweat by his chariot-wheels;
The swarming populace spread every wall,
While you alone retire, and shun this sight;
This sight, which is indeed not seen (though twice

The multitude should gaze) in absence of your eyes.

Alm. My lord, mine eyes ungratefully behold
The gilded trophies of exterior honours.
Nor will my ears be charm'd with sounding words,

Or pompous phrase; the pageantry of souls.
But that my father is return'd in safety,
I bend to heav'n with thanks.

Gon. Excellent princess!

But 'tis a task unfit for my weak age
With dying words to offer at your praise.
Garcia, my son, your beauty's lowest slave,
Has better done, in proving with his sword
The force and influence of your matchless charms.

Alm. I doubt not of the worth of Garcia's
deeds,
Which had been brave, though I had ne'er been born.

Leon. Madam, the king.

*Symphony of warlike Music. Enter the KING, attended by GARCIA and several Officers; Files of Prisoners, in Chains, and Guards. ALMERIA meets the KING, and kneels; afterwards GONSALEZ kneels and kisses the KING's Hand, while GARCIA
'does the same to the PRINCESS.*

King. Almeria, rise—My best Gonzalez, rise—

What, tears! my good old friend—

Gon. But tears of joy.

Believe me, sir, to see you thus, has fill'd
Mine eyes with more delight than they can hold.

King. By heav'n thou lov'st me, and I am pleas'd thou dost.

Take it for thanks, old man, that I rejoice
To see thee weep on this occasion—some
Here are, who seem to mourn at our success!

Why is't, Almeria, that you meet our eyes,
Upon this solemn day, in these sad weeds?
In opposition to my brightness, you
And yours are all like daughters of affliction.

Alm. Forgive me, sir, if I in this offend.
The year, which I have vow'd to pay to heav'n,
In mourning and strict life, for my deliverance
From wreck and death, wants yet to be expir'd,

King. Your zeal to heav'n is great, so is your debt;

Yet something too is due to me, who gave
That life which heav'n preserv'd. A day bestow'd

In filial duty, had aton'd and given
A dispensation to your vow—No more!

'Twas weak and wilful—and a woman's error.
Yet—upon thought, it doubly wounds my sight,
To see that sable worn upon the day
Succeeding that in which our deadliest foe,
Hated Anselmo! was interr'd—By heav'n!
It looks as thou didst mourn for him! just so
Thy senseless vow appear'd to bear its date,
Not from that hour wherein thou wert preserv'd,

But that wherein the curs'd Alphonso perish'd.
Ha! What! thou dost not weep to think of that?

Gon. Have patience, royal sir; the princess weeps

To have offended you. If fate decreed,
One pointed hour should be Alphonso's loss,
And her deliverance, is she to blame?

King. I tell thee she's to blame, not to have feasted

When my first foe was laid in earth; such enmity,

Such detestation bears my blood to his:
My daughter should have revell'd at his death;
She should have made these palace walls to shake,

And all this high and ample roof to ring
With her rejoicings. What, to mourn and weep!

Then, then to weep, and pray, and grieve
By heav'n!

There's not a slave, a shackled slave of mine,
But should have smil'd that hour, through all his care,

And shook his chains in transport and rude harmony!

Gon. What she has done was in excess of goodness;

Betray'd by too much piety, to seem
As if she had offended.—Sure, no more.

King. To seem is to commit, at this conjuncture.

I wo'not have a seeming sorrow seen
To-day.—Retire, divest yourself with speed
Of that offensive black; on me be all
The violation of your vow; for you,
It shall be your excuse that I command it.

Gar. [Kneeling] Your pardon, sir, if I presume so far,

As to remind you 'of your gracious promise.

King. Rise, Garcia—I forgot. Yet stay, Almeria.

Alm. My boding heart!—What is your pleasure, sir?

King. Draw near, and give your hand: and Garcia, yours:

Receive this lord, as one whom I have found
Worthy to be your husband and my son.

Gar. Thus let me kneel to take—O not to take—

But to devote, and yield myself for ever
The slave and creature of my royal mistress.

Gon. O let me prostrate pay my worthless thanks—

King. No more; my promise long since pass'd, thy services,

And Garcia's well-try'd valour, all oblige me.
This day we triumph; but to-morrow's sun,
Garcia, shall shine to grace thy nuptials—

Alm. Oh! [Faints.]

Gar. She faints! help to support her.

Gon. She recovers.

King. A fit of bridal fear. How is't, Almeria?

Alm. A sudden chillness seizes on my spirits.
Your leave, sir, to retire.

King. Garcia, conduct her.

[Garcia leads Almeria to the Door, and returns.]

This idle vow hangs on her woman's fears.
I'll have a priest shall preach her from her faith,
And make it sin not to renounce that vow
Which I'd have broken. Now, what would Alonso?

Enter ALONZO and Attendants.

Alon. Your beauteous captive, Zara, is arriv'd,
And with a train as if she still were wife
To Albucacim, and the moor had conquer'd.

King. It is our will she should be so attended.

Bear hence these prisoners, Garcia, which is he,
Of whose mute valour you relate such wonders?

[Prisoners led off.]

Gar. Osmyn, who led the Moorish horse;
but he,

Great sir, at her request, attends on Zara.

King. He is your prisoner; as you please dispose him.

Gar. I would oblige him, but he shuns my kindness;

And with a haughty mien, and stern civility,
Dumbly declines all offers: if he speak,

'Tis scarce above a word; as he were born Alone to do, and did disdain to talk;

At least to talk where he must not command.

King. Such sullenness, and in a man so brave,
Must have some other cause than his captivity.

Did Zara, then, request he might attend her?

Gar. My lord, she did.

King. That, join'd with his behaviour,
Begets a doubt. I'd have 'em watch'd; perhaps
Her chains hang heavier on him than his own.

Enter ZARA and OSMYN, in Chains; conducted by PEREZ and a Guard, attended by SELIM and several Mutes.

King. What welcome and what honours,
beauteous Zara,

A king and conqueror can give, are yours.
A conqueror indeed, where you are won;

Who with such lustre strike admiring eyes,

That had our pomp been with your presence
grac'd,

Th' expecting crowd had been deceiv'd; and seen
The monarch enter not triumphant, but

In pleasing triumph led; your beauty's slave.

Zara. If I on any terms could condescend
To like captivity, or think those honours,

Which conquerors in courtesy bestow,
Of equal value with unborrow'd rule,

And native right, to arbitrary sway,
I might be pleas'd, when I behold this train

With usual homage wait. But when I feel
These bonds, I look with loathing on myself;

And scorn vile slavery, though doubly hid
Beneath mock-praises, and dissembled state.

King. Those bonds! 'Twas my command
you should be free;

How durst you, Perez, disobey?

Per. Great sir,
Your order was she should not wait your
triumph;

But at some distance follow, thus attended.

King. 'Tis false! 'twas more! I bid she should be free;

If not in words, I bid it by my eyes!
Her eyes did more than bid—Free her and hers

With speed;—yet stay—my hands alone can make

Fit restitution here,—Thus I release you,
And by releasing you, enslave myself.

Zara. Such favours, so conferr'd, though when unsought,

Deserve acknowledgment from noble minds.
Such thanks, as one hating to be oblig'd—

Yet hating more ingratitude, can pay,
I offer.

King. Born to excel, and to command!
As by transcendent beauty to attract

All eyes, so by pre-eminence of soul
To rule all hearts.

Garcia, what's he, who with contracted brow,
[Beholding Osmyn, as they unbind him.]

And sullen port, glooms downwards with
his eyes,

At once regardless of his chains, or liberty?

Gar. That, sir, is he of whom I spoke;
that's Osmyn.

King. He answers well the character you gave him.

Whence comes it, valiant Osmyn, that a man
So great in arms, as thou art said to be,

So hardly can endure captivity,
The common chance of war?

Osm. Because captivity
Has robb'd me of a dear and just revenge.

King. I understand not that.

Osm. I would not have you,

Zara. That gallant Moor in battle lost a
friend,

Whom more than life he lov'd; and the regret
Of not revenging on his foes that loss,

Has caus'd this melancholy and despair.

King. She does excuse him: 'tis as I suspected. [To Gonzalez.]

Gon. That friend may be herself: seem not to heed

His arrogant reply: she looks concern'd.

King. I'll have inquiry made; perhaps his friend

Yet lives, and is a prisoner. His name?

Zara. Heli.

King. Garcia, that search shall be your care:

It shall be mine to pay devotion here;
At this fair shrine to lay my laurels down,
And raise love's altar on the spoils of war.
Conquest and triumph now, are mine no more;
Nor will I victory in camps adore:
Fickle in fields, unsteadily she flies,
But rules with settled sway in Zara's eyes.

[Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I. The Aisle of a Temple.Enter ALMERIA and LEONORA.Alm. It was a fancy'd noise, for all is hush'd.Leon. It bore the accent of a human voice.Alm. It was thy fear, or else some transient wind Whistling through hollows of this vaulted aisle.

We'll listen—

Leon. Hark!Alm. No, all is hush'd, and still as death—
'tis dreadful!

How rev'rend is the face of this tall pile,
Whose ancient pillars rear their marble heads,
To bear aloft its arch and pond'rous roof,
By its own weight made stedfast and im-
moveable,

Looking tranquillity. It strikes an awe
And terror on my aching sight: the tombs
And monumental caves of death look cold,
And shoot a chillness to my trembling heart.
Give me thy hand, and let me hear thy voice;
Nay, quickly speak to me, and let me hear Thy voice—my own affrights me with its echoes.

Leon. Let us return: the horror of this place,
And silence, will increase your melancholy.Alm. It may my fears, but cannot add to that.
No, I will on; show me Anselmo's tomb;
Lead me o'er bones and skulls, and mouldering earth

Of human bodies, for I'll mix with them;
Or wind me in the shroud of some pale corse
Yet green in earth, rather than be the bride
Of Garcia's more detested bed: that thought
Exerts my spirit; and my present fears
Are lost in dread of greater ill. Then show me, Lead me, for I'm bolder grown: Lead on Where I may kneel, and pay my vows again
To him, to heav'n, and my Alphonso's soul.

[Exeunt.]SCENE II. Opens and discovers a Place of Tombs; one Monument fronting the View.Enter HELI.

Hel. I wander through this maze of monuments,
Yet cannot find him—hark! sure 'tis the voice
Of one complaining—there it sounds—I'll follow it, [Exit.]

Enter ALMERIA and LEONORA.Leon. Behold the sacred vault, within whose tomb

The poor remains of good Anselmo rest,
Yet fresh and unconsum'd by time or worms.
What do I see? O heav'n! either my eyes
Are false, or still the marble door remains
Unclos'd; the iron gates, that lead to death
Beneath, are still wide-stretch'd upon their hinge,
And staring on us with unfolded leaves.

Alm. Sure 'tis the friendly yawn of death
for me;

And that dumb mouth, significant in show
Invites me to the bed, where I alone Shall rest; shows me the grave, where nature, weary
And long oppress'd with woes and bending cares,
May lay the burden down and sink in slumbers
Of peace eternal. My father then
Will cease his tyranny; and Garcia too
Will fly my pale deformity with loathing.
My soul, enlarg'd from its vile bonds, will mount,

And range the starry orbs and milky ways
To my Alphonso's soul. O joy too great!
O ecstasy of thought! Help me, Anselmo!
Help me, Alphonso! take me, reach thy hand;
To thee, to thee I call, to thee, Alphonso!
O Alphonso!

Enter OSMYN from the Tomb.Osm. Who calls that wretched thing that was Alphonso?Alm. Angels, and all the host of heaven, support me!Osm. Whence is that voice, whose shrillness
from the grave,
And growing to his father's shroud roots up
Alphonso?Alm. Mercy! Providence! O speak,
Speak to it quickly, quickly; speak to me,
Comfort me, help me, hold me, hide me, hide me,
Leonora, in thy bosom from the light,
And from my eyes.Osm. Amazement and illusion!
Rivet and nail me where I stand, ye pow'rs,
[Coming forward.]

That motionless I may be still deceiv'd.
Let me not stir or breathe, lest I dissolve
That tender, lovely form of painted air,
So like Almeria. Ha! it sinks, it falls;
I'll catch it ere it goes, and grasp her shade.
'Tis life! 'tis warm! 'tis she! 'tis she herself!
Nor dead, nor shade, but breathing and alive!
It is Almeria, 'tis, it is my wife!

Re-enter HELI.Leon. Alas, she stirs not yet, nor lifts her eyes!He too is fainting—Help me, help me, stranger, Whoe'er thou art, and lend thy hand to raise
These bodies.Hel. Ha! 'tis he! and with Almeria!
O miracle of happiness! O joy
Unhoped for! Does Almeria live?Osm. Where is she?
Let me behold and touch her, and be sure
'Tis she.Look up, Almeria, bless me with thy eyes;
Look on thy love, thy lover, and thy husband.Alm. I've sworn I'll not wed Garcia: why d'y'e force me?

Is this a father?

Osm. Look on thy Alphonso.
Thy father is not here, my love, nor Garcia:
Nor am I what I seem, but thy Alphonso.
Am I so alter'd, or art thou so chang'd,
That seeing my disguise, thou seest not me?Alm. It is, it is Alphonso! 'tis his face,
His voice; I know him now, I know him all.
Oh! how hast thou return'd? how hast thou charm'd

The wildness of the waves and rocks to this?

That thus relenting they have giv'n thee back
To earth, to light and life, to love and me.

Osm. O I'll not ask, nor answer how, or why

We both have backward trod the paths of fate
To meet again in life; to know I have thee,
Is knowing more than any circumstance
Or means by which I have thee—
To fold thee thus, to press thy balmy lips,
And gaze upon thy eyes, is so much joy,
I have no leisure to reflect, or know,
Or trifle time in thinking.

Alm. Stay awhile—

Let me look on thee yet a little more.

Osm. And why? what dost thou mean? why dost thou gaze so?

Alm. I know not, 'tis to see thy face, I think—
It is too much! too much to bear, and live!
To see him thus again is such profusion
Of joy, of bliss—I cannot bear—I must Be mad—I cannot be transported thus!

Osm. Thou excellence, thou joy, thou heav'n
of love!

Alm. Where hast thou been? and how art thou alive?

Sure from thy father's tomb thou didst arise!

Osm. I did; and thou, my love, didst call me; thou.

Alm. True; but how cam'st thou there?
wert thou alone?

Osm. I was, and lying on my father's lead,
When broken echoes of a distant voice
Disturb'd the sacred silence of the vault,
In murmurs round my head. I rose and listen'd,
And thought I heard thy spirit call Alphonso;
I thought I saw thee too; but O, I thought not
That I indeed should be so blest to see thee—

Alm. But still how cam'st thou hither? how thus?—Ha!

What's he who, like thyself, is started here
Ere seen?

Osm. Where? Ha! what do I see? Antonio!
I'm fortunate indeed—my friend too, safe!

Heli. Most happily, in finding you thus blest.

Alm. More miracles! Antonio too escap'd!

Osm. And twice escap'd, both from the rage of seas

And war; for in the fight I saw him fall.

Heli. But fell unhurt, a pris'ner as yourself,
And as yourself made free: hither I came Impatiently to seek you, where I knew
Your grief would lead you to lament Anselmo.

Osm. What means the bounty of all-gracious heav'n,

That persevering still, with open hand
It scatters good, as in a waste of mercy?

Where will this end? But heav'n is infinite
In all, and can continue to bestow,
When scanty number shall be spent in telling.

Leon. Or I'm deceiv'd, or I beheld the glimpse

Of two in shining habits, cross the aisle;
Who, by their pointing, seem'd to mark this place.

Alm. Sure I have dreamt, if we must part so soon.

Osm. I wish at least our parting were a dream,

Or we could sleep till we again were met.

Heli. Zara with Selim, sir; I saw and know 'em:

You must be quick, for love will lend her wings.

Alm. What love? who is she? why are you alarm'd?

Osm. She's the reverse of thee; she's my unhappiness.

Harbour no thought that may disturb thy peace;
I'll think how we may meet

To part no more: my friend will tell thee all;
How I escap'd, how I am here, and thus;
How I'm not call'd Alphonso now, but Osmyn,
And he Heli. All, all he will unfold,
Ere next we meet—

Alm. Sure we shall meet again—

Osm. We shall; we part not but to meet again.

Gladness and warmth of ever-kindling love
Dwell with thee, and revive thy heart in absence.

[Exeunt Almeria, Leonora, and Heli.]

Yet I behold her—yet—and now no more.
Turn your lights inward, eyes, and view my thought,
So shall you still behold her.

Enter ZARA and SELIM.

Zara. See where he stands, folded and fix'd to earth,

Stiff'ning in thought, a statue among statues!
Why, cruel Osmyn, dost thou fly me thus?
Am I more loathsome to thee than the grave,
That thou dost seek to shield thee there, and shun

My love? But to the grave I'll follow thee—
He looks not, minds not, hears not: barb'rous
man,

Am I neglected thus? am I despis'd?
Not heard! ungrateful Osmyn!

Osm. Ha! 'tis Zara!

Zara. Yes, traitor! Zara, lost, abandon'd Zara,
Is a regardless suppliant now to Osmyn.
The slave, the wretch that she redeem'd from
death,

Disdains to listen now, or look on Zara.

Osm. Far be the guilt of such reproaches
from me;

Lost in myself, and blinded by my thoughts,
I saw you not till now.

Zara. Now then you see me—

But with such dumb and thankless eyes you look,

Better I was unseen than seen thus coldly.

Osm. What would you from a wretch who came to mourn,

And only for his sorrows chose this solitude?
Look round, joy is not here, nor cheerfulness.
You have pursu'd misfortune to its dwelling,
Yet look for gaiety and gladness there.

Zara. Inhuman! Why, why dost thou rack
me thus,

And with perverseness, from the purpose,
answer?

What is't to me, this house of misery?

What joy do I require? If thou dost mourn,
I come to mourn with thee; to share thy griefs,
And give thee for 'em, in exchange, my love.

Osm. O that's the greatest grief—I am so poor,

I have not wherewithal to give again.

Zara. Thou hast a heart, though 'tis a savage one;

Give it me as it is; I ask no more

For all I've done, and all I have endur'd:
For saving thee, when I beheld thee first,

Driven by the tide upon my country's coast,
Pale and expiring, drench'd in briny waves,
Thou and thy friend, till my compassion found
thee:

Compassion! scarce will own that name, so soon,
So quickly was it love, for thou wert godlike
Ev'n then. Kneeling on earth, I loos'd my hair,
And with it dried those wat'ry cheeks, then chaf'd
Thy temples, till reviving blood arose,
And like the morn vermilion'd o'er thy face.
O heav'n! how did my heart rejoice and ache,
When I beheld the day-break of thy eyes,
And felt the balm of thy respiring lips!
O, why do I relate what I have done?
What did I not? was't not for you this war Commenc'd? Not knowing who you were, nor
why

You hated Manuel, I urg'd my husband
To this invasion, where he late was lost,
Where all is lost, and I am made a slave.
Look on me now, from empire fall'n to slavery;
Think on my sufferings first, then look on me;
Think on the cause of all, then view thyself:
Reflect on Osmyn, and then look on Zara,
The fall'n, the lost, and now the captive Zara;
And now abandon'd—say, what then is Osmyn!

Osm. A fatal wretch—a huge stupendous ruin,

That, tumbling on its prop, crush'd all beneath,
And bore contiguous palaces to earth.

Zara. Yet thus, thus fall'n, thus levell'd with the vilest,

If I have gain'd thy love, 'tis glorious ruin;
Ruin! 'tis still to reign, and to be more.
A queen; for what are riches, empire, pow'r,
But larger means to gratify the will?

The steps on which we tread, to rise and reach Our wish; and that obtain'd, down with the scaffolding

Of sceptres, crowns, and thrones; they have serv'd their end,

And are, like lumber, to be left and scorn'd.

Osm. Why was I made the instrument, to throw

In bonds the frame of this exalted mind?

Zara. We may be free, the conqueror is mine!

In chains, unseen, I hold him by the heart,
And can unwind and strain him as I please.
Give me thy love, I'll give thee liberty.

Osm. In vain you offer, and in vain require
What neither can bestow. Set free yourself,
And leave a slave the wretch that would be so.

Zara. Thou canst not mean so poorly as thou talk'st.

Osm. Alas you know me not.

Zara. Not who thou art:

But what this last ingratitude declares,
This grov'ling baseness—Thou say'st true, I
know

Thee not, for what thou art yet wants a name:
But something so unworthy and so vile,
That to have lov'd thee makes me yet more lost,
Than all the malice of my other fate.

Traitor, monster, cold and perfidious slave!

A slave, not daring to be free! nor dares
To love above him, for 'tis dangerous:

There, there's the dreadful sound, the king's thy rival!

Sc. Madam, the king is here, and ent'ring now.

Zara. As I could wish; by heav'n I'll be reveng'd.

Enter the KING, PEREZ, and Attendants.

King. Why does the fairest of her kind withdraw

Her shining from the day, to gild this scene
Of death and night? Ha! what disorder's this?
Somewhat I heard of king and rival mention'd.
What's he that dares be rival to the king,
Or lift his eyes to like where I adore?

Zara. There, he, your pris'ner, and that was my slave.

King. How! better than my hopes! does she accuse him? [Aside.

Zara. Am I become so low by my captivity,
And do your arms so lessen what they conquer,
That Zara must be made the sport of slaves?
And shall the wretch, whom yester sun beheld
Waiting my nod, the creature of my pow'r,
Presume to-day to plead audacious love,
And build bold hopes on my dejected fate?

King. Better for him to tempt the rage of
heav'n,
And wrench the bolt, red-hissing from the hand
Of him that thunders, than but think that insolence.

'Tis daring for a god. Hence to the wheel
With that Ixion, who aspires to hold
Divinity embrac'd; to whips and prisons
Drag him with speed, and rid me of his face.

[Guards seize Osmyn.

Zara. Compassion led me to bemoan his state,

Whose former faith had merited much more:
And through my hopes in you, I undertook
He should be set at large: thence sprung his
insolence;

And what was charity he constru'd love.

King. Enough; his punishment be what you
please.

But let me lead you from this place of sorrow,
To one where young delights attend;
Where ev'ry hour shall roll in circling joys,
And love shall wing the tedious-wasting day.
Life without love is load, and time stands still:
What we refuse to him, to death we give,
And then, then only, when we love, we live.

[Exeunt.

ACT III.

SCENE I.—A prison.

OSMYN discovered alone, with a Paper.

Osm. But now, and I was clos'd within the tomb

That holds my father's ashes; and but now,
Where he was pris'ner, I am too imprison'd.
Sure 'tis the hand of heav'n that leads me thus,
And for some purpose points out these remembrances.

In a dark corner of my cell I found
This paper; what it is this light will show.

[Reads] If my Alphonso—Ha!

*If my Alphonso live, restore him, heav'n!
Give me more weight, crush my declining
years*

With bolts, with chains, imprisonment, and want;

*But bless my son! visit not him for me!
(It is his hand! this was his pray'r;—yet more):
Let ev'ry hair, which sorrow by the roots
Tears from my hoary and devoted head,
Be doubled in thy mercies to my son!
Not for myself, but him, hear me, all-gracious—*

'Tis wanting what should follow!—Heav'n should follow,
 But 'tis torn off! Why should that word alone
 Be torn from this petition? 'Twas to heav'n,
 But heav'n was deaf; heav'n heard him not:
 but thus,

Thus as the name of heav'n from this is torn,
 So did it tear the ears of mercy from His voice, shutting the gates of pray'r against
 him!

If piety be thus debarr'd access
 On high, and of good men the very best
 Is singled out to bleed, and bear the scourge,
 What is reward? or what is punishment?
 But who shall dare to tax eternal Justice?
 Yet I may think—I may, I must; for thought
 Precedes the will to think, and error lives
 Ere reason can be born.

What noise! Who's there? My friend! how cam'st thou hither?

Enter HELI.

Heli. The time's too precious to be spent in telling.

The captain, influenc'd by Almeria's pow'r,
 Gave order to the guards for my admittance.

Osm. How does Almeria? But I know she is
 As I am. Tell me, may I hope to see her?

Heli. You may: anon, at midnight, when the king

Is gone to rest, and Garcia is retir'd
 (Who takes the privilege to visit late, Presuming on a bridegroom's right), she'll come.

Osm. She'll come! 'tis what I wish, yet what I fear.

She'll come: but whither, and to whom? O,
 heav'n!

To a vile prison, and a captive wretch;
 To one, whom had she never known, she had Been happy. Why, why was that heav'nly creature

Abandon'd o'er to love what heav'n forsakes?
 Why does she follow, with unwearied steps.
 One who has tir'd misfortune with pursuing?

Heli. Have hopes, and hear the voice of better fate.

I've learn'd there are disorders ripe for mutiny Among the troops, who thought to share the plunder,

Which Manuel to his own use and avarice
 Converts. The news has reach'd Valencia's frontiers;

Where many of your subjects, long oppress'd
 With tyranny and grievous impositions,
 Are ris'n in arms, and call for chiefs to head
 And lead them to regain their rights and liberty.

Osm. By heav'n, thou'st rous'd me from my lethargy.

The spirit, which was deaf to my own wrongs,
 And the loud cries of my dead father's blood;
 O, my Antonio, I am all on fire;

My soul is up in arms, ready to charge
 And bear amidst the foe with conqu'ring troops.
 I hear 'em call to lead 'em on to liberty,
 To victory; their shouts and clamours rend
 My ears, and reach the heav'ns! Where is the king?

Where is Alphonso? Ha! where, where indeed?

O! I could tear and burst the strings of life,
 To break these chains! Off! off! ye stains of royalty;

Off, slavery! O curse! that I alone
 Can beat and flutter in my cage, when I,
 Would soar, and stoop at victory beneath!

Heli. Zara, the cause of your restraint, may be

The means of liberty restor'd. That gain'd,
 Occasion will not fail to point out ways
 For your escape: meantime, I've thought already
 With speed and safety to convey myself,
 Where not far off some malcontents hold council
 Nightly, who hate this tyrant; some, who love
 Anselmo's memory, and will, for certain,
 When they shall know you live, assist your
 cause.

Osm. My friend and counsellor, as thou think'st fit,

So do. I will with patience wait my fortune.

Heli. When Zara comes, abate of your aversion.

Osm. I hate her not, nor can dissemble love:
 But as I may, I'll do. Farewell,
 My friend, the good thou dost deserve attend thee! [Exit Heli.]

I've been to blame, and question'd with impiety
 The care of heav'n. Not so my father bore
 More anxious grief. This should have better taught me;

This his last legacy to me; which here
 I'll treasure as more worth than diadems,
 Or all extended rule of regal pow'r.

Enter ZARA, veiled.

What brightness breaks upon me thus through shades,

And promises a day to this dark dwelling?
 Is it my love?—

Zara. O that thy heart had taught [Lifting her Veil.]

Thy tongue that saying!

Osm. Zara! I am betray'd by my surprise!
[Aside.]

Zara. What, does my face displease thee?
 That having seen it thou dost turn thy eyes
 Away, as from deformity and horror!

If so, this sable curtain shall again
 Be drawn, and I will stand before thee, seeing
 And unseen. Is it my love? Ask again
 That question; speak again in that soft voice;
 And look again with wishes in thy eyes.

O, no, thou canst not; for thou seest me now,
 As she whose savage breast hath been the cause
 Of these thy wrongs; as she whose barb'rous
 rage

Has loaded thee with chains and galling irons:

Osm. You wrong me, beauteous Zara, to believe

I bear my fortunes with so low a mind.
 But destiny and inauspicious stars
 Have cast me down to this low being; or Granting you had, from you I have deserv'd it.

Zara. Canst thou forgive me then? wilt thou believe

So kindly of my fault, to call it madness?
 O, give that madness yet a milder name,
 And call it passion; then be still more kind,
 And call that passion love!

Osm. Give it a name,
 Or being as you please, such I will think it.

Zara. O, thou dost wound me more with this thy goodness,
 Than e'er thou couldst with bitterest re-proaches;

Thy anger could not pierce thus to my heart.

Osm. Yet I could wish—

Zara. Haste me to know it: what?

Osm. That at this time I had not been this thing.

Zara. What thing?

Osm. This slave.

Zara. O, heav'n; my fears interpret
This thy silence; somewhat of high concern,
Long fashioning within thy lab'ring mind,
And now just ripe for birth, my rage has ruin'd.
Have I done this? Tell me, am I so curs'd?

Osm. Time may have still one fated hour to come,

Which, wing'd with liberty, might overtake Occasion past.

Zara. Swift as occasion, I Myself will fly; and earlier than the morn
Wake thee to freedom.

Osm. I have not merited this grace;
Nor, should my secret purpose take effect,
Can I repay, as you require, such benefits.

Zara. Thou canst not owe me more, nor have I more

To give than I've already lost. But now,
So does the form of our engagements rest,
Thou hast the wrong till I redeem thee hence;
That done, I leave thy justice to return
My love. Adieu! [Exit.

Osm. This woman has a soul
Of godlike mould, intrepid and commanding,
And challenges, in spite of me, my best Esteem.

But she has passions which outstrip the wind,
And tear her virtues up, as tempests root
The sea. I fear, when she shall know the truth,
Some swift and dire event of her blind rage
Will make all fatal. But behold she comes,
For whom I fear, to shield me from my fears,
The cause and comfort of my boding heart.

Enter ALMERIA.

My life, my health, my liberty, my all!
How shall I welcome thee to this sad place?
How speak to thee the words of joy and transport?

How run into thy arms withheld by fetters?
Or take thee into mine, while I'm thus manacled

And pinion'd like a thief or murderer?
Shall I not hurt or bruise thy tender body,
And stain thy bosom with the rust of these Rude irons? Must I meet thee thus, Almeria?

Alm. Thus, thus; we parted, thus to meet again.

Thou told'st me thou wouldst think, how we might meet

To part no more—Now we will part no more;
For these thy chains, or death, shall join us ever.

Osm. Oh! O—

Alm. Give me that sigh.

Why dost thou heave, and stifle in thy griefs?
Thy heart will burst, thy eyes look red and start;

Give thy soul way, and tell me thy dark thought.

Osm. For this world's rule, I would not wound thy breast

With such a dagger as then struck my heart.

Alm. Why? why? To know it, cannot wound me more,

Than knowing thou hast felt it. Tell it me—
Thou giv'st me pain with too much tenderness.

Osm. And thy excessive love distracts my sense.

O, wouldst thou be less killing, soft, or kind,
Grief could not double thus his darts against me

Alm. Thou dost me wrong, and grief too
robs my heart,

If there he shoot not ev'ry other shaft:
Thy second self should feel each other wound,
And woe should be in equal portions dealt.
I am thy wife—

Osm. O, thou hast search'd too deep!
There, there I bleed! there pull the cruel cords,
That strain my cracking nerves; engines and wheels,

That piecemeal grind, are beds of down and balm

To that soul-racking thought.

Alm. Then I am curs'd
Indeed, if that be so; if I'm thy torment,
Kill me, then kill me, dash me with thy chains,
Tread on me:

Am I, am I of all thy woes the worst?

Osm. My all of bliss, my everlasting life,
Soul of my soul, and end of all my wishes,
Why dost thou thus unman me with thy words,
And melt me down to mingle with thy weep-ings?

Why dost thou ask? Why dost thou talk thus piercingly?

Thy sorrows have disturb'd thy peace of mind,
And thou dost speak of miseries impossible.

Alm. Didst not thou say that racks and wheels were balm

And beds of ease, to thinking me thy wife?

Osm. No, no; nor should the subtlest pains that hell,

Or hell-born malice can invent, extort
A wish or thought from me to have thee other.
But wilt thou know what harrows up my heart?
Thou art my wife—nay, thou art yet my bride!
The sacred union of connubial love
Yet unaccomplish'd.

Is this dark cell a temple for that god?
Or this vile earth an altar for such off'rings?
This den for slaves, this dungeon damp'd with woes;

Is this to call thee mine? O hold, my heart!
To call thee mine! Yes; thus, e'en thus to call
Thee mine, were comfort, joy, extremest ecstasy.
But, O, thou art not mine, not e'en in misery;
And 'tis deny'd to me to be so bless'd,
As to be wretched with thee.

Alm. No, not that

Th' extremest malice of our fate can hinder:
That still is left us, and on that we'll feed,
As on the leavings of calamity.

There we will feast and smile on past distress,
And hug, in scorn of it, our mutual ruin.

Osm. O, thou dost talk, my love, as one resolv'd,

Because not knowing danger. But look forward;
Think of to-morrow, when thou shalt be torn
From these weak, struggling, unextended arms:
Think how my heart will heave, and eyes will strain,

To grasp and reach what is deny'd my hands:
Think how I am, when thou shalt wed with Garcia!

Then will I smear these walls with blood,
disfigure

And dash my face, and rive my clotted hair.
Break on this flinty floor my throbbing breast.

And grovel with gash'd hands to scratch a grave,
And bury me alive.

Alm. Heart-breaking horror!

Osm. Then Garcia shall lie panting on thy
bosom,
Luxurious, revelling amidst thy charms;
Hell! hell! have I not cause to rage and rave?
What are all racks, and wheels, and whips
to this?

O my Almeria!

What do the damn'd endure, but to despair,
But knowing heav'n, to know it lost for ever?

Alm. O I am struck, thy words are bolts of ice,
Which shot into my breast now melt and chill me.

Enter ZARA, PEREZ, and SELIM.

Zara. Somewhat of weight to me requires his freedom.

Dare you dispute the king's command? Behold
The royal signet. [Aside to Perez.

Per. I obey; yet beg
Your majesty one moment to defer
Your entering, till the princess is return'd
From visiting the noble prisoner.

[Aside to Zara.

Zara. Ha!

What say'st thou? [Aside to Perez.

Osm. We are lost! undone, discover'd!
Speak of compassion, let her hear you speak
Of interceding for me with the king;
Say something quickly to conceal our loves,
If possible— [Aside to Almeria.

Alm. I cannot speak.

[Aside to Osmyn.

Osm. Let me
Conduct you forth, as not perceiving her,
But till she's gone; then bless me thus again.

[Aside to Almeria.

Zara. Trembling and weeping as he leads her forth!

Confusion in his face, and grief in hers!

'Tis plain I've been abus'd—

Perdition catch 'em both, and ruin part 'em.
[Aside.

Osm. This charity to one unknown, and thus [Aloud to Almeria, as she is going.
Distress'd, heav'n will repay: all thanks are poor.

[Exit Almeria.

Zara. Damn'd, damn'd dissembler! Yet I will be calm,
Choke in my rage, and know the utmost depth
Of this deceiver [Aside]—You seem much surpris'd.

Osm. At your return so soon and unexpected!

Zara. And so unwish'd, unwanted too it seems.

Confusion! Yet I will contain myself.
You're grown a favourite since last we parted:
Perhaps I'm saucy and intruding—

Osm. Madam!

Zara. I did not know the princess' favourite:
Your pardon, sir—mistake me not; you think
I'm angry; you're deceiv'd, I came to set
You free; but shall return much better pleas'd,
To find you have an interest superior.

Osm. You do not come to mock my miseries?

Zara. I do.

Osm. I could at this time spare your mirth.

Zara. I know thou couldst; but I'm not often pleas'd,

And will indulge it now. What miseries?

Who would not be thus happily confin'd

To be the care of weeping majesty?

To have contending queens, at dead of night,
Forsake their down, to wake with wat'ry eyes,
And watch like tapers o'er your hour of rest.

O curse! I cannot hold—

Osm. Come, 'tis too much.

Zara. Villain!

Osm. How, madam?

Zara. Thou shalt die.

Osm. I thank you.

Zara. Thou liest, for now I know for whom thou'dst live.

Osm. Then you may know for whom I'd die.

Zara. Hell! hell!

Yet I'll be calm—Dark and unknown betrayer!
But now the dawn begins, and the slow hand
Of fate is stretch'd to draw the veil, and leave
Thee bare, the naked mark of public view.

Osm. You may be still deceiv'd; 'tis in my power,

Chain'd as I am, to fly from all my wrongs,
And free myself at once from misery,
And you of me.

Zara. Ha! say'st thou—But I'll prevent it.
Who waits there? As you will answer it, look this slave

[To the Guard.

Attempt no means to make himself away.

I've been deceiv'd. The public safety now
Requires he should be more confin'd, and none,
No, not the princess, suffer'd or to see,

Or speak with him: I'll quit you to the king.
Vile and ingrate! too late thou shalt repent

The base injustice thou hast done my love;
Yes, thou shalt know, spite of thy past distress,
And all those ills which thou so long hast
mourn'd,

Heav'n has no rage like love to hatred turn'd,
Nor hell a fury like a woman scorn'd.

[Exeunt.

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—A Room of State.

Enter ZARA and SELIM.

Zara. Thou hast already rack'd me with thy stay;

Therefore require me not to ask thee twice:
Reply at once to all. What is concluded?

Sel. Your accusation highly has incens'd
The king, and were alone enough to urge
The fate of Osmyn; but to that, fresh news
Has since arriv'd, of more revolted troops.
'Tis certain Heli too is fled, and with him (Which breeds amazement and distraction) some

Who bore high offices of weight and trust,
Both in the state and army. This confirms
The king in full belief of all you told him
Concerning Osmyn, and his correspondence
With them who first began the mutiny.

Wherefore a warrant for his death is sign'd;
And order given for public execution.

Zara. Ha! haste thee! fly, prevent his fate and mine;

Find out the king, tell him I have of weight
More than his crown t' impart, ere Osmyn die.

Sel. It needs not, for the king will straight be here,

And as to your revenge, not his own int'rest,
Pretend to sacrifice the life of Osmyn.

Zara. What shall I say? Invent, contrive, advise Somewhat to blind the king, and save his life
In whom I live. Devise the means to shun it, Quick; or, by heav'n, this dagger drinks thy blood.

Set. My life is yours, nor wish I to preserve it,
But to serve you. I have already thought.

Zara. Forgive my rage; I know thy love and truth.

But say, what's to be done? or when, 'or how,
Shall I prevent or stop the approaching danger?

Set. You must still seem most resolute and fix'd

On Osmyn's death; too quick a change of mercy

Might breed suspicion of the cause. Advise
That execution may be done in private.

Zara. On what pretence?

Set. Your own request's enough.
However, for a colour, tell him you
Have cause to fear his guards may be corrupted,

And some of them bought off to Osmyn's interest,

Who, at the place of execution, will Attempt to force his way for an escape;

The state of things will countenance all suspicions.

Then offer to the king to have him strangled
In secret by your mutes: and get an order,
That none but mutes may have admittance
to him.

I can no more, the king is here. Obtain This grant—and I'll acquaint you with the rest. [Exit.

Enter KING, GONSALEZ, and PEREZ.

King. Bear to the dungeon those rebellious
slaves:

But for their leaders, Sancho and Ramirez,
Let 'em be led away to present death.
Perez, see it perform'd.

Gon. Might I presume,
Their execution better were deferr'd,
Till Osmyn die. Mean time we may learn more
Of this conspiracy.

King. Then be it so.
Stay, soldier; they shall suffer with the Moor.
Are none return'd of those that follow'd Heli?

Gon. None, sir. Some papers have been since discover'd

In Roderigo's house, who fled with him,
Which seem to intimate, as if Alphonso
Were still alive, and arming in Valencia:
Which wears indeed this colour of a truth,
They who have fled have that way bent their course.

Of the same nature divers notes have been Dispers'd t' amuse the people; whereupon
Some ready of belief, have rais'd this rumour:
That being sav'd upon the coast of Afric,
He there disclos'd himself to Albucacim,
And by a secret compact made with him,
Open'd and urg'd the way to this invasion;
While he himself, returning to Valencia
In private, undertook to raise this tumult.

Zara. Ha! hear'st thou that? Is Osmyn then Alphonso?

O certain death for him, as sure despair
For me, if it be known—If not, what hope

Have I? Yet 'twere the lowest baseness, now
To yield him up—No, I will still conceal him,
And try the force of yet more obligations.

[Aside.

Gon. 'Tis not impossible. Yet it may be
That some impostor has usurp'd his name.
Your beauteous captive, Zara, can inform
If such a one, so 'scaping, was receiv'd
At any time in Albucacim's court.

King. Pardon, fair excellence, this long neglect;

An unforeseen, unwelcome hour of business,
Has thrust between us and our while of love;
But wearing now apace with ebbing sand,
Will quickly waste and give again the day.

Zara. You're too secure: the danger is more imminent

Than your high courage suffers you to see:
While Osmyn lives, you are not safe.

King. His doom
Is pass'd: if you revoke it not, he dies.

Zara. 'Tis well. By what I heard upon your entrance,

I find I can unfold what yet concerns
You more. One who did call himself Alphonso
Was cast upon my coast, as is reported,
And oft had private conference with the king;
To what effect I knew not then: but he,
Alphonso, secretly departed, just

About the time our arms embark'd for Spain.
What I know more is, that a triple league
Of strictest friendship was profest between

Alphonso, Heli, and the traitor Osmyn.

King. Public report is ratified in this.

Zara. And Osmyn's death requir'd of strong necessity.

King. Give order straight that all the prisners die,

Zara. Forbear a moment, somewhat more
I have

Worthy your private ear, and this your minister.

King. Let all, except Gonzalez, leave the room. [Exeunt Perez, etc.

Zara. I am your captive, and you've us'd me nobly;

And in return of that, though otherwise
Your enemy,

I think it fit to tell you, that your guards
Are tainted: some among 'em have resolv'd
To rescue Osmyn at the place of death.

King. Is treason then so near us as our guards?

Zara. Most certain; though my knowledge is not yet

So ripe, to point at the particular men.

King. What's to be done?

Zara. That too I will advise.

I have remaining in my train some mutes,
A present once from the sultana queen,
In the grand signior's court. These from their infancy

Are practis'd in the trade of death; and shall (As there the custom is) in private strangle Osmyn.

Gon. My lord, the queen advises well.

King. What offering, or what recompense remains

In me, that can be worthy so great services?
To cast beneath your feet the crown you've sav'd,

Though on the head that wears it, were too little.

Zara. Of that hereafter; but, mean time,
'tis fit
You give strict charge that none may be admitted
To see the pris'ner, but such mutes as I Shall send.

King. Who waits there?

Enter PEREZ.

On your life take heed,
That only Zara's mutes, or such who bring
Her warrant, have admittance to the Moor.

Zara. They, and no other, not the princess' self.

Per. Your majesty shall be obey'd.

King. Retire.

[Exit Perez.]

Gon. That interdiction so particular,
Pronounc'd with vehemence against the princess,
Should have more meaning than appears bare-fac'd.

The king is blinded by his love, and heeds
It not [Aside—Your majesty sure might have spar'd

The last restraint; you hardly can suspect
The princess is confed'rate with the Moor.

Zara. I've heard, her charity did once extend
So far, to visit him, at his request.

Gon. Ha!

King. How? She visit Osmyn! What, my daughter?

Sel. Madam, take heed; or you have ruin'd
all. [Aside to Zara.]

Zara. And after did solicit you on his Behalf—

King. Never. You have been misinform'd.

Zara. Indeed! Then 'twas a whisper spread by some,

Who wish'd it so; a common art in courts.
I will retire, and instantly prepare
Instruction for my ministers of death.

[Exeunt Zara and Selim.]

Gon. There's somewhat yet of mystery in this:

Her words and actions are obscure and double,
Sometimes concur and sometimes disagree:
I like it not.

King. What dost thou think, Gonzalez;
Are we not much indebted to this fair one?

Gon. I am a little slow of credit, sir,
In the sincerity of women's actions.
Methinks this lady's hatred to the Moor
Disquiets her too much; which makes it seem
As if she'd rather that she did not hate him.
I wish her mutes are meant to be employ'd
As she pretends—I doubt it now—Your guards
Corrupted! how? by whom? who told her so?
I'th' evening Osmyn was to die; at midnight
She begg'd the royal signet to release him;
I'th' morning he must die again; ere noon
Her mutes alone must strangle him, or he'll Escape. This put together suits not well.

King. Yet that there's truth in what she has discover'd,

Is manifest from every circumstance.

This tumult, and the lords who fled with Heli,
Are confirmation—that Alphonso lives,
Agrees expressly too with her report.

Gon. I grant it, sir; and doubt not, but in rage

Of jealousy, she has discover'd what
She now repents. It may be I'm deceiv'd:
But why that needless caution of the princess?

What if she had seen Osmyn? though 'twere strange;

But if she had, what wast' to her? unless
She fear'd her stronger charms might cause the Moor's

Affection to revolt.

King. I thank thee, friend;
There's reason in thy doubt, and I am warn'd.
But think'st thou that my daughter saw this Moor?

Gon. If Osmyn be, as Zara has related,
Alphonso's friend, 'tis not impossible
But she might wish on his account to see him.

King. Say'st thou? By heaven thou hast rous'd a thought,

That like a sudden earthquake shakes my frame.
Confusion! then my daughter's an accomplice,
And plots in private with this hellish Moor.

Gon. That were too hard a thought—but see she comes—

'Twere not amiss to question her a little,
And try, howe'er, if I've divin'd aright.
If what I fear be true, she'll be concern'd
For Osmyn's death, as he's Alphonso's friend:
Urge that, to try if she'll solicit for him.

Enter ALMERIA and LEONORA.

King. Your coming has prevented me, Al-meria;

I had determin'd to have sent for you.

Let your attendant be dismiss'd; I have [Leonora retires.]

To talk with you. Come near; why dost thou shake?

What mean those swoln and red-fleck'd eyes, that look

As they had wept in blood, and worn the night
In waking anguish? Why this, on the day
Which was design'd to celebrate thy nuptials;
But that the beams of light are to be stain'd
With reeking gore from traitors on the rack?
Wherefore I have deferr'd the marriage-rites,
Nor shall the guilty horrors of this day
Prophane that jubilee.

Alm. All days to me
Henceforth are equal: this the day of death,
To-morrow, and the next: and each that follows,
Will undistinguish'd roll, and but prolong
One hated line of more extended woe.

King. Whence is thy grief? Give me to know the cause,

And look thou answer me with truth; for know
I am not unacquainted with thy falsehood.

Why art thou mute? base and degenerate maid!

Gon. Dear madam, speak, or you'll incense
the king.

Alm. What is't to speak? or wherefore should I speak?

What mean these tears, but grief unutterable?

King. They are the dumb confessions of thy mind:

They mean thy guilt; and say thou wert con-fed'rate

With damn'd conspirators to take my life.
O impious parricide! now can'st thou speak?

Alm. O earth, behold I kneel upon thy bosom,
And bend my flowing eyes, to stream upon
Thy face, imploring thee that thou wilt yield;
Open thy bowels of compassion, take Into thy womb the last and most forlorn
Of all thy race. Hear me, thou common parent!
—I have no parent else—but thou a mother,

And step between me and the curse of him,
Who was—who was—but is no more a father,
But brands my innocence with horrid crimes,
And for the tender names of child and daughter,
Now calls me murderer and parricide.

King. Rise, I command thee—and, if thou wouldst

Acquit thyself of those detested names,
Swear thou hast never seen that foreign dog,
Now doom'd to die, that most accursed Osmyn.

Alm. Never, but as with innocence I might,
And free of all bad purposes: so heav'n's
My witness.

King. Vile equivocating wretch!
With innocence! O patience! hear—she owns
it!

Confesses it! By heav'n, I'll have him rack'd, Torn, mangl'd, flay'd, impal'd—all pains and tortures

That wit of man and dire revenge can think,
Shall be, accumulated, under-bear.

Alm. O, I am lost—there fate begins to wound.

King. Hear me; then, if thou canst, reply:
know, traitress,
I'm not to learn that curs'd Alphonso lives:
Nor am I ignorant what Osmyn is—

Alm. Then all is ended, and we both must die.

Since thou'rt reveal'd, alone thou shalt not die:
And yet alone would I have died, heav'n knows,
Repeated deaths, rather than have reveal'd thee.

King. Hell! hell! do I hear this, and yet endure!

What, dar'st thou to my face avow thy guilt?
Hence, ere I curse—fly my just rage with speed;
Lest I forget us both and spurn thee from me.

Alm. And yet a father! think I am your child.
Turn not your eyes away—look on me kneeling;
Now curse me if you can, now spurn me off.
Did ever father curse his kneeling child?

Never; for always blessings crown that posture.
O hear me then, thus crawling on the earth—

King. Be thou advis'd, and let me go, while yet

The light impression thou hast made remains.

Alm. No, never will I rise, nor loose this hold,

Till you are mov'd, and grant that he may live.

King. Ha! who may live? take heed, no more of that;

For on my soul he dies, though thou and I,
And all should follow to partake his doom.

Away, off, let me go—Call her attendants.

Re-enter LEONORA and Women.

Alm. Drag me, harrow the earth with my bare bosom,

I'll not let go till you have spar'd my husband.

King. Ha! husband! Which? who?

Alm. He, he is my husband.

King. Who?

Alm. O—

Let me go, let me fall, sink deep—I'll dig,
I'll dig a grave, and tear up death; I will;
Yes, I will strip off life, and we will change:
I will be death; then, though you kill my husband,

He shall be mine still, and for ever mine.

King. What husband? whom dost thou mean?

Gon. She raves!

Alm. O that I did! Osmyn, he is my husband.

King. Osmyn!

Alm. Not Osmyn, but Alphonso is my dear
And wedded husband—Heav'n, and air, and seas,
Ye winds and waves, I call ye all to witness!

King. Wilder than winds or waves thyself dost rave.

Should I hear more, I too should catch thy madness.

Watch her returning sense, and bring me word:

And look that she attempt not on her life.

[Exit King.

Alm. O stay, yet stay; hear me, I am not mad.

I would to heaven I were—he's gone.

Gon. Have comfort.

Alm. Cursed be that rogue that bids me be of comfort!

Cursed my own tongue, that could not move his pity!

Cursed these weak hands, that could not hold him here!

For he is gone to doom Alphonso's death.

Gon. Your too excessive grief works on your fancy,

And deludes your sense. Alphonso, if living,
Is far from hence, beyond your father's power.

Alm. Hence, thou detested ill-tim'd flatterer!
Source of my woes! thou and thy race be curs'd!

But doubly thou, who couldst alone have policy

And fraud, to find the fatal secret out,
And know that Osmyn was Alphonso!

Gon. Ha!

Alm. Why dost thou start? what dost thou see or hear?

Is it the doleful bell, tolling for death?

Or dying groans from my Alphonso's breast?

See, see; look yonder, where a grizzled, pale,
And ghastly head glares by, all smear'd with
blood,

Gasping as it would speak; and after see!

Behold a damp dead hand has dropp'd a dagger:

I'll catch it—Hark! a voice cries murder! ah!

My father's voice! hollow it sounds, and calls

Me from the tomb—I'll follow it; for there

I shall again behold my dear Alphonso!

[Exeunt Almeria and Leonora.

Gon. She's greatly griev'd: nor am I less
surpris'd.

Osmyn Alphonso! no; she over-rates

My policy: I ne'er suspected it:

Nor now had known it, but from her mistake.

Her husband too! Ha! where is Garcia then?

And where the crown that should descend on

him,

To grace the line of my posterity?

Hold, let me think—if I should tell the king—

Things come to this extremity; his daughter

Wedded already—what if he should yield?

Knowing no remedy for what is past;

And urg'd by nature pleading for his child,

With which he seems to be already shaken.

And though I know he hates beyond the grave

Anselmo's race; yet if—that if concludes me.

To doubt, when I may be assur'd, is folly.

But how prevent the captive queen, who means

To set him free? Ay, now 'tis plain: O, well

Invented tale! He was Alphonso's friend,

This subtle woman will amuse the king,

If I delay—'twill do—or better so.
One to my wish. Alonzo, thou art welcome.

Enter ALONZO.

Alon. The king expects your lordship.

Gon. 'Tis no matter;

I'm not i'th' way at present, good Alonzo.

Alon. If't please your lordship, I'll return and say

I have not seen you.

Gon. Do, my best Alonzo.

Yet stay; I would—but go; anon will serve—
Yet I have that requires thy speedy help.

I think thou wouldst not stop to do me service.

Alon. I am your creature.

Gon. Say thou art my friend.

I've seen thy sword do noble execution.

Alon. All that it can your lordship shall command.

Gon. Thanks; and I take thee at thy word.
'Thou'st seen,

Among the foll'wers of the captive queen,
Dumb men, who make their meaning known by signs.

Alon. I have, my lord.

Gon. Couldst thou procure, with speed
And privacy, the wearing garb of one Of those, though purchas'd by his death, I'd give

Thee such reward as should exceed thy wish.

Alon. Conclude it done. Where shall I wait your lordship?

Gon. At my apartment. Use thy utmost diligence:

And say I've not been seen—haste, good Alonzo.
[Exit Alonzo.]

So, this can hardly fail. Alphonso slain,
The greatest obstacle is then remov'd.
Almeria widow'd, yet again may wed;
And I yet fix the crown on Garcia's head.

[Exit.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—A Room of State.

Enter KING, PEREZ, and ALONZO.

King. Not to be found? In an ill hour he's absent.

None, say you? none? what, not the fav'rite
eunuch?

Nor she herself, nor any of her mutes,
Have yet requir'd admittance?

Per. None, my lord.

King. Is Osmyn so dispos'd as I commanded?

Per. Fast bound in double chains, and at full length

He lies supine on earth:—with as much ease
She might remove the centre of this earth,
As loose the rivets of his bonds.

King. 'Tis well.

[A Mute appears, and seeing the King retires.]

Ha! stop and seize that mute; Alonzo, follow
him.

Ent'ring he met my eyes, and started back
Frighted, and fumbling one hand in his bosom,
As to conceal th' importance of his errand.

[Alonzo follows him, and returns with a Paper.]

Alon. A bloody proof of obstinate fidelity!

King. What dost thou mean?

Alon. Soon as I seiz'd the man,
He snatch'd from out his bosom this—and strove

With rash and greedy haste at once to cram
The morsel down his throat. I caught his arm,
And hardly wrench'd his hand to wring it
from him;

Which done, he drew a poniard from his side,
And on the instant plung'd it in his breast.

King. Remove the body thence, ere Zara see it.

Alon. I'll be so bold to borrow his attire;
'Twill quit me from my promise to Gonsalez.

[Aside. Exit.]

King. How's this? my mortal foe beneath my roof!

[Having read the Letter.]

O, give me patience, all ye pow'rs! no, rather Give me new rage, implacable revenge,
And trebled fury—Ha! who's there?

Per. My lord!

King. Hence, slave! how dar'st thou bide, to watch and pry

Into how poor a thing a king descends;
How like thyself, when passion treads him down?
Ha! stir not, on thy life! for thou wert fix'd
And planted here to see me gorge this bait,
And lash against the hook—By heav'n, you're all

Rank traitors; thou art with the rest combin'd:
Thou knew'st that Osmyn was Alphonso,
knew'st

My daughter privately with him conferr'd,
And wert the spy and pander to their meeting.

Per. By all that's holy, I'm amaz'd—

King. Thou ly'st.

Thou art accomplice too with Zara: here,
Where she sets down—*Still will I set thee
free—* [Reads.]

That somewhere is repeated—I have pow'r O'er them that are thy guards—Mark that, thou traitor.

Per. It was your majesty's command I should Obey her order.

King. [Reads].—*And still will I set
Thee free, Alphonso—Hell! curs'd, curs'd Alphonso!*

False and perfidious Zara! Strumpet daughter!
Away, be gone, thou feeble boy, fond love,
All nature, softness, pity, and compassion;
This hour I throw ye off, and entertain
Fell hate within my breast, revenge, and gall.
By heav'n, I'll meet and counterwork this treachery.

Hark thee, villain, traitor—answer me, slave!

Per. My service has not merited those titles.

King. Dar'st thou reply? Take that—Thy service! thine! [Strikes him.]

What's thy whole life, thy soul, thy all, to my One moment's ease? Hear my command; and look

That thou obey, or horror on thy head:
Drench me thy dagger in Alphonso's heart.
Why dost thou start? Resolve, or—

Per. Sir, I will.

King. 'Tis well—that when she comes to set him free,

His teeth may grin and mock at her remorse.
[Perez going.]

—Stay thee—I've further thought—I'll add to
this,

And give her eyes yet greater disappointment:
When thou hast ended him, bring me his robe;
And let the cell where she'll expect to see him
Be darken'd, so as to amuse the sight.

I'll be conducted thither—mark me well—
There with his turban, and his robe array'd,
And laid along, as he now lies, supine,
I shall convict her, to her face, of falsehood.
When for Alphonso's she shall take my hand,
And breathe her sighs upon my lips for his;
Sudden I'll start, and dash her with her guilt.
But see, she comes! I'll shun th' encounter;
thou.

Follow me, and give heed to my direction.

[Exeunt.

Enter ZARA and SELIM.

Zara. Ha! 'twas the king!
The king that passed hence! frowning he went:
Dost think he saw me?

Sel. Yes; but then, as if he thought
His eyes had err'd, he hastily recall'd
Th' imperfect look, and sternly turn'd away.

Zara. Shun me when seen! I fear thou hast undone me.

Sel. Avert it, heav'n! that you should ever suffer

For my defect; or that the means which I
Devis'd to serve, should ruin your design!
Prescience is heav'n's alone, not giv'n to man.
If I have fail'd in what, as being man
I needs must fail, impute not as a crime
My nature's want, but punish nature in me;
I plead not for a pardon and to live,
But to be punish'd and forgiv'n. Here, strike;
I bare my breast to meet your just revenge.

Zara. I have not leisure now to take so poor
A forfeit as thy life; somewhat of high
And more important fate requires my thought!
Regard me well, and dare not to reply
To what I give in charge; for I'm resolv'd.
Give order that the two remaining mutes
Attend me instantly, with each a bowl
Of such ingredients mix'd, as will with speed
Benumb the living faculties, and give
Most easy and inevitable death.

Yes, Osmyn, yes; be Osmyn or Alphonso,
I'll give thee freedom, if thou dar'st be free:
Such liberty, as I embrace myself,
Thou shalt partake. Since fates no more afford,

I can but die with thee to keep my word.

[Exit.

SCENE II.—Opens and shows the Prison.

Enter GONSALEZ, disguised like a Mute, with a Dagger.

Gon. Nor sentinel, nor guard! the doors
unbarr'd.

And all as still as at the noon of night!
Sure death already has been busy here.
There lies my way; that door too is unlock'd.

[Looks in.

Ha! sure he sleeps—all's dark within, save what
A lamp, that feebly lifts a sickly flame,
By fits reveals—his face seems turn'd to favour
Th' attempt; I'll steal and do it unperceiv'd.
What noise? somebody coming? 'st, Alonzo!
Nobody. Sure he'll wait without—I would Twere done—I'll crawl and sting him to the
heart;

Then cast my skin, and leave it there to answer it.

[Goes in.

Enter GARCIA and ALONZO.

Gar. Where? where, Alonzo, where's my father? where

The king? Confusion! all is on the rout!
All's lost! all ruin'd by surprise and treachery!
Where, where is he? Why dost thou mislead me?

Alon. My lord, he enter'd but a moment since,

And could not pass me unperceiv'd—What,
hoa!

My lord, my lord, what, hoa! my lord Gonsalez!

Re-enter GONSALEZ, bloody.

Gon. Perdition choke your clamours!—
whence this rudeness?

Garcia!

Gar. Perdition, slavery, and death Are enter'ing now our doors! Where is the king?

What means this blood? and why this face of horror?

Gon. No matter: give me first to know the
cause

Of these your rash and ill-tim'd exclamations.

Gar. The eastern gate is to the foe betray'd,
Who, but for heaps of slain that choke the
passage,

Had enter'd long ere now, and borne down all Before 'em, to the palace walls. Unless
The king in person animate our men,
Granada's lost; and to confirm this fear,
The traitor Perez, and the captive Moor,
Are through a postern fled, and join the foe!

Gon. Would all were false as that! for whom you call

The Moor is dead. That Osmyn was Alphonso;
In whose heart's blood this poniard yet is warm.

Gar. Impossible! for Osmyn was, while flying,

Pronounc'd aloud by Perez for Alphonso.

Gon. Enter that chamber, and convince your eyes,

How much report has wrong'd your easy faith.

[Garcia goes in.

Alon. My lord, for certain truth Perez is fled;

And has declar'd the cause of his revolt
Was to revenge a blow the king had giv'n
him.

Re-enter GARCIA.

Gar. Ruin and horror! O, heart-wounding sight!

Gon. What says my son? what ruin? ha!
what horror?

Gar. Blasted my eyes, and speechless be my tongue,

Rather than or to see, or to relate

This deed!—O, dire mistake! O, fatal blow!

The king—

Gon. Alon. The king!

Gar. Dead, weltring, drown'd in blood!

See! see! attir'd like Osmyn, where he lies.

[They look in.

O whence, or how, or wherefore was this done?

But what imports the manner of the cause?

Nothing remains to do, or to require,

But that we all should turn our swords against Ourselves, and expiate, with our own, his blood.

Gon. O wretch! O, curs'd and rash deluded fool!

On me, on me, turn your avenging swords!
I, who have spilt my royal master's blood,

Should make atonement by a death as horrid,
And fall beneath the hand of my own son.

Gar. Ha! what? atone this murder with a greater!

The horror of that thought has damp'd my rage.

Gon. O, my son! from the blind dotage
Of a father's fondness these ills arose:
For thee I've been ambitious, base, and bloody;
For thee I've plung'd into this sea of sin;
Stemming the tide with only one weak hand,
While t'other bore the crown (to wreath thy brow),
Whose weight has sunk me ere I reach'd the shore.

Gar. Fatal ambition! Hark! the foe is enter'd!

The shrillness of that shout speaks 'em at hand.

Alon. My lord, I've thought how to conceal the body:

Require me not to tell the means, till done,
Lest you forbid what then you may approve.

Gon. They shout again! Whate'er he means to do,

'Twere fit the soldiers were amus'd with hopes;
And in the mean time fed with expectation
To see the king in person at their head.

Gar. Were it a truth, I fear 'tis now too late:

But I'll omit no care nor haste; and try
Or to repel their force, or bravely die. [Exit.]

Re-enter ALONZO.

Gon. What hast thou done, Alonzo?

Alon. Such a deed

As but an hour ago I'd not have done,
Though for the crown of universal empire.
But what are kings, reduc'd to common clay?
Or who can wound the dead?—I've from the body

Sever'd the head, and in an obscure corner
Dispos'd it, muffled in the mute's attire,
Leaving to view of them who enter next,
Alone the undistinguishable trunk;
Which may be still mistaken by the guards
For Osmyn, if in seeking for the king
They chance to find it.

Gon. 'Twas an act of horror,
And of a piece with this day's dire misdeeds.
But 'tis no time to ponder or repent.
Haste thee, Alonzo, haste thee hence with speed,

To aid my son. I'll follow with the last Reserve, to reinforce his arms: at least,
I shall make good and shelter his retreat.

[Exeunt severally.]

Enter ZARA, followed by SELIM, and two Mutes bearing the Bowls.

Zara. Silence and solitude are every where!
Through all the gloomy ways and iron doors
That hither lead, nor human face nor voice
Is seen or heard.

Let 'em set down the bowls, and warn Alphonso

That I am here—so. [Mutes go in] You return and find

The king; tell him what he requir'd I've done,
And wait his coming to approve the deed.

[Exit Selim.]

Re-enter Mutes.

What have you seen? Ha! wherefore stare you thus

[Mutes return, and look affrighted.]

With haggard eyes? Why are your arms across?

Your heavy and desponding heads hung down?
Why is't you more than speak in these sad signs?

Give me more ample knowledge of this mourning.

[They go to the Scene, which opening, she perceives the Body.]

Ha! prostrate! bloody! headless! O—I'm lost!
O Osmyn! O Alphonso! Cruel fate!

Cruel, cruel, O more than killing object!
I came prepar'd to die, and see thee die—

Nay, came prepar'd myself to give thee death—
But cannot bear to find thee thus, my Osmyn—

O, this accurs'd, this base, this treach'rous king.

Re-enter SELIM.

Sel. I've sought in vain; for no where can the king

Be found—

Zara. Get thee to hell, and seek him there! [Stabs him.]

His hellish rage had wanted means to act,
But for thy fatal and pernicious counsel.

Sel. You thought it better then—but I'm rewarded.

The mute you sent, by some mischance was seen,

And forc'd to yield your letter with his life:
I found the dead and bloody body stripp'd—
My tongue falters, and my voice fails—I sink—

Drink not the poison—for Alphonso is— [Dies.]

Zara. As thou art now—and I shall quickly be.

'Tis not that he is dead! for 'twas decreed
We both should die. Nor is't that I survive;
I have a certain remedy for that.

But oh! he died unknowing in my heart.
He knew I lov'd, but knew not to what height;
Nor that I meant to fall before his eyes,

A martyr and a victim to my vows;
Insensible of this last proof he's gone:

Then wherefore do I pause? give me the bowl.

[A Mute kneels and gives one of the Bowls.]

Hover a moment yet, thou gentle spirit,
Soul of my love, and I will wait thy flight.
This to our mutual bliss, when join'd above.

[Drinks.] O, friendly draught! already in my heart.

Cold, cold! my veins are icicles and frost.
I'll creep into his bosom, lay me there;

Cover us close—or I shall chill his breast,
And fright him from my arms—See! see! he slides

Still further from me; look, he hides his face!
I cannot feel it—quite beyond my reach.

O, now he's gone, and all is dark—

[Dies. Mutes kneel and mourn over her.]

Enter ALMERIA and LEONORA.

Alm. O, let me seek him in this horrid cell;
For in the tomb, or prison, I alone

Must hope to find him.

Leon. Heav'n's! what dismal scene
Of death is this?

Alm. Show me, for I am come in search
of death,
But want a guide, for tears have dimm'd my sight.

Leon. Alas, a little further, and behold
Zara all pale and dead! two frightful men,
Who seem the murderers, kneel weeping by;
Feeling remorse too late for what they've done.
But O, forbear—lift up your eyes no more,
But haste away, fly from this fatal place,
Where miseries are multiply'd; return,
Return, and look not on, for there's a dagger
Ready to stab the sight, and make your eyes
Rain blood—

Alm. O, I foreknow, foresee that object.
Is it at last then so? Is he then dead?
—I do not weep! the springs of tears are dry'd,
And of a sudden I am calm, as if
All things were well; and yet my husband's murder'd!

Yes, yes, I know to mourn! I'll sluice this
heart,

The source of woe, and let the torrent loose.
—Those men have left to weep! they look on
me!

I hope they murder all on whom they look.
Behold me well; your bloody hands have err'd,
And wrongfully have slain those innocents:
I am the sacrifice design'd to bleed;
And come prepar'd to yield my throat!—They bow

Their heads, in sign of grief and innocence!
[They point at the Bowl on the Ground,

And point! what mean they? Ha! a cup! O,
well

I understand what med'cine has been here.
O noble thirst! yet greedy, to drink all—
Oh for another draught of death!—

[They point at the other Cup.
Thanks to the lib'ral hand that fill'd thee thus;
I'll drink my glad acknowledgment—

Leon. O hold,
For mercy's sake; upon my knee I beg—

Alm. With thee the kneeling world should beg in vain.

Seest thou not there? Behold who prostrate lies,

And pleads against thee; who shall then prevail?

Yet I will take a cold and parting leave
From his pale lips; I'll kiss him ere I drink, Lest the rank juice should blister on my mouth,

And stain the colour of my last adieu.

Horror! a headless trunk! nor lips nor face, [Coming near the Body, starts and lets fall the Cup.

But spouting veins and mangled flesh! Oh!
oh!

Enter ALPHONSO, HELI, PEREZ, Guards, and Attendants; with GARCIA, Prisoner.

Alph. Away, stand off! where is she! let me fly,

Save her from death, and snatch her to my
heart.

Alm. Oh!

Alph. Forbear; my arms alone shall hold her up,
Warm her to life, and wake her into glad-
ness.

Give a new birth to thy long-shaded eyes,
Then double on the day reflected light.

Alm. Where am I? Heav'n! what does this dream intend?

Alph. O mayst thou never dream of less delight,

Nor ever wake to less substantial joys!

Alm. Giv'n me again from death! O, all ye pow'rs,

Confirm this miracle! Can I believe
My sight?

This is my lord, my life, my only husband:
I have him now, and we no more will part.
My father too shall have compassion—

Alph. O, my heart's comfort! 'tis not giv'n
to this

Frail life, to be entirely bless'd. E'en now,
In this extremest joy my soul can taste,
Yet I am dash'd to think that thou must weep:
Thy father fell, where he design'd my death.
Gonsalez and Alonzo, both of wounds
Expiring, have with their last breath confess'd
The just decrees of heav'n, which on themselves
Has turn'd their own most bloody purposes.
Nay, I must grant, 'tis fit you should be thus—[She weeps.

Ill-fated Zara! Ha! a cup! alas!

Thy error then is plain; but I were flint
Not to o'erflow in tribute to thy memory.

O Garcia!—

Whose virtue has renounc'd thy father's crimes, Seest thou how just the hand of heav'n has been?

Let us, who through our innocence survive,
Still in the paths of honour persevere,
And not from past or present ills despair:
For blessings ever wait on virtuous deeds,
And though a late, a sure reward succeeds.

[Exeunt.

HILL.

AARON HILL, eldest son of George Hill, Esq. of Malmesbury Abbey, Wiltshire, was born in London, Febr. 10, 1694. The life of this author presents a most astonishing instance of genius and industry. At the age of 15 we find him alone in a vessel bound for Constantinople, on a visit to Lord Paget, ambassador at that court, and a distant relation of his mother's. His Lordship, struck with the ardent desire of knowledge, which had induced this youth to such an undertaking, provided him with a tutor with whom he travelled through Egypt, Palestine and the greater part of the East. He returned with his Lordship from Constantinople by land; and profited of the occasion of their stay at the different courts to see the greatest part of Europe. 1710, Manager of the King's Theatre, Haymarket, he wrote the opera of Rinaldo, the music of which was the first of Handel's compositions after his arrival in England. Although no man could be more qualified for this undertaking, he relinquished the management on account of some misunderstanding; and turned his thoughts entirely on a project of making sweet oil from beech-nuts. He obtained a patent, and had his fortune been sufficient for the undertaking he would undoubtedly have rendered this attempt of great advantage to the nation; but borrowing a sum of 25,000 pounds, he was obliged to submit to the formation of a company, who were to act in concert with him. These people, with the most sanguine hopes of success and ignorant of the inventor's plans, or perhaps fearing to lose their money, upon a trifling delay of their hopes, immediately commenced representations; these caused disputes, and the whole affair was overthrown just at the time when profits were already rising from it, and, if pursued with vigour, would, in all probability have continued increasing and permanent. Another valuable project, that of applying the timber grown in the north of Scotland to the use of the navy, for which it had been long erroneously imagined to be unfit, he set on foot in 1727: here again we have a terrible account of the obstacles he met with: when the trees were chained together into a raft, the Highlanders could not be prevailed upon to go down the river on them, till he first went himself; and he was obliged to find out a method of doing away with the rocks (by lighting fires on them at low water), which choked up the passage in different parts of the river. The commencement of a lead mine in the same country employing all the men and horses, which had heretofore been at his service, put an end to this undertaking; however he was presented with the freedom of Inverness and Aberdeen, as a compliment for his great exertions. All this time his pen did not continue idle: he produced The progress of Wit, a caveat for the use of an eminent Writer; in which he retorts very severely upon Pope, who had introduced him into The Dunciad, as one of the competitors for the prize offered by the goddess of Dulness. After the death of his wife 1731, he continued in London and in intercourse with the public till about 1738, when he withdrew to Plaistow in Essex, where his indefatigable genius projected many profitable improvements. One he lived to complete, but without benefit to himself, which was the art of making potash, equal to that brought from Russia. Here he wrote and published several poetical pieces; and adapted Voltaire's tragedy of Merope to the English Stage, which was the last work he lived to complete. He died the very day before it was to be represented for his benefit, Feb. 8. 1749, in the very minute of the earthquake. The Biographia Dramatica says him to have been a person of the most amiable disposition, extensive knowledge, and elegant conversation. We find him bestowing the profits of many of his works for the relief of distressed authors and artists; though he would never accept of a benefit for himself, till his distresses at the close of his life obliged him to solicit the acting of Merope for their relief. No labour deterred him from the prosecution of any design which appeared to him to be praiseworthy and feasible, nor was it in the power of the greatest misfortunes to overcome or even shake his fortitude of mind. Although accused of being rather too turgid, and in some places obscure; yet the nervous power, and sterling sense we find in his writings ought to make us overlook our having been obliged to take some little pains in digging through the rock in which it is contained; while his rigid correctness will always make him stand in an exalted rank of merit.

Z A R A.

ZARA was first produced 1735; and though it is founded on the principles of religious party, which are generally apt to throw an air of enthusiasm and bigotry into those dramatic works which are built on them, this piece has always been esteemed a very superior one. The Biographia Dramatica says, "It is borrowed originally from the Zuire of Voltaire; an author who, while he resided in England, imbibed so much of the spirit of British liberty, that his writings seem almost always calculated for the meridian of London. Mr. Hill, however, has made this as well as his other translations so much his own, that it is hard to determine which of the two may most properly be called the author of this play." It is remarkable for a very extraordinary event; it is related, that a gentleman of the name of Bond, collecting a party of his friends, got up the play of Zara, at the music room in Villiers Street, York Buildings, and chose the part of Lusignan for himself. His acting was considered as a prodigy; and he yielded himself up so to the force and impetuosity of his imagination, that upon the discovery of his daughter, he fainted away. The house rung with applause; but, finding that he continued a long time in that situation, the audience began to be uneasy and apprehensive. With some difficulty, the representatives of Chatillon and Nerestan placed him in his chair; he then faintly spoke, extended his arms to receive his children, raised his eyes to heaven, and then closed them for ever.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—Enter ZARA and SELIMA.

Sel. It moves my wonder, young and beautiful Zara,

Whence these new sentiments inspire your heart!

Your peace of mind increases with your charms;
Tears now no longer shade your eyes' soft lustre:

You meditate no more those happy climes
To which Nerestan will return to guide you.
You talk no more of that gay nation now,
Where men adore their wives, and woman's power

Draws rev'rence from a polish'd people's softness:

Their husbands' equals, and their lovers' queens!
Free, without scandal; wise, without restraint;
Why have you ceas'd to wish this happy change?
A barr'd seraglio! sad, unsocial life!

Scorn'd, and a slave! All this has lost its terror;

And Syria rivals, now, the banks of Seine.

Zara. Joys which we do not know, we do not wish.

My fate's bound in by Sion's sacred wall:
Clos'd from my infancy within this palace,
Custom has learnt, from time, the power to please.

I claim no share in the remoter world,
The sultan's property, his will my law;
Unknowing all but him, his power, his fame;
To live his subject is my only hope.
All else, an empty dream—

Sel. Have you forgot
Absent Nerestan then? whose gen'rous friendship

So nobly vow'd redemption from your chains!
How oft have you admir'd his dauntless soul?
Osman, his conqu'ror, by his courage charm'd,
Trusted his faith, and on his word releas'd him:
Though not return'd in time—we yet expect him.
Nor had his noble journey other motive,
Than to procure our ransom.—And is this,
This dear, warm hope, become an idle dream?

Zara. Since after two long years he not returns,

'Tis plain his promise stretch'd beyond his power,

A stranger and a slave, unknown, like him

Proposing much, means little; talks and vows,
 Delighted with a prospect of escape:
 He promis'd to redeem ten Christians more,
 And free us all from slavery! I own
 I once admir'd the unprofitable seal,
 But now it charms no longer.

Sel. What, if yet,
 He, faithful should return, and hold his vow;
 Would you not, then—

Zara. No matter—Time is past.
 And every thing is chang'd.

Sel. But whence comes this?

Zara. Go; 'twere too much to tell thee
 Zara's fate:

The sultan's secrets all are sacred here:
 But my fond heart delights to mix with thine.
 Some three months past, when thou, and other
 slaves,

Were forc'd to quit fair Jordan's flow'ry bank!
 Heav'n, to cut short the anguish of my days,
 Rais'd me to comfort by a pow'rful hand:
 This mighty Osman!—

Sel. What of him?

Zara. This sultan,
 This conqueror of the Christians, loves—

Sel. Whom?

Zara. Zara!

Thou blushest, and I guess thy thoughts accuse me:

But, known me better—'twas unjust suspicion.
 All emperor as he is, I cannot stoop
 To honours, that bring shame and baseness with 'em:

Reason and pride, those props of modesty,
 Sustain my guarded heart, and strengthen virtue;
 No—I shall now astonish thee; his greatness
 Submits to own a pure and honest flame.
 Among the shining crowds, which live to please
 him,

His whole regard is fix'd on me alone:
 He offers marriage; and its rites now wait
 To crown me empress of this eastern world.

Sel. Your virtue and your charms deserve
 it all:

My heart is not surpris'd, but struck to hear it.
 If to be empress can complete your happiness,
 I rank myself, with joy, among your slaves.

Zara. Be still my equal, and enjoy my blessings;

For, thou partaking, they will bless me more.

Sel. Alas! but heaven! will it permit this marriage?

Will not this grandeur, falsely call'd a bliss,
 Plant bitterness, and root it in your heart?
 Have you forgot you are of Christian blood?

Zara. Ah, me! what hast thou said, why wouldst thou thus

Recall my wav'ring thoughts? How know I what,

Or whence I am? Heaven kept it hid in dark-
 ness,

Conceal'd me from myself, and from my blood.

Sel. Nerestan, who was born a Christian,
 here,

Asserts, that you like him, had Christian parents;

Besides—that cross, which from your infant
 years

Has been preserv'd, was found upon your
 bosom,

As if design'd by heav'n, a pledge of faith
 Due to the God you purpose to forsake!

Zara. Can my fond heart, on such a feeble proof,

Embrace a faith abhorr'd by him I love?

I see too plainly custom forms us all;

Our thoughts, our morals, our most fix'd belief,

Are consequences of our place of birth:

Born beyond Ganges, I had been a Pagan,

In France a Christian, I am here a Saracen:

'Tis but instruction all! Our parents' hand

Writes on our heart the first faint characters,

Which time, re-tracing deepens into strength,

That nothing can efface, but death or heaven!

Thou wert not made a pris'ner in this place,

Till after reasons, borrowing force from years,

Had lent its lustre to enlighten faith:

For me, who in my cradle was their slave,

Thy Christian doctrines were too lately taught
 me:

Yet, far from having lost the rev'rence due,

This cross, as often as it meets my eye,

Strikes through my heart a kind of awful fear!

I honour, from my soul, the Christian laws,

Those laws, which, softening nature by humanity,

Melt nations into brotherhood; no doubt

Christians are happy; and 'tis just to love them.

Sel. Why have you then declar'd yourself their foe?

Why will you join your hand with this proud
 Osman's,

Who owes his triumph to the Christians' ruin?

Zara. Ah! who could slight the offer of his heart?

Nay, for I mean to tell thee all my weakness,

Perhaps I had, ere now, profess'd thy faith,

But Osman lov'd me—and I've lost it all:

I think on none but Osman; my pleas'd heart,

Fill'd with the blessing, to be lov'd by him,

Wants room for other happiness. Oh, my friend!

I talk not of a sceptre, which he gives me:

No—to be charm'd with that were thanks too humble!

Offensive tribute, and too poor for love!

'Twas Osman won my heart, not Osman's crown:

I love not in him aught besides himself.

Thou think'st, perhaps, that these are starts of passion:

But had the will of heav'n, less bent to bless him,

Doom'd Osman to my chains, and me to fill

The throne that Osman sits on—ruin and wretchedness

Catch and consume my wishes, but I would—

To raise me to myself, descend to him.
 [Exit Selima.

A grand March. Enter OSMAN, reading a Paper, which he re-delivers to ORAS-MIN, with Attendants.

Osman. Wait my return, or should there be a cause

That may require my presence, do not fear
 To enter; ever mindful that my own

[Exit Oras. etc.

Follows my people's happiness. At length,

Cares have releas'd my heart—to love and Zara.

Zara. 'Twas not in cruel absence, to deprive me

Of your imperial image; every where

You reign triumphant; memory supplies

Reflection with your power; and you, like
 heaven,

Are always present—and are always gracious.

Osman. The sultans, my great ancestors, bequeath'd
Their empire to me, but their taste they gave not;
Their laws, their lives, their loves, delight not me;
I know our prophet smiles on am'rous wishes,
And opens a wide field to vast desire;
I know, that at my will I might possess;
That, wasting tenderness in wild profusion,
I might look down to my surrounded feet,
And bless contending beauties. I might speak,
Serenely slothful, from within my palace,
And bid my pleasure be my people's law.
But, sweet as softness is, its end is cruel;
I can look round and count a hundred kings, Unconquer'd by themselves, and slaves to others:

Hence was Jerusalem to Christians lost;
Hence from the distant Euxine to the Nile,
The trumpet's voice has wak'd the world to war;
Yet, amidst arms and death, thy power has reach'd me,
For thou disdain'st, like me, a languid love;
Glory and Zara join, and charm together.

Zara. I hear at once, with blushes and with joy,
This passion, so unlike your country's customs.

Osman. Passion, like mine, disdains my country's customs;
The jealousy, the faintness, the distrust,
The proud, superior coldness of the east.
I know to love you, Zara, with esteem;
To trust your virtue, and to court your soul.
Nobly confiding, I unveil my heart,
And dare inform you that 'tis all your own:
My joys must all be yours; only my cares
Shall lie conceal'd within, and reach not Zara.

Zara. Oblig'd by this excess of tenderness,
How low, how wretched was the lot of Zara!
Too poor with aught but thanks to pay such blessings!

Osman. Not so—I love, and would be lov'd
again;

Let me confess it: I possess a soul,
That what it wishes, wishes ardently.
I should believe you hated, had you power
To love with moderation; 'tis my aim,
In every thing to reach supreme perfection.
If, with an equal flame I touch your heart, Marriage attends your smile. But know, 'twill make

Me wretched, it if makes not Zara happy.

Zara. Ah, sir! if such a heart as gen'rous
Osman's

Can, from my will, submit to take its bliss,
What mortal ever was decreed so happy?
Pardon the pride with which I own my joy:
Thus wholly to possess the man I love!
To know, and to confess his will my fate!
To be the happy work of his dear hands!
To be—

Re-enter ORASMIN.

Osman. Already interrupted! What?
Who? Whence?

Oras. This moment, sir, there is arriv'd
That Christian slave, who, licens'd on his faith, Went hence to France; and now return'd, prays audience.

Zara. Oh, heaven! [Aside.

Osman. Admit him.—What?—Why comes he not?

Oras. He waits without. No Christian dares approach

This place, long sacred to the sultan's privacies.

Osman. Go—bring him with thee, Monarchs, like the sun,
Shine but in vain, unwarming, if unseen;
With forms and rev'rence let the great approach us;
Not the unhappy; every place alike
Gives the distress'd a privilege to enter.

[Exit Orasmin.

I think with horror on these dreadful maxims,
Which harden kings insensibly to tyrants.

Re-enter ORASMIN, with NERESTAN.

Ner. Imperial sultan! honour'd ev'n by foes!
See me return'd, regardful of my vow,
And punctual to discharge a Christian's duty.
I bring the ransom of the captive Zara,
Fair Selima, the partner of her fortune,
And of ten Christian captives, pris'ners here.
You promis'd, sultan, if I should return,
To grant their rated liberty: behold
I am return'd, and they are yours no more.
I would have stretch'd my purpose to myself,
But fortune has deny'd it; my poor all
Suffic'd no further, and a noble poverty
Is now my whole possession. I redeem
The promis'd Christians; for I taught 'em hope:
But, for myself, I come again your slave,
To wait the fuller hand of future charity.

Osman. Christian! I must confess thy courage charms me;
But let thy pride be taught it treads too high,
When it presumes to climb above my mercy.
Go ransomless thyself, and carry back
Their unaccepted ransoms, join'd with gifts,
Fit to reward thy purpose: instead of ten,
Demand a hundred Christians; they are thine:
Take 'em, and bid 'em teach their haughty
country,
They left some virtue among Saracens.
Be Lusignan alone excepted. He Who boasts the blood of kings, and dares lay claim

To my Jerusalem—that claim, his guilt!
I mourn his lot,
Who must in fetters, lost to day-light, pine
And sigh away old age in grief and pain.
For Zara but to name her as a captive,
Were to dishonour language; she's a prize
Above thy purchase: all the Christian realms,
With all their kings to guide 'em, would unite
In vain, to force her from me. Go, retire.

Ner. For Zara's ransom, with her own consent,
I had your royal word. For Lusignan—
Unhappy, poor old man—

Osman. Was I not heard?
Have I not told thee, Christian, all my will?
What, if I prais'd thee! This presumptuous
virtue,
Compelling my esteem, provokes my pride;
Be gone; and when to-morrow's sun shall rise,
On my dominions be not found—too near me.

[Exit Nerestan.

Zara. Assist him, heaven! [Aside.

Osman. Zara, retire a moment.
Assume, throughout my palace, sovereign empire,

While I give orders to prepare the pomp
That waits to crown thee mistress of my throne.

[Leads her out, and returns.

Orasmin! didst thou mark th'imperious slave?

What could he mean?—he sigh'd—and, as he went,
Turn'd and look'd back at Zara!—didst thou mark it?

Oras. Alas! my sovereign master! let not jealousy

Strike high enough to reach your noble heart.

Osman. Jealousy, saidst thou? I disdain it.
No!

Distrust is poor; and a misplac'd suspicion
Invites and justifies the falsehood fear'd.

Yet, as I love with warmth, so I could hate!
But Zara is above disguise and art.

Jealous! I was not jealous! If I was,

I am not—no—my heart—but, let us drown

Remembrance of the word, and of the image;

My heart is fill'd with a diviner flame.

Go, and prepare for the approaching nuptials.

I must allot one hour to thoughts of state,

Then all the smiling day is love and Zara's.

[Exit Orasmin.

Monarchs, by forms of pompous misery press'd,

In proud, unsocial misery, unblest'd,

Would, but for love's soft influence, curse

their throne,

And, among crowded millions, live alone. [Exit.

A C T II.

SCENE I.

Enter NERESTAN and CHATILLON.

Cha. Matchless Nerestan! generous and great!

You, who have broke the chains of hopeless
slaves!

Appear, be known, enjoy your due delight;

The grateful weepers wait to clasp your knees;

They throng to kiss the happy hand that sav'd 'em!

Indulge the kind impatience of their eyes,

And, at their head, command their hearts for ever.

Ner. Illustrious Chatillon! this praise o'erwhelms me;

What have I done beyond a Christian's duty,

Beyond what you would, in my place, have done?

Cha. True—it is every honest Christian's duty;

Nay, 'tis the blessing of such minds as ours,

For others' good to sacrifice our own.

Yet, happy they, to whom heav'n grants the

power

To execute, like you, that duty's call.

For us, the relics of abandon'd war,

Forgot in France, and in Jerusalem,

Left to grow old in fetters, Osman's father

Consign'd us to the gloom of a damp dungeon,

Where, but for you, we must have groan'd out life,

And native France have bless'd our eyes no

more.

Ner. The will of gracious heav'n, that soften'd Osman,

Inspir'd me for your sakes: but with our joy

Flows, mix'd, a bitter sadness. I had hop'd

To save from their perversion, a young beauty,

Who, in her infant innocence, with me,

Was made a slave by cruel Noradin;

When, sprinkling Syria with the blood of Christians,

Caesarea's walls saw Lusignan surpris'd,

And the proud crescent rise in bloody triumph.
From this seraglio having young escap'd,
Fate, three years since, restor'd me to my chains;

Then, sent to Paris on my plighted faith,
I flatter'd my fond hope with vain resolves,

To guide the lovely Zara to that court,

Where Lewis has establish'd virtue's throne:

But Osman will detain her—yet, not Osman;

Zara herself forgets she is a Christian,

And loves the tyrant sultan! Let that pass:

I mourn a disappointment still more cruel;

The prop of all our Christian hope is lost.

Cha. Dispose me at your will; I am your own.

Ner. Oh, sir, great Lusignan, so long their captive,

That last of an heroic race of kings,

That warrior, whose past fame has fill'd the world,

Osman refuses to my sighs for ever.

Cha. Nay, then we have been all redeem'd
in vain;

Perish that soldier who would quit his chains,

And leave his noble chief behind in fetters.

Alas! you know him not as I have known him:

Thank heav'n, that plac'd your birth so far remov'd

From those detested days of blood and woe:

But I, less happy, was condemn'd to see

Thy walls, Jerusalem, beat down, and all

Our pious fathers' labours lost in ruins!

Heav'n! had you seen the very temple rifled,

The sacred sepulchre itself profan'd,

Fathers with children mingl'd, flame together,

And our last king, oppress'd with age and

arms,

Murder'd, and bleeding o'er his murder'd sons!

Then Lusignan, sole remnant of his race,

Rallying our fated few amidst the flames,

Fearless, beneath the crush of falling towers,

The conquerors and the conquer'd, groans and death!

Dreadful—and waving in his hand a sword,

Red with the blood of infidels, cry'd out,

"This way, ye faithful Christians! follow me!"

Ner. How full of glory was that brave retreat!

Cha. 'Twas heav'n, no doubt, that sav'd and led him on,

Pointed his path, and march'd our guardian guide:

We reach'd Caesarea—there the general voice

Chose Lusignan, thenceforth to give us laws.

Alas! 'twas vain; Caesarea could not stand

When Sion's self was fallen! we were betray'd;

And Lusignan condemn'd to length of life,

In chains, in damps, and darkness, and despair.

Ner. Oh! I should hate the liberty he shar'd not.

I knew too well the miseries you describe,

For I was born amidst them. Chains and death,

Caesarea lost, and Saracens triumphant,

Were the first objects which my eyes e'er

look'd on.

Hurried, an infant, among other infants,

Snatch'd from the bosoms of their bleeding mothers,

A temple sav'd us, till the slaughter ceas'd;

Then were we sent to this ill-fated city;

Here, in the palace of our former kings,

To learn from Saracens their hated faith,

And be completely wretched. Zara, too,

Shar'd this captivity; we both grew up
So near each other, that a tender friendship
Endear'd her to my wishes: my fond heart—
Pardon its weakness, bleeds to see her lost,
And, for a barbarous tyrant, quit her God!

Cha. Such is the Saracens too fatal policy;
Watchful seducers still of infant weakness!
But let us think: may not this Zara's int'rest,
Loving the sultan, and by him belov'd,
For Lusignan procure some softer sentence?

Ner. How shall I gain admission to her presence?

Osman has banish'd me; but that's a trifle:
Will the seraglio's portals open to me?
Or could I find that easy to my hopes,
What prospect of success from an apostate?
On whom I cannot look without disdain;
And who will read her shame upon my brow.
The hardest trial of a generous mind
Is to court favours from a hand it scorns.

Cha. Think it is Lusignan we seek to serve.

Ner. Well, it shall be attempted. Hark!
who's this?

Are my eyes false? or is it really she?

Enter ZARA.

Zara. Start not, my worthy friend! I come to seek you;

The sultan has permitted it; fear nothing:
But to confirm my heart, which trembles near
you,

Soften that angry air, nor look reproach;
Why should we fear each other, both mistaking?

Associates from our birth, one prison held us,
One friendship taught affliction to be calm,
Till heaven thought fit to favour your escape,
And call you to the fields of happier France;
Thence, once again, it was my lot to find you
A pris'ner here; where, hid amongst a crowd
Of undistinguish'd slaves, with less restraint
I shar'd your frequent converse:

It pleas'd your pity, shall I say your friendship?
Or rather, shall I call it generous charity?

To form that noble purpose, to redeem
Distressful Zara—you procur'd my ransom,
And with a greatness that out-soar'd a crown,
Return'd yourself a slave, to give me freedom:
But heav'n has cast our fate for different
climes;

Here, in Jerusalem, I fix for ever;
Yet, among all the shine that marks my fortune,
I shall with frequent tears remember yours.
Your goodness will for ever sooth my heart,
And keep your image still a dweller there:
Warm'd by your great example to protect
That faith that lifts humanity so high,
I'll be a mother to distressful Christians.

Ner. How! you protect the Christians! you, who can

Abjure their saving truth, and coldly see
Great Lusignan, their chief, die slow in chains!

Zara. To bring him freedom you behold me here;

You will this moment meet his eyes in joy.

Cha. Shall I then live to bless that happy
hour?

Ner. Can Christians owe so dear a gift to Zara?

Zara. Hopeless I gather'd courage to entreat
The sultan for his liberty: amaz'd,
So soon to gain the happiness I wish'd!

See where they bring the good old chief,
grown dim

With age, by pain and sorrows hasten'd on.
Cha. How is my heart dissolv'd with sudden joy.

Enter LUSIGNAN, led in by two Guards.

Lus. Where am I? From the dungeon's depth what voice

Has call'd me to revisit long-lost day?

Am I with Christians? I am weak; forgive me,
And guide my trembling steps. I'm full of
years;

My miseries have worn me more than age.

Am I in truth at liberty? [Seats himself.]

Cha. You are;

And every Christian's grief takes end with yours.

Lus. O light! O, dearer far than light, that voice!

Chatillon, is it you? my fellow martyr!

And shall our wretchedness indeed have end?

In what place are we now? my feeble eyes,
Disus'd to day-light, long in vain to find you.

Cha. This was the palace of your royal fathers:

Tis now the son of Noradin's seraglio.

Zara. The master of this place, the mighty
Osman,

Distinguishes, and loves to cherish virtue.

This gen'rous Frenchman, yet a stranger to you
Drawn from his native soil, from peace and rest, Brought the vow'd ransom of ten Christian
slaves,

Himself contented to remain a captive;

But Osman, charm'd by greatness like his own,
To equal what he lov'd, has giv'n him you.

Lus. So gen'rous France inspires her social sons!

They have been ever dear and useful to me.

Would I were nearer to him. Noble sir,

[Nerestan approaches.]

How have I merited, that you for me

Should pass such distant seas to bring me
blessings,

And hazard your own safety for my sake?

Ner. My name, sir, is Nerestan; born in Syria,

I wore the chains of slavery from my birth;
Till quitting the proud crescent for the court
Where warlike Lewis reigns, beneath his eye
I learnt the trade of arms: the rank I held
Was but the kind distinction which he gave me,
To tempt my courage to deserve regard.

Your sight, unhappy prince, would charm
his eye;

That best and greatest monarch will behold
With grief and joy those venerable wounds,
And print embraces where your fetters bound
you.

All Paris will revere the cross's martyr.

Lus. Alas! in times long past, I've seen its
glory:

When Philip the victorious liv'd, I fought
Abreast with Montmorency and Melun,
D'Estaing, De Nesle, and the far-famous Courcy; Names which were then the praise and dread
of war.

But what have I to do at Paris now?

I stand upon the brink of the cold grave;
That way my journey lies—to find, I hope,
The King of kings, and ask the recompense
For all my woes, long suffer'd for his sake.

You gen'rous witnesses of my last hour,
 While I yet live, assist my humble prayers,
 And join the resignation of my soul.
 Nerestan! Chatillon! and you, fair mourner,
 Whose tears do honour to an old man's sorrows!
 Pity a father, the unhappiest sure
 That ever felt the hand of angry heaven!
 My eyes, though dying, still can furnish tears;
 Half my long life they flow'd, and still will flow!
 A daughter and three sons, my heart's proud hopes,
 Were all torn from me in their tend'rest
 years:

My friend Chatillon knows, and can remember—

Cho. Would I were able to forget your woe.

Lus. Thou wert a pris'ner with me in Caesarea,

And there beheld'st my wife and two dear sons
 Perish in flames.

Cha. A captive, and in fetters,
 I could not help 'em.

Lus. I know thou couldst not.

Oh, 'twas a dreadful scene! these eyes beheld it:
 Husband and father, helpless I beheld it;
 Deny'd the mournful privilege to die.

Oh, my poor children, whom I now deplore,
 If ye are saints in heav'n, as sure ye are,
 Look with an eye of pity on that brother,
 That sister whom you left! If I have yet
 Or son or daughter; for in early chains,
 Far from their lost and unassisting father,
 I heard that they were sent, with numbers more,
 To this seraglio; hence to be dispers'd
 In nameless remnants o'er the east, and spread
 Our Christian miseries round a faithless world.

Cha. 'Twas true; for in the horrors of that day,

I snatch'd your infant daughter from her cradle;
 When from my bleeding arms, fierce Saracens
 Forc'd the lost innocent, who smiling lay
 And pointed, playful, at the swarthy spoilers!
 With her your youngest, then your only son,
 Whose little life had reach'd the fourth sad year,
 And just giv'n sense to feel his own misfortunes,
 Was order'd to this city.

Ner. I too, hither,
 Just at that fatal age, from lost Caesarea,
 Came in that crowd of undistinguish'd Christians.

Lus. You! came you thence? Alas! who knows but you Might heretofore have seen my two poor children. [Looks up.]

Ra, madam! that small ornament you wear,
 Its form a stranger to this country's fashion,
 How long has it been yours?

Zara. From my first birth, sir.
 Ah, what! you seem surpris'd!—Why should this move you?

Lus. Would you confide it to my trembling
 hands?

Zara. To what new wonders am I now reserv'd?

Oh, sir! what mean you?

Lus. Providence and heaven!
 Oh, failing eyes, deceive ye not my hope?
 Can this be possible?—Yes, yes, 'tis she!
 This little cross—I know it by sure marks!
 Oh! take me, heaven, while I can die with joy!

Zara. Oh, do not, sir, distract me! Rising
 thoughts,
 And hopes, and fears, o'erwhelm me!

Lus. Tell me yet,
 Has it remain'd for ever in your hands?
 What, both brought captives from Caesarea
 hither?

Zara. Both, both.

Lus. Their voice! their looks!
 The living images of their dear mother!
 O God! who seest my tears and know'st my
 thoughts,

Do not forsake me at this dawn of hope;
 Strengthen my heart, too feeble for this joy.
 Madam! Nerestan!—Help me, Chatillon!

[Rises.]

Nerestan, hast thou on thy breast a scar,
 Which ere Caesarea fell, from a fierce hand,
 Surprising us by night, my child receiv'd?

Ner. Bless'd hand!—I bear it.—Sir, the mark is there!

Lus. Merciful heaven!

Ner. Oh, sir!—Oh, Zara, kneel! [Kneels.]

Zara. My father!—Oh!— [Kneels.]

Lus. Oh, my lost children!

Both. Oh!

Lus. My son! my daughter! lost in embracing you,

I would now die, lest this should prove a dream.

Cha. How touch'd is my glad heart to see their joy!

Lus. They shall not tear you from my arms
 —my children,

Again I find you—dear in wretchedness.

Oh, my brave son, and thou, my nameless
 daughter!

Now dissipate all doubt, remove all dread;
 Has heaven, that gives me back my children,
 given 'em

Such as I lost them? come they Christians
 to me?

One weeps, and one declines a conscious eye!
 Your silence speaks; too well I understand it.

Zara. I cannot, sir, deceive you; Osman's laws

Were mine; and Osman is not Christian.

Lus. Her words are thunder bursting on my head.

Wer't not for thee, my son, I now should die.
 Full sixty years I fought the Christian's cause;
 Saw their doom'd temple fall, their power
 destroy'd:

Twenty, a captive, in a dungeon's depth;
 Yet never for myself my tears sought heaven:
 All for my children rose my fruitless prayers.
 Yet what avails a father's wretched joy?

I have a daughter gain'd, and heaven an enemy.
 Oh, my misguided daughter, lose not thy faith;
 Reclaim thy birthright; think upon the blood
 Of twenty Christian kings, that fills thy veins:
 'Tis heroes' blood, the blood of saints and martyrs!

What would thy mother feel to see thee thus?
 She and thy murder'd brothers!—think they call thee;

Think that thou see'st 'em stretch their bloody
 arms,

And weep to win thee from their murd'rer's
 bosom.

E'en in the place where thou betray'st thy God,
 He died, my child, to save thee!

Thou tremblest—Oh! admit me to thy soul;
 Kill not thy aged, thy afflicted father;
 Shame not thy mother, nor renounce thy God.—
 'Tis past; repentance dawns in thy sweet eyes;

I see bright truth descending to thy heart,
And now my long-lost child is found for ever.

Zara. Oh, my father!

Dear author of my life! inform me, teach me,
What should my duty do?

Lus. By one short word,
To dry up all my tears, and make life welcome,

Say thou art a Christian.

Zara. Sir, I am a Christian.

Lus. Receive her, gracious heaven! and bless her for it.

Enter ORASMIN.

Oras. Madam, the sultan order'd me to tell you

That he expects you instant quit this place,
And bid your last farewell to these vile Christians.

You, captive Frenchmen, follow me; for you
It is my task to answer.

Cha. Still new miseries!

How cautious man should be, to say, "I'm happy!"

Lus. These are the times, my friends, to try our firmness,

Our Christian firmness.

Zara. Alas, sir! Oh!

Lus. Oh, you!—I dare not name you!
Farewell! but, come what may, be sure remember

You keep the fatal secret: for the rest,
Leave all to heaven—be faithful, and be blest.

[Exeunt.]

ACT III.

SCENE 1. Enter OSMAN and ORASMIN.

Osman. Orasmin, this alarm was false and groundless;

Lewis no longer turns his arms on me;
The French, grown weary by a length of woes,
Wish not at once to quit their fruitful plains,
And famish on Arabia's desert sands.

Their ships, 'tis true, have spread the Syrian seas:
And Lewis, hov'ring o'er the coast of Cyprus,
Alarms the fears of Asia.—But I've learn'd,
That, steering wide from our unmenac'd ports,
He points his thunder at th' Egyptian shore.

There let him war, and waste my enemies;
Their mutual conflict will but fix my throne.—

Release those Christians; I restore their freedom:
'Twill please their master, nor can weaken me.

Transport 'em, at my cost, to find their king.
I wish to have him know me. Carry thither

This Lusignan; whom, tell him, I restore,
Because I cannot fear his fame in arms,

But love him for his virtue and his blood.
Tell him, my father, having conquer'd twice,

Condemn'd him to perpetual chains; but I
Have set him free, that I might triumph more.

Oras. The Christians gain an army in his name.

Osman. I cannot fear a sound.

Oras. But, sir, should Lewis—

Osman. Tell Lewis, and the world, it shall be so:

Zara propos'd it, and my heart approves.

Thy statesman's reason is too dull for love!
But I talk on, and waste the smiling moments.

For one long hour I yet defer my nuptials;
She would employ it in a conference

With that Nerestan, whom thou know'st—that Christian!

Oras. And have you, sir, indulg'd that strange desire?

Osman. What mean'st thou? They were infant slaves together;

Friends should part kind, who are to meet
no more.

When Zara asks, I will refuse her nothing:
Restraint was never made for those we love.

Down with those rigours of the proud seraglio!
I hate its laws; where blind austerity

Sinks virtue to necessity.—My blood
Disclaims your Asian jealousy; I hold

The fierce, free plainness of my Scythian ancestors,

Their open confidence, their honest hate,
Their love unfearing, and their anger told.

Go; the good Christian waits; conduct him
to her;

Zara expects thee. What she wills, obey.
[Exit.]

Oras. Ho! Christian! enter.

Enter NERESTAN.

Wait a moment here.

Zara will soon approach: I go to find her. [Exit.]

Ner. In what a state, in what a place, I leave her!

Oh, faith! Oh, father! Oh, my poor, lost sister!
She's here.

Enter ZARA.

Thank heaven, it is not then unlawful
To see you yet once more, my lovely sister!

Not all so happy!—We, who met but now,
Shall never meet again; for Lusignan—

We shall be orphans still, and want a father.
Zara. Forbid it, heaven!

Ner. His last sad hour's at hand.

That flow of joy, which follow'd our discovery,
Too strong and sudden for his age's weakness,

Wasting his spirits, dried the source of life,
And nature yields him up to time's demand.

Shall he not die in peace?—Oh! let no doubt
Disturb his parting moments with distrust;

Let me, when I return to close his eyes,
Compose his mind's impatience too, and tell

him,
You are confirm'd a Christian!

Zara. Oh! may his soul enjoy, in earth and heaven,

Eternal rest; nor let one thought, one sigh,
One bold complaint of mine recall his cares!

But you have injur'd me, who still can doubt.
What! am I not your sister? and shall you

Refuse me credit? You suppose me light;
You, who should judge my honour by your

own,
Shall you distrust a truth I dar'd avow,

And stamp apostate on a sister's heart?
Ner. Ah, do not misconceive me; if I err'd,

Affection, not distrust, misled my fear;
Your will may be a Christian, yet not you;

There is a sacred mark, a sign of faith,
A pledge of promise, that must firm your

claim,
Wash you from guilt, and open heaven before you.

Swear, swear by all the woes we all have borne,

By all the martyr'd saints who call you
daughter,

That you consent, this day, to seal our faith,
By that mysterious rite which waits your call.

Zara. I swear by heaven, and all its holy host,

Its saints, its martyrs, its attesting angels,
And the dread presence of its living author,
To have no faith but yours—to die a Christian!
Now tell me what this mystic faith requires.

Ner. To hate the happiness of Osman's throne,
And love that God, who, through his maze
of woes,

Has brought us all, unhoping, thus together.
For me—I am a soldier, uninstructed,
Nor daring to instruct, though strong in faith:
But I will bring the ambassador of heaven,
To clear your views, and lift you to your God.
Be it your task to gain admission for him.
But where? from whom? Oh! thou immortal power!

Whence can we hope it, in this curs'd seraglio?
Who is this slave of Osman? Yes, this slave!
Does she not boast the blood of twenty kings?
Is not her race the same with that of Lewis?
Is she not Lusignan's unhappy daughter?
A Christian and my sister? yet a slave,
A willing slave! I dare not speak more plainly.

Zara. Cruel! go on—Alas! you do not know me.

At once, a stranger to my secret fate,
My pains, my fears, my wishes, and my power:
I am—I will be Christian—will receive
This holy priest with his mysterious blessing;
I will not do nor suffer aught unworthy
Myself, my father, or my father's race.
But tell me, nor be tender on this point,
What punishment your Christian laws decree,
For an unhappy wretch, who, to herself
Unknown, and all abandon'd by the world,
Lost and enslav'd, has, in her sovereign master,
Found a protector, generous as great,
Has touch'd his heart, and given him all her
own?

Ner. The punishment of such a slave should be Death in this world, and pain in that to come.

Zara. I am that slave! Strike here, and save my shame.

Ner. Destruction to my hopes! Can it be
you?

Zara. It is! ador'd by Osman, I adore him:
This hour the nuptial rites will make us one.

Ner. What! marry Osman! Let the world grow dark,

That the extinguish'd sun may hide thy shame!
Could it be thus, it were no crime to kill thee.

Zara. Strike, strike! I love him! yes, by heav'n, I love him.

Ner. Death is thy due; but not thy, due
from me:

Yet, were the honour of our house no bar,
My father's fame, and the too gentle laws
Of that religion which thou hast disgrac'd;
Did not the God thou quit'st hold back my arm;
Not there—I could not there—but by my soul,
I would rush, desp'rate, to the sultan's breast,
And plunge my sword in his proud heart who damns thee.

Oh, shame! shame! shame! at such a time as
this,

When Lewis, that awak'ner of the world,
Beneath the lifted cross makes Egypt pale,
And draws the sword of heaven to spread our faith;

Now to submit to see my sister doom'd
A bosom slave to him whose tyrant heart
But measures glory by the Christian's woe.
Yes, I will dare acquaint our father with it
Departing Lusignan may live so long,
As just to hear thy shame, and die to 'scape it.

Zara. Stay, my too angry brother; stay,
perhaps,

Zara has resolution great as thine:
Tis cruel and unkind. Thy words are crimes;
My weakness but misfortune. Dost thou suffer?
I suffer more. Oh! would to heaven this blood
Of twenty boasted kings would stop at once,
And stagnate in my heart! It then no more
Would rush in boiling fevers through my veins,
And every trembling drop be fill'd with Osman.
How has he lov'd me; how has he oblig'd me!
I owe thee to him. What has he not done,
To justify his boundless pow'r of charming?
For me he softens the severe decrees
Of his own faith; and is it just that mine
Should bid me hate him, but because he loves
me?

No—I will be a Christian—but preserve
My gratitude as sacred as my faith;
If I have death to fear for Osman's sake,
It must be from his coldness, not his love.

Ner. I must at once condemn and pity thee.
Here then begin performance of thy vow;
Here, in the trembling horrors of thy soul,
Promise thy king, thy father, and thy God,
Not to accomplish these detested nuptials,
Till first the rev'rend priest has clear'd your eyes,
Taught you to know, and given you claim to heaven.

Promise me this.

Zara. So bless me, heaven! I do.
Go, hasten the good priest, I will expect him;
But first return; cheer my expiring father;
Tell him I am, and will be, all he wishes me:
Tell him, to give him life 'twere joy to die.

Ner. I go. Farewell, farewell, unhappy sister! [Exit.]

Zara. I am alone;—and now be just, my
heart,

And tell me wilt thou dare betray thy God?
What am I? what am I about to be?

Daughter of Lusignan, or wife to Osman?
Am I a lover most, or most a Christian?

What shall I do? What heart has strength to bear

These double weights of duty?—Help me,
heaven!

To thy hard laws I render up my soul:
But, oh! demand it back; for now 'tis Osman's.

Re-enter OSMAN.

Osman. Shine out, appear, be found, my lovely Zara!

Impatient eyes attend, the rites expect thee,
And my devoted heart no longer brooks
This distance from its soft'ner:

Come, my slow love, the ceremonies wait thee;
Come, and begin from this dear hour my triumph.

Zara. Oh, what a wretch am I! Oh, grief!
Oh, love! [Aside.]

Osman. Nay, Zara, give me thy hand, and come.

Zara. Instruct me, heaven!
What I should say—alas! I cannot speak

Osman. Away! this modest, sweet, reluctant trifling

But doubles my desires, and thy own beauties.

Zara. Ah, me!

Osman. Nay, but thou shouldst not be too cruel.

Zara. I can no longer bear it.—Oh, my lord—

Osman. Ha! What? whence? how?

Zara. My lord, my sovereign!

Heaven knows this marriage would have been a bliss

Above my humble hopes: yet, witness, love! Not from the grandeur of your throne, that bliss,

But from the pride of calling Osman mine.

But as it is—these Christians—

Osman. Christians! What!

How start two images into thy thoughts, So distant, as the Christians and my love?

Zara. That good old Christian, rev'rend Lusignan,

Now dying, ends his life and woes together.

Osman. Well, let him die. What has thy heart to feel,

Thus pressing, and thus tender, from the death Of an old, wretched Christian?—Thank our prophet,

Thou art no Christian.—Educated here,

Thy happy youth was taught our better faith:

Sweet as thy pity shines, 'tis now mistim'd.

What! though an aged sufferer dies unhappy,

Why should his foreign fate disturb our joys?

Zara. Sir, if you love me, and would have me think

That I am truly dear—

Osman. Heaven! if I love?

Zara. Permit me—

Osman. What?

Zara. To desire—

Osman. Speak out.

Zara. The nuptial rites

May be deferr'd till—

Osman. What! Is that the voice

Of Zara?

Zara. Oh, I cannot bear his frown. [Aside.

Osman. Of Zara!

Zara. It is dreadful to my heart,

To give you but a seeming cause for anger.

Pardon my grief—alas! I cannot bear it.

There is a painful terror in your eye

That pierces to my soul. Hid from your sight,

I go to make a moment's truce with tears,

And gather force to speak of my despair:

[Exit, disordered.

Osman. I stand immovable like senseless marble;

Horror had frozen my suspended tongue,

And an astonish'd silence robb'd my will

Of power to tell her that she shock'd my soul.

Spoke she to me? Sure I misunderstood her.

Could it be me she left?—What have I seen?

Re-enter ORASMIN.

Orasmin, what a change is here!—She's gone; And I permitted it, I know not how.

Oras. Perhaps you but accuse the charming fault

Of innocence, too modest oft in love.

Osman. But why, and whence those tears? those looks? that flight?

That grief, so strongly stamp'd on every feature?

If it has been that Frenchman—What a thought! How low, how horrid a suspicion that!

But tell me, didst thou mark 'em at their parting?

Didst thou observe the language of their eyes?

Hide nothing from me.—Is my love betray'd?

Tell me my whole disgrace.—Nay, if thou tremblest,

I hear thy pity speak, though thou art silent.

Oras. I tremble at the pangs I see you suffer.

Let not your angry apprehensions urge

Your faithful slave to irritate your anguish.

I did, 'tis true, observe some parting tears;

But they were tears of charity and grief.

I cannot think there was a cause deserving

This agony of passion.

Osman. Why, no—I thank thee—

Orasmin, thou art wise. It could not be

That I should stand expos'd to such an insult.

Thou know'st, had Zara meant me the offence,

She wants not wisdom to have hid it better.

How rightly didst thou judge!—Zara shall know it,

And thank thy honest service.—After all,

Might she not have some cause for tears, which I

Claim no concern in—but the grief it gives her?

What an unlikely fear—from a poor slave

Who goes to-morrow, and, no doubt, who wishes,

Nay, who resolves to see these climes no more.

Oras. Why did you, sir, against our country's custom,

Indulge him with a second leave to come?

He said he should return once more to see her.

Osman. Return! the traitor! he return!

Dares he

Presume to press a second interview?

Would he be seen again? He shall be seen;

But dead. I'll punish the audacious slave,

To teach the faithless fair to feel my anger.

Be still, my transports; violence is blind:

I know my heart at once is fierce and weak.

Rather than fall

Beneath myself, I must, how dear so'er

It costs me, rise—till I look down on Zara!

Away; but mark me—these seraglio doors,

Against all Christians be they henceforth shut,

Close as the dark retreats of silent death.

[Exit Orasmin.

What have I done, just heaven! thy rage to move?

That thou shouldst sink me down so low to love? [Exit.

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—Enter ZARA and SELIMA.

Sel. Ah, madam! how at once I grieve your fate,

And how admire your virtue! Heaven permits,

And heaven will give you strength to bear misfortune;

To break these chains, so strong and yet so dear.

Zara. Oh that I could support the fatal struggle!

Sel. Th'Eternal aids your weakness, sees your will,

Directs your purpose, and rewards your sorrows.

Zara. Never had wretch more cause to hope he does.

Sel. What! though you here no more behold your father:

There is a father to be found above,
Who can restore that father to his daughter.

Zara. But I have planted pain in Osman's
bosom:

He loves me, even to death; and I reward him
With anguish and despair. How base! how cruel!

But I deserv'd him not; I should have been Too happy, and the hand of heav'n repell'd me.

Sel. What! will you then regret the glorious loss

And hazard thus a vict'ry bravely won?

Zara. Inhuman victory!—thou dost not know
This love so pow'rful; this sole joy of life;
This first best hope of earthly happiness,
Is yet less pow'rful in my heart than heaven.
To him who made that heart I offer it:

There, there I sacrifice my bleeding passion;
I pour before him ev'ry guilty tear;
I beg him to efface the fond impression,
And fill with his own image all my soul.
But, while I weep and sigh, repent and pray,
Remembrance brings the object of my love,
And ev'ry light illusion floats before him.
I see, I hear him; and again he charms;
Fills my glad soul, and shines 'twixt me and
heav'n!

Oh, all ye royal ancestors! Oh, father!
Mother! You Christians, and the Christians'
God!

You who deprive me of this gen'rous lover!
If you permit me not to live for him,
Let me not live at all, and I am bless'd.

Sel. Ah! despair not;

Trust your eternal helper, and be happy.

Zara. Why, what has Osman done, that he too should not?

Has heaven so nobly form'd his heart to hate
it?

Gen'rous and just, beneficent and brave,
Were he but Christian—What can man be
more?

I wish, methinks, this rev'rend priest was come
To free me from these doubts, which shake
my soul:

Yet know not why I should not dare to hope,
That heav'n, whose mercy all confess and feel,
Will pardon and approve th' alliance wish'd.
Perhaps it seats me on the throne of Syria,
To tax my pow'r for these good Christians'
comfort.

Thou know'st the mighty Saladine, who first
Conquer'd this empire from my father's race,
Who, like my Osman, charm'd th' admiring
world,

Drew breath, though Syrian, from a Christian mother.

Sel. What mean you, madam? Ah, you do not see—

Zara. Yes, yes, I see it all; I am not blind:
I see my country, and my race condemn me;
I see that; spite of all, I still love Osman.

What if I now go throw me at his feet,
And tell him there sincerely what I am?

Sel. Consider—that might cost your brother's life,

Expose the Christians, and betray you all.

Zara. You do not know the noble heart of Osman.

Sel. I know him the protector of a faith,
Sworn enemy to ours: the more he loves,
The less will he permit you to profess

Opinions which he hates. To-night the priest,
In private introduc'd, attends you here;
You promis'd him admission.

Zara. Would I had not!

I promis'd too to keep this fatal secret;
My father's urg'd command requir'd it of me;
I must obey, all dangerous as it is;
Compell'd to silence, Osman is enrag'd,
Suspicion follows, and I lose his love.

Enter OSMAN.

Osman. Madam, there was a time when my charm'd heart

Made it a virtue to be lost in love;
When, without blushing, I indulg'd my flame,
And every day still made you dearer to me.
You taught me, madam, to believe my love
Rewarded and return'd; nor was that hope,
Methinks, too bold for reason. Emperors
Who choose to sigh devoted at the feet
Of beauties, whom the world conceive their
slaves,

Have fortune's claim, at least, to sure success:
But 'twere profane to think of power in love.
Dear as my passion makes you, I decline Possession of her charms, whose heart's another's.

You will not find me a weak, jealous lover,
By coarse reproaches, giving pain to you,
And shaming my own greatness: wounded
deeply,
Yet shunning and disdaining low complaint,
I come—to tell you—

Zara. Give my trembling heart

A moment's respite.

Osman. Osman, in every trial, shall remember

That he is emperor. Whatever I suffer,
'Tis due to honour that I give up you,
And to my injur'd bosom take despair,
Rather than shamefully possess you sighing, Convinc'd those sighs were never meant for
me.

Go, madam; you are free—from Osman's
pow'r:

Expect no wrongs; but see his face no more.

Zara. At last 'tis come—the fear'd, the murd'ring moment

Is come; and I am curs'd by earth and heaven!

[Throws herself on the Ground.]

If it is true that I am lov'd no more;

If you—

Osman. It is true, my fame requires it;
It is too true that I unwilling leave you;
That I at once renounce you and adore—

Zara. you weep!

Zara. If I am doom'd to lose you!

If I must wander o'er an empty world,
Unloving and unlov'd. Oh! yet do justice
To the afflicted; do not wrong me doubly.
Punish me, if 'tis needful to your peace,
But say not I deserv'd it.

But, ah! my heart was never known to Osman.
May heav'n, that punishes, for ever hate me,
If I regret the loss of aught but you.

Osman. Rise!

What! is it love to force yourself to wound
The heart you wish to gladden? But I find Lovers least know themselves; for I believ'd
That I had taken back the power I gave you;
Yet see! you did but weep, and have resum'd
me!

Proud as I am, I must confess one wish
Evades my power—the blessing to forget you.
Zara, thy tears were form'd to teach disdain,
That softness can disarm it. 'Tis decreed,
I must for ever love; but from what cause,
If thy consenting heart partakes my fires,
Art thou reluctant to a blessing meant me?
Speak! is it artifice?

O! spare the needless pains: art was not made
For Zara. Art, however innocent,
Looks like deceiving; I abhorr'd it ever.

Zara. Alas! I have no art; not even enough
To hide this love, and this distress you give me.

Osman. New riddles! Speak with plainness to my soul;
What canst thou mean?

Zara. I have no power to speak it.

Osman. Is it some secret dangerous to my state?

Is it some Christian plot grown ripe against me?

Zara. Lives there a wretch so vile as to betray you?

Osman is bless'd beyond the reach of fear:
Fears and misfortunes threaten only Zara.

Osman. Why threaten Zara?

Zara. Permit me at your feet,
Thus trembling, to beseech a favour from you.

Osman. A favour! Oh, you guide the will of Osman.

Zara. Ah! would to heav'n our duties were united:

But this day,
But this one sad, unhappy day, permit me,
Alone, and far divided from your eye,
To cover my distress, lest you, too tender,
Should see and share it with me: from tomorrow

I will not have a thought conceal'd from you.

Osman. If it must be, it must. Be pleas'd,
my will

Takes purpose from your wishes; and consent
Depends not on my choice, but your decree:
Go; but remember how he loves, who thus
Finds a delight in pain, because you give it.

Zara. It gives me more than pain to make you feel it.

Osman. And can you, Zara, leave me?

Zara, Alas, my lord. [Exit.]

Osman. It should be yet, methinks, too soon to fly me;

Too soon, as yet, to wrong my easy faith.
The more I think, the less I can conceive
What hidden cause should raise such strange despair!

Now, when her hopes have wings, and every wish

Is courted to be lively! When I love,
And joy and empire press her to their bosom;
To see her eyes through tears shine mystic love!
Yet, was I blameless? No—I was too rash;
I have felt jealousy, and spoke it to her;
I have distrusted her—and still she loves:
Gen'rous atonement that!—I remark'd,
Ev'n while she wept, her soul a thousand times
Sprung to her lips, and long'd to leap to mine,
With honest, ardent utterance of her love.
Who can possess a heart so low, so base,
To look such tenderness, and yet have none?

Enter MELIDOR, with ORASMIN:

Mel. This letter, great disposer of the world!
Address'd to Zara, and in private brought,

Your faithful guards this moment intercepted,
And humbly offer to your sovereign eye.

Osman. Come nearer—give it me—To Zara!—Rise!

Bring it with speed. Shame on your flatt'ring distance!

[Advances, and snatches the Letter.]

Be honest, and approach me like a subject
Who serves the prince, yet not forgets the
man.

Mel. One of the Christian slaves, whom late your bounty
Releas'd from bondage, sought with heedful
guile,

Unnotic'd to deliver it. Discover'd,
He waits in chains his doom from your decree.

Osman. Leave me. [Exit Melidor] I tremble, as if something fatal

Were meant me from this letter. Should I read it?

Oras. Who knows but it contains some happy truth,

That may remove all doubts, and calm your
heart?

Osman. Be as 'twill, it shall be read.

[Opens the Letter.]

Fate, be thy call obey'd.—Orasmin, mark—
Hell! tortures! death! and woman!—What,
Orasmin,

Are we awake?—Heard'st thou?—Can this be
Zara?

Oras. Would I had lost all sense! for what
I heard

Has cover'd my afflicted heart with horror.

Osman. Thou seest how I am treated.

Oras. Monstrous treason!

To an affront like this you cannot, must not,
Remain insensible. You, who but now,
From the most slight suspicion, felt such pain,
Must, in the horror of so black a guilt,
Find an effectual cure, and banish love.

Osman. Seek her this instant—go, Orasmin, fly!

Show her this letter: bid her read and tremble:
Then, in the rising horrors of her guilt,
Stab her unfaithful breast, and let her die.
Say, while thou strik'st—Stay, stay, return and pity me.

Would I were dead!

Would I had died, unconscious of this shame!

Oras. Never did prince receive so bold a wrong.

Osman. See here detected this infernal secret!

This fountain of her tears, which my weak
heart

Mistook for marks of tenderness and pain!
Why! what a reach has woman to deceive!
Under how fine a veil of grief and fear
Did she propose retirement till to-morrow?
And I, blind dotard! gave the fool's consent,
Sooth'd her, and suffer'd her to go!—She parted,
Dissolv'd in tears; and parted to betray me!

Oras. Could you, my gracious lord! forgive my zeal,

You would—

Osman. I know it—thou art right—I'll see
her;

I'll tax her in thy presence; I'll upbraid her;
I'll let her learn—Go—find, and bring her to me.

Oras. Believe me, sir, your threat'nings,
your complaints,

What will they all produce but Zara's tears,
To quench this fancied anger? Your lost heart,
Seduc'd against itself, will search but reasons
To justify the guilt which gives it pain:
Rather conceal from Zara this discovery;
And let some trusty slave convey the letter,
Re-clos'd to her own hand: then shall you learn,

Spite of her frauds, disguise, and artifice,
The firmness, or abasement of her soul.

Osman. Thy counsel charms me! We'll about it now.

Here, take this fatal letter; choose a slave
Whom yet she never saw, and who retains
His tried fidelity—dispatch—be gone.

[Exit Orasmin.]

Now whither shall I turn my eyes and steps
The surest way to shun her, and give time
For this discovering trial?—Heaven! she's here!

Re-enter ZARA.

So, madam! fortune will befriend my cause,
And free me from your fetters.—You are met
Most aptly, to dispel a new-ris'n doubt,
That claims the finest of your arts to gloss it.
Unhappy each by other, it is time
To end our mutual pain, that both may rest.

You want not generosity, but love;
My pride forgotten, my obtruded throne,
My favours, cares, respect, and tenderness,
Touching your gratitude, provok'd regard;
Till, by a length of benefits besieg'd,
Your heart submitted, and you thought 'twas
love:

But you deceiv'd yourself, and injur'd me.
There is, I'm told, an object more deserving Your love than Osman: I would know his name.

Be just, nor trifle with my anger: tell me
Now, while expiring pity struggles faint;
While I have yet, perhaps, the power to pardon,
Give up the bold invader of my claim,
And let him die to save thee. Thou art known.
Think and resolve. While I yet speak, renounce him;

While yet the thunder rolls suspended, stay
it;

Let thy voice charm me, and recall my soul,
That turns averse, and dwells no more on Zara.

Zara. Can it be Osman speaks, and speaks to Zara?

Learn, cruel! learn that this afflicted heart,
This heart which heaven delights to prove by
tortures,

Did it not love, has pride and power to shun
you.

I know not whether heaven, that frowns upon
me,

Has destin'd my unhappy days for yours;
But, be my fate or bless'd or curst, I swear,
By honour, dearer ev'n than life or love,
Could Zara be but mistress of herself,
She would with cold regard look down on kings,

And, you alone excepted, fly 'em all.
And to this sacred truth, attesting heaven!
I call thy dreadful notice!—If my heart
Deserves reproach, 'tis for, but not from,
Osman.

Osman. What! does she yet presume to swear sincerity?
Oh, boldness of unblushing perjury!

Had I not seen, had I not read, such proof
Of her light falsehood as extinguish'd doubt,
I could not be a man, and not believe her.

Zara. Alas, my lord! what cruel fears have seiz'd you?

What harsh, mysterious words were those I heard?

Osman. What fears should Osman feel,
since Zara loves him?

Zara. I cannot live, and answer to your voice

In that reproachful tone; your angry eye
Trembles with fury while you talk of love.

Osman. Since Zara loves him!

Zara. Is it possible

Osman should disbelieve it?—Again, again
Your late repented violence returns.

Alas! what killing frowns you dart against me!
Can it be kind, can it be just to doubt me?

Osman. No! I can doubt no longer.—You may retire. [Exit Zara.]

Re-enter ORASMIN.

Orasmin, she's perfidious, even beyond
Her sex's undiscover'd power of seeming.
Say, hast thou chosen a slave?—Is he instructed?

Haste to detect her vileness and my wrongs.

Oras. Punctually I have obey'd your whole
command:

But have you arm'd, my lord, your injur'd
heart,

With coldness and indifference? Can you bear,
All painless and unmov'd, the false one's shame?

Osman. Orasmin, I adore her more than ever.

Oras. My lord! my emperor! forbid it,
heaven!

Osman. I have discern'd a gleam of distant hope.

Now hear me with attention.—Soon as night
Has thrown her welcome shadows o'er the palace;

When this Nerestan, this ungrateful Christian,
Shall lurk in expectation near our walls,
Be watchful that our guards surprise and seize
him;

Then, bound in fetters and o'erwhelm'd with
shame,

Conduct the daring traitor to my presence:

But, above all, be sure you hurt not Zara;
Mindful to what supreme excess I love.

[Exit Orasmin.]

On this last trial all my hopes depend.
Prophet, for once thy kind assistance lend,
Dispel the doubts that rack my anxious breast:
If Zara's innocent, thy Osman's bless'd. [Exit.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—Enter ZARA and SELIMA.

Zara. Sooth me no longer with this vain desire;

To a recluse like me, who dares henceforth
Presume admission!—The seraglio is shut;
Barr'd and impassable, as death to time!

My brother ne'er must hope to see me more.—
How now! what unknown slave accosts us
here?

Enter MELIOR.

Mel. This letter, trusted to my hands, receive,

In secret witness I am wholly yours.

[Zara reads the Letter.]

Sel. Thou everlasting Ruler of the world!
Shed thy wish'd mercy on our hopeless tears;
Redeem us from the hands of hated infidels,
And save my princess from the breast of Osman.

[Aside.]

Zara. I wish, my friend, the comfort of your counsel.

Sel. Retire—you shall be call'd—wait near —go, leave us.

[Exit Melidor.]

Zara. Read this, and tell me what I ought to answer:

For I would gladly hear my brother's voice.

Sel. Say rather you would hear the voice of heaven.

'Tis not your brother calls you, but your God.

Zara. I know it, nor resist his awful will;
Thou know'st that I have bound my soul by oath;

But can I, ought I, to engage myself,
My brother, and the Christians, in this danger?

Sel. 'Tis not their danger that alarms your fears;

Your love speaks loudest to your shrinking soul.
This tiger, savage in his tenderness,
Courts with contempt, and threatens amidst softness;

Yet cannot your neglected heart efface
His fated, fix'd impression!

Zara. What reproach

Can I with justice make him?—I indeed
Have given him cause to hate me!

Was not his throne, was not his temple ready?
Did he not court his slave to be a queen,
And have not I declin'd it?—I who ought
To tremble, conscious of affronted power!
Have not I triumph'd o'er his pride and love?
Seen him submit his own high will to mine,
And sacrifice his wishes to my weakness?

Sel. Talk we no more of this unhappy passion:

What resolution will your virtue take?

Zara. All things combine to sink me to despair:

From the seraglio death alone will free me.
I long to see the Christians' happy climes;
Yet in the moment while I form that prayer,
I sigh a secret wish to languish here.
How sad a state is mine! my restless soul
All ignorant what to do, or what to wish:
My only perfect sense is that of pain.
Oh, guardian heaven! protect my brother's life,
For I will meet him, and fulfil his prayer:
Then, when from Solyma's unfriendly walls,
His absence shall unbind his sister's tongue,
Osman shall learn the secret of my birth,
My faith unshaken, and my deathless love;
He will approve my choice, and pity me.
I'll send my brother word he may expect me.
Call in the faithful slave. God of my fathers!

[Exit Selima.]

Let thy hand save me, and thy will direct.

Re-enter MELIDOR, with SELIMA.

Go—tell the Christian who intrusted thee,
That Zara's heart is fix'd, nor shrinks at danger;
And that my faithful friend will, at the hour,
Expect and introduce him to his wish.

Away—the sultan comes; he must not find us.

[Exeunt Zara and Selima.]

Enter OSMAN and ORASMIN.

Osman. Swifter, ye hours, move on; my fury glows
Impatient, and would push the wheels of time.
How now? What message dost thou bring?
Speak boldly.

What answer gave she to the letter sent her?

Mel. She blush'd, and trembled, and grew pale, and paus'd;

Then blush'd, and read it, and again grew pale;
And wept, and smil'd, and doubted, and resolv'd:

For after all this race of varied passions,
When she had sent me out, and call'd me
back,

Tell him (she cried) who has intrusted thee,
That Zara's heart is fix'd, nor shrinks at danger;
And that my faithful friend will, at the hour,
Expect and introduce him to his wish.

Osman. Enough; be gone! I have no ear for more. [To the Slave.]
Leave me, thou too, Orasmin. Leave me, life,
For ev'ry mortal aspect moves my hate:

[To Orasmin.]

Leave me to my distraction, [Exit Orasmin.]
Who am I? Heav'n! Who am I? What resolve I?

Zara! Nerestan! sound these words like names
Decreed to join? Why pause I? Perish Zara—
Would I could tear her image from my heart.

Re-enter ORASMIN.

Orasmin! Friend! return, I cannot bear
This absence from thy reason: 'twas unkind,
'Twas cruel to obey me, thus distress'd,
And wanting power to think, when I had lost
thee.

How goes the hour? Has he appear'd, this rival?
Perish the shameful sound. This villain Christian!

Has he appear'd below?

Oras. Silent and dark

Th' unbreathing world is hush'd, as if it heard
And listen'd to your sorrows.

Osman. Oh, treach'rous night!

Thou lend'st thy ready veil to ev'ry treason,
And teeming mischiefs thrive beneath thy shade.
Hark! Heard'st thou nothing?

Oras. My lord.

Osman. A voice, like dying groans!

Oras. I listen, but can hear nothing.

Osman. Again! look out—he comes—

Oras. Nor tread of mortal foot, nor voice
I hear:

The still seraglio lies, profoundly plung'd
In death-like silence! nothing stirs.—The air
Is soft, as infant sleep, no breathing wing
Steals through the shadows to awaken night.

Osman. Horrors a thousand times more dark than these,
Benight my suffering soul. Thou dost not
know

To what excess of tenderness I lov'd her:
I knew no happiness but what she gave me,
Nor could have felt a mis'ry but for her!
Pity this weakness—mine are tears, Orasmin,
That fall not oft, nor lightly.

Oras. Tears! Oh, heaven!

Oh, my unhappy lord! I tremble for you—

Osman. Do—tremble at my sufferings, at my love;

At my revenge too, tremble—for 'tis due,

And will not be deluded.

Oras. Hark! I hear

The steps of men along the neighb'ring wall!

Osman. Fly! seize him! 'tis Nerestan! Wait no chains,

But drag him down to my impatient eye.

[Exit Oras.]

Enter ZARA and SELIMA, in the dark.

Zara. Where art thou, Selima? Give me thy hand.

It is so dark, I tremble as I step,

With fears and startings, never felt till now!

Osman. Damnation! 'tis her voice! the well-known sound

That has so often charm'd me into baseness!

[Draws a Dagger.]

Revenge, stand firm, and intercept his wishes!

Revenge! On whom? No matter: earth and
heaven

Would blush, should I forbear: now, Zara, now! [Drops the Dagger.]

I must not, cannot strike, the starting steel,
Unwilling, flies my hand, and shuns to wound
her.

Zara. This is the private path; come nearer, lead me.

Are we not notic'd, think'st thou?

Sel. Fear not, madam;

It cannot now be long, ere we shall meet him.

Osman. That word has given me back my ebbing rage.

[Recovers the Dagger.]

Zara. I walk in terror, and my heart forebodes.

Who's there? Nerestan! Is it you? O welcome—

Osman. [Stabs her.] This to thy heart.

'Tis not the traitor meets thee,

'Tis the betray'd, who writes it in thy blood.

Zara. Oh, gracious heaven! receive my parting soul,

And take thy trembling servant to thy mercy.

[Dies.]

Osman. Soul! then revenge has reach'd thee. I will now

Haste from this fatal place: I cannot leave her!

Whom did I strike? Was this the act of love?

Swallow me, earth! She's silent! Zara's dead!

And should I live to see returning day,

Twill show me but her blood! show me left joyless,

In a wide, empty world, with nothing round
me,

But penitence and pain: and yet 'twas just.

Hark! Destiny has sent her lover to me,

To fill my vengeance, and restore my joy.

Re-enter ORASMIN, with NERESTAN.

Approach, thou wretch! thou more than curs'd!
come near!

Thou who, in gratitude for freedom gain'd,

Hast giv'n me miseries beyond thy own!

Thou heart of hero with a traitor's soul!

Are my commands obey'd?

Oras. All is prepar'd.

Osman. Thy wanton eyes look round in search of her

Whose love, descending to a slave like thee,

From my dishonour'd hand receiv'd her doom.

See! where she lies—

Ner. Oh, fatal, rash mistake!

Osman. Dost thou behold her, slave?

Ner. Unhappy sister!

Osman. Sister! Didst thou say sister? If thou didst,

Bless me with deafness, heaven!

Ner. Tyrant! I did.

She was my sister. All that now is left thee,

Dispatch—From my distracted heart drain next

The remnant of the royal Christian blood!

Old Lusignan, expiring in my arms,

Sent his too wretched son, with his last blessing,

To his now murder'd daughter!

Would I had seen the bleeding innocent!

I would have liv'd to speak to her in death;

Would have awaken'd in her languid heart

A livelier sense of her abandon'd God;

That God, who left by her, forsook her too,

And gave the poor lost sufferer to thy rage.

Osman. Thy sister! Lusignan her father!
Selima!

Can this be true? and have I wrong'd thee,
Zara?

Sel. Thy love was all the cloud 'twixt her and heav'n!

Osman. Be dumb! for thou art base, to add distraction

To my already more than bleeding heart.

And was thy love sincere? What then remains?

Ner. Why should a tyrant hesitate on murder!

There now remains but mine of all the blood,
Which through thy father's cruel reign and thine,

Has never ceas'd to stream on Syria's sands.

Restore a wretch to his unhappy race;

Nor hope that torments, after such a scene,

Can force one feeble groan to feast thy anger.

I waste my fruitless words in empty air;

The tyrant, o'er the bleeding wound he made,

Hangs his unmoving eye, and heeds not me.

Osman. Oh, Zara!

Oras. Alas, my lord, return! Whither would grief

Transport your gen'rous heart? This Christian dog—

Osman. Take off his fetters, and observe
my will;

To him and all his friends, give instant liberty:

Pour a profusion of the richest gifts

On these unhappy Christians; and when heap'd

With vary'd benefits, and charg'd with riches,

Give 'em safe conduct to the nearest port.

Oras. But, sir—

Osman. Reply not, but obey.

Fly—nor dispute thy master's last command,

Thy prince, who orders—and thy friend, who loves thee!

Go—lose, no time—farewell—be gone—and
thou!

Unhappy warrior—yet less lost than I—

Haste from our bloody land, and to thy own

Convey this poor pale object of my rage.

Thy king, and all his Christians, when they hear

Thy miseries, shall mourn 'em with their tears;

But, if thou tell'st 'em mine, and tell'st 'em
truly,

They who shall hate my crime, shall pity me.

Take too, this poniard with thee, which my hand

Has stain'd with blood far dearer than my own;

Tell 'em—with this I murder'd her I lov'd;
The noblest and most virtuous among women!

The soul of innocence, and pride of truth:
Tell 'em I laid my empire at her feet:
Tell 'em I plung'd my dagger in her blood:
Tell 'em I so ador'd—and thus reveng'd her.
[Stabs himself.]

Rev'rence this hero, and conduct him safe.

[Dies.]
Ner. Direct me, great inspirer of the soul!
How I should act, how judge in this distress!
Amazing grandeur! and detested rage!
Ev'n I, amidst my tears, admire this foe,
And mourn his death, who liv'd to give me
woe. [Curtain falls.]

H O M E.

JOHN HOME, a native of Scotland, born in the vicinity of Ancrum, in Roxburghshire, in 1724, after the usual course of education for the church, was ordained and inducted to the living of Athelstaneford, and was the successor of the Rev. Mr. Blair, author of The Grave. In the rebellion of 1745 he took up arms in defence of the existing government. He was present at the battle of Falkirk; where he was taken prisoner, and, with five or six other gentlemen, escaped from the castle of Down. After the rebellion he resumed the duties of his profession. Having a natural inclination for the Belles Lettres, which he had cultivated with some care; he wrote his tragedy of Douglas, and presented it to the managers of the Edinburgh Theatre. Its reception will be easily imagined from the following anecdote. During the representation a young and sanguine Scotchman, in the pit, transported with delight and enthusiasm, cried out on a sudden with an air of triumph, "Weel lods; hwar's yeet Wolly Shakspeer nou!" (where is your William Shakspeare now). The author being a clergyman, the resentment of the elders of the kirk, and many other zealous members of that sect was inflamed, not only against him, but the performers also; on whom, together with him, they freely denounced their anathemas in pamphlets and public papers. The latter indeed it was out of their power greatly to injure; but their rod was near falling very heavy on the author, whom the assembly repudiated, and cut off from his preferments. In England, however, he had the good fortune to meet with friends, and being through the interest of the Earl of Bute and some other persons of distinction, recommended to the notice of his present majesty, then Prince of Wales, his Royal Highness was pleased to bestow a pension on him; thus, sheltering him under his own patronage, he put it out of the power of either bigotry, envy, or malevolence to blast his laurels. Mr. Home afterwards pursued his poetical efforts, and produced more dramatic pieces, which were brought on the stage in London; but Douglas must always stand as his master-piece in dramatic writing. He never afterwards resumed his clerical profession, which he had abandoned in 1757; but enjoyed a place under government in Scotland. Mr. Home, always the friend and patron of merit, as far as his circumstances would admit, was the means of bringing the celebrated poems of Ossian to light. While Macpherson was schoolmaster of Ruthven in Badenoch, he occupied his leisure hours in collecting, from the native, but illiterate bards of the mountains of Scotland, fragments of these inimitable poems; a few of them he translated, and inserted in a weekly Miscellany, then publishing at Edinburgh. The beauty of these pieces soon attracted the notice of Mr. Home, Dr. Robertson and Dr. Blair; and they resolved to send Macpherson on a journey all over the Highlands, at their expence, to collect the originals of those poems, which have since been a subject of so much controversy. Mr. Home died at Manchester-house near Edinburgh, Sept. the 4th 1806.

DOUGLAS.

This piece was first produced at Edinburgh, 1756; and the success it met with, induced our author to offer it to the London managers; where, notwithstanding all the influence exerted in its favour, it was refused by Garrick. Mr. Rich, however, accepted it, and it was acted the first time at Covent-garden, March the 14th 1757; where its real worth soon placed it out of the reach of critical censure. The plot was suggested by the pathetic old Scotch ballad of Gil (or Child) Morrice, reprinted in the third volume of Percy's Reliques of Ancient Poetry, and it is founded on the quarrels of the families of Douglas and other of the Scots clans. This tragedy has a great deal of pathos in it, some of the narratives are pleasingly affecting, and the descriptions poetically beautiful. On its first appearance Hume gave his opinion, that it was one of the most interesting and pathetic pieces ever exhibited in any theatre. He declared, that the author possessed the true theatric genius of Shakspeare and Otway; but we must remember, that the author was a Scotchman, consequently such extravagant praise requires no comment. Gray however had so high an opinion of this first drama of Mr. Home, that in a letter to a friend in 1757, he says, "I am greatly struck with the tragedy of Douglas, though it has infinite faults: the author seems to have retrieved the true language of the Stage, which had been lost for these hundred years; and there is one scene (between Matilda and the Old Peasant) so masterly, that it strikes me blind to all the defects in the world." To this opinion every reader of taste will readily subscribe. Johnson blames Mr. Gray for concluding his celebrated ode with suicide; a circumstance borrowed perhaps from Douglas, in which lady Randolph, otherwise a blameless character, precipitates herself, like the Bard, from a cliff, into eternity.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—The Court of a Castle, surrounded with Woods.

Enter LADY RANDOLPH.

Lady R. YE woods and wilds, whose melancholy gloom
Accords with my soul's sadness, and draws forth
The voice of sorrow from my bursting heart,
Farewell awhile: I will not leave you long;
For in your shades I deem some spirit dwells,
Who from the chiding stream, or groaning oak,

Still hears and answers to Matilda's moan.
Oh, Douglas! Douglas! if departed ghosts
Are e'er permitted to review this world,
Within the circle of that wood thou art,
And with the passion of immortals hear'st
My lamentation: hear'st thy wretched wife
Weep for her husband slain, her infant lost.
My brother's timeless death I seem to mourn,
Who perish'd with thee on this fatal day.
But Randolph comes, whom fate has made
my lord,
To chide my anguish, and defraud the dead.

Enter LORD RANDOLPH.

Lord R. Again these weeds of woe! say, dost thou well
To feed a passion which consumes thy life?
The living claim some duty; vainly thou
Bestow'st thy cares upon the silent dead.

Lady R. Silent, alas! is he for whom I mourn:

Childless, without memorial of his name,
He only now in my remembrance lives.

Lord R. Time, that wears out the trace of deepest anguish,
Has past o'er thee in vain.

Sure thou art not the daughter of sir Malcolm:
Strong was his rage, eternal his resentment:
For when thy brother fell, he smil'd to hear
That Douglas' son in the same field was slain.

Lady R. Oh! rake not up the ashes of my fathers:

Implacable resentment was their crime,
And grievous has the expiation been.

Lord R. Thy grief wrests to its purposes my words.

I never ask'd of thee that ardent love
Which in the breasts of fancy's children burns.
Decent affection and complacent kindness
Were all I wish'd for; but I wish'd in vain.
Hence with the less regret my eyes behold
The storm of war that gathers o'er this land:
If I should perish by the Danish sword,
Matilda would not shed one tear the more.

Lady R. Thou dost not think so: woful
as I am,

I love thy merit, and esteem thy virtues.
But whither goest thou now?

Lord R. Straight to the camp,
Where every warrior on the tiptoe stands
Of expectation, and impatient asks
Each who arrives, if he is come to tell
The Danes are landed.

Lady R. O, may adverse winds, Far from the coast of Scotland drive their fleet!

And every soldier of both hosts return
In peace and safety to his pleasant home!

Lord R. Thou speak'st a woman's, hear a warrior's wish:

Right from their native land, the stormy north,
May the wind blow, till every keel is fix'd
Immoveable in Caledonia's strand!
Then shall our foes repent their bold invasion,
And roving armies shun the fatal shore.
Lady, farewell: I leave thee not alone;
Yonder comes one whose love makes duty light. [Exit.]

Enter ANNA.

Anna. Forgive the rashness of your Anna's
love;
Urg'd by affection, I have thus presum'd
To interrupt your solitary thoughts;
And warn you of the hours that you neglect,
And lose in sadness.

Lady R. So to lose my hours
Is all the use I wish to make of time.

Anna. To blame thee, lady, suits not with my state:

But sure I am, since death first prey'd on man,
Never did sister thus a brother mourn.
What had your sorrows been if you had lost,
In early youth the husband of your heart?

Lady R. Oh!

Anna. Have I distress'd you with officious
love,

And ill-tim'd mention of your brother's fate?
Forgive me, lady: humble though I am,
The mind I bear partakes not of my fortune:
So fervently I love you, that to dry
These piteous tears, I'd throw my life away.

Lady R. What power directed thy unconscious tongue

To speak as thou hast done? to name—

Anna. I know not:

But since my words have made my mistress
tremble,

I will speak so no more; but silent mix
My tears with hers.

Lady R. No, thou shalt not be silent.
I'll trust thy faithful love, and thou shalt be Henceforth the instructed partner of my woes
But what avails it? Can thy feeble pity
Roll back the flood of never-ebbing time?
Compel the earth and ocean to give up
Their dead alive?

Anna. What means my noble mistress?

Lady R. Didst thou not ask, what had my sorrows been,

If I in early youth had lost a husband?
In the cold bosom of the earth is lodg'd, Mangled with wounds, the husband of my youth;

And in some cavern of the ocean lies
My child and his—

Anna. Oh! lady most rever'd!
The tale wrapt up in your amazing words
Deign to unfold.

Lady R. Alas! an ancient feud,
Hereditary evil, was the source
Of my misfortunes. Ruling fate decreed,
That my brave brother should in battle save
The life of Douglas' son, our house's foe:
The youthful warriors vow'd eternal friendship.
To see the vaunted sister of his friend,
Impatient, Douglas to Balarmo came,
Under a borrow'd name.—My heart he gain'd;
Nor did I long refuse the hand he begg'd:
My brother's presence authoriz'd our marriage.
Three weeks, three little weeks, with wings
of down,

Had o'er us flown, when my lov'd lord was call'd

To fight his father's battles; and with him,
In spite of all my tears, did Malcolm go.
Scarce were they gone, when my stern sire was told,

That the false stranger was lord Douglas' son.
Frantic with rage, the baron drew his sword,
And question'd me. Alone, forsaken, faint,
Kneeling beneath his sword, falt'ring, I took An oath equivocal, that I ne'er would Vved one of Douglas' name. Sincerity!
Thou first of virtues, let no mortal leave Thy onward path! although the earth should gape,

And from the gulf of hell destruction cry,
To take dissimulation's winding way.

Anna. Alas! how few of women's fearful kind

Durst own a truth so hardy!

Lady R. The first truth
Is easiest to avow. This moral learn,
This precious moral, from my tragic tale.—
In a few days the dreadful tidings came
That Douglas and my brother both were slain.

My lord! my life! my husband!—mighty God!
What had I done to merit such affliction?

Anna. My dearest lady, many a tale of tears
I've listen'd to; but never did I hear
A tale so sad as this.

Lady R. In the first days
Of my distracting grief, I found myself—
As women wish to be who love their lords.
But who durst tell my father? the good priest
Who join'd our hands, my brother's ancient tutor,

With his lov'd Malcolm, in the battle fell:
They two alone were privy to the marriage.
On silence and concealment I resolv'd,
Till time should make my father's fortune mine.
That very night on which my son was born,
My nurse, the only confidant I had,
Set out with him to reach her sister's house:
But nurse, nor infant have I ever seen,
Or heard of, Anna, since that fatal hour.

Anna. Not seen nor heard of! then perhaps he lives.

Lady R. No. It was dark December; wind and rain

Had beat all night. Across the Carron lay
The destin'd road, and in its swelling flood
My faithful servant perish'd with my child.
Oh! had I died when my lov'd husband fell!
Had some good angel op'd to me the book
Of Providence, and let me read my life,
My heart had broke, when I beheld the sum
Of ills, which one by one I have endur'd.

Anna. That God, whose ministers good angels are,
Hath shut the book, in mercy to mankind.
But we must leave this theme: Glenalvon comes;

I saw him bend on you his thoughtful eyes,
And hitherwards he slowly stalks his way.

Lady R. I will avoid him. An ungracious person
Is doubly irksome in an hour like this.

Anna. Why speaks my lady thus of Randolph's heir?

Lady R. Because he's not the heir of Randolph's virtues.

Subtle and shrewd, he offers to mankind
An artificial image of himself:
Yet is he brave and politic in war,
And stands aloft in these unruly times.
Why I describe him thus I'll tell hereafter.
Stay, and detain him till I reach the castle.

[Exit.

Anna. Oh happiness! where art thou to be found?

I see thou dwellest not with birth and beauty,
Though grac'd with grandeur, and in wealth
array'd;

Nor dost thou, it would seem, with virtue dwell;

Else had this gentle lady miss'd thee not.

Enter GLENALVON.

Glen. What dost thou muse on, meditating maid?

Like some entranc'd and visionary seer,
On earth thou stand'st, thy thoughts ascend to
heaven.

Anna. Would that I were, e'en as thou say'st, a seer,
To have my doubts by heavenly vision clear'd.

Glen. What dost thou doubt of? What hast thou to do

With subjects intricate? Thy youth, thy beauty,
Cannot be question'd: think of these good gifts;

And then thy contemplations will be pleasing.

Anna. Let women view yon monument of woe,

Then boast of beauty: who so fair as she?

But I must follow; this revolving day

Awakes the memory of her ancient woes.

[Exit.

Glen. So!—Lady Randolph shuns me; by-and-by

I'll woo her as the lion wooes his brides.

The deed's a doing now, that makes me lord
Of these rich valleys, and a chief of pow'r.

The season is most apt; my sounding steps

Will not be heard amidst the din of arms.

Randolph has liv'd too long; his better fate

Had the ascendant once, and kept me down:

When I had seiz'd the dame, by chance he came,

Rescu'd, and had the lady for his labour:

I 'scap'd unknown; a slender consolation!

Heav'n is my witness that I do not love

To sow in peril, and let others reap

The jocund harvest. Yet I am not safe;

By love, or something like it, stung, inflam'd,

Madly I blabb'd my passion to his wife,

And she has threaten'd to acquaint him of it.

The way of woman's will I do not know:

But well I know the baron's wrath is deadly.

I will not live in fear; the man I dread

Is as a Dane to me; ay, and the man

Who stands betwixt me and my chief desire—

No bar but he; she has no kinsman near;

No brother in his sister's quarrel bold;

And for the righteous cause, a stranger's cause,

I know no chief that will defy Glenalvon.

[Exit.

ACT II.

SCENE I.—A Court, etc.

Enter Servants and a Stranger at one Door, and LADY RANDOLPH and ANNA at another.

Lady R. What means this clamour? Stranger, speak secure;

Hast thou been wrong'd? have these rude men
presum'd

To vex the weary traveller on his way?

1 Serv. By us no stranger ever suffer'd
wrong:

This man with outcry wild has call'd us forth;
So sore afraid he cannot speak his fears.

Enter LORD RANDOLPH and NORVAL, with their Swords drawn and bloody.

Lady R. Not vain the stranger's fears! how fares my lord?

Lord R. That it fares well, thanks to this gallant youth,

Whose valour sav'd me from a wretched death.

As down the winding dale I walk'd alone,

At the cross way four armed men attack'd me;

Rovers, I judge, from the licentious camp,

Who would have quickly laid lord Randolph
low,

Had not this brave and generous stranger come,

Like my good angel, in the hour of fate,

And mocking danger, made my foes his own.

They turn'd upon him, but his active arm Struck to the ground, from whence they rose
no more,

The fiercest two; the others fled amain,
And left him master of the bloody field.
Speak, lady Randolph, upon beauty's tongue
Dwell accents pleasing to the brave and bold;
Speak, noble dame, and thank him for thy lord.

Lady R. My lord, I cannot speak what now I feel;

My heart o'erflows with gratitude to heaven,
And to this noble youth, who, all unknown
To you and yours, deliberated not,
Nor paus'd at peril, but, humanely brave,
Fought on your side against such fearful odds.
Have you not learn'd of him whom we should thank?

Whom call the saviour of lord Randolph's life?

Lord R. I ask'd that question, and he an-swer'd not;

But I must know who my deliverer is.

[To Norval.

Nor. A low-born man, of parentage obscure,

Who nought can boast, but his desire to be
A soldier, and to gain a name in arms.

Lord R. Whoe'er thou art, thy spirit is ennobl'd

By the great King of kings: thou art ordain'd
And stamp'd a hero, by the sovereign hand
Of nature! Blush not, flower of modesty
As well as valour, to declare thy birth.

Nor. My name is Norval: on the Grampian hills

My father feeds his flocks; a frugal swain, Whose constant cares were to increase his store,

And keep his only son, myself, at home.
For I had heard of battles, and I long'd
To follow to the field some warlike lord:

And heav'n soon granted what my sire denied.
This moon which rose last night, round as my shield,

Had not yet fill'd her horns, when, by her light,
A band of fierce barbarians, from the hills,
Rush'd like a torrent down upon the vale,
Sweeping our flocks and herds. The shepherds fled

For safety and for succour. I alone,
With bended bow, and quiver full of arrows,
Hover'd about the enemy, and mark'd

The road he took; then hasted to my friends,
Whom, with a troop of fifty chosen men,
I met advancing. The pursuit I led,

Till we o'ertook the spoil-encumber'd foe,
We fought and conquer'd. Ere a sword was drawn,

An arrow from my bow had pierc'd their chief,

Who wore that day the arms which now I wear.

Returning home in triumph, I disdain'd
The shepherd's slothful life; and having heard
That our good king had summon'd his bold peers

To lead their warriors to the Carron side,
I left my father's house, and took with me
A chosen servant to conduct my steps;

Yon trembling coward, who forsook his master..

Journeying with this intent, I pass'd these towers,

And, heaven directed, came this day to do
The happy deed that gilds my humble name.

Lord R. He is as wise as brave. Was ever tale

With such a gallant modesty rehears'd?
My brave deliverer! thou shalt enter now
A nobler list, and in a monarch's sight
Contend with princes for the prize of fame.
I will present thee to our Scottish king,
Whose valiant spirit ever valour lov'd.

Ah! my Matilda, wherefore starts that tear?

Lady R. I cannot say; for various affections,

And strangely mingled, in my bosom swell;
Yet each of them may well command a tear.
I joy that thou art safe; and I admire Him and his fortunes, who hath wrought thy safety;

Yea, as my mind predicts, with thine his own.
Obscure and friendless he the army sought,
Bent upon peril, in the range of death
Resolv'd to hunt for fame, and with his sword
To gain distinction which his birth denied.
In this attempt, unknown he might have perish'd,

And gain'd with all his valour, but oblivion.
Now grac'd by thee, his virtues serve no more
Beneath despair. The soldier now of hope,
He stands conspicuous; fame and great renown
Are brought within the compass of his sword.
On this my mind reflected, whilst you spoke,
And bless'd the wonder-working Lord of heaven.

Lord R. Pious and grateful ever are thy thoughts!

My deeds shall follow where thou point'st the
way.

Next to myself, and equal to Glenalvon,
In honour and command shall Norval be.

Nor. I know not how to thank you. Rude
I am

In speech and manners: never till this hour
Stood I in such a presence: yet, my lord, There's something in my breast, which makes me bold

To say, that Norval ne'er will shame thy favour.

Lady R. I will be sworn thou wilt not.
Thou shalt be

My knight; and ever, as thou didst to-day,
With happy valour guard the life of Randolph.

Lord R. Well hast thou spoke. Let me forbid reply; [To Norval.

We are thy debtors still. Thy high desert
O'ertops our gratitude. I must proceed,
As was at first intended, to the camp.

Some of my train I see are speeding hither,
Impatient doubtless of their lord's delay.

Go with me, Norval, and thine eyes shall see
The chosen warriors of thy native land,
Who languish for the fight, and beat the air
With brandish'd swords.

Nor. Let us be gone, my lord.

Lord R. [To Lady R.] About the tim that the declining sun

Shall his broad orbit o'er yon hill suspend,
Expect us to return. This night once more
Within these walls I rest; my tent I pitch
To-morrow in the field. Prepare the feast:
Free is his heart who for his country fights:
He in the eve of battle may resign

Himself to social pleasure: sweetest then,
When danger to a soldier's soul endears

The human joy that never may return.

[Exeunt Lord Randolph and Norval.]

Lady R. His parting words have struck a fatal truth.

Oh, Douglas! Douglas! tender was the time
When we two parted, ne'er to meet again!
How many years of anguish and despair
Has heaven annex'd to those swift passing hours
Of love and fondness.

Wretch that I am! Alas! why am I so?

At every happy parent I repine.

How blest the mother of yon gallant Norval!
She for a living husband bore her pains,
And heard him bless her when a man was born:
She nurs'd her smiling infant on her breast;
Tended the child, and rear'd the pleasing boy;
She, with affection's triumph, saw the youth
In grace and comeliness surpass his peers:
Whilst I to a dead husband bore a son,
And to the roaring waters gave my child.

Anna. Alas! alas! why will you thus resume
Your grief afresh? I thought that gallant youth
Would for awhile have won you from your woe.
On him intent you gazed, with a look
Much more delighted, than your pensive eye
Has deign'd on other objects to bestow.

Lady R. Delighted, say'st thou? Oh! even there mine eye

Found fuel for my life-consuming sorrow;
I thought, that had the son of Douglas liv'd,
He might have been like this young gallant
stranger,

And pair'd with him in features and in shape,
In all endowments, as in years, I deem,
My boy with blooming Norval might have number'd.

Whilst thus I mus'd, a spark from fancy fell
On my sad heart, and kindled up a fondness
For this young stranger, wand'ring from his
home,

And like an orphan cast upon my care.

I will protect thee, said I to myself,

With all my power, and grace with all my favour.

Anna. Sure, heaven will bless so gen'rous a resolve.

You must, my noble dame, exert your power:
You must awake; devices will be fram'd,
And arrows pointed at the breast of Norval.

Lady R. Glenalvon's false and crafty head will work

Against a rival in his kinsman's love,

If I deter him not; I only can.

Bold as he is, Glenalvon will beware

How he pulls down the fabric that I raise.

I'll be the artist of young Norval's fortune.

Enter GLENALVON.

Glen. Where is my dearest kinsman, noble Randolph?

Lady R. Have you not heard, Glenalvon, of the base—

Glen. I have; and that the villains may not
'scape,

With a strong band I have begirt the wood.
If they lurk there, alive they shall be taken,
And torture force from them the important
secret,

Whether some foe of Randolph's hir'd their swords,

Or if—

Lady R. That care becomes a kinsman's love.

I have a counsel for Glenalvon's ear.

[Exit Anna.]

Glen. To him your counsels always are commands.

Lady R. I have not found so; thou art known to me.

Glen. Known!

Lady R. And most certain is my cause of knowledge.

Glen. What do you know? By the most blessed cross,

You much amaze me. No created being,
Yourself except, durst thus accost Glenalvon.

Lady R. Is guilt so bold? and dost thou make a merit

Of thy pretended meekness? this to me,
Who, with a gentleness which duty blames,
Have hitherto conceal'd, what, if indulg'd,
Would make thee nothing! or what's worse than that,

An outcast beggar, and unpitied too!

For mortals shudder at a crime like thine.

Glen. Thy virtue awes me. First of wo-mankind!

Permit me yet to say, that the fond man
Whom love transports beyond strict virtue's bounds,

If he is brought by love to misery,
In fortune ruin'd, as in mind forlorn,
Unpitied cannot be. Pity's the alms
Which on such beggars freely is bestow'd;
For mortals know that love is still their lord,
And o'er their vain resolves advances still:
As fire, when kindled by our shepherds, moves
Through the dry heath before the fanning wind.

Lady R. Reserve these accents for some other ear;

To love's apology I listen not.

Mark thou my words; for it is meet thou shouldst.

His brave deliverer, Randolph here retains.
Perhaps his presence may not please thee well:
But, at thy peril, practise ought against him:
Let not thy jealousy attempt to shake
And loosen the good root he has in Randolph,
Whose favourites I know thou hast supplanted.
Thou look'st at me, as if thou wouldst pry
Into my heart. 'Tis open as my speech.

I give this early caution, and put on
The curb, before thy temper breaks away.
The friendless stranger my protection claims;
His friend I am; and be not thou his foe.

[Exit.]

Glen. Child that I was to start at my own shadow,

And be the shallow fool of coward conscience!
I am not what I have been; what I should be.
The darts of destiny have almost pierc'd
My marble heart. Had I one grain of faith
In holy legends and religious tales,
I should conclude there was an arm above
That fought against me, and malignant turn'd,
To catch myself, the subtle snare I set.

Why, rape and murder are not simple means!
The imperfect rape to Randolph gave a spouse;
And the intended murder introduc'd
A favourite to hide the sun from me;
And worst of all, a rival. Burning hell!
This were thy centre, if I thought she lov'd
him!

'Tis certain she contemns me; nay, commands
me,

And waves the flag of her displeasure o'er me,
In his behalf. And shall I thus be brav'd?
Curb'd, as she calls it, by dame Chastity?
Infernal fiends, if any fiends there are
More fierce than hate, ambition, and revenge,
Rise up, and fill my bosom with your fires.
Darkly a project peers upon my mind,
Like the red moon when rising in the east,
Cross'd and divided by strange colour'd clouds.
I'll seek the slave who came with Norval hither,
And for his cowardice was spurned from him.
I've known a follower's rankled bosom breed
Venom most fatal to his heedless lord. [Exit.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—The same.Enter ANNA.

Anna. Thy vassals, grief, great nature's order break,
And change the noontide to the midnight hour.
Whilst lady Randolph sleeps, I will walk forth,
And taste the air that breathes on yonder bank.
Sweet may her slumbers be! Ye ministers
Of gracious heaven, who love the human race,
Angels and seraphs, who delight in goodness,
Forsake your skies and to her couch descend!
There from her fancy chase those dismal forms
That haunt her waking; her sad spirit charm
With images celestial, such as please
The blest above upon their golden beds.

Enter Servant.

Serv. One of the vile assassins is secur'd.
We found the villain lurking in the wood:
With dreadful imprecations he denies
All knowledge of the crime. But this is not
His first essay: these jewels were conceal'd
In the most secret places of his garment;
Belike the spoils of some that he has murder'd.

Anna. Let me look on them. Ha! here is a heart,
The chosen crest of Douglas' valiant name!
These are no vulgar jewels. Guard the wretch.
[Exit.]

Enter Servants, with a Prisoner.

Pris. I know no more than does the child unborn
Of what you charge me with.

1 Serv. You say so, sir!
But torture soon shall make you speak the truth.
Behold, the lady of lord Randolph comes:
Prepare yourself to meet her just revenge.

Enter LADY RANDOLPH and ANNA.

Anna. Summon your utmost fortitude, before
You speak with him. Your dignity, your fame,
Are now at stake. Think of the fatal secret,
Which in a moment from your lips may fly.

Lady R. Thou shalt behold me, with a desperate heart, Hear how my infant perish'd. See, he kneels.
[The Prisoner kneels.]

Pris. Heaven bless that countenance so sweet and mild!
A judge like thee makes innocence more bold.
Oh, save me, lady, from these cruel men,
Who have attack'd and seiz'd me; who accuse
Me of intended murder. As I hope
For mercy at the judgment-seat of heaven.

The tender lamb, that never nipt the grass,
Is not more innocent than I of murder.

Lady R. Of this man's guilt what proof can ye produce?

1 Serv. We found him lurking in the hollow glen.

When view'd and call'd upon, amaz'd he fled;
We overtook him, and inquir'd from whence
And what he was: he said he came from far,
And was upon his journey to the camp.
Not satisfied with this, we search'd his clothes,
And found these jewels, whose rich value plead
Most powerfully against him. Hard he seems,
And old in villany. Permit us try
His stubbornness against the torture's force.

Pris. Oh, gentle lady! by your lord's dear
life,

Which these weak hands, I swear, did ne'er
assail,

And by your children's welfare, spare my age!
Let not the iron tear my ancient joints,
And my grey hairs bring to the grave with pain.

Lady R. Account for these; thine own they cannot be:

For these, I say: be steadfast to the truth;
Detected falsehood is most certain death.

[Anna removes the Servants, and returns.]

Pris. Alas! I'm sore beset! let never man,
For sake of lucre, sin against his soul!
Eternal justice is in this most just!

I, guiltless now, must former guilt reveal.

Lady R. Oh! Anna, hear!—once more I charge thee speak

The truth direct; for these to me foretell
And certify a part of thy narration,
With which, if the remainder tallies not,
An instant and a dreadful death abides thee.

Pris. Then, thus adjur'd, I'll speak to you as just

As if you were the minister of heaven,
Sent down to search the secret sins of men.
Some eighteen years ago I rented land
Of brave sir Malcolm, then Balarino's lord;
But falling to decay, his servants seiz'd
All that I had, and then turn'd me and mine
(Four helpless infants and their weeping mother),
Out to the mercy of the winter winds.

A little hovel by the river's side
Receiv'd us; there hard labour, and the skill
In fishing, which was formerly my sport,
Supported life. Whilst thus we poorly liv'd,
One stormy night, as I remember well,
The wind and rain beat hard upon our roof;
Red came the river down, and loud and oft
The angry spirit of the water shriek'd.

At the dead hour of night was heard the cry
Of one in jeopardy. I rose, and ran
To where the circling eddy of a pool,
Beneath the ford, us'd oft to bring within
My reach whatever floating thing the stream
Had caught. The voice had ceas'd; the person lost;

But looking sad and earnest on the waters,
By the moon's light I saw, whirl'd round and round,

A basket: soon I drew it to the bank,
And nestled curious there an infant lay.

Lady R. Was he alive?

Pris. He was.

Lady R. Inhuman that thou art!

How couldst thou kill what waves and tempests spar'd?

Pris. I am not so inhuman.

The needy man who has known better days,
One whom distress has spited at the world,
Is he whom tempting fiends would pitch upon
To do such deeds as make the prosperous men Lift up their hands, and wonder who could do them.

And such a man was I: a man declin'd,
Who saw no end of black adversity:

Yet, for the wealth of kingdoms, I would not
Have touch'd that infant with a hand of harm.

Lady R. Ha! dost thou say so! then perhaps he lives!

Pris. Not many days ago he was alive.

Lady R. Oh, God of heav'n! did he then die so lately?

Pris. I did not say he died; I hope he lives.
Not many days ago these eyes beheld
Him flourishing in youth, and health, and beauty.

Lady R. Where is he now?

Pris. Alas! I know not where.

Lady R. Oh, fate! I fear thee still. Thou riddler, speak

Direct and clear; else I will search thy soul.

Pris. Fear not my faith, though I must speak my shame;

Within the cradle where the infant lay,
Was stow'd a mighty store of gold and jewels;
Tempted by which, we did resolve to hide,
From all the world this wonderful event,
And like a peasant breed the noble child.

That none might mark the change of our estate,
We left the country, travelled to the north,
Bought flocks and herds, and gradually brought forth

Our secret wealth. But God's all-seeing eye
Beheld our avarice, and smote us sore:

For, one by one, all our own children died,
And he, the stranger, sole remain'd the heir
Of what indeed was his. Fain then would I,
Who with a father's fondness lov'd the boy,
Have trusted him, now in the dawn of youth,
With his own secret: but my anxious wife,
Foreboding evil, never would consent.

Meanwhile the stripling grew in years and
beauty;

And, as we oft observ'd, he bore himself,
Not as the offspring of our cottage blood;
For nature will break out: mild with the mild,
But with the froward he was fierce as fire;
And night and day he talk'd of war and arms.
I set myself against his warlike bent;

But all in vain; for when a desperate band
Of robbers from the savage mountains came—

Lady R. Eternal Providence! What is thy name?

Pris. My name is Norval; and my name
he bears.

Lady R. 'Tis he! 'tis he himself! It is my son!

Oh, sovereign mercy! 'twas my child I saw!

Pris. If I, amidst astonishment and fear,
Have of your words and gestures rightly judg'd,
Thou art the daughter of my ancient master;
The child I rescu'd from the flood is thine.

Lady R. With thee dissimulation now were vain.

I am indeed the daughter of sir Malcolm;
The child thou rescu'dst from the flood is mine.

Pris. Bless'd be the hour that made me a poor man;

My poverty hath sav'd my master's house!

Lady R. Thy words surprise me: sure thou dost not feign!

The tear stands in thine eye; such love from
thee

Sir Malcolm's house deserv'd not; if aright
Thou told'st the story of thy own distress.

Pris. Sir Malcolm of our barons was the flower;

The safest friend, the best, the kindest master.
But ah! he knew not of my sad estate.

After that battle, where his gallant son,
Your own brave brother fell, the good old lord
Grew desperate and reckless of the world;
And never, as he erst was wont, went forth
To overlook the conduct of his servants.

By them I was thrust out, and them I blame:
May heav'n so judge me as I judge my master!
And God so love me as I love his race!

Lady R. His race shall yet reward thee.
On thy faith

Depends the fate of thy lov'd master's house.
Rememb'rest thou a little, lonely hut,
That like a holy hermitage appears
Among the cliffs of Carron?

Pris. I remember the cottage of the cliffs.

Lady R. 'Tis that I mean:

There dwells a man of venerable age,
Who in my father's service spent his youth:
Tell him I sent thee, and with him remain,
Till I shall call upon thee to declare,
Before the king and nobles, what thou now
To me hast told. No more but this, and thou Shalt live in honour all thy future days!

Thy son so long shall call thee father still,
And all the land shall bless the man who sav'd
The son of Douglas, and sir Malcolm's heir.
Remember well my words; if thou shouldst
meet

Him, whom thou call'st thy son, still call him
so;

And mention nothing of his nobler father.

Pris. Fear not that I shall mar so fair a harvest,

By putting in my sickle ere 'tis ripe.
Why did I leave my home and ancient dame?
To find the youth, to tell him all I knew,
And make him wear these jewels on his arm;
Which might, I thought, be challeng'd, and so bring

To light the secret of his noble birth.

[Lady Randolph goes towards the Servants.]

Lady R. This man is not the assassin you suspected,
Though chance combin'd some likelihood against him.

He is the faithful hearer of the jewels
To their right owner, whom in haste he seeks.
'Tis meet that you should put him on his way,
Since your mistaken zeal hath dragg'd him
hither.

[Exeunt Prisoner and Servants.]

My faithful Anna! dost thou share my joy?
I know thou dost. Unparallel'd event!
Reaching from heav'n to earth, Jehovah's arm Snatch'd from the waves, and brings me to my son!

Judge of the widow, and the orphan's father,
Accept a widow's and a mother's thanks

For such a gift! What does my Anna think
Of the young eaglet of a valiant nest?
How soon he 'gaz'd on bright and burning
arms,
Spurn'd the low dunghill where his fate had thrown him,

And tower'd up to the regions of his sire!

Anna. How fondly did your eyes devour
the boy!

Mysterious nature, with the unseen cord
Of pow'rful instinct, drew you to your own.

Lady R. The ready story of his birth be-liev'd,

Suppress'd my fancy quite; nor did he owe
To any likeness my so sudden favour:

But now I long to see his face again,

Examine every feature, and find out

The lineaments of Douglas, or my own.

But, most of all, I long to let him know

Who his true parents are, to clasp his neck,
And tell him all the story of his father.

Anna. With wary caution you must bear
yourself

In public, lest your tenderness break forth,

And in observers stir conjectures strange.

To-day the baron started at your tears.

Lady R. He did so, Anna: well thy mistress
knows

If the least circumstance, mote of offence, Should touch the baron's eye; his sight would
be

With jealousy disorder'd. But the more

It does behove me instant to declare

The birth of Douglas, and assert his rights.

Anna. Behold, Glenalvon comes.

Lady R. Now I shun him not.

This day I brav'd him in behalf of Norval;

Perhaps too far; at least my nicer fears

For Douglas thus interpret.

Enter GLENALVON.

Glen. Noble dame,

The hovering Dane at last his men hath landed:

No band of pirates; but a mighty host,

That come to settle where there valour conquers:

To win a country, or to lose themselves.

A nimble courier, sent from yonder camp,

To hasten up the chieftains of the north,

Inform'd me as he pass'd, that the fierce Dane

Had on the eastern coasts of Lothian landed.

Lady R. How many mothers shall bewail their sons!

How many widows weep their husbands slain!

Ye dames of Denmark, e'en for you I feel,

Who, sadly sitting on the sea-beat shore,

Long look for lords that never shall return.

Glen. Oft has the unconquer'd Caledonian
sword

Widow'd the north. The children of the slain

Come, as I hope, to meet their fathers' fate.

The monster war, with her infernal brood,

Loud-yelling fury and life-ending pain,

Are objects suited to Glenalvon's soul.

Scorn is more grievous than the pains of death;

Reproach more piercing than the pointed sword.

Lord R. I scorn thee not, but when I ought to scorn;

Nor e'er reproach, but when insulted virtue

Against audacious vice asserts herself.

I own thy worth, Glenalvon; none more apt

Than I to praise thine eminence in arms,

And be the echo of thy martial fame.

No longer vainly feed a guilty passion:

Go and pursue a lawful mistress, glory.

Upon the Danish crests redeem thy fault,

And let thy valour be the shield of Randolph.

Glen. One instant stay, and hear an alter'd man.

When beauty pleads for virtue, vice abash'd

Flies its own colours, and goes o'er to virtue.

I am your convert; time will show how truly:

Yet one immediate proof I mean to give.

That youth for whom your ardent zeal to-day,

Somewhat too haughtily defy'd your slave,

Amidst the shock of armies I'll defend,

And turn death from him, with a guardian arm.

Lady R. Act thus, Glenalvon, and I am thy
friend;

But that's thy least reward. Believe me, sir,

The truly generous is the truly wise;

And he, who loves not others, lives unblest.

[Exit Lady Randolph.]

Glen. Amen! and virtue is its own reward:

I think that I have hit the very tone

In which she loves to speak. Honey'd assent,

How pleasant art thou to the taste of man,

And woman also! flattery direct

Rarely disgusts. They little know mankind

Who doubt its operation: 'tis my key,

And opes the wicket of the human heart.

How far I have succeeded now, I know not;

Yet I incline to think her stormy virtue

Is lull'd awhile; 'tis her alone I fear;

While she and Randolph live, and live in faith

And amity, uncertain is my tenure,

That slave of Norval's I have found most apt;

I show'd him gold, and he has pawn'd his soul

To say and swear whatever I suggest.

Norval, I'm told, has that alluring look,

'Twixt man and woman, which I have observ'd

To charm the nicer and fantastic dames,

Who are, like lady Randolph, full of virtue.

In raising Randolph's jealousy, I may

But point him to the truth. He seldom errs,

Who thinks the worst he can of womankind.

Exit.

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—Flourish of Trumpets.

Enter LORD RANDOLPH, attended.

Lord R. Summon a hundred horse, by break of day,

To wait our pleasure at the castle gate.

Enter LADY RANDOLPH.

Lady R. Alas, my lord, I've heard unwelcome news;

The Danes are landed.

Lord R. Ay, no inroad this

Of the Northumbrian, bent to take a spoil:

No sportive war, no tournament essay,

Of some young knight resolv'd to break a spear,

And stain with hostile blood his maiden arms.

The Danes are landed: we must beat them back,

Or live the slaves of Denmark.

Lady R. Dreadful times!

Lord R. The fenceless villages are all forsaken;

The trembling mothers, and their children
lodg'd

In wall-girt towers and castles! whilst the men

Retire indignant: yet, like broken waves,

They but retire more awful to return.

Lady R. Immense, as fame reports, the Danish host!

Lord R. Were it as numerous as loud fame reports,

An army knit like ours would pierce it through:
Brothers that shrink not from each other's side,
And fond companions, fill our warlike files:
For his dear offspring, and the wife he loves,
The husband, and the fearless father arm:
In vulgar breasts heroic ardour burns,
And the poor peasant mates his daring lord.

Lady R. Men's minds are temper'd, like their swords, for war;
Lovers of danger, on destruction's brink
They joy to rear erect their daring forms,
Hence, early graves; hence, the lone widow's life;

And the sad mother's grief-embitter'd age.
Where is our gallant guest?

Lord R. Down in the vale
I left him, managing a fiery steed,
Whose stubbornness had foil'd the strength and skill

Of every rider. But behold he comes,
In earnest conversation with Glenalvon.

Enter NORVAL and GLENALVON.

Glenalvon, with the lark arise; go forth,
And lead my troops that lie in yonder vale:
Private I travel to the royal camp:
Norval, thou goest with me. But say, young man!

Where didst thou learn so to discourse of war,
And in such terms, as I o'erheard to-day?
War is no village science, nor its phrase
A language taught amongst the shepherd swains.

Nor. Small is the skill my lord delights to praise

In him he favours. Hear from whence it came.
Beneath a mountain's brow, the most remote
And inaccessible by shepherds trod,
In a deep cave, dug by no mortal hand,
A hermit liv'd; a melancholy man!

Who was the wonder of our wand'ring swains.
Austere and lonely, cruel to himself
Did they report him; the cold earth his bed,
Water his drink, his food the shepherds' alms.
I went to see him, and my heart was touch'd
With rev'rence and with pity. Mild he spake,
And, entering on discourse, such stories told,
As made me oft revisit his sad cell.

For he had been a soldier in his youth;
And fought in famous battles, when the peers
Of Europe, by the bold Godfredo led,
Against the usurping infidel display'd
The blessed cross, and won the Holy Land.

Pleas'd with my admiration, and the fire
His speech struck from me, the old man would shake

His years away, and act his young encounters:
Then, having show'd his wounds, he'd sit him down,

And all the live-long day discourse of war.
To help my fancy, in the smooth green turf
He cut the figures of the marshal'd hosts;
Describ'd the motions, and explain'd the use
Of the deep column, and the lengthen'd line,
The square, the crescent, and the phalanx firm:
For all that Saracen or Christian knew
Of war's vast art, was to this hermit known.

Lord R. Why did this soldier in a desert hide

Those qualities that should have grac'd a camp?

Nor. That too at last I learn'd. Unhappy man!

Returning homewards by Messina's port,
Loaded with wealth and honours bravely won,
A rude and boist'rous captain of the sea
Fasten'd a quarrel on him. Fierce they fought:
The stranger fell, and with his dying breath
Declar'd his name and lineage. Mighty pow'r!
The soldier cried, My brother! Oh, my brother!

Lady R. His brother!

Nor. Yes; of the same parents born;
His only brother. They exchang'd forgiveness;
And happy in my mind was he that died;
For many deaths has the survivor suffer'd.
In the wild desert on a rock he sits,
Or on some nameless stream's untrodden banks,
And ruminates all day his dreadful fate.
At times, alas! not in his perfect mind,
Holds dialogues with his lov'd brother's ghost;
And oft each night forsakes his sullen couch,
To make sad orisons for him he slew.

Lady R. In this dire tragedy were there no more Unhappy persons? Did the parents live?

Nor. No, they were dead; kind heav'n had clos'd their eyes,

Before their son had shed his brother's blood.

Lord R. Hard is his fate; for he was not to blame!

There is a destiny in this strange world,
Which oft decrees an undeserved doom:
Let schoolmen tell us why—

[Trumpets at a Distance.]

From whence these sounds?

Enter an Officer.

Offi. My lord, the trumpets of the troops of Lorn!

The valiant leader hails the noble Randolph.

Lord R. Mine ancient guest! Does he the warriors lead?

Has Denmark rous'd the brave old knight to arms?

Offi. No; worn with warfare, he resigns the sword.

His eldest hope, the valiant John of Lorn,
Now leads his kindred bands.

Lord R. Glenalvon, go;

With hospitality's most strong request

Entreat the chief. [Exit Glenalvon.]

Offi. My lord, requests are vain.

He urges on, impatient of delay,
Stung with the tidings of the foe's approach.

Lord R. May victory sit upon the warrior's plume!

Bravest of men! his flocks and herds are safe;
Remote from war's alarms his pastures lie,
By mountains inaccessible secur'd:
Yet foremost he into the plain descends,
Eager to bleed in battles not his own.

I'll go and press the hero to my breast.

[Exit with the Officer.]

Lady R. The soldier's loftiness, the pride and pomp

Investing awful war, Norval, I see,
Transport thy youthful mind.

Nor. Ah! should they not?

Bless'd be the hour I left my father's house!

I might have been a shepherd all my days,

And stole obscurely to a peasant's grave.

Now, if I live, with mighty chiefs I stand;

And, if I fall, with noble dust I lie.

Lady R. There is a generous spirit in thy breast,
That could have well sustain'd a prouder fortune.
This way with me; under yon spreading beach,
Unseen, unheard, by human eye or ear,
I will amaze thee with a wond'rous tale.

Nor. Let there be danger, lady, with the secret,
That I may hug it to my grateful heart,
And prove my faith. Command my sword,
my life:

These are the sole possessions of poor Norval.

Lady R. Know'st thou these gems?

Nor. Durst I believe mine eyes,
I'd say I knew them, and they were my father's.

Lady R. Thy father's, say'st thou? Ah, they were thy father's!

Nor. I saw them once, and curiously inquir'd
Of both my parents, whence such splendour came.

But I was check'd, and more could never learn.

Lady R. Then learn of me—thou art not Norval's son.

Nor. Not Norval's son?

Lady R. Nor of a shepherd sprung.

Nor. Who am I then?

Lady R. Noble thou art,
For noble was thy sire.

Nor. I will believe—

Oh, tell me further! say, who was my father!

Lady R. Douglas!

Nor. Lord Douglas, whom to-day I saw?

Lady R. His younger brother.

Nor. And in yonder camp?

Lady R. Alas!

Nor. You make me tremble—Sighs and tears!
Lives my brave father?

Lady R. Ah! too brave, indeed!

He fell in battle ere thyself was born.

Nor. Ah me, unhappy! ere I saw the light!
But does my mother live? I may conclude,
From my own fate, her portion has been sorrow.

Lady R. She lives; but wastes her life in constant woe,

Weeping her husband slain, her infant lost.

Nor. You that are skill'd so well in the sad story

Of my unhappy parents, and with tears
Bewail their destiny, now have compassion
Upon the offspring of the friends you lov'd.
Oh, tell me who and where my mother is!
Oppress'd by a base world, perhaps she bends
Beneath the weight of other ills than grief;
And, desolate, implores of heaven the aid
Her son should give. It is, it must be so—
Your countenance confesses that she's wretched.
Oh, tell me her condition! Can the sword—
Who shall resist me in a parent's cause?

Lady R. Thy virtue ends her woe—My son!
my son!

I am thy mother, and the wife of Douglas!

[Falls upon his Neck.

Nor. Oh, heaven and earth! how wond'rous is my fate!

Art thou my mother? Ever let me kneel!

Lady R. Image of Douglas! fruit of fatal love!

All that I owe thy sire I pay to thee.

Nor. Respect and admiration still possess me,
Checking the love and fondness of a son:
Yet I was filial to my humble parents.

But did my sire surpass the rest of men,
As thou excellest all of womankind?

Lady R. Arise, my son. In me thou dost behold

The poor remains of beauty once admir'd.
Yet in my prime I equal'd not thy father;
His eyes were like the eagle's, yet sometimes Liker the dove's; and, as he pleas'd, he won
All hearts with softness, or with spirit aw'd.

Nor. How did he fall? Sure 'twas a bloody field

When Douglas died! Oh, I have much to ask!

Lady R. Hereafter thou shalt hear the lengthen'd tale

Of all thy father's and thy mother's woes.
At present this—Thou art the rightful heir
Of yonder castle, and the wide domains,
Which now lord Randolph, as my husband, holds.

But thou shalt not be wrong'd; I have the power

To right thee still. Before the king I'll kneel,
And call lord Douglas to protect his blood.

Nor. The blood of Douglas will protect itself.

Lady R. But we shall need both friends and favour, boy,

To wrest thy lands and lordship from the gripe
Of Randolph and his kinsman. Yet I think
My tale will move each gentle heart to pity,
My life incline the virtuous to believe.

Nor. To be the son of Douglas is to me
Inheritance enough! Declare my birth,
And in the field I'll seek for fame and fortune.

Lady R. Thou dost not know what perils and injustice

Await the poor man's valour. Oh, my son!
The noblest blood of all the land's abash'd,
Having no lackey but pale poverty.
Too long hast thou been thus attended, Douglas;
Too long hast thou been deem'd a peasant's child:

The wanton heir of some inglorious chief
Perhaps has scorn'd thee in thy youthful sports,
Whilst thy indignant spirit swell'd in vain.
Such contumely thou no more shalt bear:
But how I purpose to redress thy wrongs
Must be hereafter told. Prudence directs
That we should part before yon chief's return.
Retire, and from thy rustic follower's hand
Receive a billet, which thy mother's care,
Anxious to see thee, dictated before
This casual opportunity arose
Of private conference. Its purport mark;
For, as I there appoint, we meet again.
Leave me, my son; and frame thy manners still
To Norval's, not to noble Douglas' state.

Nor. I will remember. Where is Norval now,

That good old man?

Lady R. At hand conceal'd he lies,
A useful witness. But beware, my son,
Of yon Glenalvon; in his guilty breast
Resides a villain's shrewdness, ever prone
To false conjecture. He hath griev'd my heart.

Nor. Has he, indeed? Then let yon false
Glenalvon

Beware of me.

[Exit

Lady R. There burst the smother'd flame.
O, thou all-righteous and eternal King!
Who father of the fatherless art call'd,
Protect my son! Thy inspiration, Lord!
Hath fill'd his bosom with that sacred fire,

Which in the breasts of his forefathers burn'd:
Set him on high, like them, that he may shine
The star and glory of his native land!—
Yonder they come. How do bad women find Unchanging aspects to conceal their guilt,
When I, by reason and by justice urg'd,
Full hardly can dissemble with these men
In nature's pious cause?

Enter LORD RANDOLPH and GLENALVON.

Lord R. You gallant chief,
Of arms enamour'd, all repose disclaims.

Lady R. Be not, my lord, by his example sway'd.
Arrange the business of to-morrow now,
And when you enter, speak of war no more.

[Exit.]

Lord R. 'Tis so, by heav'n! her mien, her voice, her eye,
And her impatience to be gone, confirm it.

Glen. He parted from her now. Behind the mount,
Amongst the trees, I saw him glide along.

Lord R. For sad sequester'd virtue she's renown'd.

Glen. Most true, my lord.

Lord R. Yet this distinguish'd dame
Invites a youth, the acquaintance of a day,
Alone to meet her at the midnight hour.
This assignation [Shows a Letter] the assassin freed,

Her manifest affection for the youth,
Might breed suspicion in a husband's brain,
Whose gentle consort all for love had wedded:
Much more in mine. Matilda never lov'd me.
Let no man, after me, a woman wed,
Whose heart he knows he has not, though she brings

A mine of gold, a kingdom for her dowry.
For let her seem, like the night's shadowy queen,
Cold and contemplative—he cannot trust her;
She may, she will, bring shame and sorrow
on him;

The worst of sorrows, and the worst of shames!

Glen. Yield not, my lord, to such afflicting
thoughts,

But let the spirit of a husband sleep,
Till your own senses make a sure conclusion.

This billet must to blooming Norval go:

At the next turn awaits my trusty spy;

I'll give it him refitted for his master.

In the close thicket take your secret stand;

The moon shines bright, and your own eyes
may judge

Of their behaviour.

Lord R. Thou dost counsel well.

Glen. Permit me now to make one slight essay;

Of all the trophies, which vain mortals boast,
By wit, by valour, or by wisdom won,
The first and fairest in a young man's eye
Is woman's captive heart. Successful love
With glorious fumes intoxicates the mind,
And the proud conqueror in triumph moves,
Air-borne, exalted above vulgar men.

Lord R. And what avails this maxim?

Glen. Much, my lord.

Withdraw a little; I'll accost young Norval,
And with ironical derisive counsel
Explore his spirit. If he is no more
Than humble Norval, by thy favour rais'd,
Brave as he is, he'll shrink astonish'd from me:

But if he be the favourite of the fair,
Lov'd by the first of Caledonia's dames,
He'll turn upon me, as the lion turns
Upon the hunter's spear.

Lord R. 'Tis shrewdly thought.

Glen. When we grow loud, draw near.
But let my lord

His rising wrath restrain.— [Exit Randolph.]
'Tis strange, by heaven!

That she should run full tilt her fond career
To one so little known. She, too, that seem'd
Pure as the winter stream, when ice, emboss'd,
Whitens its course. Even I did think her chaste,
Whose charity exceeds not. Precious sex!
Whose deeds lascivious pass Glenalvon's
thoughts!

Enter NORVAL.

His port I love: he's in a proper mood
To chide the thunder, if at him it roar'd.—

[Aside.]

Has Norval seen the troops?

Nor. The setting sun
With yellow radiance lighten'd all the vale;
And as the warriors mov'd, each polish'd helm,
Corslet, or spear, glanc'd back his gilded beams.
The hill they climb'd, and, halting at its top,
Of more than mortal size, tow'ring, they seem'd
A host angelic, clad in burning arms.

Glen. Thou talk'st it well; no leader of our host

In sounds more lofty speaks of glorious war.

Nor. If I shall e'er acquire a leader's name,
My speech will be less ardent. Novelty
Now prompts my tongue, and youthful admiration

Vents itself freely; since no part is mine
Of praise pertaining to the great in arms.

Glen. You wrong yourself, brave sir, your martial deeds

Have rank'd you with the great. But mark me, Norval:

Lord Randolph's favour now exalts your youth
Above his veterans of famous service.

Let me, who know these soldiers, counsel you.
Give them all honour: seem not to command;
Else they will scarcely brook your late sprung
power,

Which nor alliance props, nor birth adorns.

Nor. Sir, I have been accusom'd all my days
To hear and speak the plain and simple truth:
And though I have been told, that there are men Who borrow friendship's tongue to speak their scorn,

Yet in such language I am little skill'd.

Therefore I thank Glenalvon for his counsel,
Although it sounded harshly. Why remind Me of my birth obscure? Why slur my power
With such contemptuous terms?

Glen. I did not mean

To gall your pride, which now I see is great.

Nor. My pride!

Glen. Suppress it, as you wish to prosper.
Your pride's excessive. Yet, for Randolph's sake,
I will not leave you to its rash direction.

If thus you swell, and frown at high-born men,
Will high-born men endure a shepherd's scorn?

Nor. A shepherd's scorn!

Glen. Yes; if you presume
To bend on soldiers these disdainful eyes,
What will become of you?

Nor. If this were told!—

[Aside.]

Hast thou no fears for thy presumptuous self?

Glen. Ha! dost thou threaten me?

Nor. Didst thou not hear?

Glen. Unwillingly I did; a nobler foe Had not been question'd thus. But such as
thee—

Nor. Whom dost thou think me?

Glen. Norval.

Nor. So I am—

And who is Norval in Glenalvon's eyes?

Glen. A peasant's son, a wandering beggar
boy;

At best no more, even if he speaks the truth.

Nor. False as thou art, dost thou suspect my truth?

Glen. Thy truth! thou'rt all a lie: and false
as bell

Is the vain-glorious tale thou told'st to Randolph.

Nor. If I were chain'd, unarm'd, and bed-rid old,

Perhaps I should revile: but as I am,
I have no tongue to rail. The humble Norval
Is of a race who strive not but with deeds.

Did I not fear to freeze thy shallow valour,
And make thee sink too soon beneath my sword,
I'd tell thee—what thou art. I know thee well.

Glen. Dost thou not know Glenalvon, born to command

Ten thousand slaves like thee—

Nor. Villain, no more!

[Draws.

Draw and defend thy life. I did design
To have defy'd thee in another cause;
But heav'n accelerates its vengeance on thee.
Now for my own and lady Randolph's wrongs.

[They fight.

Enter LORD RANDOLPH.

Lord R. Hold, I command you both. The man that stirs

Makes me his foe.

Nor. Another voice than thine

That threat had vainly sounded, noble Randolph.

Glen. Hear him, my lord; he's wondrous condescending!

Mark the humility of shepherd Norval!

Nor. Now you may scoff in safety.

[Sheathes his Sword.

Lord R. Speak not thus,

Taunting each other; but unfold to me
The cause of quarrel, then I judge betwixt you.

Nor. Nay, my good lord, though I revere
you much,

My cause I plead not, nor demand your judgment.

I blush to speak; I will not, cannot speak
The opprobrious words that I from him have borne.

To the liege lord of my dear native land
I owe a subject's homage; but ev'n him
And his high arbitration I'd reject.

Within my bosom reigns another lord;
Honour, sole judge, and umpire of itself.

If my free speech offend you, noble Randolph,
Revoke your favours, and let Norval go
Hence as he came, alone, but not dishonour'd.

Lord R. Thus far I'll mediate with impartial voice:

The ancient foe of Caledonia's land
Now waves his banners o'er her frightened fields.
Suspend your purpose till your country's arms
Repel the bold invader: then decide

The private quarrel.

Glen. I agree to this.

Nor. And I.

Enter Servant.

Serv. The banquet waits.

Lord R. We come. [Exit with Servant.

Glen. Norval,

Let not our variance mar the social hour,

Nor wrong the hospitality of Randolph.

Nor frowning anger, nor yet wrinkled hate, Shall stain my countenance. Smooth thou thy brow;

Nor let our strife disturb the gentle dame.

Nor. Think not so lightly, sir, of my resentment.

When we contend again, our strife is mortal.
[Exeunt.

ACT V.

SCENE I.—A Wood.

Enter DOUGLAS.

Doug. This is the place, the centre of the grove;

Here stands the oak, the monarch of the wood.
How sweet and solemn is this midnight scene!
The silver moon, unclouded, holds her way Through skies, where I could count each little star.

The fanning west-wind scarcely stirs the leaves;
The river, rushing o'er its pebbled bed,
Imposes silence with a stilly sound.

In such a place as this, at such an hour,
If ancestry can be in aught believ'd,
Descending spirits have convers'd with men,
And told the secrets of the world unknown.

Enter old NORVAL.

Old N. 'Tis he. But what if he should chide me hence?

His just reproach I fear.

[Douglas turns aside and sees him

Forgive, forgive;

Canst thou forgive the man, the selfish man,
Who bred sir Malcolm's heir a shepherd's son?

Doug. Kneel not to me; thou art my father still:

Thy wish'd-for presence now completes my joy
Welcome to me; my fortunes thou shalt share,
And ever honour'd with thy Douglas live.

Old N. And dost thou call me father? Oh,
my son!

I think that I could die, to make amends
For the great wrong I did thee. 'Twas my crime,

Which in the wilderness so long conceal'd
The blossom of thy youth.

Doug. Not worse the fruit,
That in the wilderness the blossom blow'd.

Amongst the shepherds, in the humble cot,
I learn'd some lessons, which I'll not forget

When I inhabit yonder lofty towers.

I, who was once a swain, will ever prove
The poor man's friend; and, when my vassals
bow,

Norval shall smooth the crested pride of Douglas.

Old N. Let me but live to see thine exaltation!

Yet grievous are my fears. Oh, leave this place,
And those unfriendly towers!

Doug. Why should I leave them?

Old N. Lord Randolph and his kinsman seek your life.

Doug. How know'st thou that?

Old N. I will inform you how.

When evening came, I left the secret place
Appointed for me by your mother's care,
And fondly trod in each accustom'd path
That to the castle leads. Whilst thus I rang'd,
I was alarm'd with unexpected sounds
Of earnest voices. On the persons came.
Unseen I lurk'd, and overheard them name
Each other as they talk'd, lord Randolph this,
And that Glenalvon. Still of you they spoke,
And of the lady: threat'ning was their speech,
Though but imperfectly my ear could hear it.
'Twas strange, they said, a wonderful discovery;
And ever and anon they vow'd revenge.

Doug. Revenge! for what?

Old N. For being what you are,
Sir Malcolm's heir: how else have you offended?
When they were gone, I hied me to my cottage,
And there sat musing how I best might find
Means to inform you of their wicked purpose;
But I could think of none. At last, perplex'd,
I issued forth, encompassing the tower,
With many a wearied step and wishful look.
Now Providence hath brought you to my sight,
Let not your too courageous spirit scorn
The caution which I give.

Doug. I scorn it not.

My mother warn'd me of Glenalvon's baseness:
But I will not suspect the noble Randolph.
In our encounter with the vile assassins,
I mark'd his brave demeanour; him I'll trust.

Old N. I fear you will, too far.

Doug. Here in this place

I wait my mother's coming: she shall know
What thou hast told: her counsel I will follow:
And cautious ever are a mother's counsels.
You must depart: your presence may prevent
Our interview.

Old N. My blessing rest upon thee!

Oh, may heav'n's hand, which sav'd thee from
the wave,

And from the sword of foes, be near thee still;
Turning mischance, if aught hangs o'er thy head,
All upon mine! [Exit.]

Doug. He loves me like a parent;
And must not, shall not, lose the son he loves,
Although his son has found a nobler father.
Eventful day! how hast thou chang'd my state!
Once on the cold and winter-shaded side
Of a bleak hill, mischance had rooted me,
Never to thrive, child of another soil;
'Transplanted now to the gay sunny vale,
Like the green thorn of May my fortune flowers.
Ye glorious stars! high heav'n's resplendent
host!

To whom I oft have of my lot complain'd,
Hear, and record my soul's unalter'd wish!
Dead or alive, let me but be renown'd!
May heav'n inspire some fierce gigantic Dane,
To give a bold defiance to our host!
Before he speaks it out, I will accept:
Like Douglas conquer, or like Douglas die.

Enter LADY RANDOLPH.

Lady R. My son! I heard a voice—

Doug. The voice was mine.

Lady R. Didst thou complain aloud to nature's ear,
That thus in dusky shades, at midnight hours,

By stealth the mother and the son should meet?

[Embraces him.]

Doug. No; on this happy day, this better birth-day,
My thoughts and words are all of hope and joy.

Lady R. Sad fear and melancholy still divide
The empire of my breast with hope and joy.
Now hear what I advise—

Doug. First, let me tell

What may the tenor of your counsel change.

Lady R. My heart forebodes some evil.

Doug. 'Tis not good—

At eve, unseen by Randolph and Glenalvon,
The good old Norval in the grove o'erheard
Their conversation; oft they mention'd me
With dreadful threat'nings; you they sometimes nam'd.

'Twas strange, they said, a wonderful discovery;
And ever and anon they vow'd revenge.

Lady R. Defend us, gracious God! we are betray'd:

They have found out the secret of thy birth!
It must be so. That is the great discovery.
Sir Malcolm's heir is come to claim his own,
And they will be reveng'd. Perhaps even now,
Arm'd and prepar'd for murder, they but wait
A darker and more silent hour, to break
Into the chamber where they think thou sleep'st.
This moment, this, heav'n hath ordain'd to save thee!

Fly to the camp, my son!

Doug. And leave you here?

No: to the castle let us go together,
Call up the ancient servants of your house,
Who in their youth did eat your father's bread;
Then tell them loudly that I am your son.
If in the breasts of men one spark remains
Of sacred love, fidelity, or pity,
Some in your cause will arm. I ask but few
To drive those spoilers from my father's house.

Lady R. Oh, nature, nature! what can check thy force?

Thou genuine offspring of the daring Douglas!
But rush not on destruction: save thyself,
And I am safe. To me they mean no harm.
Thy stay but risks thy precious life in vain.
That winding path conducts thee to the river.
Cross where thou seest a broad and beaten
way,

Which running eastward leads thee to the camp.

Instant demand admittance to lord Douglas:
Show him these jewels, which his brother wore.
Thy look, thy voice, will make him feel the truth,

Which I by certain proof will soon confirm.

Doug. I yield me, and obey: but yet my
heart

Bleeds at this parting. Something bids me stay,

And guard a mother's life. Oft have I read
Of wondrous deeds by one bold arm achiev'd.
Our foes are two; no more: let me go forth,
And see if any shield can guard Glenalvon.

Lady R. If thou regard'st thy mother, or rever'st

Thy father's memory, think of this no more.

One thing I have to say before we part:

Long wert thou lost; and thou art found, my child,

In a most fearful season. War and battle

I have great cause to dread. Too well I see
Which way the current of thy temper sets:
To-day I have found thee. Oh! my long-lost
hope!

If thou to giddy valour giv'st the rein,
To-morrow I may lose my son for ever.
The love of thee, before thou saw'st the light,
Sustain'd my life when thy brave father fell.
If thou shalt fall, I have not love nor hope
In this waste world! My son, remember me!

Doug. What shall I say? How can I give you comfort?

The God of battles of my life dispose
As may be best for you! for whose dear sake
I will not bear myself as I resolv'd.

But yet consider, as no vulgar name,
That which I boast, sounds among martial men,
How will inglorious caution suit my claim?
The post of fate unshrinking I maintain.

My country's foes must witness who I am.
On the invaders' heads I'll prove my birth,
Till friends and foes confess the genuine strain.
If in this strife I fall, blame not your son,
Who, if he live not honour'd, must not live.

Lady R. I will not utter what my bosom feels.

Too well I love that valour which I warn.
Farewell, my son, my counsels are but vain.

And as high heav'n hath will'd it, all must be.
[Embracing.]

Gaze not on me, thou wilt mistake the path;
I'll point it out again. [They separate.]
[Exeunt.]

Just as they are separating, enter, from the Wood, LORD RANDOLPH and GLEN-ALVON.

Lord R. Not in her presence.

Now—

Glen. I'm prepar'd.

Lord R. No: I command thee stay.
I go alone: it never shall be said
That I took odds to combat mortal man.
The noblest vengeance is the most complete.

[Exit.]

[Glenalvon makes some Steps to the same Side of the Stage, listens, and speaks.]

Glen. Demons of death, come settle on my sword,

And to a double slaughter guide it home!
The lover and the husband both must die.

Lord R. [Without] Draw, villain! draw!

Doug. [Without] Assail me not, lord Randolph;

Not as thou lov'st thyself.

[Clashing of Swords.]

Glen. [Running out] Now is the time.

Enter LADY RANDOLPH, at the opposite Side of the Stage, faint and breathless.

Lady R. Lord Randolph, hear me; all shall be thine own!

But spare! Oh, spare my son!

Enter DOUGLAS, with a Sword in each Hand.

Doug. My mother's voice!

I can protect thee still.

Lady R. He lives! he lives!

For this, for this to heav'n, eternal praise!
But sure I saw thee fall.

Doug. It was Glenalvon.

Just as my arm had master'd Randolph's sword,
The villain came behind me; but I slew him.

Lady R. Behind thee! ah! thou'rt wounded!

Oh, my child,

How pale thou look'st! And shall I lose thee
now?

Doug. Do not despair: I feel a little faint-
ness;

I hope it will not last. [Leans upon his Sword.]

Lady R. There is no hope!

And we must part! the hand of death is on
thee!

Oh! my beloved child! O Douglas, Douglas!

Douglas growing more and more faint.

Doug. Oh! had I fall'n as my brave fathers fell,

Turning with fatal arm the tide of battle,
Like them I should have smil'd and welcom'd
death;

But thus to perish by a villain's hand!

Cut off from nature's and from glory's course,
Which never mortal was so fond to run.

Lady R. Hear, justice, hear! stretch thy avenging arm.

[Douglas falls.]

Doug. Unknown I die; no tongue shall speak of me.

Some noble spirits, judging by themselves,
May yet conjecture what I might have prov'd,

And think life only wanting to my fame:

But who shall comfort thee?

Lady R. Despair, Despair!

Doug. Oh, had it pleas'd high heav'n to let me live

A little while!—my eyes that gaze on thee
Grow dim apace! my mother—O! my mother!

[Dies. Lady Randolph faints on the Body.]

Enter LORD RANDOLPH and ANNA.

Lord R. Thy words, thy words of truth,
have pierc'd my heart:

I am the stain of knighthood and of arms.

Oh! if my brave deliverer survives

The traitor's sword—

Anna. Alas! look there, my lord.

Lord R. The mother and her son! How curst am I!

Was I the cause? No: I was not the cause.

Yon matchless villain did seduce my soul

To frantic jealousy.

Anna. My lady lives:

The agony of grief hath but suppress'd

Awhile her powers.

Lord R. But my deliverer's dead!

Lady R. [Recovering] Where am I now?
Still in this wretched world!

Grief cannot break a heart so hard as mine.

Lord R. Oh, misery!

Amidst thy raging grief I must proclaim
My innocence.

Lady R. Thy innocence!

Lord R. My guilt

Is innocence compar'd with what thou think'st it.

Lady R. Of thee I think not; what have I to do

With thee, or any thing? My son! my son!

My beautiful! my brave! how proud was I

Of thee and of thy valour! my fond heart

O'erflow'd this day with transport, when I
thought

Of growing old amidst a race of thine.

Now all my hopes are dead! A little while
Was I a wife! a mother not so long!
What am I now?—I know—But I shall be
That only whilst I please; for such a son
And such a husband drive me to my fate.

[Exit running.]

Lord R. Follow her, Anna: I myself would follow,

But in this rage she must abhor my presence.

[Exit Anna.]

Curs'd, curs'd Glenalvon, he escap'd too well,
Though slain and baffled by the hand he hated.
Foaming with rage and fury to the last,
Cursing his conqueror, the felon died.

Re-enter ANNA.

Anna. My lord! My lord!

Lord R. Speak: I can hear of horror.

Anna. Horror, indeed!

Lord R. Matilda!

Anna. Is no more:

She ran, she flew like lightning up the hill;
Nor halted till the precipice she gain'd,
Beneath whose low'ring top the river falls
Ingulf'd in rifted rocks: thither she came,
As fearless as the eagle lights upon it,

And headlong down—

Lord R. 'Twas I, alas! 'twas I
That fill'd her breast with fury; drove her down

The precipice of death! Wretch that I am!

Anna. Oh, had you seen her last despairing look!

Upon the brink she stood, and cast her eyes
Down on the deep: then lifting up her head,
And her white hands to heaven, seeming to say
Why am I forc'd to this? she plung'd herself
Into the empty air.

Lord R. I will not vent,
In vain complaints, the passion of my soul.
Peace in this world I never can enjoy.
These wounds the gratitude of Randolph gave;
They speak aloud, and with the voice of fate
Denounce my doom. I am resolv'd. I'll go Straight to the battle, where the man that makes

Me turn aside, must threaten worse than death.
Thou, faithful to thy mistress, take this ring,
Full warrant of my power. Let every rite
With cost and pomp upon their funerals wait:
For Randolph hopes he never shall return.

[The Curtain descends slowly to Music.]

LILLO.

GEORGE LILLO, was by profession a jeweller, and was born in the neighbourhood of Moorgate, in London, on the 4th of Feb. 1693; in which neighbourhood he pursued his occupation for many years, with the fairest and most unblemished character. He was strongly attached to the Muses, yet seemed to have laid it down as a maxim, that the devotion paid to them ought always to tend to the promotion of virtue, morality, and religion. In pursuance of this aim, Mr. Lillo was happy in the choice of his subjects, and shewed great power of affecting the heart, by working up the passions to such a height, as to render the distresses of common and domestic life equally interesting as those of kings and heroes; and the ruin brought on private families by an indulgence of avarice, lust etc., as the havoc made in states and empires by ambition, cruelty and tyranny. His George Barnwell, Fatal Curiosity, and Arden of Feversham are all planned on common and well-known stories; yet they have, perhaps, more frequently drawn tears from an audience, than the more pompous tragedies of Alexander the Great, All for Love, etc. Mr. Lillo, as before observed, has been happy in the choice of his subjects; his conduct and the management of them is no less meritorious, and his pathos very great. If there is any fault to be objected to his writings, it is, that sometimes he affects an elevation of style somewhat above the simplicity of his subject, and the supposed rank of his characters; but the custom of tragedy will stand in some degree of excuse for this; and a still better argument perhaps may be admitted in vindication, not only of our present author, but of others in the like predicament; which is, that even nature itself will justify this conduct; since we find even the most humble characters in real life, when under peculiar circumstances of distress, or actuated by the influence of any violent passions, will at times be elevated to an aptness of expression, and power of language, not only greatly superior to themselves, but even to the general language and conversation of persons of much higher rank in life, and of minds more perfectly cultivated. Our author died Sept. 3d. 1739, in the 47th year of his age; and a few months after his death the celebrated Fielding printed the following character of him in The Champion: "He had a perfect knowledge of human nature, though his contempt of all base means of application, which are the necessary steps to great acquaintance, restrained his conversation within very narrow bounds. He had the spirit of an old Roman, joined to the innocence of a primitive christian; he was contented with his little state of life, in which his excellent temper of mind gave him a happiness beyond the power of riches; and it was necessary for his friends to have a sharp insight into his want of their services, as well as good inclination or abilities to serve him. In short, he was one of the best of men, and those who knew him best will most regret his loss."

GEORGE BARNWELL.

THIS play was acted 1731, at the Theatre Royal in Drury-lane with great success. "In the newspapers of the time" says the Biographia Dramatica, "we find, that on Friday, 1d of July 1731, 'the Queen sent to the playhouse in Drury-lane, for the manuscript of George Barnwell, to peruse it, which Mr. Wilks carried to Hampton Court.' This tragedy being founded on a well known old ballad, many of the critics of that time, who went to the first representation of it, formed so contemptuous an idea of the piece, in their expectations, that they purchased the ballad (some thousands of which were used in one day on this account), in order to draw comparisons between that and the play. But its merit soon got the better of this contempt, and presented them with scenes written so true to the heart, that they were compelled to subscribe to their power, and lay aside their ballads to take their handkerchiefs." The original performer of the character of George Barnwell, Mr. Ross, relates, that "in the year 1752, he played this part. Dr. Barrowby was sent for by a young merchant's apprentice, who was in a high fever; upon the Doctor's approaching him, he saw his patient was afflicted with a disease of the mind. The Doctor being alone with the young man, he confessed, after much solicitation, that he had made an improper acquaintance with a kept mistress; and had made free with money intrusted to his care, by his employers, to the amount of 200 pounds. Seeing Mr. Ross in that piece, he was so forcibly struck, he had not enjoyed a moment's peace since, and wished to die, to avoid the shame he saw hanging over him. The Doctor calmed his patient by telling him, if his father made the least hesitation to give the money, he should have it from him. The father arrived, put the amount into the son's hands,—they wept, kissed, embraced. The son soon recovered, and lived to be a very eminent merchant. Dr. Barrowby never told me the name; but one even—ing he said to me, 'you have done some good in your profession, more perhaps than many a clergyman who preached last Sunday.' I had for nine or ten years, at my benefit, a note sealed up with ten guineas, and these words, "a tribute of gratitude from one who is highly obliged, and saved from ruin, by seeing Mr. Ross's performance of Barnyvell." What will the virulent decriers of stage-plays say to this?

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A Room in THOROWGOOD'S House.

Enter THOROWGOOD and TRUEMAN.

True. SIR, the packet from Genoa is arrived.

[Gives Letters.]

Thorow. Heaven be praised! the storm that threatened our royal mistress, pure religion, liberty, and laws, is for a time diverted. By this means, time is gained to make such preparation on our part, as may, heaven concurring, prevent his malice, or turn the meditated mischief on himself.

True. He must be insensible indeed, who is not affected when the safety of his country is concerned. Sir, may I know by what means? —If I am not too bold—

Thorow. Your curiosity is laudable; and I gratify it with the greater pleasure, because from thence you may learn how honest merchants, as such, may sometimes contribute to the safety of their country, as they do at all times to its happiness; that if hereafter you should be tempted to any action that has the appearance of vice or meanness in it, upon reflecting on the dignity of our profession, you may with honest scorn reject whatever is unworthy of it.

True. Should Barnwell, or I, who have the benefit of your example, by our ill conduct bring any imputation on that honourable name, we must be left without excuse.

Thorow. You compliment, young man. [Trueman bows respectfully] Nay, I'm not offended. As the name of merchant never degrades the gentleman, so by no means does it exclude him; only take heed not to purchase the character of complaisant at the expense of your sincerity.

True. Sir, have you any commands for me at this time?

Thorow. Only look carefully over the files, to see whether there are any tradesmen's bills unpaid; if there are, send and discharge 'em. We must not let artificers lose their time, so useful to the public and their families, in unnecessary attendance. [Exit Trueman.]

Enter MARIA.

Well, Maria; have you given orders for the entertainment? I would have it in some measure worthy the guests. Let there be plenty, and of the best, that the courtiers may at least commend our hospitality.

Maria. Sir, I have endeavoured not to wrong your well-known generosity by an ill-timed parsimony.

Thorow. Nay, 'twas a needless caution; I have no cause to doubt your prudence.

Maria. Sir, I find myself unfit for conversation. I should but increase the number of the company, without adding to their satisfaction.

Thorow. Nay, my child, this melancholy must not be indulged.

Maria. Company will but increase it. I wish you would dispense with my presence. Solitude best suits my present temper.

Thorow. You are not insensible, that it is chiefly on your account these noble lords do me the honour so frequently to grace my board. Should you be absent, the disappointment may make them repent of their condescension, and think their labour lost.

Maria. He that shall think his time or honour lost in visiting you, can set no real value on your daughter's company, whose only merit is that she is yours. The man of quality who chooses to converse with a gentleman and merchant of your worth and character, may confer honour by so doing; but he loses none.

Thorow. Come, come, Maria, I need not tell you, that a young gentleman may prefer your conversation to mine, and yet intend me no disrespect at all; for though he may lose no honour in my company, 'tis very natural for him to expect more pleasure in yours. I remember the time when the company of the greatest and wisest man in the kingdom, would have been insipid and tiresome to me, if it had deprived me of an opportunity of enjoying your mother's.

Maria. Yours, no doubt, was as agreeable to her: for generous minds know no pleasure in society but where 'tis mutual.

Thorow. Thou knowest I have no heir, no child, but thee; the fruits of many years successful industry must all be thine. Now it would give me pleasure, great as my love, to see on whom you will bestow it. I am daily solicited by men of the greatest rank and merit for leave to address you; but I have hitherto declined it, in hopes that, by observation, I should learn which way your inclination tends; for, as I know love to be essential to happiness in the marriage state, I had rather my approbation should confirm your choice than direct it.

Maria. What can I say? How shall I answer as I ought this tenderness, so uncommon even in the best of parents? But you are without example; yet, had you been less indulgent, I had been most wretched. That I look on the crowd of courtiers that visit here, with equal esteem, but equal indifference, you have observed, and I must needs confess; yet, had you asserted your authority, and insisted on a parent's right to be obeyed, I had submitted, and to my duty sacrificed my peace.

Thorow. From your perfect obedience in every other instance, I feared as much; and therefore would leave you without a bias in an affair wherein your happiness is so immediately concerned.

Maria. Whether from a want of that just ambition that would become your daughter, or from some other cause, I know not; but I find high birth and titles don't recommend the man who owns them to my affections.

Thorow. I would not that they should, unless his merit recommends him more. A noble birth and fortune, though they make not a bad man good, yet they are a real advantage to a worthy one; and place his virtues in the fairest light.

Maria. I cannot answer for my inclinations; but they shall ever be submitted to your wisdom and authority. And as you will not compel me to marry where I cannot love, love shall never make me act contrary to my duty. Sir, have I your permission to retire?

Thorow. I'll see you to your chamber.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—A Room in MILLWOOD'S House.

Enter MILLWOOD and LUCY.

Mill. How do I look to-day, Lucy?

Lucy. O, killingly, madam! A little more red, and you'll be irresistible!—But why this more than ordinary care of your dress and complexion? What new conquest are you aiming at?

Mill. A conquest would be new indeed!

Lucy. Not to you, who make 'em every day—but to me—Well, 'tis what I'm never to expect—unfortunate as I am—But your wit and beauty—

Mill. First made me a wretch, and still continue me so. Men, however generous and sincere to one another, are all selfish hypocrites in their affairs with us; we are no otherwise esteemed or regarded by them, but as we contribute to their satisfaction.

Lucy. You are certainly, madam, on the wrong side of this argument. Is not the expense all theirs? And I am sure it is our own fault if we han't our share of the pleasure.

Mill. We are but slaves to men.

Lucy. Nay, 'tis they that are slaves most certainly, for we lay them under contribution.

Mill. Slaves have no property; no, not even in themselves: all is the victor's.

Lucy. You are strangely arbitrary in your principles, madam.

Mill. I would have my conquest complete, like those of the Spaniards in the new world; who first plundered the natives of all the wealth they had, and then condemned the wretches to the mines for life, to work for more.

Lucy. Well, I shall never approve of your scheme of government; I should think it much more politic, as well as just, to find my subjects an easier employment.

Mill. It is a general maxim among the knowing part of mankind, that a woman without virtue, like a man without honour or honesty, is capable of any action, though ever so vile; and yet what pains will they not take, what arts not use, to seduce us from our innocence, and make us contemptible and wicked, even in their own opinion? Then is it not just, the villains, to their cost, should find us so? But guilt makes them suspicious, and keeps them on their guard; therefore we can take advantage only of the young and innocent part of the sex, who never having injured women, apprehend no danger from them.

Lucy. Ay, they must be young indeed!

Mill. Such a one I think I have found. As I have passed through the city, I have often observed him receiving and paying considerable sums of money; from thence I conclude he is employed in affairs of consequence.

Lucy. Is he handsome?

Mill. Ay, ay, the stripling is well made, and has a good face.

Lucy. About—

Mill. Eighteen.

Lucy. Innocent, handsome, and about eighteen! You'll be vastly happy. Why, if you manage well, you may keep him to yourself these two or three years.

Mill. If I manage well, I shall have done with him much sooner. Having long had a design on him, and meeting him yesterday, I made a full stop, and gazing wishfully on his face, asked his name. He blushed, and, bowing very low, answered George Barnwell. I begged his pardon for the freedom I had taken, and told him that he was the person I had long wished to see, and to whom I had an affair of importance to communicate at a proper time and place. He named a tavern; I talked of honour and reputation, and invited him to my house. He swallowed the bait, promised to come, and this is the time I expect him. [Knocking at the Door] Somebody knocks. D'ye hear, I'm at home to nobody to-day but him. [Exit Lucy] Less affairs must give way to those of more consequence; and I am strangely mistaken if this does not prove of great importance to me, and him too, before I have done with him. Now, after what manner shall I receive him? Let me consider—What manner of person am I to receive? He is young, innocent, and bashful; therefore I must take care not to put him out of countenance at first.

Enter BARNWELL, bowing very low. LUCY at a Distance.

Mill. Sir, the surprise and joy!

Barn. Madam!

Mill. This is such a favour— [Advancing.]

Barn. Pardon me, madam!

Mill. So unhop'd for! [Still advances. Barnwell salutes her, and retires in confusion.] To see you here—Excuse the confusion—

Barn. I fear I am too bold.

Mill. Alas, sir, I may justly apprehend you think me so. Please, sir, to sit. I am as much at a loss how to receive this honour as I ought, as I am surprised at your goodness in conferring it.

Barn. I thought you had expected me: I promised to come.

Mill. That is the more surprising: few men are such religious observers of their word.

Barn. All who are honest are.

Mill. To one another; but we simple women are seldom thought of consequence enough to gain a place in their remembrance.

[Laying her Hand on his, as by accident.]

Barn. Her disorder is so great, she don't perceive she has laid her hand on mine. Heavens! how she trembles! What can this mean?

[Aside.]

Mill. The interest I have in all that relates to you (the reason of which you shall know hereafter) excites my curiosity; and were I sure you would pardon my presumption, I should desire to know your real sentiments on a very particular subject.

Barn. Madam, you may command my poor thoughts on any subject. I have none that I would conceal.

Mill. You'll think me bold.

Barn. No, indeed.

Mill. What then are your thoughts of love?

Barn. If you mean the love of women, I have not thought of it at all. My youth and circumstances make such thoughts improper in me yet. But if you mean the general love we owe to mankind, I think no one has more of it in his temper than myself. I don't know that person in the world, whose happiness I don't wish, and wouldn't promote, were it in my power. In an especial manner, I love my uncle and my master; but above all, my friend.

Mill. You have a friend then, whom you love?

Barn. As he does me, sincerely.

Mill. He is, no doubt, often bless'd with your company and conversation.

Barn. We live in one house, and both serve the same worthy merchant.

Mill. Happy, happy youth! Whoe'er thou art, I envy thee; and so must all who see and know this youth. What have I lost by being married a woman! I hate my sex, myself. Had I been a man, I might perhaps have been as happy in your friendship, as he who now enjoys it is; but as it is—Oh!—

Barn. I never observed woman before; or this is, sure, the most beautiful of her sex.

[Aside] You seem disordered, madam;—may I know the cause?

Mill. Do not ask me—I can never speak it, whatever is the cause. I wish for things impossible. I would be a servant, bound to the same master, to live in one house with you.

Barn. How strange, and yet how kind her words and actions are! and the effect they have on me is as strange. I feel desires I never knew before; I must be gone, while I have power to go. [Aside] Madam, I humbly take my leave.

Mill. You will not, sure, leave me so soon!

Barn. Indeed I must.

Mill. You cannot be so cruel! I have prepared a poor supper, at which I promised myself your company.

Barn. I am sorry I must refuse the honour you designed me; but my duty to my master calls me hence. I never yet neglected his service. He is so gentle, and so good a master, that should I wrong him, though he might forgive me, I should never forgive myself.

Mill. Am I refused by the first man, the second favour I ever stooped to ask? Go then, thou proud hard-hearted youth; but know, you are the only man that could be found, who would let me sue twice for greater favours.

Barn. What shall I do? How shall I go or stay?

Mill. Yet do not, do not leave me. I with my sex' pride would meet your scorn; but when I look upon you, when I behold those eyes—Oh! spare my tongue, and let my blushes—this flood of tears too, that will force its way, declare—what woman's modesty should hide.

Barn. Oh, heavens! she loves me, worthless as I am. Her looks, her words, her flowing tears confess it. And can I leave her then? Oh, never, never! Madam, dry up your tears; you shall command me always. I will stay here for ever, if you would have me.

Lucy. So, she has wheedled him out of his virtue of obedience already, and will strip him of all the rest, one after another, till she has left him as few as her ladyship, or myself.

[Aside.]

Mill. Now you are kind indeed; but I mean not to detain you always; I would have you shake off all slavish obedience to your master; but you may serve him still.

Lucy. Serve him still! Ay, or he'll have no opportunity of fingering his cash; and then he'll not serve your end, I'll be sworn.

[Aside.]

Enter BLUNT.

Blunt. Madam, supper's on the table.

Mill. Come, sir, you'll excuse all defects. My thoughts were too much employed on my guest to observe the entertainment.

[Exeunt Barnwell and Millwood.]

Blunt. What, is all this preparation, this elegant supper, variety of wines, and music, for the entertainment of that young fellow?

Lucy. So it seems.

Blunt. How! is our mistress turned fool at last? She's in love with him, I suppose.

Lucy. I suppose not. But she designs to make him in love with her, if she can.

Blunt. What will she get by that? He seems under age, and can't be supposed to have much money.

Lucy. But his master has, and that's the same thing, as she'll manage it.

Blunt. I don't like this fooling with a handsome young fellow; while she's endeavouring to ensnare him she may be caught herself.

Lucy. Nay, were she like me, that would certainly be the consequence; for, I confess, there is something in youth and innocence that moves me mightily.

Blunt. Yes, so does the smoothness and plumpness of a partridge move a mighty desire in the hawk to be the destruction of it.

Lucy. Why, birds are their prey, and men ours: though, as you observed, we are sometimes caught ourselves. But that, I dare say, will never be the case with our mistress.

Blunt. I wish it may prove so; for you know we all depend upon her. Should she trifle away her time with a young fellow that there's nothing to be got by, we must all starve.

Lucy. There's no danger of that; for I am sure she has no view in this affair but interest.

Blunt. Well, and what hopes are there of success in that?

Lucy. The most promising that can be. 'Tis true, the youth has his scruples; but she'll soon teach him to answer them, by stifling his conscience. Oh, the lad is in a hopeful way, depend upon it. [Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE 1.—A Room in THOROWGOOD'S House.

Enter BARNWELL.

Barn. How strange are all things round me! Like some thief who treads forbidden ground, and fain would lurk unseen, fearful I enter each apartment of this well-known house. To guilty love, as if that were too little, already have I added breach of trust. A thief! Can I know myself that wretched thing, and look my honest friend and injured master in the face? Though hypocrisy may awhile conceal my guilt, at length it will be known, and public shame and ruin must ensue. In the mean time, what must be my life? Ever to speak a language foreign to my heart; to hourly add to the number of my crimes, in order to conceal 'em. Sure such was the condition of the grand apostate, when first he lost his purity. Like me, disconsolate he wandered; and while yet in heaven, bore all his future hell about him.

Enter TRUEMAN.

True. Barnwell, oh how I rejoice to see you safe! So will our master, and his gentle daughter; who, during your absence, often inquired after you.

Barn. Would he were gone! His officious love will pry into the secrets of my soul.

[Aside.

True. Unless you knew the pain the whole family has felt on your account, you can't conceive how much you are beloved. But why thus cold and silent?—When my heart is full of joy for your return, why do you turn away—why thus avoid me? What have I done? How am I altered since you saw me last? Or rather, what have you done—and why are you thus changed? for I am still the same.

Barn. What have I done, indeed! [Aside.

True. Not speak!—nor look upon me!—

Barn. By my face he will discover all I would conceal. Methinks already I begin to hate him. [Aside.

True. I cannot bear this usage from a friend; one whom till now I ever found so loving; whom yet I love; though his unkindness strikes at the root of friendship, and might destroy it in any breast but mine.

Barn. I am not well. [Turning to him] Sleep has been a stranger to these eyes since you beheld 'em last.

True. Heavy they look, indeed, and swoln with tears;—now they overflow. Rightly did my sympathizing heart forebode last night, when thou wast absent, something fatal to our peace.

Barn. Your friendship engages you too far. My troubles, whate'er they are, are mine alone; you have no interest in them, nor ought your concern for me to give you a moment's pain.

True. You speak as if you knew of friendship nothing but the name. Before I saw your grief I felt it. E'en now, though ignorant of the cause, your sorrow wounds me to the heart.

Barn. 'Twill not be always thus. Friendship and all engagements cease as circumstances and occasions vary; and since you once may hate me, perhaps it might be better for us both that now you loved me less.

True. Sure I but dream! Without a cause would Barnwell use me thus? Ungenerous and ungrateful youth, farewell; I shall endeavour to follow your advice. [Going] Yet, stay; perhaps I am too rash and angry, when the cause demands compassion. Some unforeseen calamity may have befallen him, too great to bear.

Barn. What part am I reduced to act? 'Tis vile and base to move his temper thus, the best of friends and men. [Aside.

True. I am to blame; pr'ythee forgive me, Barnwell. Try to compose your ruffled mind; and let me know the cause that thus transports you from yourself; my friendly counsel may restore your peace.

Barn. All that is possible for man to do for man your generous friendship may effect; but here, even that's in vain.

True. Something dreadful is labouring in your breast; oh, give it vent, and let me share your grief; 'twill ease your pain, should it admit no cure, and make it lighter by the part I bear.

Barn. Vain supposition! My woes increase by being observed: should the cause be known, they would exceed all bounds.

True. So well I know thy honest heart, guilt cannot harbour there.

Barn. Oh, torture insupportable! [Aside.

True. Then why am I excluded? Have I a thought I would conceal from you?

Barn. If still you urge me on this hated subject, I'll never enter more beneath this roof, nor see your face again.

True. 'Tis strange—but I have done—say but you hate me not.

Barn. Hate you! I am not that monster yet.

True. Shall our friendship still continue?

Barn. It's a blessing I never was worthy of, yet now must stand on terms; and but upon conditions can confirm it.

True. What are they?

Barn. Never hereafter, though you should wonder at my conduct, desire to know more than I am willing to reveal.

True. 'Tis hard; but upon any conditions I must be your friend.

Barn. Then, as much as one lost to himself can be another's, I am yours. [Embracing.

True. Be ever so; and may heaven restore your peace! But business requires our attendance: business, the youth's best preservative from ill, as idleness his worst of snares. Will you go with me?

Barn. I'll take a little time to reflect on what has passed, and follow you. [Exit Trueman] I might have trusted Trueman, and engaged him to apply to my uncle to repair the wrong I have done my master:—but what of Millwood? Yet shall I leave her, for ever leave her, and not let her know the cause? she who loves me with such a boundless passion! Can cruelty be duty? I judge of what she then must feel, by what I now endure. The love of life, and fear of shame, opposed by inclination strong as death or shame, like wind and tide in raging conflict met, when neither can prevail, keep me in doubt. How then can I determine?

Enter THOROWGOOD.

Thorow. Without a cause assigned or notice given, to absent yourself last night was a fault, young man, and I came to chide you for it, but hope I am prevented. That modest blush, the confusion so visible in your face, speak grief and shame. When we have offended heaven, it requires no more: and shall man, who needs himself to be forgiven, be harder to appease? If my pardon, or love, be of moment to your peace, look up secure of both.

Barn. This goodness has o'ercome me. [Aside] Oh, sir, you know not the nature and extent of my offence; and I should abuse your mistaken bounty to receive it. Though I had rather die than speak my shame, though racks could not have forced the guilty secret from my breast, your kindness has.

Thorow. Enough, enough; whate'er it be, this concern shows you're convinced, and I am satisfied. How painful is the sense of guilt to an ingenuous mind: Some youthful folly which it were prudent not to inquire into.

Barn. It will be known, and you'll recall your pardon, and abhor me.

Thorow. I never will. Yet be upon your guard in this gay, thoughtless season of your life: when vice becomes habitual, the very power of leaving it is lost.

Barn. Hear me, on my knees, confess—

Thorow. Not a syllable more upon this subject: it were not mercy, but cruelty, to hear what must give you such torment to reveal.

Barn. This generosity amazes and distracts me!

Thorow. This remorse makes thee dearer to me, than if thou hadst never offended. Whatever is your fault, of this I am certain, 'twas harder for you to offend, than me to pardon. [Exit.]

Barn. Villain! villain! villain! basely to wrong so excellent a man. Should I again return to folly?—Detested thought!—But what of Millwood then?—Why I renounce her—I give her up—The struggle's over, and virtue has prevailed. Reason may convince, but gratitude compels. This unlooked-for generosity has saved me from destruction. [Going.]

Enter a Footman.

Foot. Sir, two ladies from your uncle in the country desire to see you.

Barn. Who should they be? [Aside] Tell them I'll wait upon 'em. [Exit Footman] Methinks I dread to see 'em—Now, every thing alarms me!—Guilt, what a coward hast thou made me.

SCENE II.—Another Room in THOROWGOOD's House.

Enter MILLWOOD, LUCY, and a Footman.

Foot. Ladies, he'll wait upon you immediately.

Mill. 'Tis very well—I thank you.

[Exit Footman.]

Enter BARNWELL.

Barn. Confusion! Millwood!

Mill. That angry look tells me, that here I am an unwelcome guest: I feared as much: the unhappy are so every where.

Barn. Will nothing but my utter ruin content you?

Mill. Unkind and cruel. Lost myself, your happiness is now my only care.

Barn. How did you gain admission?

Mill. Saying we were desired by your uncle to visit and deliver a message to you, we were received by the family without suspicion, and with much respect conducted here.

Barn. Why did you come at all?

Mill. I never shall trouble you more. I'm come to take my leave for ever. Such is the malice of my fate! I go hopeless, despairing ever to return. This hour is all I have left; one short hour is all I have to bestow on love and you, for whom I thought the longest life too short.

Barn. Then we are met to part ever.

Mill. It must be so. Yet think not that time or absence shall ever put a period to my grief, or make me love you less. Though I must leave you, yet condemn me not.

Barn. Condemn you! No, I approve your resolution, and rejoice to hear it; 'tis just, 'tis necessary;—I have well weighed, and found it so.

Lucy. I am afraid the young man has more sense than she thought he had. [Aside.]

Barn. Before you came, I had determined never to see you more.

Mill. Confusion!

[Aside.]

Lucy. Ay, we are all out; this is a turn so unexpected, that I shall make nothing of my part; they must e'en play the scene betwixt themselves. [Aside.]

Mill. It was some relief to think, though absent, you would love me still; but to find this, as I never could expect, I have not learn'd to bear.

Barn. I am sorry to hear you blame me in a resolution that so well becomes us both.

Mill. I have reason for what I do, but you have none.

Barn. Can we want a reason for parting, who have so many to wish we had never met?

Mill. Look on me, Barnwell. Am I deformed or old, that satiety so soon succeeds enjoyment? Nay, look again; am I not she whom yesterday you thought the fairest and the kindest of her sex; whose hand, trembling with ecstasy, you pressed and moulded thus, while, on my eyes you gazed with such delight, as if desire increased by being fed?

Barn. No more: let me repent my former follies, if possible, without remembering what they were.

Mill. Why?

Barn. Such is my frailty, that 'tis dangerous.

Mill. Where is the danger, since we are to part?

Barn. The thought of that already is too painful.

Mill. If it be painful to part, then I may hope, at least, you do not hate me.

Barn. No—No—I never said I did—Oh, my heart!

Mill. Perhaps you pity me?

Barn. I do—I do—Indeed I do.

Mill. You'll think upon me!

Barn. Doubt it not, while I can think at all.

Mill. You may judge an embrace at parting too great a favour, though it would be the last. [Barnwell draws back] A look shall then suffice—farewell—for ever.

[Exeunt Millwood and Lucy.]

Barn. If to resolve to suffer be to conquer—I have conquered—Painful victory!

Re-enter MILLWOOD and LUCY.

Mill. One thing I had forgot—I never must return to my own house again. This I thought proper to let you know, lest your mind should change, and you should seek in vain to find me there. Forgive me this second intrusion; I only came to give you this caution, and that perhaps was needless.

Barn. I hope it was; yet it is kind, and I must thank you for it.

Mill. My friend, your arm. [To Lucy] Now, I am gone for ever. [Going.]

Barn. One thing more—sure there's no danger in knowing where you go? If you think otherwise—

Mill. Alas! [Weeping.]

Lucy. We are right, I find; that's my cue. [Aside] Ah, dear sir, she's going she knows not whither; but go she must.

Barn. Humanity obliges me to wish you well; why will you thus expose yourself to needless troubles?

Lucy. Nay, there's no help for it; she must quit the town immediately, and the kingdom as soon as possible. It was no small matter, you may be sure, that could make her resolve to leave you.

Mill. No more, my friend; since he for whose dear sake alone I suffer, and am content to suffer, is kind and pities me; where'er I wander, through wilds and deserts benighted and forlorn, that thought shall give me comfort.

Barn. For my sake!—Oh tell me how, which way I am so cursed to bring such ruin on thee?

Mill. To know it will but increase your troubles.

Barn. My troubles can't be greater than they are.

Lucy. Well, well, sir, if she won't satisfy you, I will.

Barn. I am bound to you beyond expression.

Mill. Remember, sir, that I desired you not to hear it.

Barn. Begin, and ease my expectation.

Lucy. Why you must know my lady here was an only child, and her parents dying while she was young, left her and her fortune (no inconsiderable one I assure you) to the care of a gentleman who has a good estate of his own.

Mill. Ay, ay, the barbarous man is rich enough; but what are riches when compared to love!

Lucy. For awhile he performed the office of a faithful guardian, settled her in a house, hired her servants—But you have seen in what manner she has lived, so I need say no more of that.

Mill. How I shall live hereafter, heaven knows!

Lucy. All things went on as one could wish, till some time ago, his wife dying, he fell violently in love with his charge, and would fain have married her. Now the man is neither old nor ugly, but a good, personable sort of man; but I don't know how it was, she could never endure him. In short, her ill usage so provoked him, that he brought in an account of his executorship, wherein he makes her debtor to him—

Mill. A trifle in itself, but more than enough to ruin me, whom, by this unjust account, he had stripped of all before.

Lucy. Now, she having neither money nor friend, except me, who am as unfortunate as herself, he compelled her to pass his account, and give bond for the sum he demanded; but still provided handsomely for her, and continued his courtship, till being informed by his spies (truly, I suspect some in her own family) that you were entertained in her house, and staid with her all night, he came this morning, raving and storming like a madman; talks no more of marriage (so there's no hope of making up matters that way), but vows her ruin, unless she'll allow him the same favour that he supposes she granted you.

Barn. Must she be ruined, or find a refuge in another's arms?

Mill. He gave me but an hour to resolve in: that's happily spent with you—And now I go—

Barn. To be exposed to all the rigours of the various seasons; the summer's parching heat, and winter's cold; unhoused, to wander friendless through the inhospitable world, in misery and want; attended with fear and danger, and pursued by malice and revenge. Wouldst thou endure all this for me, and can I do nothing, nothing to prevent it?

Lucy. 'Tis really a pity there can be no way found out.

Barn. Oh, where are all my resolutions now?

Lucy. Now, I advised her, sir, to comply with the gentleman.

Barn. Tormenting fiend, away! I had rather perish, nay, see her perish, than have her saved by him. I will myself prevent her ruin, though with my own. A moment's patience; I'll return immediately. [Exit.]

Lucy. 'Twas well you came, or, by what I can perceive, you had lost him.

Mill. Hush! he's here.

Re-enter BARNWELL, with a Bag of Money.

Barn. What am I about to do?—Now you, who boast your reason all-sufficient, suppose yourselves in my condition, and determine for me; whether 'tis right to let her suffer for my faults, or, by this small addition to my guilt, prevent the ill effects of what is past.—Here, take this, and with it purchase your deliverance: return to your house, and live in peace and safety.

Mill. So, I may hope to see you there again?

Barn. Answer me not, but fly—lest, in the agonies of my remorse, I again take what is not mine to give, and abandon thee to want and misery.

Mill. Say but you'll come.

Barn. You are my fate—my heaven, or my hell; only leave me now—dispose of me hereafter as you please. [Exeunt Millwood and Lucy] What have I done? Were my resolutions founded on reason, and sincerely made? Why then has heaven suffered me to fall? I sought not the occasion; and, if my heart deceives me not, compassion and generosity were my motives.—But why should I attempt to reason? All is confusion, horror, and remorse. I find I am lost, cast down from all my late-erected hope, and plunged again in guilt, yet scarce know how or why—

Such undistinguish'd horrors make my brain,
Like hell, the seat of darkness and of pain.

[Exit.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—A Room in THOROWGOOD'S House.

THOROWGOOD and TRUEMAN discovered, with Account-books, sitting at a Table.

Thorow. Well, I have examined your accounts; they are not only just, as I have always found them, but regularly kept, and fairly entered. I commend your diligence. Method in business is the surest guide. Are Barnwell's accounts ready for my inspection? He does not use to be the last on those occasions.

True. Upon receiving your orders he retired, I thought in some confusion. If you please, I'll go and hasten him.

Thorow. I'm now going to the Exchange: let him know, at my return I expect to find him ready.

[Exeunt.]

Enter MARIA, with a Book. Sits and reads.

Maria. "How forcible is truth! The weakest mind, inspired with love of that, fixed and collected in itself, with indifference beholds the united force of earth and hell opposing. Such souls are raised above the sense of pain, or so supported that they regard it not. The martyr cheaply purchases his heaven; small are his sufferings, great is his reward. Not so the wretch who combats love with duty; whose mind, weakened and dissolved by the soft passion, feeble and hopeless, opposes his own desires.—What is an hour, a day, a year of pain, to a whole life of tortures such as these?"

Enter TRUEMAN.

True. Oh, Barnwell! Oh, my friend! how art thou fallen!

Maria. Ha! Barnwell! What of him? Speak, say, what of Barnwell?

True. 'Tis not to be concealed: I've news to tell of him that will afflict your generous father, yourself, and all who know him.

Maria. Defend us, heaven!

True. I cannot speak it. See there.

[Gives a Letter.]

Maria. [Reads] I know my absence will surprise my honoured master and yourself; and the more, when you shall understand, that the reason of my withdrawing is, my having embezzled part of the cash with which I was entrusted. After this, 'tis needless to inform you, that I intend never to return again. Though this might have been known by examining my accounts, yet to prevent that unnecessary trouble, and to cut off all fruitless expectations of my return, I have left this from the lost

GEORGE BARNWELL.

True. Lost indeed! Yet how he should be guilty of what he here charges himself withal, raises my wonder equal to my grief. Never had youth a higher sense of virtue. Justly he thought, and as he thought he practised; never was life more regular than his. An understanding uncommon at his years; an open, generous, manliness of temper; his manners easy, unaffected, and engaging.

Maria. This and much more you might have said with truth. He was the delight of every eye, and joy of every heart that knew him.

True. Since such he was, and was my friend, can I support his loss? See, the fairest, happiest maid this wealthy city boasts, kindly condescends to weep for thy unhappy fate, poor, ruined Barnwell!

Maria. Trueman, do you think a soul so delicate as his, so sensible of shame, can e'er submit to live a slave to vice?

True. Never, never: so well I know him, I'm sure this act of his, so contrary to his nature, must have been caused by some unavoidable necessity.

Maria. Is there no means yet to preserve him?

True. Oh, that there were! But few men recover their reputation lost, a merchant never. Nor would he, I fear, though I should find him, ever be brought to look his injured master in the face.

Maria. I fear as much, and therefore would never have my father know it.

True. That's impossible.

Maria. What's the sum?

True. 'Tis considerable. I've marked it here, to show it, with the letter, to your father, at his return.

Maria. If I should supply the money, could you so dispose of that and the account, as to conceal this unhappy mismanagement from my father?

True. Nothing more easy. But can you intend it? Will you save a helpless wretch from ruin? Oh, 'twere an act worthy such exalted virtue as Maria's! Sure heaven, in mercy to my friend, inspired the generous thought.

Maria. Doubt not but I would purchase so great a happiness at a much dearer price. But how shall he be found?

True. Trust to my diligence for that. In the mean time I'll conceal his absence from your father, or find such excuses for it, that the real cause shall never be suspected.

Maria. In attempting to save from shame one whom we hope may yet return to virtue, to heaven, and you, the only witnesses of this action, I appeal whether I do any thing unbecoming my sex and character.

True. Earth must approve the deed, and heaven, I doubt not, will reward it.

Maria. If heaven succeeds it, I am well rewarded. A virgin's fame is sullied by suspicion's lightest breath; and, therefore, as this must be a secret from my father and the world, for Barnwell's sake, for mine, let it be so to him. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—A Room in MILLWOOD'S House.

Enter LUCY and BLUNT.

Lucy. Well, what do you think of Millwood's conduct now? Her artifice in making him rob his master at first, and the various stratagems by which she has obliged him to continue that course, astonish even me, who know her so well. Being called by his master to make up his accounts, he was forced to quit his house and service, and wisely flies to Millwood for relief and entertainment.

Blunt. How did she receive him?

Lucy. As you would expect. She wondered what he meant, was astonished at his impudence, and, with an air of modesty peculiar to herself, swore so heartily that she never saw him before, that she put me out of countenance.

Blunt. That's much, indeed! But how did Barnwell behave?

Lucy. He grieved; and, at length, enraged at this barbarous treatment, was preparing to be gone; and making towards the door, showed a sum of money, which he had brought from his master's, the last he is ever likely to have from thence.

Blunt. But then, Millwood—

Lucy. Ay, she, with her usual address, returned to her old arts of lying, swearing, and dissembling; hung on his neck, wept, and swore 'twas meant in jest. The amorous youth melted into tears, threw the money into her lap, and swore he had rather die than think her false.

Blunt. Strange infatuation!

Lucy. But what ensued was stranger still. Just then, when every passion with lawless anarchy prevailed, and reason was in the raging tempest lost, the cruel, artful Millwood, prevailed upon the wretched youth to promise—what I tremble but to think on.

Blunt. I am amazed! What can it be?

Lucy. You will be more so to hear—it is to attempt the life of his nearest relation, and best benefactor.

Blunt. His uncle! whom we have often heard him speak of, as a gentleman of a large estate, and fair character, in the country where he lives.

Lucy. The same. She was no sooner possessed of the last dear purchase of his ruin, but her avarice, insatiate as the grave, demanded this horrid sacrifice. Barnwell's near relation, whose blood must seal the dreadful secret, and prevent the terrors of her guilty fears.

Blunt. 'Tis time the world were rid of such a monster. But there is something so horrid in murder, that all other crimes seem nothing, when compared to that; I would not be involved in the guilt of it for all the world!

Lucy. Nor I, heaven knows. Therefore let us clear ourselves, by doing all that's in our power to prevent it. I have just thought of a way that to me seems probable. Will you join with me to detect this cursed design?

Blunt. With all my heart. He who knows of a murder intended to be committed, and does not discover it, in the eye of the law and reason, is a murderer.

Lucy. Let us lose no time. I'll acquaint you with the particulars as we go. [Exit.]

SCENE III.—A Walk some distance from a Country-seat.

Enter BARNWELL.

Barn. A dismal gloom obscures the face of the day. Either the sun has slipped behind a cloud, or journeys down the west of heaven with more than common speed, to avoid the sight of what I am doomed to act. Since I set forth on this accursed design, where'er I tread, methinks the solid earth trembles beneath my feet. Murder my uncle! my father's only brother, and since his death, has been to me a father; that took me up an infant and an orphan, reared me with tenderest care, and still indulged me with most paternal fondness! Yet here I stand his destined murderer.—I stiffen with horror at my own impiety—'Tis yet unperformed—What if I quit my bloody purpose and fly the place? [Going, then stops]—But whither, oh, whither shall I fly? My Master's once friendly doors are ever shut against me; and without money, Millwood will never see me more; and she has got such firm possession of my heart, and governs there with such despotic sway, that life is not to be endured without her! Ay, there's the cause of all my sin and sorrow: 'tis more than love; it is the fever of the soul, and madness of desire. In vain does nature, reason, conscience, all oppose it; the impetuous passion bears down all before it, and drives me on to lust, to theft, and murder. Oh, conscience, feeble guide to virtue, thou only showest us when we go astray, but wantest power to stop us in our course!—Ha! in yonder shady walk I see my uncle—He's alone—Now for my disguise. [Plucks out a Vizard]—This is his hour of private meditation. Thus daily he prepares his soul for heaven, while I—But what have I to do with heaven?—Ha! no struggles, conscience—

Hence, hence remorse, and ev'ry thought that's good;

The storm that lust began, must end in blood.

[Puts on the Vizard, draws a Pistol, and exit.]

SCENE IV.—A close Walk in a Wood.

Enter UNCLE.

Uncle. If I were superstitious, I should fear some danger lurked unseen, or death were nigh. A heavy melancholy clouds my spirits. My imagination is filled with ghastly forms of dreary graves, and bodies changed by death; when the pale, lengthen'd visage attracts each weeping eye, and fills the musing soul at once with grief and horror, pity and aversion. I will indulge the thought. The wise man prepares himself for death by making it familiar to his mind. When strong reflections hold the mirror near, and the living in the dead behold their future self, how does each inordinate passion and desire cease, or sicken at the view! The mind scarce moves! the blood, curdling and chilled, creeps slowly through the veins; fixed, still, and motionless we stand, so like the solemn objects of our thoughts, we are almost at present what we must be hereafter; till curiosity awake the soul, and sets it on inquiry.

Enter GEORGE BARNWELL, at a Distance.

Oh, death! thou strange, mysterious power, seen every day, yet never understood but by the incommunicative dead, what art thou? The extensive mind of man, that with a thought circles the earth's vast globe, sinks to the centre, or ascends above the stars; that worlds exotic finds, or thinks it finds, thy thick clouds attempts to pass in vain; lost and bewildered in the horrid gloom, defeated, she returns more doubtful than before, of nothing certain but of labour lost.

[During this Speech, Barnwell sometimes presents the Pistol, and draws it back again.]

Barn. Oh, 'tis impossible!

[Throws down the Pistol. Uncle starts, and attempts to draw his Sword.]

Uncle. A man so near me! armed and masked—

Barn. Nay, then there's no retreat.

[Plucks a Poignard from his Breast, and stabs him.]

Uncle. Oh, I am slain! All gracious heaven, regard the prayer of thy dying servant; bless, with the choicest blessings, my dearest nephew; forgive my murderer; and take my fleeting soul to endless mercy!

[Barnwell throws off his Mask, runs to him, and kneeling by him, raises him.]

Barn. Expiring saint! Oh, murdered, martyred uncle! lift up your dying eyes, and view your nephew in your murderer.—Oh, do not look so tenderly upon me—Let indignation lighten from your eyes, and blast me ere you die.—By heaven, he weeps, in pity of my woes.—Tears, tears for blood.—The murdered, in the agonies of death, weeps for his murderer—Oh, speak your pious purpose; pronounce your pardon then, and take me with you—He would, but cannot.—Oh, why with such fond affection do you press my murdering hand?—[Uncle sighs, and dies] Life, that hovered on his lips but till he had sealed my pardon, in that sigh expired! He's gone for ever—and oh! I follow—[Swoons away upon the dead Body] Do I still breathe, and taint with my infectious breath the wholesome air? Let heaven from its high throne, in justice or in mercy, now look down on that dear, murdered saint, and me the murderer, and if his vengeance spares, let pity strike, and end my wretched being.—Murder the worst of crimes, and parricide the worst of murders, and this the worst of parricides.

Oh may it ever stand alone accurst,

The last of murders, as it is the worst. [Exit.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—A Room in THOROWGOOD'S House.

Enter MARIA, meeting TRUEMAN.

Maria. What news of Barnwell?

True. None; I have sought him with the greatest diligence, but all in vain.

Maria. Does my father yet suspect the cause of his absence?

True. All appeared so just and fair to him, it is not possible he ever should. But his absence will no longer be concealed. Your father is wise; and though he seems to hearken to the friendly excuses I would make for Barnwell, yet I am afraid he regards 'em only as such, without suffering them to influence his judgment.

Enter THOROWGOOD and LUCY.

Thorow. This woman here has given me a sad, and bating some circumstances, too probable an account of Barnwell's defection.

Lucy. I am sorry, sir, that my frank confession of my former unhappy course of life should cause you to suspect my truth on this occasion.

Thorow. It is not that; your confession has in it all the appearance of truth. Among many other particulars, she informs me that Barnwell has been influenced to break his trust, and wrong me, at several times, of considerable sums of money. Now, as I know this to be false, I would fain doubt the whole of her relation, too dreadful to be willingly believed.

Maria. Sir, your pardon; I find myself on a sudden so indisposed that I must retire. Poor, ruined Barnwell! Wretched, lost Maria?

[Aside. Exit.]

Thorow. How am I distressed on every side! Pity for that unhappy youth, fear for the life of a much valued friend—and then my child—the only joy and hope of my declining life! Her melancholy increases hourly, and gives me painful apprehensions of her loss—Oh, Trueman, this person informs me that your friend, at the instigation of an impious woman, is gone to rob and murder his venerable uncle.

True. Oh, execrable deed! I'm blasted with horror at the thought!

Lucy. This delay may ruin all.

Thorow. What to do or think I know not. That he ever wronged me I know is false; the rest may be so too; there's all my hope.

True. Trust not to that; rather suppose all true, than lose a moment's time. Even now the horrid deed may be doing—dreadful imagination!—or it may be done, and we be vainly debating on the means to prevent what is already past.

Thorow. This earnestness convinces me that he knows more than he has yet discovered. What, ho! without there, who waits?

Enter a Servant.

Order the groom to saddle the swiftest horse, and prepare to set out with speed; an affair of life and death demands his diligence. [Exit Servant] For you, whose behaviour on this occasion I have no time to commend as it deserves, I must engage your further assistance. Return, and observe this Millwood till I come. I have your directions, and will follow you as soon as possible [Exit Lucy]. Trueman, you I am sure will not be idle on this occasion. [Exit.]

True. He only who is a friend, can judge of my distress. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—MILLWOOD'S House.

Enter MILLWOOD.

Mill. I wish I knew the event of his design. The attempt without success would ruin him. —Well, what have I to apprehend from that? I fear too much. The mischief being only intended, his friends, through pity of his youth, turn all their rage on me. I should have thought of that before. Suppose the deed done; then and then only I shall be secure—Or what if he returns without attempting it at all—

Enter BARNWELL, bloody.

But he is here, and I have done him wrong. His bloody hands show he has done the deed, but show he wants the prudence to conceal it.

Barn. Where shall I hide me? Whither shall I fly to avoid the swift unerring hand of justice?

Mill. Dismiss your fears; though thousands had pursued you to the door, yet being entered here, you are as safe as innocence. I have a cavern by art so cunningly contrived, that the piercing eyes of jealousy and revenge may search in vain, nor find the entrance to the safe retreat. There will I hide you, if any danger's near.

Barn. Oh, hide me—from myself, if it be possible; for while I bear my conscience in my bosom, though I were hid where man's eye never saw, nor light ere dawned, 'twere all in vain. For, oh, that innate, that impartial judge, will try, convict, and sentence me for murder, and execute me with never-ending torments. Behold these hands all crimsoned o'er with my dear uncle's blood. Here's a sight to make a statue start with horror, or turn a living man into a statue!

Mill. Ridiculous! Then it seems you are afraid of your own shadow, or what is less than a shadow, your conscience.

Barn. Though to man unknown I did the accursed act, what can hide me from heaven's all-seeing eye?

Mill. No more of this stuff! What advantage have you made by his death: or what advantage may yet be made of it? Did you secure the keys of his treasure, which no doubt were about him? What gold, what jewels, or what else of value have you brought me?

Barn. Think you I added sacrilege to murder! Oh, had you seen him as his life flowed from him in a crimson flood, and heard him praying for me by the double name of nephew and of murderer; (alas, alas, he knew not then that his nephew was his murderer!) how would you have wished, as I did, though you had a thousand years of life to come, to have given them all to have lengthened his one hour. But being dead, I fled the sight of what my hands had done; nor could I, to have gained the empire of the world, have violated by theft his sacred corpse.

Mill. Whining, preposterous, canting villain!

to murder your uncle, rob him of life, nature's first, last, dear prerogative, after which there's no injury, then fear to take what he no longer wanted, and bring to me your penury and guilt. Do you think I'll hazard my reputation, nay my life, to entertain you?

Barn. Oh, Millwood!—this from thee?—But I have done—If you hate me, if you wish me dead, then are you happy; for, oh, 'tis sure my grief will quickly end me.

Mill. In this madness he will discover all, and involve me in his ruin. We are on a precipice, from whence there's no retreat for both. Then to preserve myself—[Pauses].—There is no other way. 'Tis dreadful; but reflection comes too late when danger's pressing, and there's no room for choice. It must be done. [Aside. Rings a Bell.]

Enter a Servant.

Fetch me an officer, and seize this villain. He has confess'd himself a murderer. Should I let him escape, I might justly be thought as bad as he. [Exit Servant.]

Barn. Oh, Millwood! sure you do not, you cannot mean it. Stop the messenger; upon my knees, I beg you'd call him back. 'Tis fit I die, indeed, but not by you. I will this instant throw myself into the hands of justice, indeed I will; for death is all I wish. But thy ingratitude so tears my wounded soul, 'tis worse ten thousand times than death with torture.

Mill. Call it what you will; I am willing to live, and live secure, which nothing but your death can warrant.

Barn. If there be a pitch of wickedness that sets the author beyond the reach of vengeance, you must be secure. But what remains for me, but a dismal dungeon, hard galling fetters, an awful trial, and an ignominious death, justly to fall, unpitied and abhorred? This I could bear, nay wish not to avoid, had it but come from any hand but thine.

Enter BLUNT, Officer, and Attendants.

Mill. Heaven defend me! Conceal a murderer! Here, sir, take this youth into your custody, I accuse him of murder, and will appear to make good my charge.

[They seize him.]

Barn. To whom, of what, or how shall I complain? I'll not accuse her. The hand of heaven is in it, and this the punishment of lust and parricide.

Be warn'd, ye youths, who see my sad despair;

Avoid lewd women, false as they are fair.

By my example learn to shun my fate,

(How wretched is the man who's wise too late!)

Ere innocence, and fame, and life be lost,

Here purchase wisdom cheaply at my cost.

[Exeunt Barnwell, Officer, and Attendants.]

Mill. Where's Lucy? Why is she absent at such a time?

Blunt. Would I had been so too! Lucy will soon be here; and I hope to thy confusion, thou devil!

Mill. Insolent! This to me!

Blunt. The worst that we know of the devil is, that he first seduces to sin, and then betrays to punishment. [Exit Blunt.]

Mill. They disapprove of my conduct then. My ruin is resolved. I see my danger, but scorn both it and them. I was not born to fall by such weak instruments. [Going.]

Enter THOROWGOOD.

Thorow. Where is the scandal of her own sex, and curse of ours?

Mill. What means this insolence? Whom do you seek for?

Thorow. Millwood!—

Mill. Well, you have found her then, I am Millwood!

Thorow. Then you are the most impious wretch that e'er the sun beheld!

Mill. From your appearance I should have expected wisdom and moderation: but your manners belie your aspect. What is your business here? I know you not.

Thorow. Hereafter you may know me better. I am Barnwell's master.

Mill. Then you are master to a villain; which, I think, is not much to your credit.

Thorow. Had he been as much above thy arts, as my credit is superior to thy malice, I need not have blushed to own him.

Mill. My arts! I don't understand you, sir. If he has done amiss, what's that to me? Was he my servant, or yours? You should have taught him better.

Thorow. Why should I wonder to find such uncommon impudence in one arrived to such a height of wickedness? Know, sorceress, I'm not ignorant of any of the arts by which you first deceived the unwary youth. I know how, step by step, you've led him on, reluctant and unwilling, from crime to crime, to this last horrid act, which you contrived, and by your cursed wiles even forced him to commit.

Mill. Ha! Lucy has got the advantage, and accused me first. Unless I can turn the accusation, and fix it upon her and Blunt, I am lost. [Aside.]

Thorow. Had I known your cruel design sooner, it had been prevented. To see you punished, as the law directs, is all that now remains. Poor satisfaction! For he, innocent as he is, compared to you, must suffer too.

Mill. I find, sir, we are both unhappy in our servants. I was surprised at such ill treatment without cause, from a gentleman of your appearance, and therefore too hastily returned it, for which I ask your pardon. I now perceive you have been so far imposed on, as to think me engaged in a former correspondence with your servant, and some way or other accessory to his undoing.

Thorow. I charge you as the cause, the sole cause of all his guilt, and all his suffering, of all he now endures, and must endure, till a violent and shameful death shall put a dreadful period to his life and miseries together.

Mill. 'Tis very strange! But who's secure from scandal and detraction? So far from contributing to his ruin, I never spoke to him till since this fatal accident, which I lament as much as you. 'Tis true I have a servant, on whose account he hath of late frequented my house. If she has abused my good opinion of her, am I to blame? Has not Barnwell done the same by you?

Thorow. I hear you. Pray go on.

Mill. I have been informed he had a violent passion for her, and she for him; but till now I always thought it innocent. I know her poor, and given to expensive pleasures. Now, who can tell but she may have influenced the amorous youth to commit this murder, to supply her extravagancies.—It must be so. I now recollect a thousand circumstances that confirm it. I'll have her, and a man-servant whom I suspect as an accomplice, secured immediately. [Offers to go.]

Thorow. Madam, you pass not this way. I see your design, but shall protect them from your malice.

Mill. I hope you will not use your influence, and the credit of your name, to screen such guilty wretches. Consider, sir, the wickedness of persuading a thoughtless youth to such a crime!

Thorow. I do—and of betraying him when it was done.

Mill. That which you call betraying him, may convince you of my innocence. She who loves him, though she contrived the murder, would never have delivered him into the hands of justice, as I, struck with horror at his crimes, have done.

Thorow. How should an unexperienced youth escape her snares? Even I, that with just prejudice came prepared, had by her artful story been deceived, but that my strong conviction of her guilt makes even a doubt impossible. [Aside.] Those whom subtilly you would accuse, you know are your accusers; and, which proves unanswerably their innocence and your guilt, they accused you before the deed was done, and did all that was in their power to prevent it.

Mill. Sir, you are very hard to be convinced; but I have a proof, which, when produced, will silence all objection. [Exit Millwood.]

Enter LUCY, TRUAMAN, BLUNT, Officers, etc.

Lucy. Gentlemen, pray place yourselves, some on one side of that door, and some on the other; watch her entrance, and act as your prudence shall direct you. This way; [To Thorowgood] and note her behaviour; I have observed her; she's driven to the last extremity, and is forming some desperate resolution. I guess at her design.

Re-enter MILLWOOD with a Pistol, TRUAMAN secures her.

True. Here thy power of doing mischief ends, deceitful, cruel, bloody woman!

Mill. Fool, hypocrite, villain, man! Thou canst not call me that.

True. To call thee woman were to wrong thy sex, thou devil!

Mill. That imaginary being is an emblem of thy cursed sex collected. A mirror, wherein each particular man may see his own likeness, and that of all mankind.

Thorow. Think not by aggravating the faults of others, to extenuate thy own, of which the abuse of such uncommon perfections of mind and body is not the least.

Mill. If such I had, well may I curse your barbarous sex, who robbed me of 'em ere I knew their worth; then left me, too late, to count their value by their loss.—Another, and another spoiler came, and all my gain was poverty and reproach. My soul disdained, and yet disdains, dependence and contempt. Riches, no matter by what means obtained, I saw secured the worst of men from both; I found it therefore necessary to be rich, and to that end I summoned all my arts. You call 'em wicked; be it so; they were such as my conversation with your sex had furnished me withal.

Thorow. Sure none but the worst of men conversed with thee!

Mill. Men of all degrees, and all professions, I have known, yet found no difference, but in their several capacities; all were alike, wicked to the utmost of their power. What are your laws of which you make your boast, but the fool's wisdom, and the coward's valour, the instrument and screen of all your villanies? By them you punish in others what you act yourselves, or would have acted, had you been in their circumstances. The judge, who condemns the poor man for being a thief, had been a thief himself had he been poor.—Thus you go on deceiving and deceived, harassing, plaguing, and destroying one another. But women are your universal prey:

Women, by whom you are, the source of joy,

With cruel arts you labour to destroy:
A thousand ways our ruin you pursue,
Yet blame in us those arts first taught by you.

Oh, may from hence each violated maid,
By flattering, faithless, barb'rous man betray'd,

When robb'd of innocence and virgin fame,
From your destruction raise a nobler name,
To avenge their sex' wrongs devote their mind,
And future Millwood's prove to plague mankind.
[Exeunt.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—A Dungeon, a Table, and a Lamp.
BARNWELL reading.

Enter THOROWGOOD, at a Distance.

Thorow. There see the bitter fruits of passion's detested reign, and sensual appetite indulged: severe reflections, penitence, and tears.

Barn. My honoured, injured master, whose goodness has covered me a thousand times with shame, forgive this last unwilling disrespect. Indeed I saw you not.

Thorow. 'Tis well; I hope you are better employed in viewing of yourself; your journey's long, your time for preparation almost spent. I sent a reverend divine to teach you to improve it, and should be glad to hear of his success.

Barn. The word of truth, which he recommended for my constant companion in this my sad retirement, has at length removed the doubts I laboured under. From thence I have learned the infinite extent of heavenly mercy. How shall I describe my present state of mind? I hope in doubt, and trembling I rejoice; I feel my grief increase, even as my fears give way. Joy and gratitude now supply more tears than the horror and anguish of despair before.

Thorow. These are the genuine signs of true repentance; the only preparatory, the certain way to everlasting peace.

Barn. What do I owe for all your generous kindness? But though I cannot, heaven can and will reward you.

Thorow. To see thee thus, is joy too great for words. Farewell.—Heaven strengthen thee!—Farewell.

Barn. Oh, sir, there's something I would say, if my sad swelling heart would give me leave.

Thorow. Give it vent awhile, and try.

Barn. I had a friend—'tis true I am unworthy—yet methinks your generous example might persuade. Could I not see him once, before I go from whence there's no return?

Thorow. He's coming, and as much thy friend as ever. I will not anticipate his sorrow; too soon he'll see the sad effects of this contagious ruin.—This torrent of domestic misery bears too hard upon me. I must retire, to indulge a weakness I find impossible to overcome. [Aside] Much loved—and much lamented youth!—Farewell.—Heaven strengthen thee!—Eternally farewell.

Barn. The best of masters, and of men—Farewell. While I live let me not want your prayers.

Thorow. Thou shalt not. Thy peace being made with heaven, death is already vanquished. Bear a little longer the pains that attend this transitory life, and cease from pain to rever.

[Exit.]

Barn. Perhaps I shall. I find a power within, that bears my soul above the fears of death, and, spite of conscious shame and guilt, gives me a taste of pleasure more than mortal.

Enter TRUAMAN.

Barn. Trueman!—My friend, whom I so wished to see; yet, now he's here, I dare not look upon him. [Weeps.]

True. Oh, Barnwell, Barnwell!

Barn. Mercy! mercy! gracious heaven! For death, but not for this was I prepared.

True. What have I suffered since I saw thee last!—What pain has absence given me!—But oh, to see thee thus!—

Barn. I know it is dreadful! I feel the anguish of thy generous soul:—But I was born to murder all who love me. [Both weep.]

True. I come not to reproach you; I thought to bring you comfort. Oh, had you trusted me when first the fair seducer tempted you, all might have been prevented.

Barn. Alas, thou knowest not what a wretch I've been. Breach of friendship was my first and least offence. So far was I lost to goodness, so devoted to the author of my ruin, that had she insisted on my murdering thee—I think—I should have done it.

True. Pr'ythee aggravate thy faults no more.

Barn. I think I should! Thus good and generous as you are, I should have murdered you!

True. We have not yet embraced, and may be interrupted. Come to my arms.

Barn. Never, never will I taste such joys on earth; never will I sooth my just remorse. Are those honest arms and faithful bosom fit to embrace and support a murderer? These iron fetters only shall clasp, and flinty pavement bear me; [Throwing himself on the Ground] even these are too good for such a bloody monster.

True. Shall fortune sever those whom friendship joined? Thy miseries cannot lay thee so low, but love will find thee. Here will we offer to stern calamity; this place the altar, and ourselves the sacrifice. Our mutual groans shall echo to each other through the dreary vault; our sighs shall number the moments as they pass; and mingling tears communicate such anguish, as words were never made to express.

Barn. Then be it so. [Rising] Since you propose an intercourse of woe, pour all your griefs into my breast, and in exchange take mine. [Embracing] Where's now the anguish that you promised? Oh, take, take some of the joy that overflows my breast!

True. I do, I do. Almighty Power! how hast thou made us capable to bear at once the extremes of pleasure and of pain!

Enter Keeper.

Keep. Sir.

True. I come.

[Exit Keeper.

Barn. Must you leave me? Death would soon have parted us for ever.

True. Oh, my Barnwell, there's yet another task behind. Again your heart must bleed for others woes.

Barn. To meet and part with you, I thought was all I had to do on earth. What is there more for me to do or suffer?

True. I dread to tell thee, yet it must be known!—Maria—

Barn. Our master's fair and virtuous daughter?

True. The same.

Barn. No misfortune, I hope, has reached that maid! Preserve her, heaven, from every ill, to show mankind that goodness is your care!

True. Thy, thy misfortunes, my unhappy friend, have reached her ear. Whatever you and I have felt, and more, if more be possible, she feels for you.

Barn. This is indeed the bitterness of death. [Aside.

True. You must remember (for we all observed it), for some time past, a heavy melancholy weighed her down. Disconsolate she seemed, and pined and languished from a cause unknown; till hearing of your dreadful fate, the long stifled flame blazed out, and in the transport of her grief discovered her own lost state, while she lamented yours.

Barn. [Weeping] Why did not you let me die, and never know it?

True. It was impossible. She makes no secret of her passion for you; she is determined to see you ere you die, and waits for me to introduce her. [Exit.

Barn. Vain, busy thoughts, be still! What avails it to think on what I might have been? I am now what I've made myself.

Re-enter TRUEMAN, with MARIA.

True. Madam, reluctant I lead you to this dismal scene. This is the seat of misery and guilt. Here awful justice reserves her public victims. This is the entrance to a shameful death.

Maria. To this sad place then, no improper guest, the abandoned and lost Maria brings despair, and sees the subject and the cause of all this world of woe. Silent and motionless he stands, as if his soul had quitted her abode, and the lifeless form alone was left behind.

Barn. I groan, but murmur not. Just heaven! I am your own; do with me what you please.

Maria. Why are your streaming eyes still fix'd below, as though thou'dst give the greedy earth thy sorrows, and rob me of my due? Were happiness within your power, you should bestow it where you pleased; but in your misery I must and will partake.

Barn. Oh, say not so; but fly, abhor, and leave me to my fate. Consider what you are. So shall I quickly be to you—as though I had never been.

Maria. When I forget you, I must be so indeed. Reason, choice, virtue, all forbid it. Let women, like Millwood, if there are more such women, smile in prosperity, and in adversity forsake. Be it the pride of virtue to repair, or to partake, the ruin such have made.

True. Lovely, ill-fated maid!

Maria. Yes, fruitless is my love, and unavailing all my sighs and tears. Can they save thee from approaching death?—from such a death?—Oh, sorrow insupportable!

Barn. Preserve her, heaven, and restore her peace, nor let her death be added to my crimes! —[Bell tolls]—I'm summoned to my fate.

Re-enter Keeper.

Keep. Sir, the officers attend you. Millwood is already summoned.

Barn. Tell 'em I'm ready. [Exit Keeper] And now, my friend, farewell. [Embracing] Support and comfort, the best you can, this mourning fair.—No more—Forget not to pray for me.—[Turning to Maria]—Would you, bright excellence, permit me the honour of a chaste embrace, the last happiness this world could give were mine.—[She inclines towards him; they embrace] Exalted goodness! Oh, turn your eyes from earth and me to heaven, where virtue like yours is ever heard. Pray for the peace of my departing soul! Early my race of wickedness began, and soon I reached the summit. Thus justice, in compassion to mankind, cuts off a wretch like me; by one such example to secure thousands from future ruin.

If any youth, like you, in future times
Shall mourn my fate, though he abhors my crimes;

Or tender maid, like you, my tale shall hear,
And to my sorrows give a pitying tear;
To each such melting eye and throbbing heart,
Would gracious heaven this benefit impart:
Never to know my guilt, nor feel my pain,
Then must you own you ought not to
complain,

Since you nor weep, nor I shall die in vain. } [Exit Barnwell.

True. In vain

With bleeding hearts, and weeping eyes, we show

A humane, gen'rous sense of others woe,
Unless we mark what drew their ruin on,
And, by avoiding that, prevent our own.

[The Curtain descends to slow Music.

MASSINGER

THIS excellent poet was son to Mr. Philip Massinger, a gentleman, who had some employment under the Earl of Pembroke, in whose service he died, after having spent several happy years in his family. Our author was born at Salisbury, in queen Elizabeth's reign, anno 1584, and at the age of 18, was entered a fellow-commoner of Alban Hall, in Oxford; in which station he remained three or four years, in order to complete his education, yet, though he was encouraged in the pursuit of his studies by his father's patron, the Earl of Pembroke, the natural bent of his genius lead him much more to poetry and polite literature, than to the dryer and more abstruse studies of logic and philosophy; being impatient for an opportunity of moving in a more public sphere of action, and improving his poetical fancy and his knowledge of the belles lettres, by conversation with the world, and an intercourse with men of wit and genius; he quitted the university without taking any degree, and came to London, where, applying himself to writing for the stage, he presently rose into high reputation; his plays meeting with universal approbation, both for the purity of their style, and the ingenuity and oeconomy of their plots. "Those who are unacquainted with Massinger's writings," says the Biographia Dramatica, "will, perhaps be surprised to find us placing him in an equal rank with Beaumont and Fletcher, and the immortal Ben; but we flatter ourselves that, upon a perusal of his plays, their astonishment will cease, that they will acquiesce with our opinion, and think themselves obliged to us, for pointing out so vast a treasury of entertainment and delight." Massinger has certainly equal invention, equal ingenuity, in the conduct of his plots, and an equal knowledge of character and nature, with Beaumont and Fletcher; and if it should be objected, that he has less of the vis comica, it will surely be allowed, that that deficiency is amply made amends for by that purity and decorum which he has preserved, and a rejection of that looseness and obscenity which runs through most of their comedies. As to Ben Jonson, we shall readily allow that he excels this author with respect to the studied accuracy and classical correctness of his style; yet Massinger has so greatly the superiority over him in fire, pathos, and the fancy and management of his plots, that we cannot help thinking the balance stands pretty even between them. Though his pieces bespeak him a man of the first-rate abilities, and well qualified both as to learning and a most perfect acquaintance with the methods of dramatic writing, yet he was at the same time a person of the most consummate modesty, which rendered him extremely beloved by all his contemporary poets, few of whom but esteemed it as an honour to join with him in the composition of their works. He died in 1659, some say 69.

THE DUKE OF MILAN.

ACTED at Black Friars, 1635. The plot is taken partly from Guicciardini, book 8, and partly from Josephus's History of the Jews, book 15, ch. 4, where will be found the story of Herod's leaving orders with his uncle Joseph to put his beloved wife Mariamne to death; from which the instructions given by Sforza to his favourite Francisco, for the murder of the Duchess Marcelia, his wife, seem evidently borrowed. This piece was altered, and produced at Covent Garden, by Mr. Cumberland, in 1799, but the additions made to it, from Fenton's Mariamne, rather injured than improved the play, and it was acted only two or three times. In its present state it was reproduced at Drury Lane, March 9, 1816; and from its reception promises to be a long and lasting favourite. Massinger seems to have been buried in obscurity, and forgotten among the number of writers of the same period, whose names were not worth calling forth from the cavern of oblivion; but when we consider, how long many of those pieces, even of the immortal Shakespeare himself, which are now the greatest ornament of the stage, lay neglected, although they wanted nothing but a judicious pruning of some few luxuriances, some little straggling branches, which overhung the fairer flowers, and hid some of the choicest fruits, it is the less to be wondered at, that this author who though second, stands no more than second to him, should share for a while the same destiny. Thus has this precious gem been once more presented to an admiring audience, the modern taste demanding a different dress to that of former years; and the few judicious alterations which have taken place in it, have fitted it to shine in all its lustre.

SCENE.—For the first and second Acts, in MILAN; during part of the third, in the Imperial Camp near PAVIA; the rest of the Play, in MILAN and its Neighbourhood.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—An outer Room in the Castle.

Enter GRACCHO, JULIO, and GIOVANNI, with Flagons.

Grac. TAKE every man his flagon; give the oath

To all you meet; I am this day the state drunkard,
I am sure against my will; and if you find
A man at ten that's sober, he's a traitor,
And, in my name, arrest him.

Julio. Very good, sir;
But say he be a sexton?

Grac. If the bells
Ring out of tune, as if the streets were burning,
And he cry, "Tis rare music!" bid him
sleep;

Tis a sign he has ta'en his liquor: and if you
meet

An officer preaching of sobriety,
Unless he read it in Geneva spirit,
Lay him by the heels.

Julio. But think you 'tis a fault
To be found sober?

Grac. It is capital treason;
Or, if you mitigate it, let such pay
Forty crowns to the poor; but give a pension
To all the magistrates you find singing catches,
Or their wives dancing; for the courtiers
reeling,

And the duke himself, I dare not say dis-
temper'd,

But kind, and in his tottering chair carousing,
They do the country service.

And so, dear friends, co-partners in my travails,
Drink hard; and let the health run through
the city,

Until it reel again, and with me cry,
"Long live the dutchess!"

Enter TIBERIO and STEPHANO.

Julio. Here are two lords! what think you?
Shall we give the oath to them?

Grac. Fie! no; I know them:

You need not swear them; your lord, by his patent,
Stands bound to take his rouse. Long live the dutchess!

[Exeunt Graccho, Julio, and Giovanni.]

Steph. The cause of this? but yesterday the court

Wore the sad livery of distrust and fear;
No smile, not in a buffoon, to be seen,
Or common jester: the great duke himself
Had sorrow in his face; which, waited on
By his mother, sister, and his fairest dutchess,
Dispersed a silent mourning through all Milan;
As if some great blow had been given the state,
Or were at least expected.

Tib. Stephano,
I know as you are noble, you are honest,
And capable of secrets of more weight
Than now I shall deliver. If that Sforza,
The present duke (though his whole life hath been

But one continual pilgrimage through dangers,
Affrights, and horrors, which his fortune, guided

By his strong judgment, still hath overcome),
Appears now shaken, it deserves no wonder:
All that his youth hath labour'd for, the harvest
Sown by his industry ready to be reap'd too,
Being now at stake; and all his hopes confirm'd

Or lost for ever.

Steph. I know no such hazard:
His guards are strong and sure, and though war rages

In most parts of our western world, there is No enemy near us.

Tib. Dangers that we see
To threaten ruin, are with ease prevented;
But those strike deadly that come unexpected.
The wars so long continued between
The emperor Charles, and Francis, the French king,

Have interest'd, in either's cause, the most
Of the Italian princes; among which, Sforza,
As one of greatest power, was sought by both;
But with assurance, having one his friend,
The other lived his enemy.

Steph. 'Tis true;
And 'twas a doubtful choice.

Tib. But he, well knowing
And hating too, it seems, the Spanish pride,
Lent his assistance to the king of France;
Which hath so far incens'd the emperor,
That all his hopes and honours are embark'd
With his great patron's fortune.

Steph. Which stands fair,
For aught I yet can hear.

Tib. But should it change,
The duke's undone. They have drawn to the field

Two royal armies, full of fiery youth,
Of equal spirit to dare, and power to do;
So near intrench'd, that 'tis beyond all hope
Of human counsel they e'er can be severed,
Until it be determin'd by the sword
Who hath the better cause; for the success
Concludes the victor innocent, and the vanquish'd

Most miserably guilty.

Steph. But why, then,
In such a time, when every knee should bend
For the success and safety of his person,

Are these loud triumphs? In my weak opinion,

They are unseasonable.

Tib. I judge so too;
But only in the cause to be excus'd.

It is the dutchess' birth-day, once a year
Solemniz'd with all pomp and ceremony;
In which the duke is not his own, but hers:
Nay, every day, indeed, he is her creature;
For never man so doted.

Steph. She knows it,
And how to prize it.

Tib. She bears herself with such a majesty,
That Sforza's mother, that would lose no part
Of what was once her own, nor his fair sister,
Will brook it well.

Come, let us to the court;
We there shall see all bravery and cost
That art can boast of.

Steph. I'll bear you company. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—Another Room in the same.

Enter FRANCISCO, ISABELLA, and MARIANA.

Mari. I will not go; I scorn to be a spot
In her proud train.

Isa. Shall I, that am his mother,
Be so indulgent as to wait on her
That owes me duty?

Fran. 'Tis done to the duke,
And not to her; and, my sweet wife, remember,

And, madam, if you please, receive my counsel,
As Sforza is your son, you may command him;

And, as a sister, you may challenge from him

A brother's love and favour: but this granted,
Consider he's the prince, and you his subjects,
And not to question or contend with her
Whom he is pleas'd to honour. Private men
Prefer their wives; and shall he, being a prince,
And blest with one that is the paradise
Of sweetness, and of beauty,
Not use her like herself?

Isa. You are ever forward
To sing her praises.

Mari. Others are as fair;
I am sure as noble.

Fran. I detract from none
In giving her what's due. Were she deform'd,
Yet, being the dutchess, I stand bound to serve her;

But as she is, to admire her. Never wife
Met with a purer heat her husband's fervour;
A happy pair, one in the other blest!

She confident in herself he's wholly hers,
And cannot seek for change; and he secure
That 'tis not in the power of man to tempt her.

And therefore to contest with her, that is
The stronger and the better part of him,
Is more than folly: you know him of a nature
Not to be play'd with; and, should you forget
To obey him as your prince, he'll not remember

The duty that he owes you.

Mari. I shall do
What may become the sister of a prince;
But will not stoop beneath it.

Fran. Yet, be wise;
Soar not too high, to fall; but stoop, to rise.
[Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—A State Room in the same. A magnificent Banquet.

Flourish. Enter TIBERIO, STEPHANO, FRANCISCO, LUDOVICO SFORZA, MARCELIA, ISABELLA, MARIANA, and Attendants.

Sfor. You are the mistress of the feast; sit here,

O my soul's comfort!
Let me glory in
My happiness, and mighty kings look pale
With envy, while I triumph in mine own.
O mother, look on her! sister, admire her!
For sure this present age yields not a woman
Worthy to be her second.

Fran. Your excellence,
Though I confess you give her but her own,
Forces her modesty to the defence
Of a sweet blush.

Sfor. It need not, my Marc'elia;
When most I strive to praise thee, I appear
A poor detractor: for thou art, indeed,
So absolute in body and in mind
That, but to speak the least part to the height,
Would ask an angel's tongue, and yet then end
In silent admiration!

Isa. You still court her
As if she were a mistress, not your wife.

Sfor. A mistress, mother! she is more to me,
And every day deserves more to be sued to.

Marc. My worthiest lord!
My pride, my glory, in a word, my all!
Bear witness, heaven, that I esteem myself
In nothing worthy of the meanest praise
You can bestow, unless it be in this,
That in my heart I love you, and desire,
When you are sated with all earthly glories,
And age and honours make you fit for heaven,
That one grave may receive us.

Sfor. 'Tis believ'd—Believ'd, my blest one.

Mari. How she winds herself
Into his soul! [Aside.]

Sfor. Sit all. Let others feed
On those gross cates, while Sforza banquets with
Immortal viands ta'en in at his eyes.
I could live ever thus.

Enter a Courier.

From whence?

Cour. From Pavia, my dread lord.

Sfor. Speak, is all lost?

Cour. [Delivers a Letter] The letter will inform you. [Exit.]

Fran. How his hand shakes,
As he receives it! [Aside.]

Mari. This is some allay
To his hot passion. [Aside.]

Sfor. Though it bring death, I'll read it.
[Reads.]

May it please your excellence to understand, that the very hour I wrote this, I heard a bold defiance delivered by a herald from the emperor, which was cheerfully received by the king of France. The battles being ready to join, and the van guard committed to my charge, enforces me to end abruptly. Your highness's humble servant. GASPERO.

Ready to join!—By this, then, I am nothing.
Or my estate secure. [Aside.]

Marc. My lord!

Sfor. To doubt,

Is worse than to have lost; and to despair,
Is but to antedate those miseries
That must fall on us.

The cause consider'd,
Why should I fear? The French are bold and strong,

Their numbers full, and in their councils wise;
But then, the haughty Spaniard is all fire,
Hot in his executions, fortunate
In his attempts, married to victory.

Ay, there it is that shakes me. [Aside.]

Marc. Speak to him, Francisco. [Apart.]

Fran. Excellent lady,
One gale of your sweet breath will easily Disperse these clouds; and, but yourself, there's none

That dare speak to him. [Apart.]

Marc. I will run the hazard. [Apart.]

My lord!

Sfor. Ha! pardon me, Marc'elia, I am troubled;

And stand uncertain, whether I am master
Of aught that's worth the owning.

Marc. I am yours, sir;
And I have heard you swear, I being safe,
There was no loss could move you. This day, sir,

Is by your gift made mine. Can you revoke
A grant made to Marc'elia? your Marc'elia?
For whose love, nay, whose honour, gentle sir,
All deep designs, and state affairs deferr'd,
Be, as you purpos'd, merry.

Sfor. Out of my sight!

[Throws away the Letter.]
And all thoughts that may strangle mirth, forsake me.

Fall what can fall, I dare the worst of fate:
Though the foundation of the earth should shrink,

The glorious eye of heaven lose his splendour,
Supported thus, I'll stand upon the ruins,
And seek for new life here. Why are you sad?
Some music there! by heaven he's not my
friend,

That wears one furrow in his face.
Come, make me happy once again. I am rapt—
'Tis not to-day, to-morrow, or the next,
But all my days and years shall be employ'd
To do thee honour. [A Trumpet without.]

Another post! hang him—
I will not interrupt my present pleasures,
Although his message should import my head.

Marc. Nay, good sir, I am pleas'd
To grant a little intermission to you:
Who knows but he brings news we wish to
hear,

To heighten our delights.

Sfor. As wise as fair!

Enter another Courier.

From Gaspero?

Cour. That was, my lord.

Sfor. How? dead?

Cour. [Delivers a Letter] With the delivery of this, and prayers,
To guard your excellency from certain dangers,
He ceased to be a man. [Music. Exit.]

Sfor. All that my fears
Could fashion to me, or my enemies wish,
Is fallen upon me. Silence that harsh music;

Sfor. I understand you;

And I will put your counsel into act,
And speedily. I only will take order
For some domestical affairs, that do
Concern me nearly, and with the next sun
Ride with you: in the mean time, my best friend,

Pray take your rest.

Pes. Indeed, I have travell'd hard;
And will embrace your counsel. [Exit.

Sfor. With all care
Attend my noble friend. Stay you, Francisco.
You see how things stand with me!

Fran. To my grief:
And if the loss of my poor life could be
A sacrifice to restore them as they were,
I willingly would lay it down.

Sfor. I think so;
For I have ever found you true and thankful,
Which makes me love the building I have rais'd
In your advancement; and repent no grace
I have conferr'd upon you. And, believe me,
Though now I should repeat my favours to you,
The titles I have given you, and the means
Suitable to your honours; that I thought you
Worthy my sister and my family,
And in my dukedom made you next myself;
It is not to upbraid you; but to tell you
I find you are worthy of them, in your love
And service to me.

Fran. Sir, I am your creature;
And any shape that you would have me wear,
I gladly will put on.

Sfor. Thus, then, Francisco:
I now am to deliver to your trust
A weighty secret; of so strange a nature,
And 'twill, I know, appear so monstrous to you,
That you will tremble in the execution,
As much as I am tortur'd to command it:
For 'tis a deed so horrid, that, but to hear it,
Would strike into a ruffian flesh'd in murders,
Or an obdurate hangman, soft compassion;
And yet, Francisco, of all men the dearest,
And from me most deserving, such my state
And strange condition is, that thou alone
Must know the fatal service, and perform it.

Fran. These preparations, sir, to work a stranger,

Or to one unacquainted with your bounties,
Might appear useful; but to me they are
Needless impertinences: for I dare do
Whate'er you dare command.

Sfor. But you must swear it;
And put into the oath all joys or torments
That fright the wicked, or confirm the good;
Not to conceal it only—that is nothing—
But, whensoever my will shall speak, "Strike
now!"

To fall upon't like thunder.

Fran. Minister
The oath in any way or form you please,
I stand resolv'd to take it.

Sfor. Thou must do, then,
What no malevolent star will dare to look on,
It is so wicked: for which men will curse thee
For being the instrument; and the blest angels
Forsake me at my need, for being the author:
For 'tis a deed of night, of night, Francisco!
In which the memory of all good actions
We can pretend to, shall be buried quick:
Or, if we be remember'd, it shall be
To fright posterity by our example,
That have outgone all precedents of villains

That were before us; and such as succeed,
Though taught in hell's black school, shall ne'er come near us.

Art thou not shaken yet?

Fran. I grant you move me:
But to a man confirm'd—

Sfor. I'll try your temper:
What think you of my wife?

Fran. As a thing sacred;
To whose fair name and memory I pay gladly
These signs of duty.

Sfor. Is she not the abstract
Of all that's rare, or to be wish'd in woman?

Fran. It were a kind of blasphemy to dispute it.

But to the purpose, sir.

Sfor. Add too, her goodness,
Her tenderness of me, her care to please me,
Her unsuspected chastity, ne'er equall'd;
Her innocence, her honour—Oh, I am lost
In the ocean of her virtues and her graces,
When I think of them!

Fran. Now I find the end
Of all your conjurations; there's some service
To be done for this sweet lady. If she have enemies,

That she would have remov'd—

Sfor. Alas! Francisco,
Her greatest enemy is her greatest lover;
Yet, in that hatred, her idolater.
One smile of hers would make a savage tame;
One accent of that tongue would calm the seas,
Though all the winds at once strove there for empire.

Yet I, for whom she thinks all this too little,
Should I miscarry in this present journey,
From whence it is all number to a cipher,
I ne'er return with honour, by thy hand
Must have her murder'd.

Fran. Murder'd!—She that loves so,
And so deserves to be belov'd again!
And I, who sometimes you were pleas'd to favour,

Pick'd out the instrument!

Sfor. Do not fly off.
What is decreed can never be recall'd.
'Tis more than love to her, that marks her out
A wish'd companion to me in both fortunes:
And strong assurance of thy zealous faith,
That gives up to thy trust a secret, that Racks should not have forc'd from me. Oh,
Francisco!

There is no heaven without her, nor a hell
Where she resides. I ask from her but justice,
And what I would have paid to her, had sickness,
Or any other accident, divorc'd
Her purer soul from her unspotted body.

Express a ready purpose to perform
What I command, or, by Marcelia's soul,
This is thy latest minute.

Fran. 'Tis not fear
Of death, but love to you, makes me embrace
it;

But for mine own security, when 'tis done,
What warrant have I? If you please to sign one,

I shall, though with unwillingness and horror,
Perform your dreadful charge.

Sfor. I will, Francisco:
But still remember that a prince's secrets
Are balm, conceal'd; but poison, if discover'd.
I may come back; then this is but a trial

To purchase thee, if it were possible,
A nearer place in my affection: but
I know thee honest.

Fran. 'Tis a character
I will not part with.

Sfor. I may live to reward it. [Exeunt.

ACT II.

SCENE I.—The same. An open Space before the Castle.

Enter TIBERIO and STEPHANO.

You never heard the motives that induc'd him
To this strange course?

Tib. No, those are cabinet councils,
And not to be communicated, but
To such as are his own, and sure. Alas!
We fill up empty places, and in public
Are taught to give our suffrages to that
Which was before determin'd; and are safe so.
Seignior Francisco (upon whom alone
His absolute power is, with all strength conferr'd,

During his absence) can with ease resolve you.

Steph. But, my good lord Tiberio, this Francisco
Is on the sudden strangely rais'd.

Tib. O sir,
He took the thriving course: he had a sister,
A fair one too, with whom, as it is rumour'd,
The duke was too familiar; but she, cast off,
Upon the sight of this, forsook the court,
And since was never seen.

Steph. But how is
His absence borne by the dutchess?

Tib. Sadly, it seems;
For since he left the court,
For the most part she hath kept her private chamber,
No visitants admitted. But on the other side,
The darling of his mother, Mariana,
As there were an antipathy between
Her and the dutchess's passions; and as
She'd no dependance on her brother's fortune,
She ne'er appear'd so full of mirth.

Steph. 'Tis strange. [They retire.

Enter GRACCHO, with Musicians.

But see! her favourite, and accompanied,
To your report.

Grac. You shall play, and I will sing
A scurvy ditty to a scurvy tune,
Repine who dares.

Mus. But if we should offend,
The dutchess having silenc'd us, and these lords
Stand by to hear us.

Grac. They in name are lords,
But I am one in power; and, for the dutchess,
But yesterday we were merry for her pleasure;
We'll now be for my lady's.

[Tiberio and Stephano come forward.

Tib. Seignior Graccho.

Grac. A poor man, sir, a servant to the princess;

But you, great lords and counsellors of state,
Whom I stand bound to reverence.

Tib. Come, we know
You are a man in grace.

Grac. Fie! no: I grant
I bear my fortunes patiently; serve the princess,

And have access at all times to her closet;
Such is my impudence! when your grave
lordships

Are masters of the modesty to attend
Three hours, nay, sometimes four; and then bid wait

Upon her the next morning.

Steph. He derides us. [Apart.

Tib. Pray you, what news is stirring? You know all.

Grac. Who, I? alas! I've no intelligence
At home nor abroad; I only sometimes guess
The change of the times: I should ask of your lordships

Who are to keep their honours, who to lose
them;

Who the dutchess smil'd on last, or on whom frown'd;

You only can resolve me; and could you tell
me

What point of state 'tis that I am commanded
To muster up this music, on mine honesty,
You should much befriend me.

Steph. Sirrah, you grow saucy.

Tib. And would be laid by the heels.

Grac. Not by your lordships, Without a special warrant. Look to your own stakes;

Were I committed, here come those would bail me:

Perhaps we might change places too.

Enter ISABELLA and MARIANA. GRACCHO whispers the latter.

Tib. The princess!

We must be patient.

Steph. There is no contending. [Apart.

Tib. See the informing rogue! [Apart.

Steph. That we should stoop
To such a mushroom! [Apart.

Mari. Thou dost mistake; they durst not Use the least word of scorn, although provok'd,
To any thing of mine.—Go, get you home,
And to your servants, friends, and flatt'ers, number

How many descents you're noble.

[Exeunt Tiberio and Stephano.

Grac. Your excellence hath the best gift to dispatch

These arras pictures of nobility,
I ever read of.

Isa. But the purpose, daughter,
That brings us hither? Is it to bestow
A visit on this woman?

Mari. If to vex her
May be interpreted to do her honour,
She shall have many of them.

My brother, being not by now to protect her,
I am her equal.

Play any thing
That's light and loud enough but to torment
her. [Music.

Enter MARGELIA.

Isa. She frowns, as if
Her looks could fright us. [Apart.

Mari. May it please your greatness, one smile, I pray you,

On your poor servants.

Isa. She's made of courtesy. [Apart.

Mari. Mistress of all hearts! [Apart.

Isa. 'Tis wormwood, and it works. [Apart.

Marc. If doting age could let you but remember,
You have a son; or frontless impudence,
You are a sister; and, in making answer
To what was most unfit for you to speak,
Or me to hear, borrow of my just anger;
You durst not then, on any hire or hope,
Rememb'ring what I am, and whose I am,
Put on the desp'rate boldness to disturb
The least of my retirements.

Mari. Note her now.

[Apart.

Marc. For both shall understand, though the one presume
Upon the privilege due to a mother;
The duke stands now on his own legs, and needs

No nurse to lead him.

Isa. How, a nurse!

Marc. But I am merciful.
And dotage signs your pardon.

Isa. I defy thee!

Thee and thy pardons, proud one!

Marc. For you,
From this hour learn to serve me, or you'll feel
I must make use of my authority,
And, as a princess, punish it.

Isa. A princess!

Mari. I had rather be a slave unto a Moor,
Than know thee for my equal.

Enter FRANCISCO and Guards.

Fran. What wind hath rais'd this tempest?
A tumult in the court! What's the cause?
Speak, Mariana.

Mari. Do you hear, sir?
Right me on this monster, or ne'er look to have

A quiet hour with me.

Isa. If my son were here,
And would endure this, may a mother's curse
Pursue and overtake him!

Fran. O, forbear:
In me he's present, both in power and will;
And, madam, I much grieve that, in his absence,
There should arise the least distaste to move
you:

It being his principal, nay, only charge,
To have you, in his absence, serv'd and honour'd,

As when himself perform'd the willing office.

Grac. I would I were well off! [Aside.

Fran. And therefore I beseech you, gentle madam,
Name those that have offended you.

Isa. I am one.

Mari. And I will justify it.

Fran. Remember she's the dutchess.

Marc. But us'd with more contempt than if I were
A peasant's daughter.

Fran. Think not then I speak
(For I stand bound to honour, and to serve you);
But that the duke, that lives in this great lady,
For the contempt of him in her, commands you
To be close prisoners.

Isa. Mari. Prisoners!

Fran. Bear them hence.

Marc. I am not cruel,
But pleas'd they may have liberty.

Isa. Pleas'd, with a mischief!

Mari. I'll rather live in any loathsome dungeon,

Than in a paradise at her entreaty.

And for you, upstart—

Off. What shall become of these?

Fran. See them well whipp'd,
As you will answer it.

Grac. I preach patience,
And must endure my fortune.

[Exeunt all but Francisco and Marcelia.

Fran. Let them first know themselves, and how you are
To be serv'd and honour'd; which, when they confess,

You may again receive them to your favour;
And then it will show nobly.

Marc. With my thanks,
The duke shall pay you his, if he return
To bless us with his presence.

Fran. Any service done to so much sweet-
ness,

In your favour finds
A wish'd and glorious end.

Marc. From you I take this
As loyal duty; but in any other,
It would appear gross flattery.

Fran. Flattery, madam!
You are so rare and excellent in all things,
And rais'd so high upon a rock of goodness,
As that vice cannot reach you: who but looks on
This temple, built by nature to perfection,
But must bow to it; and out of that zeal,
Not only learn to adore it, but to love it?

Marc. Whither will this fellow? [Aside.

Fran. Pardon, therefore, madam,
If an excess in me of humble duty,
Teach me to hope my piety and love
May find reward.

Marc. You have it in my thanks;
And, on my hand, I am pleas'd that you shall take

A full possession of it: but take heed
That you fix here, and feed no hope beyond it;
If you do, it will prove fatal.

Fran. Be it death,
And death with torments tyrants ne'er found out,
Yet I must say I love you.

Marc. As a subject,
And 'twill become you.

Fran. Farewell circumstance!
And since you are not pleas'd to understand
me,

But by a plain and usual form of speech,
All superstitious reverence laid by,
I love you as a man. Why do you start?
I am no monster, and you but a woman;
A woman made to yield, and by example
Told it is lawful.

Marc. Keep off! O, you powers!
Are all the princely bounties, favours, honours,
Which, with some prejudice to his own wisdom,
Thy lord and raiser hath conferr'd upon thee,
In three days absence, buried? And is this,
This impudent attempt to taint mine honour,
The fair return of both our ventur'd favours?

Fran. Hear my excuse.

Marc. Read my life,
And find one act of mine so loosely carried,
That could invite a most self-loving fool,
Set off, with all that fortune could throw on
him,

To the least hope to find way to my favour.

Fran. And while the duke did prize you to your value,
I well might envy him; but durst not hope
To stop you in your full career of goodness:
But now I find that he's fall'n from his fortune,
And, howsoever he would appear doting,
Grown cold in his affection; I presume,
From his most barbarous neglect of you,
To offer my true service. Nor stand I bound
To look back on the courtesies of him
That, of all living men, is most unthankful.

Marc. Unheard-of arrogance!

Fran. You'll say I am modest
When I have told the story.
You think he loves you
With unexempl'd fervour; nay, dotes on you,
As there were something in you more than
woman:
When, on my knowledge, he long since hath wish'd
You were among the dead.

Marc. Bless me, good angels,
Or I am blasted! Lies so false and wicked,
And fashion'd to so damnable a purpose,
Cannot be spoken by a human tongue.
My husband hate me! give thyself the lie,
False and accurs'd! Thy soul, if thou hast any,
Can witness, never lady stood so bound
To the unfeign'd affections of her lord,
As I do to my Sforza. If thou wouldst work Upon my weak credulity, tell me, rather,
There's peace between the lion and the lamb;
Or, that the ravenous eagle and the dove
Keep in one aerie, and bring up their young;
Or any thing that is averse to nature;
And I will sooner credit it than that
My lord can think of me but as a jewel
He loves more than himself, and all the world.

Fran. O innocence abus'd! simplicity cozen'd!
It were a sin, for which we have no name,
To keep you longer in this wilful error.
Read his affections here; [Gives her a Paper] and then observe
How dear he holds you! 'Tis his character,
Which cunning yet could never counterfeit.

Marc. 'Tis his hand, I'm resolv'd of it: I'll try
What the inscription is.

Fran. Pray you do so.

Marc. [Reads] You know my pleasure, and the hour of Marcelia's death, which fail not to execute, as you will answer the contrary, not with your head alone,
but with the ruin of your whole family.
And this, written with my own hand, and signed with my privy signet, shall be your sufficient warrant.—

LUDOVICO SFORZA.

I do obey it! Every word's a poniard,
And reaches to my heart. [Swoons.]

Fran. What have I done?

Madam! for heaven's sake, madam!—
Dear lady!—

She stirs. For the duke's sake! for Sforza's sake—

Marc. Sforza's! stand off! though dead, I will be his;

And even my ashes shall abhor the touch
Of any other. O unkind, and cruel!
Learn, women, learn to trust in one another;
There is no faith in man: Sforza is false,
False to Marcelia!

Fran. But I am true,
And live to make you happy.

Marc. I prefer the hate
Of Sforza, though it mark me for the grave,
Before thy base affection. I am yet
Pure and unspotted in my true love to him;
Nor shall it be corrupted, though he's tainted;
Nor will I part with innocence, because
He is found guilty. For thyself, thou art
A thing, that, equal with the devil himself,
I do detest and scorn.

Fran. Thou, then, art nothing:
Thy life is in my power, disdainful woman!
Think on't, and tremble.

Marc. No, with my curses
Of horror to thy conscience in this life,
And pains in hell hereafter, I defy thee. [Exit.]

Fran. I am lost
In the discovery of this fatal secret.
Curs'd hope, that flatter'd me, that wrongs could make her
A stranger to her goodness! all my plots
Turn back upon myself; but I am in,
And must go on; and since I have put off
From the shore of innocence, guilt be now my pilot! [Exit.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—The Imperial Camp before PAVIA.

Enter MEDINA, HERNANDO, and ALPHONSO.

Med. The spoil, the spoil! 'tis that the soldier fights for.

Our victory, as yet, affords us nothing
But wounds and empty honour.

Her. Hell put it in.
The enemy's mind to be desperate, and hold
out!

Yieldings and compositions will undo us;
And what is that way given, for the most part,
Comes to the emperor: the poor soldier left
To starve, or fill up hospitals.

Alph. But, when
We enter towns by force, and carve ourselves,
Pleasure with pillage—

Med. I long to be at it.

Her. My main hope is,
To begin the sport at Milan: there's enough,
And of all kinds of pleasure we can wish for,
To satisfy the most covetous.

Alph. Every day
We look for a remove.

Med. For Lodowick Sforza,
The duke of Milan, I, on mine own knowledge,
Can say thus much: he is too much a soldier;
Too confident of his own worth; too rich too;
And understands too well the emperor hates him,
To hope for composition.

Alph. On my life
We need not fear his coming in.

Her. On mine
I do not wish it: I had rather that,
To show his valour, he'd put us to the trouble
To fetch him in by the ears.

Med. The emperor!

Flourish. Enter the EMPEROR CHARLES,
PESCARA, and Attendants.

Emp. C. You make me wonder: nay, it is no counsel:
You may partake it, gentlemen. Who'd have thought

That he, that scorn'd our proffer'd amity
When he was sued to, should, ere he be summon'd,
First kneel for mercy?

Med. When your majesty
Shall please to instruct us who it is, we may Admire it with you.

Emp. C. Who, but the duke of Milan,
The right hand of the French! of all that stand
In our displeasure, whom necessity Compels to seek our favour, I would have sworn Sforza had been the last.

Her. And should be writ so In the list of those you pardon. Would his city

Had rather held us out a siege, like Troy,
Than, by a feign'd submission, he should cheat
you

Of a just revenge, or us of those fair glories
We have sweat blood to purchase!

Alph. The sack alone of Milan
Will pay the army.

Emp. C. I am not so weak;
To be wrought on as you fear; nor ignorant
That money is the sinew of the war:
Yet, for our glory, and to show him that
We've brought him on his knees, it is resolv'd
To bear him as a suppliant. Bring him in;
But let him see the effects of our just anger,
In the guard that you make for him.

[Exit Pescara.]

Her. I am now
Familiar with the issue; all plagues on it!
He will appear in some dejected habit,
His countenance suitable, and for his order,
A rope about his neck; then kneel, and tell Old stories—what more worthy thing it is
To have power than to use it;
To make a king than kill one: which apply'd
To the emperor and himself, a pardon's granted
To him, an enemy; and we, his servants,
Condemn'd to beggary. [Apart to Medina.]

Med. Yonder he comes;
But not as you expected.

Re-enter PESCARA, with LUDOVICO SPORZA, strongly guarded.

Alph. He looks as if
He would outface his dangers. [Apart.]

Her. I am cozen'd:
A suitor, in the devil's name! [Apart.]

Med. Hear him speak. [Apart.]

Sfor. I come not, emperor, to invade thy mercy,

By fawning on thy fortune; nor bring with me
Excuses or denials. I profess,
And with a good man's confidence, even this instant

That I am in thy power, I was thine enemy;
Thy deadly and vow'd enemy; one that wish'd
Confusion to thy person and estates;
And with my utmost powers, and deepest
counsels,

Had they been truly follow'd, further'd it.
Nor will I now, although my neck were under
The hangman's axe, with one poor syllable
Confess, but that I honour'd the French king
More than thyself, and all men.

Med. By saint Jaques,
This is no flattery. [Aside.]

Sfor. Now give me leave,

My hate against thyself, and love to him
Freely acknowledged, to give up the reasons
That made me so affected: in my wants
I ever found him faithful; had supplies
Of men and money from him; and my hopes
Quite sunk, were, by his grace, buoy'd up again;
I dare to speak his praise now, in as high
And loud a key, as when he was thy equal.
The benefits he sow'd in me met not Unthankful ground, but yielded him his own
With fair increase, and I still glory in it.
And though my fortunes
Are in thy fury burnt, let it be mention'd,
They serv'd but as small tapers to attend
The solemn flame at this great funeral:
And with them I will gladly waste myself,
Rather than undergo the imputation
Of being base, or unthankful.

Alph. Nobly spoken! [Apart.]

Her. I do begin, I know not why, to hate
him

Less than I did. [Apart.]

Sfor. If that, then, to be grateful
For courtesies receiv'd, or not to leave
A friend in his necessities, be a crime
Amongst you Spaniards, Sforza brings his head
To pay the forfeit. Nor come I as a slave,
Pinion'd and fetter'd, in a squalid weed,
Falling before thy feet, kneeling and howling
For a forestall'd remission; I ne'er fear'd to die,
More than I wish'd to live. When I had reach'd
My ends in being a duke, I wore these robes,
This crown upon my head, and to my side
This sword was girt; and witness, truth, that now

'Tis in another's power, when I shall part
With them and life together, I'm the same:
My veins then did not swell with pride; nor
now

Shrink they for fear. Know, sir, that Sforza stands

Prepar'd for either fortune.

Her. As I live,
I do begin strangely to love this fellow.

[Apart.]

Sfor. But, if example
Of my fidelity to the French,
Has power to invite you to make him a friend,
That hath given evident proof he knows to love,
And to be thankful: this my crown, now yours,
You may restore me.

Alph. By this light,
'Tis a brave gentleman. [Apart.]

Emp. C. Thou hast so far
Outgone my expectation, noble Sforza,
For such I hold thee; and true constancy,
Rais'd on a brave foundation, bears such palm
And privilege with it, that where we behold it,
Though in an enemy, it does command us
To love and honour it. By my future hopes,
I am glad, for thy sake, that, in seeking favour,
Thou didst not borrow of vice her indirect,
Crooked, and abject means: and so far
I am from robbing thee of the least honour,
That with my hands, to make it sit the faster,
I set thy crown once more upon thy head;
And do not only style thee duke of Milan,
But vow to keep thee so. Yet, not to take
From others to give only to myself,
I will not hinder your magnificence
To my commanders, neither will I urge it;
But in that, as in all things else, I leave you

To be your own disposer.

Sfor. May I live
To seal my loyalty, though with loss of life.

[Flourish. Exeunt Emperor Charles, Medina, Hernando, and Alphonso.]

Pes. So, sir, this tempest is well overblown,
And all things fall out to our wishes; but,
In my opinion, this quick return,
Before you've made a party in the court
Among the great ones (for these needy captains

Have little power in peace), may beget danger,
At least suspicion.

Sfor. Where true honour lives,
Doubt hath no being; I desire no pawn,
Beyond an emperor's word, for my assurance.
Besides, Pescara, to thyself, of all men,
I will confess my weakness: though my state
And crown's restor'd me, though I am in grace,
And that a little stay might be a step
To greater honours, I must hence. Alas,
I live not here; my wife, my wife, Pescara,
Being absent, I am dead. Pr'ythee excuse,
And do not chide, for friendship's sake, my fondness;

But ride along with me: I'll give you reasons,
And strong ones, to plead for me.

Pes. Use your own pleasure;
I'll bear you company.

Sfor. Farewell, grief! I am stored with Two blessings most desired in human life,
A constant friend, an unsuspected wife.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—MILAN. A Room in the Castle.

Enter GRACCHO.

Grac. Whipt like a rogue! no lighter punishment serve
To balance with a little mirth! 'Tis well:
My credit sunk for ever, I am now
Fit company only for pages and for footboys.

Enter JULIO and GIOVANNI.

Gio. See Julio,
Yonder the proud slave is. How he looks now,
After his castigation! [Apart.

Julio. Let's be merry with him. [Apart.

Grac. How they stare at me! am I turn'd to an owl?

The wonder, gentlemen?

Julio. I read this morning,
Strange stories of the passive fortitude
Of men in former ages, which I thought
Impossible, and not to be believed;
But now I look on you my wonder ceases.

Grac. The reason, sir?

Julio. Why, sir, you have been whipt; Whipt, seignior Graccho; and the whip, I take it,

Is, to a gentleman, the greatest trial
That may be of his patience.

Grac. Sir, I'll call you
To a strict account for this.

Gio. I'll not deal with you,
Unless I have a beadle for my second;
And then I'll answer you.

Julio. Farewell, poor Graccho.

[Exeunt Julio and Giovanni.]

Grac. Better and better still. If ever wrongs Could teach a wretch to find the way to vengeance.

Enter FRANCISCO and a Servant.

Hell now inspire me! How, the lord protector!
Whither thus in private?

I will not see him. [Stands aside.

Fran. If I am sought for,
Say I am indispos'd, and will not hear
Or suits, or suitors.

Serv. But, sir, if the princess
Inquire, what shall I answer?

Fran. Say I am rid Abroad to take the air; but by no means
Let her know I'm in court.

Serv. So I shall tell her.

[Exit.]

Fran. Within there!

Enter a Gentlewoman.

Gentlew. My good lord, your pleasure?

Fran. Pr'ythee let me beg thy favour for access

To the dutchess.

Gentlew. In good sooth, my lord, I dare not;
She's very private.

Fran. Come, there's gold—
Where is thy lady?

Gentlew. She's walking in the gallery.

Fran. Bring me to her.

[Exeunt Francisco and Gentlewoman.]

Grac. A brave discovery beyond my hope,
A plot even offer'd to my hand to work on!
If I am dull now, may I live and die
The scorn of worms and slaves! Let me consider;

My lady and her mother first committed,
In the favour of the dutchess; and I whipt!
And all his brib'd approaches to the dutchess
To be conceal'd! good, good. This to my lady Deliver'd, as I'll order it, runs her mad.

[Exit.]

SCENE III.—Another Room in the same.

Enter MARCELIA and FRANCISCO.

Marc. Believe thy tears or oaths! can it be hop'd,

After a practice so abhorr'd and horrid,
Repentance e'er can find thee?

Fran. Dearest lady,
I do confess, humbly confess my fault,
To be beyond all pity; my attempt
So barbarously rude, that it would turn
A saint-like patience into savage fury.

Marc. I'st possible

This can be cunning?

[Aside.]

Fran. But, if no submission,
Nor prayers can appease you, that you may
know

'Tis not the fear of death that makes me sue thus,

I will not wait the sentence of the duke;
But I myself will do a fearful justice on myself,
No witness by but you.

Yet, before I do it,

For I perceive in you no signs of mercy,
I will disclose a secret, which, dying with me,
May prove your ruin.

Marc. Speak it; it will take from
The burden of thy conscience.

Fran. Thus, then, madam:
The warrant, by my lord sign'd for your death,
Was but conditional; but you must swear,
By your unspotted truth, not to reveal it,
Or I end here abruptly.

Marc. By my hopes

Of joys hereafter. On.

Fran. Nor was it hate
That forc'd him to it, but excess of love.
"And if I ne'er return (so said great Sforza),
No living man deserving to enjoy
My best Marcelia, with the first news
That I am dead (for no man after me Must e'er enjoy her), fail not to kill her.
But till certain proof
Assure thee I am lost (these were his words),
Observe and honour her, as if the soul
Of woman's goodness only dwelt in hers."
'This trust I have abus'd, and basely wrong'd;
And if the excelling pity of your mind
Cannot forgive it, as I dare not hope it,
Rather than look on my offended lord,
I stand resolv'd to punish it.

[Draws his Sword.

Marc. Hold! 'tis forgiven,
And by me freely pardon'd. In thy fair life
Hereafter, study to deserve this bounty:
But that my lord, my Sforza, should esteem
My life fit only as a page, to wait on
The various course of his uncertain fortunes;
Or cherish in himself that sensual hope,
In death to know me as a wife, afflicts me.
I will slack the ardour that I had to see him
Return in safety.

Fran. But if your entertainment
Should give the least ground to his jealousy,
To raise up an opinion I am false,
You then destroy your mercy. Therefore vouchsafe,

In company, to do me those fair graces
And favours, which your innocence and honour
May safely warrant: it would to the duke,
I being to your best self alone known guilty,
Make me appear most innocent.

Marc. Have your wishes;
And something I may do to try his temper,
At least to make him know a constant wife
Is not so slaved to her husband's dotting humours,
Her fate appointing it.

Fran. It is enough,
Nay, all I could desire; and will make way
To my revenge, which shall disperse itself
On him, on her, and all.

[Aside, and exit. Shout, and flourish.

Marc. What noise is that?

Enter TIBERIO and STEPHANO.

Tib. All happiness to the dutchess, that may flow
From the duke's new and wish'd return!

Marc. He's welcome.

Steph. How coldly she receives it! [Apart.

Tib. Observe the encounter. [Apart.

Fleurish. Enter LUDOVICO SFORZA, PESCARA, and Attendants.

Sfor. I have stood
Silent thus long, Marcelia, expecting
When, with more than a greedy haste, thou
wouldst

Have flown into my arms, and on my lips
Have printed a deep welcome. My desires
To glass myself in these fair eyes, have borne
me

With more than human speed: nor durst I stay
In any temple, or to any saint,
To pay my vows and thanks for my return,

Till I had seen thee.

Marc. Sir, I am most happy
To look upon you safe, and would express
My love and duty in a modest fashion,
Such as might suit with the behaviour
Of one that knows herself a wife, and how
To temper her desires; nor can it wrong me
To love discreetly.

Sfor. How! why, can there be
A mean in your affections to Sforza?
My passions to you are in extremes,
And know no bounds.—Come, kiss me.

Marc. I obey you.

Sfor. By all the joys of love, she does salute me
As if I were her father! What witch,
With cursed spells, hath quench'd the amorous heat

That liv'd upon these lips? Tell me, Marcelia,
And truly tell me, is't a fault of mine
That hath begot this coldness, or neglect
Of others in my absence?

Marc. Neither, sir:
I stand indebted to your substitute,
Noble and good Francisco, for his care,
And fair observance of me.

Sfor. How!

Steph. How the duke stands! [Apart.

Tib. As he were rooted there,
And had no motion. [Apart.

Pes. My lord, from whence Grows this amazement?

Sfor. It is more, dear my friend;
For I am doubtful whether I've a being,
But certain that my life's a burden to me.
Take me back, good Pescara, show me to Caesar,
In all his rage and fury; I disclaim
His mercy: to live now, which is his gift,
Is worse than death, and with all studied tor-
ments.

Marcelia is unkind, nay, worse, grown cold
In her affection; my excess of fervour,
Which yet was never equal'd, grown distasteful.

But have thy wishes, woman; thou shalt know
That I can be myself, and thus shake off
The fetters of fond dotage. From my sight,
Without reply; for I am apt to do Something I may repent. [Exit Marcelia.

Oh! who would place
His happiness in most accursed woman;
In whom obsequiousness engenders pride,
And harshness, deadly hatred? From this hour
I'll labour to forget there are such creatures:
True friends, be now my mistresses. Clear your brows,
And, though my heart-strings crack for't, I will be

To all a free example of delight.
We will have sports of all kinds, and propound
Rewards to such as can produce us new;
Unsatisfied, though we surfeit in their store:
And never think of curs'd Marcelia more.

[Exeunt.

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—The same. An Apartment in the Castle.

Enter FRANCISCO and GRACCHO.

Fran. And is it possible thou shouldst forget
A wrong of such a nature, and then study
My safety and content?

Grac. Sir, but allow me
Not the abstruse and hidden arts to thrive
there:

And you may please to grant me so much
knowledge,
That injuries from one in grace, like you,
Are noble favours.

Fran. But to the purpose;
And then, that service done, make thine own fortunes.

My wife, thou say'st, is jealous I am too
Familiar with the dutchess.

Grac. And incens'd
For her commitment in her brother's absence;
And by her mother's anger is spurr'd on
To make discovery of it.

Fran. I thank thy care, and will deserve
this secret,
In making thee acquainted with a greater,
And of more moment. I delight in change
And sweet variety; that's my heaven on earth,
For which I love life only. I confess,
My wife pleas'd me a day; the dutches, two
(And yet I must not say I have enjoy'd her);
But now I care for neither: therefore, Grac-
cho,

So far I am from stopping Mariana
In making her complaint, that I desire thee
To urge her to it.

Grac. That may prove your ruin:
The duke already being, as 'tis reported,
Doubtful she hath play'd false.

Fran. There thou art cozen'd;
His dotage, like an 'ague, keeps his course,
And now 'tis strongly on him. But I lose
time;

And therefore know, whether thou wilt or no,
Thou art to be my instrument; and, in spite
Of the old saw, that says, "It is not safe
On any terms to trust a man that's wrong'd,"
I dare thee to be false.

Grac. This is a language,
My lord, I understand not.

Fran. You thought, sirrah,
To put a trick on me, for the relation
Of what I knew before; and, having won
Some weighty secret from me, in revenge
To play the traitor. Know, thou wretched thing,

By my command thou wert whipt; and every day

I'll have thee freshly tortur'd, if thou miss
In the least charge that I impose upon thee.
Though what I speak, for the most part, is true;

Nay, grant thou hadst a thousand witnesses
To be depos'd they heard it, 'tis in me,
With one word, such is Sforza's confidence
Of my fidelity not to be shaken,
To make all void, and ruin my accusers.

Therefore look to't; bring my wife hotly on
To accuse me to the duke—I have an end in't—
Or think what 'tis makes man most miserable,
And that shall fall upon thee. Thou wert a fool

To hope, by being acquainted with my courses,
To curb and awe me; or that I should live
Thy slave, as thou didst saucily divine:
For prying in my counsels, still live mine.

[Exit.

Grac. I am caught on both sides. This 'tis for a puisne

In policy's roguish school, to try conclusions
With one that hath commenc'd, and gone out doctor.

If I discover what but now he bragg'd of,
I shall not be believ'd: if I fall off
From him, his threats and actions go together,
And there's no hope of safety. Till I get
A plummet that may sound his deepest counsels,
I must obey and serve him. Want of skill
Now makes me play the rogue against my will.
[Exit.

SCENE II.—Another Apartment in the Castle.
Enter MARCELIA, TIBERIO, STEPHANO, and Gentlewoman.

Marc. Command me from his sight, and with such scorn
As he would rate his slave!

Tib. 'Twas in his fury.

Steph. And he repents it, madam.

Marc. Was I born
To observe his humours? or, because he dotes,
Must I run mad?

Tib. He hath paid the forfeit
Of his offence, I'm sure, with such a sorrow,
As if it had been greater, would deserve
A full remission.

Marc. Why, perhaps, he hath it;
And I stand more afflicted for his absence,
Than he can be for mine: so, pray you, tell
him.

But till I have digested some sad thoughts,
And reconcil'd passions that are at war
Within myself, I purpose to be private:
And have you care, unless it be Francisco,
That no man be admitted.

[Exit Gentlewoman.

Tib. How! Francisco?

Enter FRANCISCO.

Steph. Here he comes.

Is this her privacy!

This may go to the duke.

[Exeunt Tib. and Steph.

Marc. Your face is full
Of fears and doubts: the reason!

Fran. O, best madam,
They are not counterfeit. The duke, the duke,
I more than fear, hath found that I am guilty.

Marc. By my unspotted honour, not from me;
Nor have I with him chang'd one syllable,
Since his return, but what you heard.

Fran. Yet malice
Is eagle-ey'd, and would see that which is not;
And jealousy's too apt to build upon Unsure foundations.

Marc. Jealousy!

Fran. It takes.

[Aside.

Marc. Who dares but only think I can be tainted?

But for him, though almost on certain proof,
To give it hearing, not belief, deserves
My hate for ever.

Fran. Whether grounded on Your noble, yet chaste favours, shewn unto
me;

Or her imprisonment, for her contempt
To you, by my command, my frantic wife
Hath put it in his head.

Marc. Have I then liv'd
So long, now to be doubted? Are my favours
The themes of her discourse? or what I do,

That never trod in a suspected path,
Subject to base construction? Be undaunted;
For now, as of a creature that is mine,
I rise up your protectress: all the grace
I hitherto have done you, was bestow'd
With a shut hand; it shall be now more free,
Open, and liberal. But let it not,
Though counterfeited to the life, teach you
To nourish saucy hopes.

Fran. May I be accurs'd,
When I prove such a monster!

Marc. I will stand then Between you and all danger. He shall know,
Suspicion overturns what confidence builds;
And he that dares but doubt when there's no
ground,

Is neither to himself nor others sound. [Exit.

Fran. So, let it work! Her goodness, that denied

My service, branded with the name of lust,
Shall now destroy itself; and she shall find,
When he's a suitor, that brings cunning arm'd
With power to be his advocates, the denial
Is a disease as killing as the plague,
And chastity a clue that leads to death.
Hold but thy nature, duke, and be but rash
And violent enough, and then at leisure
Repent; I care not.

And let my plots produce this long'd-for birth,
In my revenge I have my heaven on earth.
[Exit.

SCENE III.—Another Room in the same.

Enter LUDOVICO SPORZA, PESCARA, JULIO, and GIOVANNI.

Pes. You promis'd to be merry.

Julio. There are pleasures,
And of all kinds, to entertain the time.

Gio. Your excellence vouchsafing to make choice

Of that which best affects you.

Sfor. Hold your prating.
Learn manners too; you are rude.

Pes. I must borrow
The privilege of a friend, and will; or else
I am, like these, a servant; or, what's worse,
A parasite to the sorrow Sforza worships
In spite of reason.

Sfor. Pray you, use your freedom;
And so far, if you please, allow me mine,
To hear you only; not to be compell'd
To take your moral potions. I am a man,
And, though philosophy, your mistress, rage
for't,

Now I have cause to grieve, I must be sad;
And I dare show it.

Pes. Would it were bestow'd
Upon a worthier subject!

Sfor. Take heed, friend.
You rub a sore, whose pain will make me
mad;

And I shall then forget myself and you.
Lance it no further.

Pes. Have you stood the shock
Of thousand enemies, and outfac'd the anger
Of a great emperor, that vow'd your ruin,
Though by a desperate, a glorious way,
That had no precedent?

Have you given proof, to this hour of your
life,

Prosperity, that searches the best temper,
Could never puff you up, nor adverse fate

Deject your valour? Shall, I say, these virtues,
So many and so various trials of
Your constant mind, be buried in the frown
(To please you, I will say so) of a fair woman?
—Yet I have seen her equals.

Sfor. Good Pescara,
This language in another were profane;
In you it is unmannerly. Her equal!
I tell you as a friend, and tell you plainly
(To all men else my sword should make reply),
Her goodness does disdain comparison,
And, but herself, admits no parallel.

Pes. Well, sir, I'll not cross you,
Nor labour to diminish your esteem,
Hereafter, of her.

Enter TIBERIO and STEPHANO.

Sfor. O! you are well return'd;
Say, am I blest? hath she vouchsaf'd to hear
you?

Is there hope left that she may be pleas'd?

Tib. She, sir, yet is froward,
And desires respite, and some privacy.

Steph. She was harsh at first; but, ere we parted, seem'd not

Implacable.

Sfor. There's comfort yet: I'll ply her Each hour with new ambassadors of more honours,

Titles, and eminence: my second self,
Francisco, shall solicit her.

Steph. That a wise man,
And what is more, a prince that may command,

Should sue thus poorly, and treat with his wife,
As she were a victorious enemy.

Sfor. What is that you mutter?
I'll have thy thoughts.

Steph. You shall. You are too fond,
And feed a pride that's swoln too big already,
And surfeits with observance.

Sfor. O my patience!
My vassal speak thus?

Steph. Let my head answer it,
If I offend. She, that you think a saint,
I fear, may play the devil.

Pes. Well said, old fellow. [Aside.

Steph. And he that hath so long engross'd your favours,
Though to be nam'd with reverence, lord
Francisco,

Who, as you purpose, shall solicit for you,
I think's too near her.

[Sfor. lays his Hand on his Sword.

Pes. Hold, sir! this is madness.

Steph. It may be they confer of joining
lordships;
I'm sure he's private with her.

Sfor. Let me go,
I scorn to touch him; he deserves my pity,
And not my anger. Dotard! and to be one
Is thy protection, else thou durst not think
That love to my Marcelia hath left room
In my full heart for any jealous thought:
I could smile to think, what wretched things they are,

That dare be jealous.

Tib. This is a confidence
Beyond example.

Enter ISABELLA, and MARIANA.

Sfor. If you come

To bring me comfort, say that you have made
My peace with my Marcelia.

Isa. I had rather

Wait on you to your funeral.

Sfor. You are my mother;
Or, by her life, you were dead else.

Mari. Would you were,
To your dishonour! Here your mother was Committed by your servant (for I scorn
To call him husband), and myself, your sister,
If that you dare remember such a name,
Mew'd up, to make the way open and free
For the adulteress; I am unwilling
To say, a part of Sforza.

Sfor. She hath blasphem'd, and by our law must die.

Isa. Blasphem'd! for giving a false woman her true name.

Sfor. O hell, what do I suffer?

Mari. Or is it treason
For me, that am a subject, to endeavour
To save the honour of the duke, and that
He should not be a wittol on record?

Sfor. Some proof, vile creature!
Or thou hast spoke thy last.

Mari. The public fame,
Their hourly private meetings; and, e'en now,
When, under a pretence of grief or anger,
You are denied the joys due to a husband,
And made a stranger to her, at all times
The door stands open to him.

Sfor. O the malice
And envy of base women! Wretches! you have rais'd
A monumental trophy to her. I'm so far
From giving credit to you, this would teach me More to admire and serve her. You are not worthy

To fall as sacrifices to appease her;
And therefore live till your own envy burst
you.

Isa. All is in vain; he is not to be mov'd.

Mari. She has bewitch'd him.

Pes. 'Tis so past belief,
To me it shows a fable.

Enter FRANCISCO, speaking to a Servant within.

Fran. On thy life,
Provide my horses, and without the port
With care attend me.

Sero. [within] I shall, my lord.

Fran. Great sir,
I would impart,
Please you to lend your ear, a weighty secret,
I am in labour to deliver to you.

Sfor. All leave the room.

[Excunt Isa. and Mari.]

Excuse me, good Pescara,
Ere long I will wait on you.

Pes. You speak, sir,
The language I should use.

Sfor. Be within call,
Perhaps we may have use of you.

Tib. We shall, sir.

[Excunt Tiberio and Stephano.]

Sfor. Say on, my comfort!

Fran. Comfort! no, your torment,
For so my fate appoints me. I could curse
The hour that gave me being.

Sfor. What new monsters
Of misery stand ready to devour me?

Let them at once dispatch me.

Fran. Draw your sword then,
And, as you wish your own peace, quickly kill me;

Consider not, but do it.

Sfor. Art thou mad?

Fran. Would from my youth a loathsome leprosy

Had run upon this face, or that my breath
Had been infectious, and so made me shunn'd
Of all societies! Curs'd be he that taught me
Discourse or manners, or lent any grace
That makes the owner pleasing in the eye
Of wanton woman!

Sfor. I am on the rack!
Dissolve this doubtful riddle.

Fran. That I alone,
Of all mankind, that stand most bound to love
you,

And study your content, should be appointed,
Not by my will, but forc'd by cruel fate,
To be your greatest enemy! Not to hold you
In this amazement longer, in a word,
Your dutchess loves me.

Sfor. Loves thee!

Fran. Is mad for me—
Pursues me hourly.

Sfor. Oh!

Fran. And from hence grew
Her late neglect of you.

Sfor. O women! women!

Fran. I labour'd to divert her by persuasion, Then urg'd your much love to her, and the danger;

Denied her and with scorn.

Sfor. 'Twas like thyself.

Fran. But when I saw her smile, then heard her say,

Your love and extreme dotage, as a cloak,
Should cover our embraces, and your power
Fright others from suspicion; and all favours
That should preserve her in her innocence,
By lust inverted to be us'd as bawds;
I could not but in duty (though I know
That the relation kills in you all hope
Of peace hereafter, and in me 'twill show
Both base and poor to rise up her accuser)
Freely discover it.

Sfor. Eternal plagues Pursue and overtake her! But, like a village nurse,

Stand I now cursing and considering, when
The tamest fool would do. Within there!
Stephano,

Tiberio, and the rest! I will be sudden,
And she shall know and feel, love in extremes
Abus'd, knows no degree in hate.

Re-enter TIBERIO and STEPHANO.

Tib. My lord.

Sfor. Go to the chamber of that wicked
woman—

Steph. What wicked woman, sir?

Sfor. The devil, my wife.
Force a rude entry; drag her hither;
And know no pity; any gentle usage
To her will call on cruelty from me,
To such as show it. Stand you staring! Go,
Put my will in act.

[Excunt Tiberio and Stephano.]

Since she dares damnation,
I'll be a fury to her.

Fran. Yet, great sir,
Exceed not in your fury; she's yet guilty
Only in her intent.

Sfor. Intent, Francisco!
It does include all fact; and I might sooner
Be won to pardon treason to my crown,
Or one that kill'd my father.

Fran. You are wise,
And know what's best to do: yet, if you please,
To prove her temper to the height, say only
That I am dead, and then observe how far
She'll be transported. I'll remove a little,
But be within your call. Now to the upshot!
Howe'er, I'll shift for one. [Aside, and exit.]

Re-enter TIBERIO, STEPHANO, and Guard, with MARCELIA.

Marc. Where is this monster,
This walking tree of jealousy? Are you here?
Is it by your commandment or allowance,
I am thus basely us'd? Which of my virtues,
My labours, services, and cares to please you,
Invites this barbarous course? Dare you look on me

Without a seal of shame?

Sfor. Impudence,
How ugly thou appear'st now! Thy intent
To be a wanton, leaves thee not blood enough
To make an honest blush: what had the act
done?

Marc. Return'd thee the dishonour thou deserv'st.

Sfor. Your chosen favourite, your woo'd
Francisco,
Has dearly paid for't; for, wretch! know, he's dead,
And by my hand.

Marc. Thou hast kill'd then,
A man I do profess I lov'd; a man
For whom a thousand queens might well be rivals.

But he, I speak it to thy teeth, that dares be
A jealous fool, dares be a murderer,
And knows no end in mischief.

Sfor. I begin now
In this my justice. [Stabs her.]

Marc. Oh! I have fool'd myself
Into my grave, and only grieve for that Which, when you know you've slain an innocent,

You needs must suffer.

Sfor. An innocent! Let one
Call in Francisco; for he lives, vile creature, [Exit Stephano.]

To justify thy falsehood.
With wanton flatteries thou hast tempted him.

Re-enter STEPHANO.

Steph. Seignior Francisco, sir, but even now
Took horse without the ports.

Marc. We are both abus'd,
And both by him undone. Stay, death, a little,
Till I have clear'd me to my lord, and then
I willingly obey thee. O my Sforza!
Francisco was not tempted, but the tempter;
And, as he thought to win me, show'd the warrant

That you sign'd for my death. But, being contemn'd,

Upon his knees with tears he did beseech me,
Not to reveal it: I, soft-hearted fool,
Judging his penitence true, was won unto it:

Indeed, the unkindness to be sentenc'd by you,
Before that I was guilty in a thought,
Made me put on a seeming anger towards you,
And now—behold the issue! As I do,
May heaven forgive you! [Dies.]

Sfor. Then I believe thee;
Believe thee innocent too.

Tib. Her sweet soul has left
Her beauteous prison.

Steph. Look to the duke; he stands
As if he wanted motion.

Tib. Grief hath stopp'd
The organ of his speech.

Sfor. O my heart-strings! [Exeunt.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—The MILANESE. A Room in EU-GENIA'S House.

Enter FRANCISCO and EUGENIA.

Fran. Why, couldst thou think, Eugenia, that rewards,
Graces, or favours, though strew'd thick upon
me,

Could ever bribe me to forget mine honour?
Or that I tamely would set down, before
I had dried these eyes, still wet with showers of tears

By the fire of my revenge? Look up, my dearest!
For that proud fair, that thief-like, stepp'd between

Thy promis'd hopes, and robb'd thee of a fortune
Almost in thy possession, hath found,
With horrid proof, his love she thought her
glory,

But hasten'd her sad ruin.

Eug. Do not flatter
A grief that is beneath it; for, however
The credulous duke to me prov'd false and cruel,
It is impossible he could be wrought on
So to serve her.

Fran. Such indeed, I grant,
The stream of his affection was, and ran,
A constant course, till I, with cunning malice
(And yet I wrong my act, for it was justice),
Made it turn backward; and hate, in extremes
(Love banish'd from his heart), to fill the room:
In a word, know the fair Marcelia's dead.

Eug. Dead!

Fran. And by Sforza's hand. Does it not move you?

How coldly you receive it! I expected
The mere relation of so great a blessing,
Borne proudly on the wings of sweet revenge,
Would have call'd on a sacrifice of thanks.
You entertain it with a look, as if
You wish'd it were undone.

Eug. Indeed I do:
For if my sorrows could receive addition,
Her sad fate would increase, not lessen them.
She never injur'd me.

Fran. Have you then no gall,
Anger, or spleen, familiar to your sex?
Or is it possible that you could see
Another to possess what was your due,
And not grow pale with envy?

Eug. Yes, of him
That did deceive me. There's no passion, that
A maid so injur'd ever could partake of,
But I have dearly suffer'd. These three years,
In my desire and labour of revenge,
Trusted to you, I have endur'd the throes

Of teeming women; and will hazard all
Fate can inflict on me, but I will reach
Thy heart, false Sforza!

Fran. Still mine own, and dearer!
And yet in this you but pour oil on fire,
And offer your assistance where it needs not:
And that you may perceive I lay not fallow,
But had your wrongs stamp'd deeply on my
heart,

I did begin his tragedy in her death,
To which it serv'd as prologue, and will make
A memorable story of your fortunes
In my assur'd revenge: only, best sister,
Let us not lose ourselves in the performance,
By your rash undertaking: we will be
As sudden as you could wish.

Eug. Upon those terms
I yield myself and cause, to be dispos'd of
As you think fit.

Enter a Servant.

Fran. Thy purpose?

Serv. There's one Graccho,
That follow'd you, it seems, upon the track,
Since you left Milan, that's importunate
To have access, and will not be denied;
His haste, he says, concerns you.

Fran. Bring him to me. [Exit Servant.]
Though he hath laid an ambush for my life,
Or apprehension, yet I will prevent him,
And work mine own ends out.

Enter GRACCHO.

Grac. Now for my whipping!
And if I now outstrip him not, and catch him,
I'll swear there are worms in my brains.

Fran. Now, my good Graccho!
We meet as 'twere by miracle.
Be brief; what brought thee hither?

Grac. Love and duty,
And vigilance in me for my lord's safety.
You are a condemn'd man, pursued and
sought for,
And your head rated at ten thousand ducats
To him that brings it.

Fran. Very good.

Grac. All passengers
Are intercepted, and your picture sent
To every state confederate with Milan:
It is impossible you should escape
Their curious search.

Eug. Why, let us then turn Romans.
And, falling by our own hands, mock their threats.

Fran. 'Twould show nobly:
But that the honour of our full revenge
Were lost in the rash action. No, Eugenia, Graccho is wise; my friend too, not my servant;

And I dare trust him with my latest secret.
We would, and thou must help us to perform it,
First kill the duke—then, fall what can upon us!
For injuries are writ in brass, kind Graccho,
And not to be forgotten.

Grac. He instructs me
What I should do.

Fran. What's that?

Grac. I labour with
A strong desire to assist you with my service;
And now I am deliver'd of it,

Fran. I told you.

Speak, my oraculous Graccho.

Grac. I have heard, sir,
Of men in debt that, laid for by their creditors,
In all such places where it could be thought
They would take shelter, chose for sanctuary
Their lodgings underneath their creditors' noses; Confident that there they never should be sought for.

Fran. But what infer you from it?

Grac. This, my lord;
That since all ways of your escape are stopp'd,
In Milan only, or, what's more, in the court,
Whither it is presum'd you dare not come,
Conceal'd in some disguise, you may live safe.

Fran. And not to be discover'd?

Grac. But by myself.

Fran. By thee? Alas! I know thee honest,
Graccho,
And I will put thy counsel into act,
And suddenly. Yet, not to be ungrateful
For all thy loving travail to preserve me,
What bloody end soe'er my stars appoint,
Thou shalt be safe, good Graccho.—Who's within there?

Grac. In the devil's name, what means he?
[Aside.]

Enter Servants.

Fran. Take my friend
Into your custody, and bind him fast:
I would not part with him.

Grac. My good lord!

Fran. Dispatch:
'Tis for your good, to keep you honest,
Graccho:
I would not have ten thousand ducats tempt
you

To play the traitor. Why, thou fool!
I can look through and through thee! thy intent

Appear to me as written in thy forehead,
In plain and easy characters: and, but that I scorn a slave's base blood should rust that sword

That from a prince expects a scarlet die,
Thou now wert dead. Away with him!
I will not hear a syllable.

[Exeunt Servants, with Graccho.]
We must trust
Ourselves, Eugenia; and though we make use of

The counsel of our servants, that oil spent,
Like snuffs that do offend, we tread them out.
But now to our last scene, which we'll so carry,

That few shall understand how 'twas begun,
Till all, with half an eye, may see 'tis done.
[Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—MILAN. A Room in the Castle.

Enter PESCARA, TIBERIO, and STEPHANO.

Pes. The like was never read of.

Steph. But that melancholy should work
So far upon a man, as to compel him
To court a thing that has nor sense nor being,
Is unto me a miracle.

Pes. Troth, I'll tell you,
And briefly as I can, by what degrees
He fell into this madness. When, by the care
Of his physicians, he was brought to life,
He call'd for fair Marcelia, and being told
That she was dead, he broke forth in extremes

(I would not say blasphem'd); then it came
Into his fancy that she was accus'd
By his mother and his sister; thrice he curs'd
them,

And thrice his desp'rate hand was on his sword
'T'have kill'd them both; but they restrain'd him;
When wisely his physicians, looking on
The dutchess's wound, to stay his ready hand,
Cried out, it was not mortal.

Tib. 'Twas well thought on.

Pes. He, easily believing what he wish'd,
Fell prostrate at the doctors' feet, and swore,
Provided they recover'd her, he would live
A private man, and they should share his dukedom.

Sfor. [Within] Support her gently.

Pes. Now be your own witnesses;
I am prevented.

Enter LUDOVICO SFORZA, ISABELLA, MARIANA, Doctors, and Servants, with the Body of MARCELIA.

Sfor. Carefully, I beseech you.

How pale and wan she looks! O pardon me,
That I presume, dyed o'er with bloody guilt,
To touch this snow-white hand. How cold
it is!

This once was Cupid's fire-brand, and still
'Tis so to me. How slow her pulses beat too!
Yet in this temper she is all perfection.

Mari. Is not this strange?

Isa Oh! cross him not, dear daughter.

Enter a Servant, and whispers PESCARA.

Pes. With me? What is he?

Serv. He has a strange aspect;
A Jew by birth, and a physician
By his profession, as he says; who, hearing
Of the duke's frenzy, on the forfeit of
His life, will undertake to render him
Perfect in every part. [Apart.

Pes. Bring me to him,
As I find cause, I'll do.

[Apart. Exeunt Pescara and Servants.

Sfor. How sound she sleeps!
Heaven keep her from a lethargy! How long
(But answer me with comfort, I beseech you) Does your judgment tell you that her sleep will last?

1 Doc. We have given her, sir,
A sleepy potion, that will hold her long;
That she may be less sensible of the torment
The searching of her wound will put her to.

Sfor. I am patient.
You see I do not rage, but wait your pleasure.
What do you think she dreams of now? for sure,

Although her body's organs are bound fast,
Her fancy cannot slumber.

1 Doc. That, sir, looks on Your sorrow for your late rash act, and prepares

To meet the free confession of your guilt
With a glad pardon.

Sfor. She was ever kind.
Let her behold me in a pleasing dream

[Kneels.

Thus, on my knees before her (yet that duty
In me is not sufficient); let her see me
Compel my mother, from whom I took life,
And this my sister, partner of my being,
To bow thus low unto her:

Bite your tongues, vile creatures,
And let your inward horror fright your souls,
For having belied that pureness.

And for that dog, Francisco, that seduc'd me,
I'll follow him to hell, but I will find him,
And there live a fourth fury to torment him.
Then, for this cursed hand and arm, that guided

The wicked steel, I'll have them, joint by joint,
With burning irons sear'd off, which I will eat,
I being a vulture fit to taste such carrion.

Lastly—

1 Doc. You are too loud, sir; you disturb
Her sweet repose.

Sfor. I am hush'd.

1 Doc. He's past hope: we can no longer cover the imposture.

Re-enter PESCARA, with FRANCISCO, as a Jew
Doctor, and EUGENIA, disguised.

Fran. I am no god, sir,
To give a new life to her; yet I'll hazard
My head, I'll work the senseless trunk t'appear
To him as it had got a second being.

Pes. Do but this,
Till we use means to win upon his passions,
T'endure to hear she's dead with some small
patience,

And make thy own reward.

Fran. The art I use
Admits no looker on: I only ask
The fourth part of an hour, to perfect that I boldly undertake. Therefore command,
That instantly my pupil and myself
Have leave to make a trial of our skill
Alone and undisturb'd.

Pes. About it straight. [Exit Eugenia.

Sfor. What stranger's this?

Pes. Look up sir, cheerfully;
Comfort in him flows strongly to you.

Sfor. Comfort! from whence came that sound?

Pes. He is a man that can do wonders.

[Beckons Francisco. Exit Francisco.
Do not hinder

The dutchess's wish'd recovery, to inquire
Or what he is, or to give thanks; but leave him
To work this miracle.

Sfor. Sure 'tis my good angel.
I do obey in all things. Be it death
For any to disturb him, or come near,
Till he be pleas'd to call us. O be prosperous,
And make a duke thy bondman. [Exeunt

Re-enter FRANCISCO, leading in EUGENIA, clothed as the Body of MARCELIA.

Fran. 'Tis my purpose.
I'll make the door fast—so—

Eug. Alas! I tremble:
Thus to tyrannise upon, and mock the dead,
Is most inhuman.

Fran. Come we for revenge,
And can we think on pity? If to enjoy
The wish'd-for sacrifice to thy lost honour,
Be in thy wavering thought a benefit,
Now art thou blest.

Eug. Ah me! what follows now?

Fran. What, but a full conclusion of our wishes!
Look on this flow'r, Eugenia—such a thing
As yonder corpse, whose fatal robe you wear,
Must the pale wretch be summon'd to appear

In the grim court of death, whose senses taste
The poisonous powder scatter'd o'er its leaves.
Now mark, that when with rapturous lust,
Thinking the dead Marcelia reviv'd,
The duke shall fix his lips upon thy hand,
Hold fast the poison'd herb, till the fond fool
Has drunk his death-draught from thy hand
he spurn'd.

Eug. I yield myself and cause up, to be dispos'd

As thou think'st fit. [Sits down veiled.]

Fran. Now to the upshot;
And, as it proves, applaud it.—My lord the duke!

Enter with joy, and see the sudden change,
Your servant's hand hath wrought.

Re-enter LUDOVICO SFORZA and the Rest.

Sfor. I live again
In my full confidence that Marcelia may Pronounce my pardon. Can she speak yet?

Fran. No:
You must not look for all your joys at once;
That will ask longer time.

Sfor. By all the dues of love I have had
from her,

This hand seems as it was when first I kiss'd it.
[Kisses her Hand.]

Pes. 'Tis wondrous strange!

Sfor. This act will bind e'en heaven your debtor:

The saints will smile and look on't.
Oh, I could ever feed upon this native
Sweetness.

[Kisses her Hand again. Eugenia throws away the Flower, and sobs.]

She wakes! she lives! and I am blest again.
[She lifts up her Veil.]

Oh! horror! shield me from that face.

Eug. I can no more—thou'rt mark'd for death.

Pes. Treason, treason!

Tib. Call up the guard.

Fran. Then we are lost.

Sfor. Speak.

Eug. This is—

Enter Guard.

Fran. Francisco.

Pes. Monster of men!

Fran. Give me all attributes
Of all you can imagine, yet I glory
To be the thing I was born. I am Francisco;
Francisco, that was rais'd by you, and made
The minion of the time; the same Francisco,
That would have us'd thy wife while she had life,

And after breath'd a jealousy upon thee,
As killing as those damps that belch out plagues
When the foundation of the earth is shaken:
I made thee do a deed heaven will not pardon,
Which was—to kill an innocent.

Sfor. Call forth the tortures
For all that flesh can feel.

Fran. I dare the worst.

Only, to yield some reason to the world
Why I pursu'd this course—look on this face,
Made old by thy base falsehood! 'tis Eugenia.

Sfor. Eugenia!

Fran. Does it start you, sir? my sister,
Seduc'd and fool'd by thee; but thou must pay

The forfeit of thy falsehood. Does it not work yet?

Whatever becomes of me, which I esteem not,
Thou art mark'd for the grave: I've given thee poison

In this cup; now observe me: which, thy lust
Carousing deeply of, made thee forget
Thy vow'd faith to Eugenia.

Pes. O damn'd villain!

How do you, sir? [To Ludovico Sforza.]

Sfor. Like one

That learns to know in death what punishment

Waits on the breach of faith! Oh! now I feel
An Aetna in my entrails. I have liv'd

A prince, and my last breath shall be command.
I burn! I burn! yet, ere life be consum'd,
Let me pronounce upon this wretch all torture
That witty cruelty can invent.

Pes. Away with him!

Tib. In all things we will serve you.

Fran. Farewell, sister!

Now I have kept my word, torments I scorn;
I leave the world with glory. They are men,
And leave behind them name and memory,
That, wrong'd, do right themselves before they die.

[Exeunt Guard, with Francisco.]

Steph. A desperate wretch!

Sfor. I come: death! I obey thee.

Yet I will not die raging; for, alas!
My whole life was a frenzy. Good Eugenia,
In death forgive me.—As you love me, bear
her

To some religious house, there let her spend
The remnant of her life: when I am ashes,
Perhaps she'll be pleas'd, and spare a prayer
For my poor soul. Bury me with Marcelia,
And let our epitaph be—

[Dies. Curtain falls.]

MOORE.

EDWARD MOORE was bred a linen-draper; but having a stronger attachment to Pegasus than the yard, and a more ardent zeal in the pursuit of fame than in the hunt after fortune, he quitted business and applied to the Muses for a support. In verse he had certainly a very happy and pleasing manner; in his Trial of Selim the Persian, which is a compliment to the ingenious Lord Lyttelton, he has shewn himself a perfect master of the most elegant kind of paegyric, viz. that which is couched under the appearance of accusation; and his Fables for the Female Sex seem, not only in the freedom and ease of the versification, but also in the forcibleness of the moral and poignancy of the satire, to approach nearer to the manner of Mr. Gay, than any of the numerous imitations of that author which have been attempted since the publication of his Fables. As a dramatic writer, Mr. Moore has, by no means, met with the success his works had merited: since, out of three plays that he wrote, one of them, The Foundling, has been condemned for its supposed resemblance to a very celebrated comedy (The Conscious Lovers), but to which great preference must be given; and another, The Gamester, met with a cold reception, for no other apparent reason, but because it too nearly touched a favourite and fashionable vice. Yet on the whole his plots are interesting his sentiments delicate, and his language poetical and pleasing; and, what crowns the whole of his recommendation, the greatest purity runs through all his writings, and the apparent tendency of every piece is towards the promotion of morality and virtue. The two plays mentioned, and one more, (Gil Blas) with a serenata (Solomon) make the whole of his dramatic works. Mr. Moore married a lady of the name of Hamilton, whose father was table-decker to the princesses; she had also a very poetical turn, and has been said to have assisted him in the writing of his tragedy. One specimen of her poetry, however, was handed about before their marriage; it was addressed to a daughter of the famous Stephen Duck; and begins with the following stanza:

Would you think it, my Duck, for the fault I must own | Though millions if fortune should lavishly pour,
Your Jenny, at last, is quite covetous grown; | I still should be wretched if I had not MOORE.

And after half a dozen stanzas more, in which, with great ingenuity and delicacy, and yet in a manner that expresses a sincere affection, she has quibbled on our author's name, she concludes with the following lines:

You will wonder, my girl, who this dear one can be, | But you shan't know his name; though I told you before,
Whose merit can boast such a conquest as me; | It begins with an M.; but I dare not say MOORE.

Mr. Moore died the 28. of Febr. 1757, soon after his celebrated papers, entitled The World, were collected into volumes.

THE GAMESTER.

ACTED at Drury Lane 1755. This tragedy is written in prose, and is the best drama that Mr. Moore produced. The language is nervous, and yet pathetic; the plot is artful, yet clearly conducted; the characters are highly marked, yet not unnatural; and the catastrophe is truly tragic, yet not unjust. Still with all these merits it met with but middling success, the general cry against it being, that the distress was too deep to be borne; yet we are rather apt to imagine its want of perfect approbation arose in one part, and that no inconsiderable one, of the audience, from a tenderness of another kind than that of compassion; and that they were less hurt by the distress of Beverley, than by finding their darling vice, their favourite folly, thus vehemently attacked by the strong lance of reason and dramatic execution. It has often been disputed, whether plays, in which the plots are taken from domestic life, should be written in prose or metre; and the success of the present performance and George Barnwell must incline one very strongly in favour of the former. A great author, however, appears to be of a different opinion. Mr. Howard says, that having communicated his play of The Female Gamester to Dr. Samuel Johnson, that gentleman observed "that he could hardly consider a prose tragedy as dramatic; that it was difficult to performers to speak it; that, let it be either in the middling or in low life, it may, though in metre and spirited, be properly familiar and colloquial; that many in the middling rank are not without erudition; that they have the feelings and sensations of nature, and every emotion in consequence thereof, as well as the great; that even the lowest, when impassioned, raise their language; and that the writing of prose is generally the plea and excuse of poverty of genius." We have heard that the interview between Lewson and Stukely, in the fourth act, was the production of Mr. Garrick's pen. When the play was shown in manuscript to Dr. Young, he remarked, that "Gaming wanted such a caustic as the concluding scene of the play presented."

ACT I.

SCENE I.—BEVERLEY'S Lodgings.

MRS. BEVERLEY and CHARLOTTE discovered.

Mrs. B. Be comforted, my dear, all may be well yet. And now, methinks, the lodging begins to look with another face. Oh, sister! sister! if these were all my hardships; if all I had to complain of were no more than quitting my house, servants, equipage, and show, your pity would be weakness.

Char. Is poverty nothing, then?

Mrs. B. Nothing in the world, if it affected only me. While we had a fortune, I was the happiest of the rich; and now 'tis gone, give me but a bare subsistence and my husband's smiles, and I shall be the happiest of the poor. Why do you look at me?

Char. That I may hate my brother.

Mrs. B. Don't talk so, Charlotte.

Char. Has he not undone you?—Oh, this pernicious vice of gaming! But methinks his usual hours of four or five in the morning might have contented him. Need he have staid out all night?—I shall learn to detest him.

Mrs. B. Not for the first fault. He never slept from me before.

Char. Slept from you! No, no, his nights have nothing to do with sleep. How has this one vice driven him from every virtue!—Nay, from his affections too!—The time was, sister—

Mrs. B. And is. I have no fear of his affections. Would I knew that he were safe!

Char. From ruin and his companions. But that's impossible.—His poor little boy too! What must become of him?

Mrs. B. Why, want shall teach him industry. From his father's mistakes he shall learn prudence, and from his mother's resignation, patience. Poverty has no such terrors in it as you imagine. There's no condition of life, sickness and pain excepted, where happiness is excluded. The husbandman, who rises early to his labour, enjoys more welcome rest at night for't. His bread is sweeter to him; his home happier; his family dearer; his enjoyments surer. The sun that rouses him in the morning, sets in the evening to release him. All situations have their comforts if sweet contentment dwell in the heart. But my poor Beverley has none. The thought of having ruined those he loves is misery for ever to him. Would I could ease his mind of that.

Char. If he alone were ruined 'twere just he should be punished. He is my brother 'tis true; but when I think of what he has done—of the fortune you brought him—of his own large estate too, squandered away upon this vilest of passions, and among the vilest of wretches! Oh, I have no patience!—My own little fortune is untouched, he says. Would I were sure on't.

Mrs. B. And so you may—'twould be a sin to doubt it.

Char. I will be sure on't—'twas madness in me to give it to his management. But I'll demand it from him this morning. I have a melancholy occasion for it.

Mrs. B. What occasion?

Char. To support a sister.

Mrs. B. No; I have no need on't. Take it, and reward a lover with it.—The generous Lewson deserves much more—Why won't you make him happy?

Char. Because my sister's miserable.

Mrs. B. You must not think so. I have my jewels left yet. And when all's gone, these hands shall toil for our support. The poor should be industrious—Why those tears, Charlotte?

Char. They flow in pity for you.

Mrs. B. All may be well yet. When he has nothing to lose, I shall fetter him in these arms again; and then what is it to be poor?

Char. Cure him but of this destructive passion, and my uncle's death may retrieve all yet.

Mrs. B. Ay, Charlotte, could we cure him!—But the disease of play admits no cure but poverty; and the loss of another fortune would but increase his shame and his affliction.—Will Mr. Lewson call this morning?

Char. He said so last night. He gave me hints too, that he had suspicions of our friend Stukely.

Mrs. B. Not of treachery to my husband? That he loves play I know, but surely he's honest.

Char. He would fain be thought so;—therefore I doubt him. Honesty needs no pains to set itself off.

Enter LUCY.

Lucy. Your old steward, madam. I had not the heart to deny him admittance, the good old man begged so hard for't. [Exit.]

Enter JARVIS.

Mrs. B. Is this well, Jarvis? I desired you to avoid me.

Jar. Did you, madam? I am an old man, and had forgot. Perhaps, too, you forbade my tears; but I am old, madam, and age will be forgetful.

Mrs. B. The faithful creature! how he moves me! [To Charlotte.]

Jar. I have forgot these apartments too. I remember none such in my young master's house; and yet I have lived in't these five-and-twenty years. His good father would not have dismissed me.

Mrs. B. He had no reason, Jarvis.

Jar. I was faithful to him while he lived, and when he died he bequeathed me to his son. I have been faithful to him too.

Mrs. B. I know it, I know it, Jarvis.

Jar. I have not a long time to live. I asked but to have died with him, and he dismissed me.

Mrs. B. Pr'ythee no more of this! 'Twas his poverty that dismissed you.

Jar. Is he indeed so poor, then?—Oh! he was the joy of my old heart—But must his creditors have all?—And have they sold his house too? His father built it when he was but a prating boy. The times that I have carried him in these arms! And, Jarvis, says he, when a beggar has asked charity of me, why should people be poor? You shan't be poor, Jarvis; if I were a king nobody should be poor. Yet he is poor. And then he was so brave!—Oh, he was a brave little boy! And yet so merciful, he'd not have killed the gnat that stung him.

Mrs. B. Speak to him, Charlotte, for I cannot.

Jar. I have a little money, madam; it might have been more, but I have loved the poor. All that I have is yours.

Mrs. B. No, Jarvis; we have enough yet. I thank you though, and I will deserve your goodness.

Jar. But shall I see my master? And will he let me attend him in his distresses; I'll be no expense to him; and, 'twill kill me to be refused.—Where is he, madam?

Mrs. B. Not at home, Jarvis. You shall see him another time.

Char. To-morrow, or the next day—Oh, Jarvis! what a change is here!

Jar. A change indeed, madam! my old heart aches at it. And yet, methinks—But here's somebody coming.

Re-enter LUCY, with STUKELY.

Lucy. Mr. Stukely, madam. [Exit.]

Stuke. Good morning to you, ladies. Mr. Jarvis, your servant. Where's my friend, madam? [To Mrs. Beverley.]

Mrs. B. I should have asked that question of you. Have you seen him to-day?

Stuke. No, madam.

Char. Nor last night?

Stuke. Last night! Did he not come home then?

Mrs. B. No.—Were you not together?

Stuke. At the beginning of the evening, but not since.—Where can he have staid?

Char. You call yourself his friend, sir—why do you encourage him in this madness of gaming?

Stuke. You have asked me that question before, madam; and I told you my concern was that I could not save him; Mr. Beverley is a man, madam; and if the most friendly entreaties have no effect upon him, I have no other means. My purse has been his, even to the injury of my fortune. If that has been encouragement I deserve censure; but I meant it to retrieve him.

Mrs. B. I don't doubt it, sir, and I thank you—But where did you leave him last night?

Stuke. At Wilson's, madam, if I ought to tell, in company I did not like. Possibly he may be there still. Mr. Jarvis knows the house, I believe.

Jar. Shall I go, madam?

Mrs. B. No; he may take it ill.

Char. He may go as from himself.

Stuke. And if he pleases, madam, without naming me. I am faulty myself, and should conceal the errors of a friend. But I can refuse nothing here. [Bowing to the Ladies.]

Jar. I would fain see him, methinks.

Mrs. B. Do so then, but take care how you upbraid him—I have never upbraided him.

Jar. Would I could bring him comfort!

[Exit.]

Stuke. Don't be too much alarmed, madam. All men have their errors, and their times of seeing them. Perhaps my friend's time is not come yet. But he has an uncle; and old men don't live for ever. You should look forward, madam; we are taught how to value a second fortune by the loss of a first.

[Knocking at the Door.]

Mrs. B. Hark!—No—that knocking was too rude for Mr. Beverley. Pray heaven he be well!

Stuke. Never doubt it, madam. You shall be well too—Every thing shall be well.

[Knocking again.]

Mrs. B. The knocking is a little loud though—Who waits there? Will none of you answer?—None of you, did I say?—Alas, what was I thinking of! I had forgot myself.

Char. I'll go, sister—But don't be alarmed so.

[Exit.]

Stuke. What extraordinary accident have you to fear, madam?

Mrs. B. I beg your pardon; but 'tis ever thus with me in Mr. Beverley's absence. No one knocks at the door, but I fancy it is a messenger of ill news.

Stuke. You are too fearful, madam; 'twas but one night of absence; and if ill thoughts intrude (as love is always doubtful), think of your worth and beauty, and drive them from your breast.

Mrs. B. What thoughts? I have no thoughts that wrong my husband.

Stuke. Such thoughts indeed would wrong him. The world is full of slander; and every wretch that knows himself unjust, charges his neighbour with like passions; and by the general frailty hides his own—If you are wise, and would be happy, turn a deaf ear to such reports. 'Tis ruin to believe them.

Mrs. B. Ay, worse than ruin. 'Twould be to sin against conviction. Why was it mentioned?

Stuke. To guard you against rumour. The sport of half mankind is mischief; and for a single error they make men devils. If their tales reach you, disbelieve them.

Mrs. B. What tales? By whom? Why told? I have heard nothing—or, if I had, with all his errors, my Beverley's firm faith admits no doubt—It is my safety, my seat of rest and joy, while the storm threatens round me. I'll not forsake it. [Stukely sighs, and looks down.] Why turn you, sir, away? and why that sigh?

Stuke. I was attentive, madam; and sighs will come, we know not why. Perhaps I have been too busy—If it should seem so, impute my zeal to friendship, that meant to guard you against evil tongues. Your Beverley is wronged, slandered most vilely—My life upon his truth.

Mrs. B. And mine too. Who is't that doubts it? But no matter—I am prepared, sir—Yet why this caution?—You are my husband's friend; I think you mine too; the common friend of both. [Pauses] I had been unconcerned else.

Stuke. For heaven's sake, madam, be so still! I meant to guard you against suspicion, not to alarm it.

Mrs. B. Nor have you, sir. Who told you of suspicion? I have a heart it cannot reach.

Stuke. Then I am happy—I would say more—but am prevented.

Enter CHARLOTTE.

Char. What a heart has that Jarvis!—A creditor, sister. But the good old man has taken him away—"Don't distress his wife—Don't distress his sister." I could hear him say. "'Tis cruel to distress the afflicted"—And when he saw me at the door, he begged pardon that his friend had knocked so loud.

Stuke. I wish I had known of this. Was it a large demand, madam?

Char. I heard not that; but visits such as these we must expect often—Why so distressed, sister? This is no new affliction.

Mrs. B. No, Charlotte; but I am faint with watching—quite sunk and spiritless—Will you excuse me, sir? I'll to my chamber, and try to rest a little.

[Exit.]

Stuke. Good thoughts go with you, madam. My bait is taken then. [Aside.]—Poor Mrs. Beverley! How my heart grieves to see her thus!

Char. Cure her, and be a friend then.

Stuke. How cure her, madam?

Char. Reclaim my brother.

Stuke. Ay; give him a new creation, or breathe another soul into him. I'll think on't, madam. Advice, I see, is thankless.

Char. Useless I am sure it is, if, through mistaken friendship, or other motives, you feed his passion with your purse, and sooth it by example. Physicians, to cure fevers, keep from the patient's thirsty lip the cup that would inflame him. You give it to his hands. [A knocking] Hark, sir!—These are my brother's desperate symptoms—Another creditor!

Stuke. One not so easily got rid of—What, Lewson!

Enter LEWSON.

Lew. Madam, your servant—Yours, sir. I was inquiring for you at your lodgings.

Stuke. This morning! You had business then?

Lew. You'll call it by another name, perhaps. Where's Mr. Beverley, madam?

Char. We have sent to inquire for him.

Lew. Is he abroad then? He did not use to go out so early.

Char. No, nor stay out so late.

Lew. Is that the case? I am sorry for it. But Mr. Stukely, perhaps, may direct you to him.

Stuke. I have already, sir. But what was your business with me?

Lew. To congratulate you upon your late successes at play. Poor Beverley!—But you are his friend; and there's a comfort in having successful friends.

Stuke. And what am I to understand by this?

Lew. That Beverley's a poor man, with a rich friend; that's all.

Stuke. Your words would mean something, I suppose. Another time, sir, I shall desire an explanation.

Lew. And why not now? I am no dealer in long sentences. A minute or two will do for me.

Stuke. But not for me, sir.—I am slow of apprehension, and must have time and privacy. A lady's presence engages my attention. Another morning I may be found at home.

Lew. Another morning, then, I'll wait upon you.

Stuke. I shall expect you, sir. Madam, your servant. [Exit.

Char. What mean you by this?

Lew. To hint to him that I know him.

Char. How know him? Mere doubt, and supposition!

Lew. I shall have proof soon.

Char. And what then? Would you risk your life to be his punisher?

Lew. My life, madam! Don't be afraid. But let it content you that I know this Stukely—'T would be as easy to make him honest as brave.

Char. And what do you intend to do.

Lew. Nothing, till I have proof. But methinks, madam, I am acting here without authority. Could I have leave to call Mr. Beverley brother, his concerns would be my own. Why will you make my services appear officious?

Char. You know my reasons, and should not press me. But I am cold, you say; and cold I will be, while a poor sister's destitute—But let us change this subject—Your business here this morning is with my sister. Misfortunes press too hard upon her; yet, till to-day she has borne them nobly.

Lew. Where is she?

Char. Gone to her chamber. Her spirits failed her.

Lew. I hear her coming. Let what has passed with Stukely be a secret—She has already too much to trouble her.

Enter MRS. BEVERLEY.

Mrs. B. Good morning, sir; I heard your voice, and, as I thought, inquiring for me. Where's Mr. Stukely, Charlotte?

Char. This moment gone—You have been in tears, sister; but here's a friend shall comfort you.

Lew. Or, if I add to your distresses, I'll beg your pardon, madam. The sale of your house and furniture was finished yesterday.

Mrs. B. I know it, sir; I know too your generous reason for putting me in mind of it. But you have obliged me too much already.

Lew. There are trifles, madam, which I know you have set a value on; those I have purchased, and will deliver. I have a friend too, that esteems you—He has bought largely, and will call nothing his, till he has seen you. If a visit to him would not be painful, he has begged it may be this morning.

Mrs. B. Not painful in the least, my pain is from the kindness of my friends. Why am I to be obliged beyond the power of return?

Lew. You shall repay us at your own time. I have a coach waiting at the door—Shall we have your company, madam? [To Charlotte.

Char. No; my brother may return soon; I'll stay and receive him.

Mrs. B. He may want a comforter, perhaps. But don't upbraid him, Charlotte. We shan't be absent long. Come, sir, since I must be so obliged.

Lew. 'Tis I that am obliged. An hour, or less, will be sufficient for us. We shall find you at home, madam?

[To Charlotte. Exit with Mrs. Beverley.
Char. Certainly.

SCENE II.—STUKELY'S Lodgings.

Enter STUKELY.

Stuke. That Lewson suspects me, 'tis too plain. Yet why should he suspect me?—I appear the friend of Beverley as much as he. But I am rich, it seems; and so I am, thanks to another's folly and my own wisdom. To what use is wisdom, but to take advantage of the weak? This Beverley's my fool; I cheat him, and he calls me friend. But more business must be done yet—His wife's jewels are unsold; so is the reversion of his uncle's estate: I must have these too. And then there's a treasure above all—I love his wife—Before she knew this Beverley I loved her; but, like a cringing fool, bowed at a distance, while he stepped in and won her—Never, never will I forgive him for it. Those hints this morning were well thrown in—Already they have fastened on her. If jealousy should weaken her affections, want may corrupt her virtue—These jewels may do much—He shall demand them of her; which, when mine, shall be converted to special purposes—

Enter BATES.

What now, Bates?

Bates. Is it a wonder then to see me? The forces are all in readiness, and only wait for orders. Where's Beverley?

Stuke. At last night's rendezvous, waiting for me. Is Dawson with you?

Bates. Dressed like a nobleman; with money in his pocket, and a set of dice that shall deceive the devil.

Stuke. That fellow has a head to undo a nation; but for the rest, they are such low-mannered, ill-looking dogs, I wonder Beverley has not suspected them.

Bates. No matter for manners and looks. Do you supply them with money, and they are gentlemen by profession—The passion of gaming casts such a mist before the eyes, that the nobleman shall be surrounded with sharpers, and imagine himself in the best company.

Stuke. There's that Williams too. It was he, I suppose, that called at Beverley's with the note this morning. What directions did you give him?

Bates. To knock loud and be clamorous. Did not you see him?

Stuke. No; the fool sneaked off with Jarvis. Had he appeared within doors as directed, the note had been discharged. I waited there on purpose. I want the women to think well of me, for Lewson's grown suspicious; he told me so himself.

Bates. What answer did you make him?

Stuke. A short one—That I would see him soon for further explanation.

Bates. We must take care of him. But what have we to do with Beverley? Dawson and the rest are wondering at you.

Stuke. Why, let them wonder. I have designs above their narrow reach. They see me lend him money, and they stare at me.

But they are fools. I want him to believe me beggared by him.

Bates. And what then?

Stuke. Ay, there's the question; but no matter; at night you may know more. He waits for me at Wilson's.—I told the women where to find him.

Bates. To what purpose?

Stuke. To save suspicion. It looked friendly, and they thanked me.—Old Jarvis was dispatched to him.

Bates. And may entreat him home—

Stuke. No; he expects money from me, but I'll have none. His wife's jewels must go—Women are easy creatures, and refuse nothing where they love. Follow to Wilson's—Come, sir.

Let drudging fools by honesty grow great;
The shorter road to riches is deceit.

[Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—A Gaming-house, with a Table, Box, Dice, etc.

BEVERLEY discovered sitting.

Bev. Why, what a world is this! The slave that digs for gold receives his daily pittance, and sleeps contented; while those for whom he labours convert their good to mischief, making abundance the means of want. What had I to do with play? I wanted nothing—My wishes and my means were equal.—The poor followed me with blessings, love scattered roses on my pillow, and morning waked me to delight—Oh, bitter thought, that leads to what I was, by what I am! I would forget both—Who's there?

Enter a Waiter.

Wait. A gentleman, sir, inquires for you.

Bev. He might have used less ceremony. Stukely, I suppose?

Wait. No, sir, a stranger.

Bev. Well, show him in. [Exit Waiter]
A messenger from Stukely then; from him that has undone me! yet all in friendship—And now he lends me his little to bring back fortune to me.

Enter JARVIS.

Jarvis!—Why this intrusion?—Your absence had been kinder.

Jar. I came in duty, sir. If it be troublesome—

Bev. It is—I would be private—hid even from myself. Who sent you hither?

Jar. One that would persuade you home again. My mistress is not well—her tears told me so.

Bev. Go with thy duty there then—Pr'ythee, be gone—I have no business for thee.

Jar. Yes, sir; to lead you from this place. I am your servant still. Your prosperous fortune blessed my old age: If that has left you, I must not leave you.

Bev. Not leave me! Recall past time then; or, through this sea of storms and darkness, show me a star to guide me.—But what canst thou?

Jar. The little that I can I will. You have been generous to me—I would not offend you, sir—but—

Bev. No; think'st thou I'd ruin thee too? I have enough of shame already—My wife! my wife! Wouldst thou believe it, Jarvis? I have not seen her all this long night—I, who have loved her so, that every hour of absence seemed as a gap in life! but other bonds have held me—Oh, I have played the boy! dropping my counters in the stream, and reaching to redeem them, lost myself!

Jar. For pity's sake, sir!—I have no heart to see this change.

Bev. Not I to bear it—How speaks the world of me, Jarvis?

Jar. As of a good man dead—Of one who, walking in a dream, fell down a precipice. The world is sorry for you.

Bev. Ay, and pities me—Says it not so? But I was born to infamy. I'll tell thee what it says; it calls me villain, a treacherous husband, a cruel father, a false brother, one lost to nature and her charities; or, to say all in one short word, it calls me—gamester. Go to thy mistress—I'll see her presently.

Jar. And why not now? Rude people press upon her; loud, bawling creditors; wretches who know no pity—I met one at the door—he would have seen my mistress: I wanted means of present payment, so promised it to-morrow: but others may be pressing, and she has grief enough already.—Your absence hangs too heavy on her.

Bev. Tell her I'll come then. I have a moment's business. But what hast thou to do with my distresses? Thy honesty has left thee poor; and age wants comfort.—Keep what thou hast, lest, between thee and the grave, misery steal in. I have a friend shall counsel me—This is that friend.

Enter STUKELY.

Stuke. How fares it, Beverley? Honest Mr. Jarvis, well met. That viper, Williams! was it not he that troubled you this morning?

Jar. My mistress heard him then; I am sorry that she heard him.

Bev. And Jarvis promised payment.

Stuke. That must not be. Tell him I'll satisfy him.

Jar. Will you, sir? Heaven will reward you for it.

Bev. Generous Stukely! Friendship like yours, had it ability like will, would more than balance the wrongs of fortune.

Stuke. You think too kindly of me—Make haste to Williams; his clamours may be rude else. [To Jarvis.]

Jar. And my master will go home again—Alas! sir, we know of hearts there breaking for his absence. [Exit.]

Bev. 'Would I were dead!

Stuke. Ha! ha! ha! Pr'ythee, be a man, and leave dying to disease and old age. Fortune may be ours again; at least we'll try for't.

Bev. No; it has fooled us on too far.

Stuke. Ay, ruined us; and therefore we'll sit down contented. These are the despondings of men without money; but let the shining ore chink in the pocket, and folly turns to wisdom. We are fortune's children—True, she's a fickle mother; but shall we droop because she's peevish?—No; she has smiles in store, and these her frowns are meant to brighten them.

Bev. Is this a time for levity?—But you are single in the ruin, and therefore may talk lightly of it; with me 'tis complicated misery.

Stuke. You censure me unjustly; I but assumed these spirits to cheer my friend. Heaven knows he wants a comforter.

Bev. What new misfortune?

Stuke. I would have brought you money, but lenders want securities. What's to be done? All that was mine is yours already.

Bev. And there's the double weight that sinks me. I have undone my friend too; one who, to save a drowning wretch, reached out his hand, and perished with him.

Stuke. Have better thoughts.

Bev. Whence are they to proceed? I have nothing left.

Stuke. [Sighing] Then we're indeed undone—What! nothing? No moveables, nor useless trinkets?—Bawbles locked up in caskets, to starve their owners? I have ventured deeply for you.

Bev. Therefore this heart-ache; for I am lost beyond all hope.

Stuke. No; means may be found to save us.—Jarvis is rich—Who made him so? This is no time for ceremony.

Bev. And is it for dishonesty? The good old man! Shall I rob him too? My friend would grieve for't.—No; let the little that he has buy food and clothing for him.

Stuke. Good morning then. [Going.]

Bev. So hasty! why, then good morning.

Stuke. And when we meet again upbraid me—Say it was I that tempted you—Tell Lewson so, and tell him I have wronged you—He has suspicions of me, and will thank you.

Bev. No; we have been companions in a rash voyage, and the same storm has wrecked us both: mine shall be self-upbraidings.

Stuke. And will they feed us? You deal unkindly by me. I have sold and borrowed for you while land or credit lasted; and now, when fortune should be tried, and my heart whispers me success, I am deserted—turned loose to beggary, while you have hoards.

Bev. What hoards? Name them, and take them!

Stuke. Jewels.

Bev. And shall this thriftless hand seize them too? My poor, poor wife! Must she lose all? I would not wound her so.

Stuke. Nor I, but from necessity. One effort more, and fortune may grow kind.—I have unusual hopes.

Bev. Think of some other means then.

Stuke. I have, and you rejected them.

Bev. Pr'ythee let me be a man.

Stuke. Ay, and your friend a poor one—But I have done: and for these trinkets of a woman, why let her keep them to deck her pride with, and show a laughing world that she has finery to starve in.

Bev. No; she shall yield up all—My friend demands it. But need we have talked lightly of her? The jewels that she values are truth and innocence—Those will adorn her for ever; and, for the rest, she wore them for a husband's pride, and to his wants will give them. Alas! you know her not.—Where shall we meet?

Stuke. No matter; I have changed my mind—Leave me to a prison; 'tis the reward of friendship.

Bev. Perish mankind first!—Leave you to a prison! No! fallen as you see me, I'm not that wretch: nor would I change this heart, o'ercharged as 'tis with folly and misfortune, for one most prudent and most happy, if callous to a friend's distress.

Stuke. You are too warm.

Bev. In such a cause, not to be warm is to be frozen. Farewell—I'll meet you at your lodgings.

Stuke. Reflect a little.—The jewels may be lost—Better not hazard them—I was too pressing.

Bev. And I ungrateful. Reflection takes up time.—I have no leisure for't—Within an hour expect me. [Exit.]

Stuke. The thoughtless, shallow prodigal! We shall have sport at night then—but hold—The jewels are not ours yet—The lady may refuse them—The husband may relent too—'Tis more than probable—I'll write a note to Beverley, and the contents shall spur him to demand them—But am I grown this rogue through avarice? No; I have warmer motives, love and revenge—Ruin the husband, and the wife's virtue may be bid for.

Enter BATES.

Look to your men, Bates; there's money stirring.—We meet to-night upon this spot.—Hasten, and tell them.—Hasten, I say, the rogues will scatter else.

Bates. Not till their leader bids them.

Stuke. Give them the word, and follow me; I must advise with you—This is a day of business. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—BEVERLEY'S Lodgings.

Enter BEVERLEY and CHARLOTTE.

Char. Your looks are changed too;—there's wildness in them. My wretched sister! How will it grieve her to see you thus!

Bev. No, no; a little rest will ease me. And for your Lewson's kindness to her it has my thanks; I have no more to give him.

Char. Yes; a sister and her fortune. I trifle with him, and he complains—My looks, he says, are cold upon him. He thinks too—

Bev. That I have lost your fortune—He dares not think so.

Char. Nor does he—you are too quick at guessing—He cares not if you had. That care is mine—I lent it you to husband, and now I claim it.

Bev. You have suspicions then?

Char. Cure them, and give it me.

Bev. To stop a sister's chidings?

Char. To vindicate her brother.

Bev. How if he needs no vindication?

Char. I would fain hope so.

Bev. Ay; would and cannot—Leave it to time then; 'twill satisfy all doubts.

Char. Mine are already satisfied.

Bev. 'Tis well. And when the subject is renewed, speak to me like a sister, and I will answer like a brother.

Char. To tell me I'm a beggar.—Why, tell it now. I, that can bear the ruin of those dearer to me—the ruin of a sister and her infant, can bear that too.

Bev. No more of this—you wring my heart.

Char. 'Would that the misery were all your own! But innocence must suffer—Unthinking rioter!—whose home was heaven to him! an angel dwelt there, and a little cherub, that crown'd his days with blessings.—How has he lost this heaven, to league with devils!

Bev. Forbear, I say; reproaches come too late;—they search, but cure not. And, for the fortune you demand, we'll talk to-morrow on't—our tempers may be milder.

Char. Or, if 'tis gone, why farewell all. I claimed it for a sister.—But I'll upbraid no more. What heaven permits, perhaps it may ordain.—Yet, that the husband, father, brother, should be its instruments of vengeance!—'Tis grievous to know that!

Bev. If you're my sister spare the remembrance—it wounds too deeply. To-morrow shall clear all; and when the worst is known, it may be better than your fears. Comfort my wife; and for the pains of absence I'll make atonement.

Char. See where she comes!—Look cheerfully upon her Affections such as hers are prying, and lend those eyes that read the soul.

Enter MRS. BEVERLEY and LEWSON.

Mrs. B. My life!

Bev. My love! how fares it? I have been a truant husband.

Mrs. B. But we meet now, and that heals all—Doubts and alarms I have had; but in this dear embrace I bury and forget them. My friend here, [Pointing to Lewson] has been indeed a friend. Charlotte, 'tis you must thank him: your brother's thanks and mine are of too little value.

Bev. Yet what we have we'll pay. I thank you, sir, and am obliged. I would say more, but that your goodness to the wife upbraids the husband's follies. Had I been wise, she had not trespassed on your bounty.

Lew. Nor has she trespassed. The little I have done acceptance overpays.

Char. So friendship thinks—

Mrs. B. And doubles obligations by striving to conceal them—We'll talk another time on't—You are too thoughtful, love.

Bev. No; I have reason for these thoughts.

Char. And hatred for the cause—'Would you had that too!

Bev. I have—The cause was avarice.

Char. And who the tempter?

Bev. A ruined friend—ruined by too much kindness.

Lew. Ay, worse than ruined; stabbed in his fame, mortally stabbed—riches can't cure him.

Bev. Or if they could, those I have drained him of. Something of this he hinted in the morning—that Lewson had suspicions of him—Why these suspicions? [Angrily.]

Lew. At school we knew this Stukely. A cunning, plodding boy he was, sordid and cruel, slow at his task, but quick at shifts and tricking. He schemed out mischief, that others might be punished; and would tell his tale with so much art, that for the lash he merited, rewards and praise were given him. Show me a boy with such a mind, and time, that ripens manhood in him, shall ripen vice too—I'll prove him, and lay him open to you—Till then be warned—I know him, and therefore shun him.

Bev. As I would those that wrong him.—You are too busy, sir.

Mrs. B. No; not too busy—Mistaken, perhaps—That had been milder.

Lew. No matter, madam. I can bear this, and praise the heart that prompts it—Pity such friendship should be so placed!

Bev. Again, sir! But I'll bear too—You wrong him, Lewson, and will be sorry for't.

Char. Ay; when 'tis proved he wrongs him. The world is full of hypocrites.

Bev. And Stukely one—so you would infer, I think.—I'll bear no more of this—my heart aches for him—I have undone him.

Lew. The world says otherwise.

Bev. The world is false then—I have business with you, love. [To Mrs. Beverley] We'll leave them to their rancour. [Going.]

Char. No; we shall find room within for't.—Come this way, sir. [To Lewson.]

Lew. Another time my friend will thank me; that time is hastening too.

[Exeunt Lewson and Charlotte.]

Bev. They hurt me beyond bearing—Is Stukely false! Then honesty has left us! 'Twere sinning against heaven to think so.

Mrs. B. I never doubted him.

Bev. No; you are charity. Meekness and ever-during patience live in that heart, and love that knows no change.—Why did I ruin you?

Mrs. B. You have not ruined me. I have no wants when you are present, nor wishes in your absence, but to be blest with your return. Be but resigned to what has happened, and I am rich beyond the dreams of avarice.

Bev. My generous girl!—But memory will be busy; still crowding on my thoughts, to sour the present by the past. I have another pang too.

Mrs. B. Tell it, and let me cure it.

Bev. That friend—that generous friend, whose fame they have traduced—I have undone him too. While he had means he lent me largely; and now a prison must be his portion.

Mrs. B. No; I hope otherwise.

Bev. To hope must be to act. The charitable wish feeds not the hungry—Something must be done.

Mrs. B. What?

Bev. In bitterness of heart he told me, just now he told me, I had undone him. Could I hear that, and think of happiness? No, I have disclaimed it while he is miserable.

Mrs. B. The world may mend with us, and then we may be grateful. There's comfort in that hope.

Bev. Ay, 'tis the sick man's cordial, his promised cure; while, in preparing it, the patient dies—What now?

Enter Lucy.

Lucy. A letter, sir. [Delivers it, and exit.]

Bev. The hand is Stukely's.

[Opens it, and reads it to himself.]

Mrs. B. And brings good news—at least I'll hope so—What says he, love?

Bev. Why this—too much for patience. Yet he directs me to conceal it from you.

[Reads.]

Let your haste to see me be the only proof of your esteem for me, I have determined, since we parted, to bid adieu to England; choosing rather to forsake my country, than owe my freedom in it to the means we talked of. Keep this a secret at home, and hasten to the ruined. R. STUKELY.

Ruined by friendship!—I must relieve or follow him.

Mrs. B. Follow him did you say? Then I am lost indeed!

Bev. Oh, this infernal vice! how has it sunk me! A vice, whose highest joy was poor to my domestic happiness. Yet how have I pursued it! turned all my comforts to bitterest pangs, and all my smiles to tears.—Damned, damned infatuation!

Mrs. B. Be cool, my life! What are the means the letter talks of? Have you—have I those means? Tell me, and ease me. I have no life while you are wretched.

Bev. No, no; it must not be. 'Tis I alone have sinned; 'tis I alone must suffer. You shall reserve those means, to keep my child and his wronged mother from want and wretchedness.

Mrs. B. What means?

Bev. I came to rob you of them—but cannot—dare not—Those jewels are your sole support—I should be more than monster to request them.

Mrs. B. My jewels! Trifles, not worth speaking of, if weighed against a husband's peace; but let them purchase that, and the world's wealth is of less value.

Bev. How little do I seem before such virtues!

Mrs. B. No more, my love. I kept them all occasion called to use them; now is the occasion, and I'll resign them cheerfully.

Bev. Why, we'll be rich in love then. But this excess of kindness melts me. Yet for a friend one would do much—He has denied me nothing.

Mrs. B. Come to my closet—But let him manage wisely. We have no more to give him.

Bev. Where learned my love this excellence? 'Tis heaven's own teaching: that heaven, which to an angel's form has given a mind more lovely. I am unworthy of you, but will deserve you better.

Henceforth my follies and neglects shall cease,
And all to come be penitence and peace;
Vice shall no more attract me with her charms,
Nor pleasure reach me, but in these dear arms.

[Excunt.]

ACT III.

SCENE I—STUKELY'S Lodgings.

Enter STUKELY and BATES.

Stuke. So runs the world, Bates. Fools are the natural prey of knaves; nature designed them so, when she made lambs for wolves. The laws, that fear and policy have framed, nature disclaims: she knows but two, and those are force and cunning. The nobler law is force; but then there's danger in't; while cunning, like a skillful miner, works safely and unseen.

Bates. And therefore wisely. Force must have nerves and sinews; cunning wants neither. The dwarf that has it shall trip the giant's heels up.

Stuke. And bind him to the ground. Why, we'll erect a shrine for nature, and be her oracles. Conscience is weakness; fear made it, and fear maintains it. The dread of shame, inward reproaches, and fictitious burnings swell out the phantom. Nature knows none of this; her laws are freedom.

Bates. Sound doctrine, and well delivered!

Stuke. We are sincere too, and practise what we teach. Let the grave pedant say as much.—But now to business—The jewels are disposed of, and Beverley again worth money. If my design succeeds, this night we finish with him—Go to your lodgings, and be busy—You understand conveyances, and can make ruin sure.

Bates. Better stop here. The sale of this reversion may be talked of—There's danger in it.

Stuke. No, 'tis the mark I aim at. We'll thrive and laugh. You are the purchaser, and there's the payment. [Giving a Pocket-book] He thinks you rich; and so you shall be. Inquire for titles, and deal hardly; 'twill look like honesty.

Bates. How if he suspects us?

Stuke. Leave it to me. I study hearts, and when to work upon them. Go to your lodgings; and if we come, be busy over papers. Talk of a thoughtless age, of gaming and extravagance; you have a face for't.

Bates. A feeling too that would avoid it. We push too far; but I have cautioned you. If it ends ill, you'll think of me—adieu. [Exit.]

Stuke. This fellow sins by halves; his fears are conscience to him. I'll turn these fears to use. Rogues that dread shame will still be greater rogues to hide their guilt—Lewson grows troublesome—We must get rid of him—He knows too much. I have a tale for Beverley; part of it truth too—He shall call Lewson to account—If it succeeds, 'tis well; if not, we must try other means—But here he comes—I must dissemble.

Enter BEVERLEY.

Look to the door there!—[In a seeming Fright]—My friend!—I thought of other visitors.

Bev. No; these shall guard you from them. [Offering Notes] Take them, and use them cautiously—The world deals hardly by us.

Stuke. And shall I leave you destitute? No; your wants are the greatest. Another climate may treat me kinder. The shelter of to-night takes me from this.

Bev. Let these be your support then—Yet is there need of parting? I may have means again; we'll share them, and live wisely.

Stuke. No; I should tempt you on. Habit is nature in me: ruin can't cure it. Even now I would be gaming. Taught by experience as I am, and knowing this poor sum is all that's left us, I am for venturing still—And say I am to blame—Yet will this little supply our wants? No; we must put it out to usury.—Whether 'tis madness in me, or some restless impulse of good fortune, I yet am ignorant; but—

Bev. Take it, and succeed then. I'll try no more.

Stuke. 'Tis surely impulse; it pleads so strongly—But you are cold—We'll e'en part here then. And for this last reserve, keep it for better uses; I'll have none on't. I thank you though, and will seek fortune singly—One thing I had forgot—

Bev. What is it?

Stuke. Perhaps 'twere best forgotten. But I am open in my nature, and zealous for the honour of my friend—Lewson speaks freely of you.

Bev. Of you I know he does.

Stuke. I can forgive him for't; but, for my friend, I'm angry.

Bev. What says he of me?

Stuke. That Charlotte's fortune is embezzled—He talks on't loudly.

Bev. He shall be silenced then—How heard you of it?

Stuke. From many. He questioned Bates about it. You must account with him, he says.

Bev. Or be with me—and soon too.

Stuke. Speak mildly to him. Cautions are best.

Bev. I'll think on't—But whither go you?

Stuke. From poverty and prisons—No matter whither. If fortune changes, you may hear from me.

Bev. May these be prosperous then, [Offering the Notes, which he refuses] Nay, they are yours—I have sworn it, and will have nothing—Take them, and use them.

Stuke. Singly I will not—My cares are for my friend; for his lost fortune and ruined family. All separate interests I disclaim. Together we have fallen; together we must rise. My heart, my honour, and affections, all will have it so.

Bev. I am weary of being fooled.

Stuke. And so am I—Here let us part then—These bodings of good fortune shall all be stifled; call them folly, and forgot them—farewell.

Bev. No; stay a moment—How my poor heart's distracted! I have the bodings too; but whether caught from you, or prompted by my good or evil genius, I know not—The trial shall determine—And yet, my wife—

Stuke. Ay, ay, she'll chide.

Bev. No; my chidings are all here.

[Pointing to his Heart.]

Stuke. I'll not persuade you.

Bev. I am persuaded; by reason too; the strongest reason, necessity. Oh, could I but regain the height I have fallen from, heaven should forsake me in my latest hour, if I again mixed in these scenes, or sacrificed the husband's peace, his joy, and best affections, to avarice and infamy.

Stuke. I have resolved like you; and, since our motives are so honest, why should we fear success?

Bev. Come on then—Where shall we meet?

Stuke. At Wilson's—Yet if it hurts you, leave me: I have misled you often.

Bev. We have misled each other—But come! Fortune is fickle, and may be tir'd with plaguing us—There let us rest our hopes.

Stuke. Yet think a little.

Bev. I cannot—thinking but distracts me.

When desperation leads, all thoughts are vain;

Reason would lose what rashness may obtain. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—BEVERLEY'S Lodgings.

Enter MRS. BEVERLEY and CHARLOTTE.

Char. 'Twas all a scheme, a mean one; unworthy of my brother.

Mrs. B. No, I am sure it was not—Stukely is honest too, I know he is.—This madness has undone them both.

Char. My brother irrecoverable—You are too spiritless a wife—A mournful tale, mixed with a few kind words, will steal away your soul. The world's too subtle for such goodness. Had I been by, he should have asked your life sooner than those jewels.

Mrs. B. He should have had it then. [Warmly.] I live but to oblige him. She who can love and is beloved, like me, will do as much. Men have done more for mistresses, and women for a base deluder: and shall a wife do less? Your chidings hurt me, Charlotte.

Char. And come too late; they might have saved you else. How could he use you so?

Mrs. B. 'Twas friendship did it. His heart was breaking for a friend.

Char. The friend that has betrayed him.

Mrs. B. Pr'ythee don't think so.

Char. To-morrow he accounts with me.

Mrs. B. And fairly—I will not doubt it.

Char. Unless a friend has wanted—I have no patience—Sister! sister! we are bound to curse this friend.

Mrs. B. My Beverley speaks nobly of him.

Char. And Lewson truly—But I displease you with this talk.—To-morrow will instruct us.

Mrs. B. Stay till it comes then—I would not think so hardly.

Char. Nor I, but from conviction—Yet we have hope of better days. My uncle is infirm, and of an age that threatens hourly—Or if he lives, you never have offended him; and for distresses so unmerited he will have pity.

Mrs. B. I know it, and am cheerful. We have no more to lose; and for what is gone, if it brings prudence home, the purchase was well made.

Char. My Lewson will be kind too. While he and I have life and means you shall divide with us—And see, he's here.

Enter LEWSON.

We were just speaking of you.

Lew. 'Tis best to interrupt you then. Few characters will bear a scrutiny; and where the bad outweighs the good, he's safest that's least talked of. What say you, madam?

[To Charlotte.]

Char. That I hate scandal, though a woman—therefore talk seldom of you.

Mrs. B. Or, with more truth, that though a woman, she loves to praise—therefore talks always of you. I'll leave you to decide it.

[Exit.]

Lew. How good and amiable! I came to talk in private with you, of matters that concern you.

Char. What matters?

Lew. First, answer me sincerely to what I ask.

Char. Propose your question.

Lew. 'Tis now a tedious twelvemonth since, with an open and kind heart, you said you loved me. And when, in consequence of such sweet words, I pressed for marriage, you gave a voluntary promise that you would live for me.

Char. You think me changed then?

[Angrily.

Lew. I did not say so. Time and a near acquaintance with my faults may have brought change—if it be so; or for a moment, if you have wished this promise were unmade, here I acquit you of it—This is my question then; and with such plainness as I ask it, I shall entreat an answer. Have you repented of this promise?

Char. Why am I doubted?

Lew. My doubts are of myself. I have my faults, and you have observation. If, from my temper, my words, or actions, you have conceived a thought against me, or even a wish for separation, all that has passed is nothing.

Char. Why now I'll answer you. Your doubts are prophecies—I am really changed.

Lew. Indeed!

Char. I could torment you now, as you have me; but it is not in my nature.—That I am changed, I own: for what at first was inclination is now grown reason in me; and from that reason, had I the world, nay, were I poorer than the poorest, and you too wanting bread—I would be yours, and happy.

Lew. My kindest Charlotte! [Taking her Hand] Thanks are too poor for this—and words too weak! But if we loved so, why should our union be delayed?

Char. For happier times. The present are too wretched.

Lew. I may have reasons that press it now.

Char. What reasons?

Lew. The strongest reasons; unanswerable ones.

Char. Be quick and name them.

Lew. First promise, that to-morrow, or the next day, you will be mine for ever.

Char. I do—though misery should succeed.

Lew. Thus then I seize you! And with you every joy on this side heaven!

Char. Now, sir, your secret.

Lew. Your fortune's lost.

Char. My fortune lost!—I'll study to be humble then. But was my promise claimed for this? How nobly generous! Where learned you this sad news?

Lew. From Bates, Stukeley's prime agent. I have obliged him, and he's grateful—He told me in friendship, to warn me from my Charlotte.

Char. 'Twas honest in him, and I'll esteem him for it.

Lew. He knows much more than he has told.

Char. For me it is enough. And for your generous love, I thank you from my soul. If you'd oblige me more, give me a little time.

Lew. Why time? It robs us of our happiness.

Char. I have a task to learn first. The little pride this fortune gave me must be subdued. Once we were equal; but now 'tis otherwise; and for a life of obligations, I have not learned to bear it.

Lew. Mine is that life. You are too noble.

Char. Leave me to think on't.

Lew. To-morrow then you'll fix my happiness?

Char. All that I can I will.

Lew. It must be so; we live but for each other. Keep what you know a secret; and when we meet to-morrow, more may be known.—Farewell. [Exit.

Char. My poor, poor sister! how would this wound her! But I'll conceal it, and speak comfort to her. [Exit.

SCENE III.—A Room in a Gaming-house.

Enter BEVERLEY and STUKELY.

Bev. Whither would you lead me?

[Angrily.

Stuke. Where we may vent our curses.

Bev. Ay, on yourself, and those damned counsels that have destroyed me. A thousand fiends were in that bosom, and all let loose to tempt me—I had resisted else.

Stuke. Go on, sir—I have deserved this from you.

Bev. And curses everlasting—Time is too scanty for them—

Stuke. What have I done?

Bev. What the arch-devil of old did—soothed with false hopes for certain ruin.

Stuke. Myself unhurt; nay, pleased at your destruction—So your words mean. Why, tell it to the world. I am too poor to find a friend in't.

Bev. A friend! What's he? I had a friend.

Stuke. And have one still.

Bev. Ay; I'll tell you of this friend. He found me happiest of the happy. Fortune and honour crowned me; and love and peace lived in my heart. One spark of folly lurked there; that too he found: and by deceitful breath blew it into flames, that have consumed me. This friend were you to me.

Stuke. A little more, perhaps—The friend, who gave his all to save you; and not succeeding, chose ruin with you. But no matter, I have undone you, and am a villain.

Bev. No; I think not—The villains are within.

Stuke. What villains?

Bev. Dawson and the rest—We have been dupes to sharpers.

Stuke. How know you this? I have had doubts as well as you; yet still as fortune changed I blushed at my own thoughts.—But you have proofs, perhaps?

Bev. Ay, damned ones. Repeated losses—Night after night, and no reverse—Chance has no hand in this.

Stuke. I think more charitably; yet I am peevish in my nature, and apt to doubt—The world speaks fairly of this Dawson; so it does of the rest. We have watched them closely too. But 'tis a right usurped by losers, to think the winners knaves—We'll have more manhood in us.

Bev. I know not what to think—This night has stung me to the quick—Blasted my reputation too—I have bound my honour to these vipers; played meanly upon credit, till I tired them; and now they shun me, to rifle one another. What's to be done?

Stuke. Nothing. My counsels have been fatal.

Bev. By heaven I'll not survive this shame—Traitor! 'tis you have brought it on me. [Taking hold of him] Show me the means to save me, or I'll commit a murder here, and next upon myself.

Stuke. Why, do it then, and rid me of ingratitude.

Bev. Pr'ythee forgive this language—I speak I know not what—Rage and despair are in my heart, and hurry me to madness. My home is horror to me—I'll not return to it. Speak quickly; tell me, if, in this wreck of fortune, one hope remains? Name it, and be my oracle.

Stuke. To vent your curses on—You have bestowed them liberally. Take your own counsel; and should a desperate hope present itself, 'twill suit your desperate fortune. I'll not advise you.

Bev. What hope? By heaven I'll catch at it, however desperate. I am so sunk in misery it cannot lay me lower.

Stuke. You have an uncle.

Bev. Ay; what of him?

Stuke. Old men live long by temperance; while their heirs starve on expectation.

Bev. What mean you?

Stuke. That the reversion of his estate is yours; and will bring money to pay debts with—Nay more, it may retrieve what's past.

Bev. Or leave my child a beggar.

Stuke. And what's his father? A dishonourable one; engaged for sums he cannot pay—That should be thought of.

Bev. It is my shame—The poison that inflames me. Where shall we go? To whom? I'm impatient till all's lost.

Stuke. All may be yours again—Your man is Bates—He has large funds at his command, and will deal justly by you.

Bev. I am resolved—Tell them within we'll meet them presently; and with full purses, too—Come, follow me.

Stuke. No; I'll have no hand in this; nor do I counsel it—Use your discretion, and act from that. You'll find me at my lodgings.

Bev. Succeed what will, this night I'll dare the worst;

'Tis loss of fear to be completely curst.

[Exit.]

Stuke. Why, lose it then for ever—Fear is the mind's worst evil: and 'tis a friendly office to drive it from the bosom—Thus far has fortune crowned me—Yet Beverley is rich; rich in his wife's best treasure, her honour and affections. I would supplant him there too. Charlotte is sometimes absent. The seeds of jealousy are sown already. If I mistake not, they have taken root too. Now is the time to ripen them, and reap the harvest. The softest of her sex, if wronged in love, or thinking that she's wronged, becomes a tigress in revenge—I'll instantly to Beverley's—No matter for the danger—When beauty leads us on, 'tis indiscretion to reflect, and cowardice to doubt.

[Exit.]

SCENE IV.—BEVERLEY'S Lodgings.

Enter MRS. BEVERLEY and LUCY.

Mrs. B. Did Charlotte tell you any thing?

Lucy. No, madam.

Mrs. B. She looked confused, methought; said she had business with her Lewson; which when I pressed to know, tears only were her answer.

Lucy. She seemed in haste too—Yet her return may bring you comfort.

Mrs. B. No, my kind girl; I was not born for it—But why do I distress thee? Thy sympathizing heart bleeds for the ills of others—What pity that thy mistress can't reward thee! But there's a power above, that sees and will remember all. [Knocking] Hark! there's some one entering.

Lucy. Perhaps 'tis my master, madam.

[Exit.]

Mrs. B. Let him be well too, and I am satisfied. [Goes to the Door and listens] No, 'tis another's voice.

Re-enter LUCY, with STUKELY.

Lucy. Mr. Stukely, madam.

[Exit.]

Stuke. To meet you thus alone, madam, was what I wished. Unseasonable visits, when friendship warrants them, need no excuse—therefore I make none.

Mrs. B. What mean you, sir? And where is your friend?

Stuke. Men may have secrets, madam, which their best friends are not admitted to. We parted in the morning, not soon to meet again.

Mrs. B. You mean to leave us then—to leave your country too? I am no stranger to your reasons, and pity your misfortunes.

Stuke. Your pity has undone you. Could Beverley do this? That letter was a false one; a mean contrivance to rob you of your jewels—I wrote it not.

Mrs. B. Impossible! Whence came it then?

Stuke. Wronged as I am, madam, I must speak plainly.

Mrs. B. Do so, and ease me.—Your hints have troubled me. Reports, you say, are stirring—Reports of whom? You wished me not to credit them.—What, sir, are these reports?

Stuke. I thought them slander, madam; and cautioned in friendship, lest from officious tongues the tale had reached you with double aggravation.

Mrs. B. Proceed, sir.

Stuke. It is a debt due to my fame; due to an injured wife too.—We are both injured.

Mrs. B. How injured? And who has injured us?

Stuke. My friend—your husband.

Mrs. B. You would resent for both then; but know, sir, my injuries are my own, and do not need a champion.

Stuke. Be not too hasty, madam. I come not in resentment, but for acquittance. You thought me poor; and to the feigned distresses of a friend gave up your jewels.

Mrs. B. I gave them to a husband.

Stuke. Who gave them to a—

Mrs. B. What? whom did he give them to?

Stuke. A mistress.

Mrs. B. No; on my life he did not.

Stuke. Himself confessed it, with curses on her avarice.

Mrs. B. I'll not believe it—He has no mistress; or, if he has, why is it told to me?

Stuke. To guard you against insults. He told me, that, to move you to compliance, he forged that letter, pretending I was ruined by him too. The fraud succeeded; and what a trusting wife bestowed in pity, was lavished on a wanton.

Mrs. B. Then I am lost indeed! His follie I have borne without upbraiding, and saw th approach of poverty without a tear—My affections, my strong affections, supported me through every trial.

Stuke. Be patient, madam.

Mrs. B. Patient! the barbarous, ungrateful man! And does he think that the tenderness of my heart is his best security for wounding it? But he shall find that injuries such as these can arm my weakness for vengeance and redress.

Stuke. Ha! then I may succeed. [Aside] Redress is in your power.

Mrs. B. What redress?

Stuke. Forgive me, madam, if, in my zeal to serve you, I hazard your displeasure. Think of your wretched state. Already want surrounds you—Is it in patience to bear that? To see your helpless little one robbed of his birthright? A sister too, with unavailing tears, lamenting her lost fortune? No comfort left you, but ineffectual pity from the few, outweighed by insults from the many.

Mrs. B. Am I so lost a creature?—Well, sir, my redress?

Stuke. To be resolved is to secure it. The marriage vow once violated, is, in the sight of heaven, dissolved—Start not, but hear me. 'Tis now the summer of your youth: time has not cropped the roses from your cheek, though sorrow long has washed them. Then use your beauty wisely, and, freed by injuries, fly from the cruellest of men, for shelter with the kindest.

Mrs. B. And who is he?

Stuke. A friend to the unfortunate; a bold one too, who, while the storm is bursting on your brow, and lightning flashing from your eyes, dares tell you that he loves you.

Mrs. B. Would that these eyes had heaven's own lightning, that, with a look, thus I might blast thee! Am I then fallen so low? Has poverty so humbled me, that I should listen to a bellish offer, and sell my soul for bread?—Oh, villain! villain!—But now I know thee, and thank thee for that knowledge.

Stuke. If you are wise, you shall have cause to thank me.

Mrs. B. An injured husband too shall thank thee.

Stuke. Yet know, proud woman, I have a heart as stubborn as your own! as haughty and imperious: and as it loves, so can it hate.

Mrs. B. Mean, despicable villain! I scorn thee, and thy threats. Was it for this that Beverley was false?—that his too credulous wife should, in despair and vengeance, give up her honour to a wretch? But he shall know it, and vengeance shall be his.

Stuke. Why, send him for defiance then—Tell him I love his wife; but that a worthless husband forbids our union. I'll make a widow of you, and court you honourably.

Mrs. B. Oh, coward, coward! thy soul will shrink at him: Yet, in the thought of what may happen, I feel a woman's fears.—Keep thy own secret, and be gone. [Rings a Bell.]

Enter Lucy.

Your absence, sir, would please me.

Stuke. I'll not offend you, madam.

[Exit with Lucy.]

Mrs. B. Why opens not the earth, to swallow such a monster? Be conscience then his punisher, till heaven, in mercy, gives him penitence, or dooms him in his justice. [Exit.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—STUKELY'S Lodgings.

Enter STUKELY and BATES, meeting.

Bates. Where have you been?

Stuke. Fooling my time away—playing my tricks, like a tame monkey, to entertain a woman.—No matter where—I have been vexed and disappointed.—Tell me of Beverley: how bore he his last shock?

Bates. Like one (so Dawson says) whose senses had been numbed with misery. When all was lost, he fixed his eyes upon the ground, and stood some time, with folded arms, stupid and motionless; then snatching his sword, that hung against the wainscot, he sat him down, and with a look of fixed attention, drew figures on the floor. At last he started up, looked wild, and trembled; and, like a woman seized with her sex's fits, laughed out aloud, while the tears trickled down his face—so left the room.

Stuke. Why, this was madness.

Bates. The madness of despair.

Stuke. We must confine him then—A prison would do well. [A knocking at the Door] Hark! that knocking may be his—Go that way down. [Exit Bates] Who's there?

Enter LEWSON.

Lew. An enemy—an open, and avowed one.

Stuke. Why am I thus broke in upon? This house is mine, sir, and should protect me from insult and ill manners.

Lew. Guilt has no place of sanctuary; wherever found, 'tis virtue's lawful game. The fox's hold, and tiger's den, are no security against the hunter.

Stuke. Your business, sir?

Lew. To tell you that I know you.—Why this confusion? That look of guilt and terror? Is Beverley awake, or has his wife told tales? The man that dares like you, should have a soul to justify his deeds, and courage to confront accusers: not, with a coward's fear, to shrink beneath reproof.

Stuke. Who waits there?

[Aloud, and in confusion.]

Lew. By heaven he dies that interrupts us! [Shutting the Door] You should have weighed your strength, sir; and then, instead of climbing to high fortune, the world had marked you for what you are—a little, paltry villain!

Stuke. You think I fear you.

Lew. I know you fear me—This is to prove it.—[Pulls him by the Sleeve] You wanted privacy—A lady's presence took up your attention.—Now we are alone, sir.—Why, what a wretch! [Flings him from him] The vilest insect in creation will turn when trampled on; yet has this thing undone a man!—by cunning and mean arts undone him!—But we have found you, sir; traced you through all your labyrinths. If you would save yourself, fall to confession, no mercy will be shown else.

Stuke. First prove me what you think me; till then your threatenings are in vain—And for this insult, vengeance may yet be mine.

Lew. Infamous coward! why, take it now then—[Draws, and Stukely retires] Alas, I pity thee!—Yet, that a wretch like this should overcome a Beverley! It fills me with astonishment!—A wretch, so mean of soul, that even desperation cannot animate him to look upon an enemy. You should not have thus soared, sir, unless, like others of your black profession, you had a sword to keep the fools in awe your villany has ruined.

Stuke. Villany! 'Twere best to curb this license of your tongue—for know, sir, while there are laws, this outrage on my reputation will not be borne with.

Lew. Laws! Dar'st thou seek shelter from the laws—those laws which thou and thy infernal crew live in the constant violation of? Talk'st thou of reputation too, when, under friendship's sacred name, thou hast betrayed, robbed, and destroyed?

Stuke. Ay, rail at gaming—'tis a rich topic, and affords noble declamation.—Go preach against it in the city—you'll find a congregation in every tavern. If they should laugh at you, fly to my lord, and sermonize it there: he'll thank you, and reform.

Lew. And will example sanctify a vice? No, wretch; the custom of my lord, or of the cit that apes him, cannot excuse a breach of law, or make the gamester's calling reputable.

Stuke. Rail on, I say—But is this zeal for beggared Beverley? Is it for him that I am treated thus? No; he and his wife might both have groaned in prison, had but the sister's fortune escaped the wreck, to have rewarded the disinterested love of honest Mr. Lewson.

Lew. How I detest thee for the thought! But thou art lost to every human feeling. Yet, let me tell thee, and may it wring thy heart, that, though my friend is ruined by thy snares, thou hast, unknowingly, been kind to me.

Stuke. Have I? It was, indeed, unknowingly.

Lew. Thou hast assisted me in love—given me the merit that I wanted; since, but for thee, my Charlotte had not known 'twas her dear self I sighed for, and not her fortune.

Stuke. Thank me, and take her then.

Lew. And, as a brother to poor Beverley, I will pursue the robber that has stripped him, and snatch him from his gripe.

Stuke. Then know, imprudent man, he is within my gripe; and should my friendship for him be slandered once again, the hand that has supplied him shall fall and crush him.

Lew. Why, now there's a spirit in thee! This is, indeed, to be a villain! But I shall reach thee yet—Fly where thou wilt, my vengeance shall pursue thee—And Beverley shall yet be saved—he saved from thee, thou monster! nor owe his rescue to his wife's dishonour.

Stuke. [Pausing] Then ruin has enclosed me!—Curse on my coward heart! I would be bravely villainous; but 'tis my nature to shrink at danger, and he has found me. Yet fear brings caution, and that security—More mischief must be done to hide the past—Look to yourself, officious Lewson—there may be danger stirring—How now, Bates?

Enter BATES.

Bates. What is the matter? 'Twas Lewson, and not Beverley, that left you—I heard him loud—You seem alarmed too.

Stuke. Ay, and with reason—We are discovered.

Bates. I feared as much, and therefore cautioned you; but you were peremptory.

Stuke. Thus fools talk ever; spending their idle breath on what is past, and trembling at the future. We must be active; Beverley, at worst, is but suspicious; but Lewson's genius, and his hate to me, will lay all open. Means must be found to stop him.

Bates. What means?

Stuke. Dispatch him—Nay, start not—Desperate occasions call for desperate deeds—We live but by his death.

Bates. You cannot mean it?

Stuke. I do, by heaven!

Bates. Good night, then.

[Going.]

Stuke. Stay—I must be heard, then answered.—Perhaps the motion was too sudden; and human weakness starts at murder, though strong necessity compels it. I have thought long of this, and my first feelings were like yours; a foolish conscience awed me, which soon I conquered. The man that would undo me, nature cries out, undo. Brutes know their foes by instinct; and, where superior force is given, they use it for destruction. Shall man do less? Lewson pursues us to our ruin! and shall we, with the means to crush him, fly from our hunter, or turn and tear him? 'Tis folly even to hesitate.

Bates. He has obliged me, and I dare not.

Stuke. Why, live to shame then—to beggary and punishment. You would be privy to the deed, yet want the soul to act it.—Nay more, had my designs been levelled at his fortune, you had stepped in the foremost—And what is life without its comforts?—Those you would rob him of, and by a lingering death add cruelty to murder. Henceforth, adieu to half-made villains—There's danger in them. What you have got is yours—keep it, and hide with it—I'll deal my future bounty to those that merit it.

Bates. What's the reward?

Stuke. Equal division of our gains. I swear it, and will be just.

Bates. Think of the means then.

Stuke. He's gone to Beverley's—Wait for him in the street—'Tis a dark night, and fit for mischief—A dagger would be useful.

Bates. He sleeps no more.

Stuke. Consider the reward. When the deed's done I have other business with you. Send Dawson to me.

Bates. Think it already done—and so, farewell.

[Exit.]

Stuke. Why farewell, Lewson, then; and farewell to my fears. This night secures me—I'll wait the event within.

[Exit.]

SCENE II.—The Street.—Stage darkened.

Enter BEVERLEY.

Bev. How like an outcast do I wander! Loaded with every curse that drives the soul to desperation! The midnight robber, as he walks his rounds, sees, by the glimmering lamp, my frantic looks, and dreads to meet me. Whither am I going? My home lies there; all that is dear on earth it holds too;

yet are the gates of death more welcome to me—I'll enter it no more—Who passes there? 'Tis Lewson—He meets me in a gloomy hour; and memory tells me he has been meddling with my fame.

Enter LEWSON.

Lew. Beverley! well met. I have been busy in your affairs.

Bev. So I have heard, sir: and now I must thank you as I ought.

Lew. To-morrow I may deserve your thanks.—Late as it is I go to Bates.—Discoveries are making that an arch villain trembles at.

Bev. Discoveries are made, sir, that you shall tremble at. Where is this boasted spirit, this high demeanour, that was to call me to account? You say I have wronged my sister—Now say as much. But, first be ready for defence, as I am for resentment. [Draws.

Lew. What mean you? I understand you not.

Bev. The coward's stale acquittance! who, when he spreads foul calumny abroad, and dreads just vengeance on him, cries out, "What mean you? I understand you not."

Lew. Coward and calumny? Whence are those words? But I forgive and pity you.

Bev. Your pity had been kinder to my fame: but you have traduced it—told a vile story to the public ear, that I have wronged my sister.

Lew. 'Tis false! Show me the man that dares accuse me.

Bev. I thought you brave, and of a soul superior to low malice; but I have found you, and will have vengeance. This is no place for argument.

Lew. Nor shall it be for violence.—Imprudent man! who in revenge for fancied injuries, would pierce the heart that loves him! But honest friendship acts from itself, unmoved by slander or ingratitude: the life you thirst for shall be employed to serve you.—You know me not.

Bev. Yes; for the slanderer of my fame—who, under show of friendship, arraigns me of injustice; buzzing in every ear foul breach of trust, and family dishonour.

Lew. Have I done this? Who told you so?

Bev. The world—'Tis talked of every where.—It pleased you to add threats too—You were to call me to account—Why, do it now then; I should be proud of such an arbiter.

Lew. Put up your sword, and know me better. I never injured you. The base suggestion comes from Stukely: I see him and his aims.

Bev. What aims? I'll not conceal it—'twas Stukely that accused you.

Lew. To rid him of an enemy—Perhaps of two—He fears discovery, and frames a tale of falsehood, to ground revenge and murder on.

Bev. I must have proof of this.

Lew. Wait till to-morrow then.

Bev. I will.

Lew. Good night—I go to serve you—Forget what's past, as I do; and cheer your family with smiles—To-morrow may confirm them, and make all happy. [Exit.

Bev. [Pausing.] How vile and how absurd is man! His boasted honour is but another name for pride, which easier bears the consciousness of guilt, than the world's just reproofs! But 'tis the fashion of the times; and in defence of falsehood and false honour, men die martyrs. I knew not that my nature was so bad. [Stands musing.

Enter BATES and JARVIS.

Jar. This way the noise was; and yonder's my poor master.

Bates. I heard him at high words with Lewson.—

Jar. I heard him too. Misfortunes vex him.

Bates. Go to him, and lead him home.—I'll not be seen by him. [Exit.

Bev. [Starting] What fellow's that? [Seeing Jarvis] Art thou a murderer, friend? Come, lead the way—I have a hand as mischievous as thine; a heart as desperate too—Jarvis! to bed, old man—the cold will chill thee.

Jar. Why are you wandering at this late hour? Your sword drawn too? For heaven's sake sheath it, sir—the sight distracts me.

Bev. Whose voice was that? [Wildly.

Jar. 'Twas mine, sir: Let me entreat you to give the sword to me.

Bev. Ay, take it—quickly take it—Perhaps I am not so cursed, but heaven may have sent thee at this moment to snatch me from perdition.

Jar. Then I am blessed.

Bev. Continue so, and leave me—my sorrows are contagious. No one is bless'd that's near me.

Jar. I came to seek you, sir.

Bev. And now thou hast found me, leave me,—My thoughts are wild, and will not be disturbed.

Jar. Such thoughts are best disturbed.

Bev. Who sent thee hither?

Jar. My weeping mistress.—Alas, sir, forget your griefs, and let me lead you to her! The streets are dangerous.

Bev. Be wise, and leave me then. The night's black horrors are suited to my thoughts—These stones shall be my resting-place. [Throws himself on the Ground] Here shall my soul brood o'er its miseries; till, with the fiends of hell and guilty of the earth, I start and tremble at the morning's light.

Jar. Let patience, not despair, possess you—Rise, I beseech you—There's not a moment of your absence that my poor mistress does not mourn for.

Bev. Have I undone her, and is she still so kind? [Starting up] It is too much—My brain can't hold it.—Oh, Jarvis, how desperate is that wretch's state, which only death or madness can relieve!

Jar. Appease his mind, good heaven, and give him resignation! Alas, sir, could beings in the other world perceive the events of this, how would your parents' blessed spirits grieve for you, even in heaven!—Let me conjure you, by their honoured memories—by the sweet innocence of your yet helpless child, and by the ceaseless sorrows of my poor mistress, to rouse your manhood and struggle with these griefs!

Bev. Thou virtuous, good, old man! Thy tears and thy entreaties have reached my heart, through all its miseries.

Jar. Be but resigned, sir, and happiness may yet be yours. Hark! I hear voices—Come this way: we may reach home unnoticed.

Bev. Unnoticed didst thou say? Alas! I dread no looks but of those wretches I have made at home. Oh, had I listened to thy honest warnings, no earthly blessing had been wanting to me; but I have warred against the power that blest me, and now am sentenced to the hell I merit.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—STUKELY'S Lodgings.

Enter STUKELY and DAWSON.

Stuke. Come hither, Dawson; my limbs are on the rack, and my soul shivers in me, till this night's business be complete.—Tell me thy thoughts; is Bates determined, or does he waver?

Daw. At first he seemed irresolute!—wished the employment had been mine; and muttered curses on his coward hand, that trembled at the deed.

Stuke. And did he leave you so?

Daw. No; we walked together, and, sheltered by the darkness, saw Beverley and Lewson in warm debate; but soon they cooled, and then I left them to hasten hither; but not till 'twas resolved Lewson should die.

Stuke. Thy words have given me life.—That quarrel too was fortunate; for, if my hopes deceive me not, it promises a grave to Beverley.

Daw. You misconceive me—Lewson and he were friends.

Stuke. But my prolific brain shall make them enemies. If Lewson falls he falls by Beverley—Ask me no question, but do as I direct. This writ [Takes out a Pocket-book] for some days past I have treasured here, till a convenient time called for its use—That time is come; take it, and give it to an officer—It must be served this instant.

[Gives a Paper.]

Daw. On Beverley?

Stuke. Look at it.—It is for the sums that I have lent him.

Daw. Must he to prison then?

Stuke. I ask obedience, not replies. This night a gaol must be his lodging. 'Tis probable he's not gone home yet.—Wait at his door, and see it executed.

Daw. Upon a beggar!—He has no means of payment.

Stuke. Dull and insensible!—If Lewson dies, who was it killed him? Why, he that was seen quarrelling with him: and I, that knew of Beverley's intents, arrested him in friendship—A little late, perhaps; but 'twas a virtuous act, and men will thank me for it. Now, sir, you understand me?

Daw. Most perfectly; and will about it.

Stuke. Haste, then; and when 'tis done, come back and tell me.

Daw. Till then, farewell.

[Exit.]

Stuke. Now tell thy tale, fond wife! And, Lewson, if again thou canst insult me!

Not avarice now, but vengeance, fires my breast;

And one short hour must make me curs'd or bless'd.

[Exit.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—STUKELY'S Lodgings.

Enter STUKELY, BATES, and DAWSON.

Bates. Poor Lewson!—But I told you enough last night. The thought of him is horrible to me.

Stuke. In the street did you say? and no one near him.

Bates. By his own door; he was leading me to his house. I pretended business with him, and stabbed him to the heart, while he was reaching at the bell.

Stuke. And did he fall so suddenly?

Bates. The repetition pleases you, I see—I told you he fell without a groan.

Stuke. What heard you of him this morning?

Bates. That the watch found him in their rounds, and alarmed the servants. I mingled with the crowd just now, and saw him dead in his own house.—The sight terrified me.

Stuke. Away with terrors, till his ghost rise and accuse us. We have no living enemy to fear unless 'tis Beverley; and him we have lodged safe in prison.

Bates. Must he be murdered too?

Stuke. No; I have a scheme to make the law his murderer. At what hour did Lewson fall?

Bates. The clock struck twelve as I turned to leave him—'Twas a melancholy bell, I thought, ringing for his death.

Stuke. The time was lucky for us—Beverley was arrested at one, you say? [To Dawson.]

Daw. Exactly.

Stuke. Good. We'll talk of this presently. The women were with him, I think?

Daw. And old Jarvis. I would have told you of them last night, but your thoughts were too busy.—'Tis well you have a heart of stone; the tale would melt it else.

Stuke. Out with it then.

Daw. I traced him to his lodgings; and pretending pity for his misfortunes, kept the door open while the officers seized him. 'Twas a damned deed!—but no matter—I followed my instructions.

Stuke. And what said he?

Daw. He upbraided me with treachery, called you a villain, acknowledged the sums you had lent him, and submitted to his fortune.

Stuke. And the women—

Daw. For a few minutes astonishment kept them silent. They looked wildly at one another, while the tears streamed down their cheeks. But rage and fury soon gave them words; and then, in the very bitterness of despair, they cursed me, and the monster that had employed me.

Stuke. And you bore it with philosophy?

Daw. Till the scene changed, and then I melted. I ordered the officers to take away their prisoner. The women shrieked, and would have followed him; but we forbade them. 'Twas then they fell upon their knees, the wife fainted, the sister raving, and both, with all the eloquence of misery, endeavouring to soften us. I never felt compassion till that moment; and, had the officers been moved like me, we had left the business undone, and fled with curses on ourselves. But their hearts were steeled by custom. The sighs of beauty, and the pangs of affection, were beneath their pity. They tore him from their arms, and lodged him in prison, with only Jarvis to comfort him.

Stuke. There let him lie, till we have further business with him—But how to proceed will require time and thought.—Come along with me; the room within is fitted for privacy—

But no compassion, sir. [To Dawson].—We want leisure for't—This way. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—BEVERLEY'S Lodgings.

Enter MRS. BEVERLEY and CHARLOTTE.

Mrs. B. No news of Lewson yet?

Char. None. He went out early, and knows not what has happened.

Mrs. B. The clock strikes eight—I'll wait no longer. Oh, what a night was last night! I would not pass another such to purchase worlds by it—My poor Beverley too! What must he have felt?—The very thought distracts me!—
To have him torn at midnight from me! A loathsome prison his habitation! A cold, damp room his lodging! The bleak winds, perhaps, blowing upon his pillow! No fond wife to lull him to his rest! and no reflections but to wound and tear him!—'Tis too horrible!—I wanted love for him, or they had not forced him from me.—They should have parted soul and body first—I was too tame.

Char. You must not talk so.—All that we could we did; and Jarvis did the rest—The faithful creature will give him comfort. See where he comes! His looks are cheerful too!

Enter JARVIS.

Mrs. B. Are tears then cheerful! Alas, he weeps! Speak to him, Charlotte.

Char. How does your master, Jarvis?

Jar. I am old and foolish, madam; and tears will come before my words—But don't you weep; [To Mrs. Beverley] I have a tale of joy for you.

Mrs. B. Say but he's well, and I have joy enough.

Jar. All shall be well—I have news for him, that will make his poor heart bound again—
Fie upon old age!—How childish it makes me!—I have a tale of joy for you, and my tears drown it.

Mrs. B. What is it, Jarvis?

Jar. Your uncle, madam, died yesterday.

Mrs. B. My uncle!—Oh, heavens!

Char. How heard you of his death?

Jar. His steward came express, madam—I met him in the street, inquiring for your lodgings—I should not rejoice, perhaps—but he was old, and my poor master a prisoner—Now he shall live again—Oh, 'tis a brave fortune! and
'twas death to me to see him a prisoner.

Char. How did he pass the night, Jarvis?

Jar. Like a man dreaming of death and horrors—When they led him to his cell, he flung himself upon a wretched bed, and lay speechless till day-break. I spoke to him, but he would not hear me; and when I persisted, he raised his hand at me, and knit his brow so—I thought he would have struck me. I bid him be of comfort—Be gone, old wretch, says he—My wife! my child! my sister! I have undone them all, and will know no comfort!
Then, falling upon his knees, he imprecated curses upon himself.

Mrs. B. This is too horrible! But we have staid too long. Let us haste to comfort him, or die with him. [Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—A Prison.

BEVERLEY is discovered sitting.

Bev. Why there's an end then; I have judged deliberately, and the result is death! How the self-murderer's account may stand I know not.

But this I know—the load of hateful life op-presses me too much—The horrors of my soul are more than I can bear—[Offers to kneel.] Father of mercy!—I cannot pray—Despair has laid his iron hand upon me, and sealed me for perdition—Conscience! conscience! thy clamours are too loud!—Here's that shall silence thee. [Takes a Phial out of his Pocket, and looks at it] Thou art most friendly to the miserable. Come then, thou cordial for sick minds—Come to my heart. [Drinks] Oh, that the grave would bury memory as well as body! For if the soul sees and feels the sufferings of those dear ones it leaves behind, the Everlasting has no vengeance to torment
it deeper—I'll think no more on't—Reflection comes too late—Once there was a time for't
—but now 'tis past.—Who's there?

Enter JARVIS.

Jar. One that hoped to see you with better looks—Why do you turn so from me? I have brought comfort with me. And see who comes to give it welcome!

Bev. My wife and sister! Why 'tis but one pang more then, and farewell, world! [Aside.]

Enter MRS. BEVERLEY and CHARLOTTE.

Mrs. B. Where is he? [Runs and embraces him] Oh, I have him! I have him!
And now they shall never part us more—I have news, love, to make you happy for ever —Alas, he hears us not!—Speak to me, love.
I have no heart to see you thus.

Bev. This is a sad place!

Mrs. B. We come to take you from it—to tell you the world goes well again—that Providence has seen our sorrows, and sent the means to help them—Your uncle died yesterday.

Bev. My uncle!—No, do not say so!—Oh,
I am sick at heart!

Mrs. B. Indeed!—I meant to bring you comfort.

Bev. Tell me he lives then—If you would bring me comfort, tell me he lives!

Mrs. B. And if I did—I have no power to raise the dead—He died yesterday.

Bev. And I am heir to him?

Jar. To his whole estate, sir—But bear it patiently—pray bear it patiently.

Bev. Well, well—[Pausing] Why fame says I am rich then?

Mrs. B. And truly so—Why do you look so wildly?

Bev. Do I? The news was unexpected. But has he left me all?

Jar. All, all, sir—He could not leave it
from you.

Bev. I am sorry for it.

Mrs. B. Why are you disturbed so?

Bev. Has death no terrors in it?

Mrs. B. Not an old man's death. Yet, if it troubles you, I wish him living.

Bev. And I, with all my heart. For I have a tale to tell that shall turn you into stone; or, if the power of speech remain, you shall kneel down and curse me.

Mrs. B. Alas! and why are we to curse you?—I'll bless you for ever.

Bev. No; I have deserved no blessings. The world holds not such another wretch. All this large fortune, this second bounty of heaven, that might have healed our sorrows, and satisfied our utmost hopes, in a cursed hour I sold last night.

Mrs. B. Impossible!

Bev. That devil, Stukely, with all hell to aid him, tempted me to the deed. To pay false debts of honour, and to redeem past errors, I sold the reversion—Sold it for a scanty sum, and lost it among villains.

Char. Why, farewell all then!

Bev. Liberty and life—Come, kneel and curse me.

Mrs. B. Then hear me, heaven! [Kneels] Look down with mercy on his sorrows! Give softness to his looks, and quiet to his heart! Take from his memory the sense of what is past, and cure him of despair! On me, on me, if misery must be the lot of either, multiply misfortunes! I'll bear them patiently, so he is happy! These hands shall toil for his support! These eyes be lifted up for hourly blessings on him! And every duty of a fond and faithful wife be doubly done, to cheer and comfort him!—So hear me!—So reward me! [Rises.]

Bev. I would kneel too, but that offended heaven would turn my prayers into curses. For I have done a deed to make life horrible to you—

Mrs. B. What deed?

Jar. Ask him no questions, madam—This last misfortune has hurt his brain. A little time will give him patience.

Enter STUKELY.

Bev. Why is this villain here!

Stuke. To give you liberty and safety. There, madam, is his discharge. [Giving a Paper to Mrs. Beverley.] The arrest last night was meant in friendship, but came too late.

Char. What mean you, sir?

Stuke. The arrest was too late, I say; I would have kept his hands from blood, but was too late.

Mrs. B. His hands from blood!—whose blood?

Stuke. From Lewson's blood.

Char. No, villain! Yet, what of Lewson? Speak quickly.

Stuke. You are ignorant then! I thought I heard the murderer at confession.

Char. What murderer?—And who is murdered? Not Lewson?—Say he lives, and I'll kneel and worship you.

Stuke. In pity, so I would; but that the tongues of all cry murder. I came in pity, not in malice, to save the brother, not kill the sister. Your Lewson's dead.

Char. Oh, horrible!

Bev. Silence, I charge you—Proceed, sir.

Stuke. No; justice may stop the tale—and there's an evidence.

Enter BATES.

Bates. The news, I see, has reached you. But take comfort, madam. [To Charlotte] There's one without inquiring for you.—Go to him, and lose no time.

Char. O misery! misery! [Exit.]

Mrs. B. Follow her, Jarvis. If it be true that Lewson's dead, her grief may kill her.

Bates. Jarvis must stay here, madam. I have some questions for him.

Stuke. Rather let him fly. His evidence may crush his master.

Bev. Why ay; this looks like management.

Bates. He found you quarrelling with Lewson in the streets last night. [To Beverley.]

Mrs. B. No; I am sure he did not.

Jar. Or if I did—

Mrs. B. 'Tis false, old man—They had no quarrel; there was no cause for quarrel.

Bev. Let him proceed, I say—Oh! I am sick! sick!—Reach a chair. [He sits down.]

Mrs. B. If Lewson's dead, you killed him not.

Enter DAWSON.

Stuke. Who sent for Dawson?

Bates. 'Twas I—We have a witness too you little think of—without there!

Stuke. What witness?

Bates. A right one. Look at him.

Enter LEWSON and CHARLOTTE.

Stuke. Lewson! O villains! villains!

[To Bates and Dawson.]

Mrs. B. Risen from the dead! Why, this is unexpected happiness!

Char. Or is it his ghost? [To Stukely] That sight would please you, sir.

Jar. What riddle's this?

Bev. Be quick and tell it—My minutes are but few.

Mrs. B. Alas! Why so? You shall live long and happily.

Lew. While shame and punishment shall rack that viper! [Pointing to Stukely] The tale is short—I was too busy in his secrets, and therefore doomed to die. Bates, to prevent the murder, undertook it—I kept aloof to give it credit—

Char. And gave me pangs unutterable.

Lew. I felt them all, and would have told you—But vengeance wanted ripening. The villain's scheme was but half executed. The arrest by Dawson followed the supposed murder—And now, depending on his once wicked associates, he comes to fix the guilt on Beverley.

Bates. Dawson and I are witnesses of this.

Lew. And of a thousand frauds. His fortune ruined by sharpers and false dice; and Stukely sole contriver and possessor of all.

Daw. Had he but stopped on this side murder, we had been villains still.

Lew. How does my friend? [To Beverley.]

Bev. Why, well. Who's he that asks me?

Mrs. B. 'Tis Lewson, love—Why do you look so at him?

Bev. They told me he was murdered.

[Wildly.]

Mrs. B. Ay; but he lives to save us.

Bev. Lend me your hand—The room turns round.

Lew. This villain here disturbs him. Remove him from his sight—And, for your lives, see that you guard him. [Stukely is taken off by Dawson and Bates] How is it, sir?

Bev. 'Tis here—and here. [Pointing to his Head and Heart] And now it tears me.

Mrs. B. You feel convulsed too—What is't disturbs you?

Bev. A furnace rages in this heart—Down, restless flames! [Laying his Hand on his Heart] Down to your native hell—There you shall rack me—Oh! for a pause from pain!—

Where's my wife?—Can you forgive me, love?

Mrs. B. Alas! for what?

Bev. For meanly dying.

Mrs. B. No—do not say it.

Bev. As truly as my soul must answer it—Had Jarvis staid this morning all had been well. But, pressed by shame—pent in a prison—tormented with my pangs for you—driven to despair and madness—I took the advantage of his absence, corrupted the poor wretch he left to guard me, and—swallowed poison.

Lew. Oh, fatal deed!

Char. Dreadful and cruel!

Bev. Ay, most accursed—And now I go to my account. Bend me, and let me kneel. [Kneels.] I'll pray for you too. Thou power that madest me, hear me! If for a life of frailty, and this too hasty deed of death, thy justice dooms me, here I acquit the sentence; but if, enthroned in mercy where thou sittest, thy pity has beheld me, send me a gleam of hope, that in these last and bitter moments my soul may taste of comfort! and for these mourners here, oh! let their lives be peaceful, and their deaths happy!

[They lift him to the Chair.]

Mrs. B. Restore him, heaven! Oh, save him! save him! or let me die too.

Bev. No; live, I charge you.—We have a little one.—Though I have left him, you will not leave him.—To Lewson's kindness I bequeath him.—Is not this Charlotte?—We have lived in love, though I have wronged you.—Can you forgive me, Charlotte?

Char. Forgive you! Oh, my poor brother!

Bev. Oh! for a few short moments to tell you how my heart bleeds for you—That even now, thus dying as I am, dubious and fearful of hereafter, my bosom-pang is for your miseries! Support her, heaven!—And now I go—Oh, mercy! mercy! [Dies.]

Lew. How is it, madam?

Char. Her grief is speechless.

Lew. Remove her from this sight—lead and support her—Some ministering angel bring her peace! [Charlotte leads her off] And thou, poor, breathless corpse, may thy departed soul have found the rest it prayed for! Save but one error, and this last fatal deed, thy life was lovely. Let frailer minds take warning; and from example learn, that want of prudence is want of virtue. [Exit.]

THOMAS OTWAY,

Was not more remarkable for moving the tender passions, than for the variety of fortune to which he himself was subjected. He was the son of the Rev. Mr. Humphrey Otway, rector of Wolbeding, in Sussex, and was born at Trotton in that county, the 5d of March in the year 1651. He received his education at Wicheham school, near Winchester, and became a commoner of Christ Church, in Oxford, in 1669. But on his quitting the university, in 1674, and coming to London, he turned player. His success as an actor was but indifferent, having made only one attempt in Mrs. Behn's tragedy of The Forc'd Marriage; or, Jealous Bridegroom; he was more valued for the sprightliness of his conversation and the acuteness of his wit; which gained him the friendship of the Earl of Plymouth, who procured him a cornet's commission in the troops which then served in Flanders. At his return from Flanders he gave up his commission and had recourse to writing for the stage; and now it was that he found out the only employment that nature seems to have fitted him for. In comedy he has been deemed to licentious; which, however, was no great objection to those who lived in the profligate days of Charles II. But in tragedy few of our English poets ever equalled him; and perhaps none ever excelled him in touching the passions, particularly that of love. There is generally something familiar and domestic in the fable of his tragedy, and there is amazing energy in his expression. But though Otway possessed, in so eminent a degree, the rare talent of writing to the heart, yet he was not very favorably regarded by some of his contemporary poets; nor was he always successful in his dramatic compositions. After experiencing many reverses of fortune, in regard to his circumstances, but generally changing for the worse, he at last died wretchedly in a house, known by the sign of a Bull, on Tower Hill, April 14, 1685. whither he had retired to avoid the pressure of his creditors. Some have said, that downright hunger compelling him to fall too eagerly upon a piece of bread, of which he had been some time in want, the first mouthful choked him, and instantly put a period to his days.

VENICE PRESERVED.

ACTED at the Duke's Theatre, 1682. This interesting tragedy is borrowed, with respect to the plan of it at least, from a little book that relates the circumstances of the Spanish conspiracy at Venice, i. e. the Abbé de St. Real's Histoire de la Conjuration du Marquis de Badamar. The speech of Renault to the conspirators is translated word for word from this author. It has been remarked, that though, on the whole, the incidents of Otway's piece are interesting, and the catastrophe affecting, there is not one truly valuable character in the whole drama, except that of Belvidera. To this, however, we cannot entirely subscribe. The character of Pierre is nobly drawn. His public services had been rewarded with ingratitude, and he was a greatly injured character; but was justly punished for taking a treasonable mode of redressing his wrongs. The scene lies in Venice. By comparing this with The Orphan, it will appear that his images were by time become stronger, and his language more energetic. The public seems to judge rightly of the faults and excellencies of this play; that it is the work of a man not attentive to decency, nor zealous for virtue, but of one who conceived forcibly, and drew originally, by consulting nature in his own breast. Mr. Dryden says, "the motives which are studied are never so natural as those which break out in the height of a real passion. Mr. Otway possessed this part as thoroughly as any of the ancients or moderns. I will not defend every thing in his Venice Preserved; but I must bear this testimony to his memory, that the passions are truly touched in it, though perhaps there is somewhat to be desired, both in the grounds of them, and in the height and elegance of expression; but nature is there, which is the greatest beauty."

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A Street in VENICE.

Enter PRIULI and JAFFIER.

Pri. No more! I'll hear no more! Be gone and leave me.

Jaf. Not hear me! By my suffering but you shall!

My lord, my lord! I'm not that abject wretch
You think me. Patience! where's the distance throws

Me back so far, but I may boldly speak
In right, though proud oppression will not hear
me?

Pri. Have you not wrong'd me?

Jaf. Could my nature e'er
Have brook'd injustice, or the doing wrongs,
I need not now thus low have bent myself
To gain a hearing from a cruel father.
Wrong'd you?

Pri. Yes, wrong'd me! In the nicest point,
The honour of my house, you've done me
wrong.

You may remember (for I now will speak,
And urge its baseness) when you first came home

From travel, with such hopes as made you look'd on,

By all men's eyes, a youth of expectation;
Pleas'd with your growing virtue, I receiv'd
you;

Courted, and sought to raise you to your merits:

My house, my table, nay, my fortune too,
My very self was yours; you might have us'd
me

To your best service; like an open friend
I treated, trusted you, and thought you mine:
When, in requital of my best endeavours,
You treacherously practis'd to undo me;
Seduc'd the weakness of my age's darling,
My only child, and stole her from my bosom.
Oh Belvidera!

Jaf. 'Tis to me you owe her:
Childless you had been else, and in the grave
Your name extinct; no more Priuli heard of.
You may remember, scarce five years are past,
Since in your brigantine you sail'd to see
The Adriatic wedded by our duke;
And I was with you: your unskilful pilot
Dash'd us upon a rock; when to your boat
You made for safety: enter'd first yourself;
Th' affrighted Belvidera following next,
As she stood trembling on the vessel's side,
Was, by a wave, wash'd off into the deep;
When instantly I plung'd into the sea,
And buffeting the billows to her rescue,
Redeem'd her life with half the loss of mine.
Like a rich conquest, in one hand I bore her,
And with the other dash'd the saucy waves,
That throng'd and press'd to rob me of my
prize.

I brought her, gave her to your despairing
arms:

Indeed you thank'd me; but a nobler gratitude
Rose in her soul: for from that hour she lov'd
me,

Till for her life she paid me with herself.

Pri. You stole her from me; like a thief
you stole her,

At dead of night! that cursed hour you chose
To rifle me of all my heart held dear.

May all your joys in her prove false, like mine;
A sterile fortune, and a barren bed,
Attend you both; continual discord make
Your days and nights bitter and grievous; still
May the hard hand of a vexatious need
Oppress and grind you; till at last you find
The curse of disobedience all your portion.

Jaf. Half of your curse you have bestow'd
in vain:

Heav'n has already crown'd our faithful loves
With a young boy, sweet as his mother's beauty:

May he live to prove more gentle than his grandsire,

And happier than his father.

Pri. Rather live
To bait thee for his bread, and din your ears
With hungry cries; whilst his unhappy mother
Sits down and weeps in bitterness of want.

Jaf. You talk as if 'twould please you.

Pri. 'Twould, by heav'n!

Jaf. Would I were in my grave!

Pri. And she too with thee:
For, living here, you're but my curst remem-brancers.

I once was happy.

Jaf. You use me thus, because you know
my soul

Is fond of Belvidera. You perceive
My life feeds on her, therefore thus you treat
me.

Oh! could my soul ever have known satiety;
Were I that thief, the doer of such wrongs
As you upbraid me with, what hinders me
But I might send her back to you with contumely,

And court my fortune where she would be kinder?

Pri. You dare not do't.

Jaf. Indeed, my lord, I dare not.

My heart, that awes me, is too much my
master:

Three years are past, since first our vows were plighted,

During which time, the world must bear me
witness,

I've treated Belvidera like your daughter,
The daughter of a senator of Venice:

Distinction, place, attendance, and observance,
Due to her birth, she always has commanded.

Out of my little fortune I've done this;
Because (though hopeless e'er to win your nature)

The world might see I lov'd her for herself;
Not as the heiress of the great Priuli.

Pri. No more.

Jaf. Yes, all, and then adieu for ever.
There's not a wretch, that lives on common charity,

But's happier than me: for I have known
The luscious sweets of plenty; every night
Have slept with soft content about my head,
And never wak'd, but to a joyful morning;

Yet now must fall, like a full ear of corn,
Whose blossom 'scap'd, yet's wither'd in the ripening.

Pri. Home, and be humble; study to retrench;
Discharge the lazy vermin of thy hall,
Those pageants of thy folly:

Reduce the glitt'ring trappings of thy wife
To humble weeds, fit for thy little state:

Then, to some suburb cottage both retire;

Drudge to feed loathsome life: get brats and starve—

Home, home, I say.—

[Exit.

Jaf. Yes, if my heart would let me—
This proud, this swelling heart: home I would go,
But that my doors are baleful to my eyes,
Fill'd and dam'd up with gaping creditors,
Watchful as fowlers when their game will spring.

I've now not fifty ducats in the world,
Yet still I am in love, and pleas'd with ruin.
Oh! Belvidera! Oh! she is my wife—
And we will bear our wayward fate together,
But ne'er know comfort more.

Enter PIERRE.

Pier. My friend, good morrow!
How fares the honest partner of my heart?
What, melancholy! not a word to spare me?

Jaf. I'm thinking, Pierre, how that damn'd starving quality,
Call'd honesty, got footing in the world.

Pier. Why, powerful villany first set it up,
For its own ease and safety. Honest men
Are the soft easy cushions on which knaves
Repose and fatten. Were all mankind villains, They'd starve each other; lawyers would want
practice,

Cut-throats rewards: each man would kill his brother
Himself; none would be paid or hang'd for murder.

Honesty! 'twas a cheat invented first
To bind the hands of bold deserving rogues,
That fools and cowards might sit safe in power,
And lord it uncontrol'd above their betters.

Jaf. Then honesty is but a notion?

Pier. Nothing else;
Like wit, much talk'd of, not to be defin'd:
He that pretends to most, too, has least share in't.
Tis a ragged virtue: Honesty! no more on't.

Jaf. Sure thou art honest!

Pier. So, indeed, men think me;
But they're mistaken, Jaffier: I'm a rogue
As well as they;
A fine, gay, bold-fac'd villain as thou seest me.
Tis true, I pay my debts, when they're contracted;

I steal from no man; would not cut a throat
To gain admission to a great man's purse,
Or a whore's bed; I'd not betray my friend
To get his place or fortune; I scorn to flatter
A blown-up fool above me, or crush the wretch
beneath me;

Yet, Jaffier, for all this I'm a villain.

Jaf. A villain!

Pier. Yes, a most notorious villain;
To see the sufferings of my fellow creatures,
And own myself a man: to see our senators
Cheat the deluded people with a show
Of liberty, which yet they ne'er must taste of.
They say, by them our hands are free from fetters;

Yet whom they please they lay in basest bonds;
Bring whom they please to infamy and sorrow;
Drive us, like wrecks, down the rough tide of power,

Whilst no hold's left to save us from destruction.
All that bear this are villains, and I one,
Not to rouse up at the great call of nature,
And check the growth of these domestic spoilers,
That make us slaves, and tell us, 'tis our charter.

Jaf. I think no safety can be here for virtue,
And grieve, my friend, as much as thou, to live
In such a wretched state as this of Venice,
Where all agree to spoil the public good;
And villains fatten with the brave man's labours.

Pier. We've neither safety, unity, nor peace,
For the foundation's lost of common good;
Justice is lame, as well as blind, amongst us;
The laws (corrupted to their ends that make 'em)
Serve but for instruments of some new tyranny,
That every day starts up, 'enslave us deeper.
Now could this glorious cause but find out friends
To do it right, oh, Jaffier! then might'st thou
Not wear these seals of woe upon thy face;
The proud Priuli should be taught humanity,
And learn to value such a son as thou art.

I dare not speak, but my heart bleeds this moment.

Jaf. Curs'd be the cause, though I thy friend be part on't:

Let me partake the troubles of thy bosom,
For I am us'd to misery, and perhaps
May find a way to sweeten't to thy spirit.

Pier. Too soon 'twill reach thy knowledge—

Jaf. Then from thee

Let it proceed. There's virtue in thy friendship,
Would make the saddest tale of sorrow pleasing,
Strengthen my constancy and welcome ruin.

Pier. Then thou art ruined!

Jaf. That I long since knew;

I and ill fortune have been long acquainted.

Pier. I pass'd this very moment by thy doors,
And found them guarded by a troop of villains;
The sons of public rapine were destroying.
They told me, by the sentence of the law,
They had commission to seize all thy fortune:
Nay more, Priuli's cruel hand had sign'd it.
Here stood a ruffian with a horrid face,
Lording it o'er a pile of massy plate,
Tumbled into a heap for public sale;
There was another, making villanous jests
At thy undoing: he had taken possession
Of all thy ancient, most domestic ornaments,
Rich hangings intermix'd and wrought with gold;
The very bed, which on thy wedding-night
Receiv'd thee to the arms of Belvidera,
The scene of all thy joys, was violated
By the coarse hands of filthy dungeon villains,
And thrown amongst the common lumber.

Jaf. Now thank heaven—

Pier. Thank heaven! for what?

Jaf. That I'm not worth a ducat.

Pier. Curse thy dull stars, and the worse
fate of Venice,
Where brothers, friends, and fathers, all are false;

Where there's no truth, no trust; where innocence

Stoops under vile oppression, and vice lords it.
Hadst thou but seen, as I did, how at last
Thy beauteous Belvidera, like a wretch
That's doom'd to banishment, came weeping forth,
Shining through tears, like April suns in showers,
That labour to o'ercome the cloud that loads 'em;
Whilst two young virgins, on whose arms
she lean'd,

Kindly look'd up, and at her grief grew sad,
As if they catch'd the sorrows that fell from her.
Ev'n the lewd rabble, that were gather'd round
To see the sight, stood mute when they beheld her;
Govern'd their roaring throats, and grumbled pity.
I could have hugg'd the greasy rogues: they pleas'd me.

Jaf. I thank thee for this story, from my soul;
Since now I know the worst that can befall me.
Ah, Pierre! I have a heart that could have borne
The roughest wrong my fortune could have done me;

But when I think what Belvidera feels,
The bitterness her tender spirit tastes of,
I own myself a coward: bear my weakness:
If throwing thus my arms about thy neck,
I play the boy, and blubber in thy bosom.
Oh! I shall drown thee with my sorrows.

Pier. Burn,
First, burn and level Venice to thy ruin.
What! starve, like beggars' brats, in frosty weather,

Under a hedge, and whine ourselves to death!
Thou or thy cause shall never want assistance,
Whilst I have blood or fortune fit to serve thee:
Command my heart, thou'rt every way its master.

Jaf. No, there's a secret pride in bravely dying.

Pier. Rats die in holes and corners, dogs run mad;

Man knows a braver remedy for sorrow:
Revenge, the attribute of gods; they stamp'd it,
With their great image, on our natures. Die!
Consider well the cause, that calls upon thee:
And, if thou'rt base enough, die then. Remember,
Thy Belvidera suffers; Belvidera!

Die—damn first—What! be decently interr'd
In a church-yard, and mingle thy brave dust
With stinking rogues, that rot in winding-sheets,
Surfeit-slain fools, the common dung o' th' soil!

Jaf. Oh!

Pier. Well said, out with't, swear a little—

Jaf. Swear! By sea and air; by earth, by heav'n, and hell,

I will revenge my Belvidera's tears.

Hark thee, my friend—Priuli—is—a senator.

Pier. A dog.

Jaf. Agreed.

Pier. Shoot him.

Jaf. With all my heart.

No more; where shall we meet at night?

Pier. I'll tell thee;

On the Rialto, every night at twelve,
I take my evening's walk of meditation;
There we two will meet, and talk of precious Mischief—

Jaf. Farewell.

Pier. At twelve.

Jaf. At any hour; my plagues

Will keep me waking. [Exit Pierre.]

Tell me why, good heaven,
Thou mad'st me, what I am, with all the spirit,
Aspiring thoughts, and elegant desires,
That fill the happiest man? Ah, rather, why
Didst thou not form me sordid as my fate,
Base-minded, dull, and fit to carry burthens?
Why have I sense to know the curse that's
on me?

Is this just dealing, nature?—Belvidera!

Enter BELVIDERA.

Poor Belvidera!

Bel. Lead me, lead me, my virgins,
To that kind voice. My lord, my love, my refuge!
Happy my eyes, when they behold thy face!
My heavy heart will leave its doleful beating
At sight of thee, and bound with sprightly joys.
Oh smile! as when our loves were in their spring,
And cheer my fainting soul.

Jaf. As when our loves

Were in their spring! Has then our fortune chang'd?

Art thou not Belvidera, still the same,
Kind, good, and tender, as my arms first found
thee?

If thou art alter'd, where shall I have harbour?
Where ease my loaded heart? Oh! where complain?

Bel. Does this appear like change, or love
decaying,

When thus I throw myself into thy bosom,
With all the resolution of strong truth!
Beats not my heart, as 'twould alarm thine
To a new charge of bliss?—I joy more in thee,
Than did thy mother, when she hugg'd thee first,
And bless'd the gods for all her travail past.

Jaf. Can there in woman be such glorious faith?

Sure all ill stories of thy sex are false!
Oh woman! lovely woman! nature made thee
To temper man: we had been brutes without you!
Angels are painted fair to look like you:
There's in you all that we believe of heaven;
Amazing brightness, purity, and truth,
Eternal joy, and everlasting love.

Bel. If love be treasure, we'll be wondrous rich;
I have so much, my heart will surely break with't:
Vows can't express it. When I would declare How great's my joy, I'm dumb with the big
thought;

I swell, and sigh; and labour with my longing.
O! lead me to some desert wide and wild,
Barren as our misfortunes, where my soul
May have its vent, where I may tell aloud
To the high heavens, and ev'ry list'ning planet,
With what a boundless stock my bosom's fraught;

Where I may throw my eager arms about thee,
Give loose to love, with kisses kindling joy,
And let off all the fire that's in my heart.

Jaf. Oh, Belvidera! doubly I'm a beggar:
Undone by fortune, and in debt to thee.
Want, worldly want, that hungry, meagre fiend,
Is at my heels, and chases me in view.
Canst thou bear cold and hunger? Can these limbs,

Fram'd for the tender offices of love,
Endure the bitter gripes of smarting poverty?
When banish'd by our miseries abroad
(As suddenly we shall be) to seek out
In some far climate, where our names are strangers,

For charitable succour; wilt thou then,
When in a bed of straw we shrink together,
And the bleak winds shall whistle round our heads;

Wilt thou then talk thus to me? Wilt thou then
Hush my cares thus, and shelter me with love?

Bel. Oh! I will love thee, even in madness
love thee;

Though my distracted senses should forsake me,
I'd find some intervals, when my poor heart
Should 'swage itself, and be let loose to thine.
Though the bare earth be all our resting-place,
Its roots our food, some cleft our habitation,
I'll make this arm a pillow for thine head;
And, as thou sighing ly'st, and swell'd with
sorrow,

Creep to thy bosom, pour the balm of love
Into thy soul, and kiss thee to thy rest;
Then praise our God, and watch thee till the morning.

Jaf. Hear this, you heav'ns! and wonder how you made her:
Reign, reign, ye monarchs that divide the world,
Busy rebellion ne'er will let you know
Tranquillity and happiness like mine!
Like gaudy ships th' obsequious billows fall,
And rise again to lift you in your pride;
They wait but for a storm, and then devour you;
I, in my private bark already wreck'd,
Like a poor merchant driven to unknown land,
That had by chance pack'd up his choicest treasure
In one dear casket, and sav'd only that;
Since I must wander further on the shore,
Thus hug my little, but my precious store,
Resolv'd to scorn and trust my fate no more,
[Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—The Rialto.Enter JAFFIER.

Jaf. I'm here; and thus, the shades of night around me,
I look as if all hell were in my heart,
And I in hell. Nay surely 'tis so with me!—
For every step I tread, methinks some fiend
Knocks at my breast, and bids me not be quiet.
I've heard how desperate wretches, like myself,
Have wander'd out at this dead time of night,
To meet the foe of mankind in his walk.
Sure I'm so curs'd that, though of heaven
forsaken,
No minister of darkness cares to tempt me.
Hell, hell! why sleep'st thou?

Enter PIERRE.

Pier. Sure I've staid too long:
The clock has struck, and I may lose my proselyte.
Speak, who goes there?

Jaf. A dog, that comes to howl
At yonder moon. What's he that asks the question?

Pier. A friend to dogs, for they are honest creatures,
And ne'er betray their masters: never fawn
On any that they love not. Well met, friend:
Jaffier!

Jaf. The same.Pier. Where's Belvidera?—

Jaf. For a day or two
I've lodg'd her privately, till I see further
What fortune will do for me. Pr'ythee, friend,
If thou wouldst have me fit to hear good counsel,
Speak not of Belvidera—

Pier. Not of her!Jaf. Oh, no!Pier. Not name her! May be I wish her well.Jaf. Whom well?Pier. Thy wife; thy lovely Belvidera.

I hope a man may wish his friend's wife well,
And no harm done?

Jaf. Y' are merry, Pierre.Pier. I am so:

Thou shalt smile too, and Belvidera smile:
We'll all rejoice. Here's something to buy pins;
Marriage is chargeable. [Gives him a Purse.]

Jaf. I but half wish'd
To see the devil, and he's here already. Well!
What must this buy? Rebellion, murder, treason?

Tell me, which way I must be damn'd for this.

Pier. When last we parted, we'd no qualms like these,
But entertain'd each other's thoughts like men
Whose souls were well acquainted. Is the world Reform'd since our last meeting? What new miracles

Have happen'd? Has Priuli's heart relented?
Can he be honest?

Jaf. Kind heav'n, let heavy curses
Gall his old age; cramps, aches, rack his bones,
And bitterest disquiet wring his heart.
Oh! let him live, till life become his burden:
Let him groan under't long, linger an age
In the worst agonies and pangs of death,
And find its ease but late.

Pier. Nay, couldst thou not
As well, my friend, have stretch'd the curse to all
The senate round, as to one single villain?

Jaf. But curses stick not: could I kill with cursing,

By heaven I know not thirty heads in Venice
Should not be blasted. Senators should rot
Like dogs on dunghills. Oh! for a curse
To kill with!

Pier. Daggers, daggers are much better.Jaf. Ha!Pier. Daggers.Jaf. But where are they?Pier. Oh! a thousand

May be dispos'd of, in honest hands, in Venice.

Jaf. Thou talk'st in clouds.

Pier. But yet a heart, half wrong'd
As thine has been, would find the meaning,
Jaffier.

Jaf. A thousand daggers, all in honest hands!
And have not I a friend will stick one here!

Pier. Yes, if I thought thou wert not cherish'd
T' a nobler purpose, I would be thy friend;
But thou hast better friends; friends whom thy wrongs

Have made thy friends; friends worthy to be call'd so.

I'll trust thee with a secret: There are spirits
This hour at work.—But as thou art a man,
Whom I have pick'd and chosen from the world,
Swear that thou wilt be true to what I utter;
And when I've told thee that which only gods,
And men like gods, are privy to, then swear
No chance or change shall wrest it from thy bosom.

Jaf. When thou wouldst bind me, is there need of oaths?

For thou'rt so near my heart, that thou may'st see
Its bottom, sound its strength and firmness to thee.
Is coward, fool, or villain in my face?

If I seem none of these, I dare believe
Thou wouldst not use me in a little cause,
For I am fit for honour's toughest task,
Nor ever yet found fooling was my province;
And for a villainous, inglorious enterprise,
I know thy heart so well, I dare lay mine
Before thee, set it to what point thou wilt.

Pier. Nay, 'tis a cause thou wilt be fond of, Jaffier;

For it is founded on the noblest basis;
Our liberties, our natural inheritance.
There's no religion, no hypocrisy in't;
We'll do the business, and ne'er fast and pray for't;

Openly act a deed the world shall gaze
With wonder at, and envy when 'tis done.

Jaf. For liberty!

Pier. For liberty, my friend.
Thou shalt be freed from base Priuli's tyranny,
And thy sequester'd fortunes heal'd again:
I shall be free from those opprobrious wrongs
That press me now, and bend my spirit downward;

All Venice free, and every growing merit
Succeed to its just right: fools shall be pull'd
From wisdom's seat: those baleful, unclean birds,
Those lazy owls, who, perch'd near fortune's top,
Sit only watchful with their heavy wings
To cuff down new-fledg'd virtues, that would rise
To nobler heights, and make the grove harmonious.

Jaf. What can I do?

Pier. Canst thou not kill a senator?

Jaf. Were there one wise or honest, I could kill him,
For herding with that nest of fools and knaves.
By all my wrongs, thou talk'st as if revenge
Were to be had; and the brave story warms me.

Pier. Swear then!

Jaf. I do, by all those glittering stars,
And yon great ruling planet of the night;
By all good pow'rs above, and ill below;
By love and friendship, dearer than my life,
No pow'r or death shall make me false to thee.

Pier. Here we embrace, and I'll unlock
my heart.

A council's held hard by, where the destruction
Of this great empire's hatching: there I'll lead thee.
But be a man! for thou'rt to mix with men
Fit to disturb the peace of all the world,
And rule it when it's wildest—

Jaf. I give thee thanks
For this kind warning. Yes, I'll be a man;
And charge thee, Pierre, whene'er thou seest
my fears

Betray me less, to rip this heart of mine
Out of my breast, and show it for a coward's.
Come, let's be gone, for from this hour I chase
All little thoughts, all tender human follies
Out of my bosom: Vengeance shall have room:
Revenge!

Pier. And liberty!

Jaf. Revenge—revenge— [Exeunt.

SCENE II.—AQUILINA'S House.

Enter RENAULT.

Ren. Why was my choice ambition? the worst ground
A wretch can build on! It's, indeed, at distance,
A goodly prospect, tempting to the view;
The height delights us, and the mountain top
Looks beautiful, because it's nigh to heav'n:
But we ne'er think how sandy's the foundation,
What storm will batter, and what tempest shake us.

Who's there?

Enter SPINOSA.

Spin. Renault, good morrow, for by this time
I think the scale of night has turn'd the balance,
And weighs up morning! Has the clock struck twelve?

Ren. Yes! clocks will go as they are set;
but man,

Irregular man's ne'er constant, never certain:
I've spent at least three precious hours of darkness
In waiting dull attendance: 'tis the curse
Of diligent virtue to be mix'd, like mine,
With giddy tempers, souls but half resolv'd.

Spin. Hell seize that soul amongst us it can frighten.

Ren. What's then the cause that I am here alone?

Why are we not together?

Enter ELLIOTT.

O, sir, welcome!

You are an Englishman: when treason's hatching,
One might have thought you'd not have been behind-hand.

In what whore's lap have you been lolling?
Give but an Englishman his whore and ease,
Beef, and a sea-coal fire, he's yours for ever.

Ell. Frenchman, you are saucy.

Ren. How!

Enter BEDAMAR, the Ambassador; THEO-DORE, BRAMVEIL, DURAND, BRABE, REVIL-
LIDO, MEZZANA, TERNON, and RETROSL, Conspirators.

Bed. At difference; fie!

Is this a time for quarrels? Thieves and rogues Fall out and brawl: should men of your high calling,

Men separated by the choice of Providence
From the gross heap of mankind, and set here
In this assembly as in one great jewel,
To adorn the bravest purpose it e'er smil'd on;
Should you, like boys, wrangle for trifles?

Ren. Boys!

Bed. Renault, thy hand.

Ren. I thought I'd given my heart
Long since to every man that mingles here;
But grieve to find it trusted with such tempers,
That can't forgive my froward age its weakness.

Bed. Elliot, thou once hadst virtue. I have seen
Thy stubborn temper bent with godlike goodness,
Not half thus courted: 'Tis thy nation's glory
To hug the foe that offers brave alliance.

One more embrace, my friends—we'll all embrace.

United thus, we are the mighty engine
Must twist this rooted empire from its basis.
Totters not it already?

Ell. Would 'twere tumbling.

Bed. Nay, it shall down; this night we seal its ruin.

Enter PIERRE.

Oh, Pierre, thou art welcome.
Come to my breast, for by its hopes thou look'st
Lovely dreadful, and the fate of Venice
Seems on thy sword already. Oh, my Mars!
The poets that first feign'd a god of war,
Sure prophesied of thee.

Pier. Friend, was not Brutus
(I mean that Brutus, who in open senate Stabb'd the first Caesar that usurp'd the world),
A gallant man?

Ren. Yes, and Cataline too;
Though story wrong his fame: for he conspir'd
To prop the reeling glory of his country:
His cause was good.

Bed. And ours as much above it,
As, Renault, thou'rt superior to Cethegus,
Or Pierre to Cassius.

Pier. Then to what we aim at.
When do we start? or must we talk for ever?

Bed. No, Pierre, the deed's near birth; fate seems to have set

The business up, and given it to our care;

I hope there's not a heart or hand amongst us,
But is firm and ready.

All. All

We'll die with Bedamar.

Bed. O men

Matchless! as will your glory be hereafter:
The game is for a matchless prize, if won;
If lost, disgraceful ruin.

Pier. Ten thousand men are armed at your nod,
Commanded all by leaders fit to guide
A battle for the freedom of the world:
This wretched state has starv'd them in its service;

And, by your bounty quicken'd, they're resolved
To serve your glory, and revenge their own:
They've all their different quarters in this city,
Watch for th' alarm, and grumble 'tis so tardy.

Bed. I doubt not, friend, but thy unwearied
diligence

Has still kept waking, and it shall have ease;
After this night it is resolv'd we meet
No more, till Venice owns us for her lords.

Pier. How lovelily the Adriatic whore, Dress'd in her flames, will shine! Devouring flames!

Such as shall burn her to the watery bottom,
And hiss in her foundation.

Bed. Now if any

Amongst us, that owns this glorious cause,
Have friends or interest he'd wish to save,
Let it be told: the general doom is seal'd;
But I'd forego the hopes of a world's empire,
Rather than wound the bowels of my friend.

Pier. I must confess, you there have touch'd
my weakness,

I have a friend; hear it! such a friend,
My heart was ne'er shut to him. Nay, I'll tell you:
He knows the very business of this hour;
But he rejoices in the cause, and loves it;
We've chang'd a vow to live and die together,
And he's at hand to ratify it here.

Ren. How! all betray'd!

Pier. No—I've nobly dealt with you;
I've brought my all into the public stock:
I've but one friend, and him I'll share amongst
you:

Receive and cherish him; or if, when seen
And search'd, you find him worthless: as my tongue

Has lodg'd this secret in his faithful breast,
To ease your fears, I wear a dagger here
Shall rip it out again, and give you rest.
Come forth, thou only good I e'er could boast of.

Enter JAFFIER, with a Dagger.

Bed. His presence bears the show of manly virtue.

Jaf. I know you'll wonder all, that thus uncall'd,
I dare approach this place of fatal councils;
But I'm amongst you, and by heav'n it glads me
To see so many virtues thus united
To restore justice, and dethrone oppression.
Command this sword, if you would have it quiet,
Into this breast; but, if you think it worthy
To cut the throats of reverend rogues in robes,
Send me into the curs'd assembled senate:
It shrinks not, though I meet a father there.
Would you behold this city flaming? here's
A hand shall bear a lighted torch at noon
To th' arsenal, and set its gates on fire.

Ren. You talk this well, sir.

Jaf. Nay—by heaven I'll do this.

Come, come, I read distrust in all your faces;
You fear me villain, and, indeed, it's odd
To hear a stranger talk thus, at first meeting,
Of matters that have been so well debated;
But I come ripe with wrongs, as you with councils.

I hate this senate, am a foe to Venice;
A friend to none, but men resolv'd like me
To push on mischief. Oh! did you but know me,
I need not talk thus!

Bed. Pierre, I must embrace him.

My heart beats to this man, as if it knew him.

Ren. I never lov'd these huggers.

Jaf. Still I see

The cause delights ye not. Your friends survey me
As I were dangerous—But I come arm'd Against all doubts, and to your trust will give A pledge, worth more than all the world can pay for.

My Belvidera. Hoa; my Belvidera!

Bed. What wonder's next?

Jaf. Let me entreat you,
As I have henceforth hopes to call you friends,
That all but the ambassador, and this Grave guide of councils, with my friend that owns me;

Withdraw awhile, to spare a woman's blushes.

[Exeunt all but Bedamar, Renault, Jaffier, and Pierre.]

Enter BELVIDERA.

Bed. Pierre, whither will this ceremony lead
us?

Jaf. My Belvidera! Belvidera!

Bel. Who,

Who calls so loud at this late peaceful hour?
That voice was wont to come in gentle whispers,
And fill my ears with the soft breath of love.
Thou hourly image of my thoughts, where art thou?

Jaf. Indeed 'tis late.

Bel. Alas! where am I? whither is't you lead me?

Methinks I read distraction in your face,
Something less gentle than the fate you tell me.
You shake and tremble too! your blood runs cold!

Heav'n's guard my love, and bless his heart with patience.

Jaf. That I have patience, let our fate bear
witness,

Who has ordain'd it so, that thou and I (Thou, the divinest good man e'er possess'd,
And I, the wretched'st of the race of man)
This very hour, without one tear, must part.

Bel. Part! must we part? Oh, am I then forsaken?

Why drag you from me? Whither are you going?

My dear! my life! my love!

Jaf. Oh, friends!

Bel. Speak to me.

Jaf. Take her from my heart,
She'll gain such hold else, I shall ne'er get loose.
I charge thee take her, but with tender'st care
Relieve her troubles, and assuage her sorrows.

Ren. Rise, madam, and command amongst your servants.

Jaf. To you, sirs, and your honours, I bequeath her;

And with her this; when I prove unworthy—
[Gives a Dagger.]

You know the rest—Then strike it to her heart;
And tell her, he who three whole happy years
Lay in her arms, and each kind night repeated
The passionate vows of still increasing love,
Sent that reward for all her truth and sufferings.

Bel. Nay, take my life, since he has sold it cheaply.

O! thou unkind one;
Never meet more! have I deserv'd this from you;
Look on me, tell me, speak, thou fair deceiver.
Why am I separated from thy love?
If I am false, accuse me; but if true,
Don't, pr'ythee don't, in poverty forsake me,
But pity the sad heart that's torn with parting.
Yet hear me, yet recall me—

[Exeunt Renault, Bedamar, and Belvidera.]

Jaf. Oh! my eyes,
Look not that way, but turn yourselves awhile
Into my heart, and be wean'd altogether.
My friend where art thou?

Pier. Here, my honour's brother.

Jaf. Is Belvidera gone?

Pier. Renault has led her
Back to her own apartment; but, by heav'n,
Thou must not see her more, till our work's over.

Jaf. No!

Pier. Not for your life.

Jaf. Oh, Pierre, wert thou but she,
How I would pull thee down into my heart,
Gaze on thee, till my eye-strings crack'd with
love;

Then, swelling, sighing, raging to be blest,
Come like a panting turtle to thy breast;
On thy soft bosom hovering, bill and play,
Confess the cause why last I fled away;
Own 'twas a fault, but swear to give it o'er,
And never follow false ambition more.

[Exeunt.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—A Chamber.

Enter BELVIDERA.

Bel. I'm sacrific'd! I'm sold! betray'd to shame!

Inevitable ruin has enclos'd me!
He that should guard my virtue has betray'd it;
Left me! undone me! Oh, that I could hate him!
Where shall I go? Oh, whither, whither, wander?

Enter JAFFIER.

Jaf. Can Belvidera want a resting-place,
When these poor arms are ready to receive her?
There was a time—

Bel. Yes, yes, there was a time,
When Belvidera's tears, her cries, and sorrows,
Were not despis'd; when, if she chanc'd to sigh,
Or look'd but sad—there was indeed a time,
When Jaffier would have ta'en her in his arms,
Eas'd her declining head upon his breast,
And never left her till he found the cause.

Jaf. Oh, Portia, Portia! What a soul was thine!

Bel. That Portia was a woman; and when Brutus,
Big with the fate of Rome, (heav'n guard thy safety!)
Conceal'd from her the labours of his mind;
She let him see her blood was great as his,
Flow'd from a spring as noble, and a heart
Fit to partake his troubles as his love.
Fetch, fetch that dagger back, the dreadful dower,

Thou gav'st last night in parting with me; strike it
Here to my heart; and as the blood flows from it,
Judge if it run not pure, as Cato's daughter's.

Jaf. Oh! Belvidera!

Bel. Why was I last night deliver'd to a villain?

Jaf. Ha! a villain?

Bel. Yes, to a villain! Why at such an hour
Meets that assembly, all made up of wretches?
Why, I in this hand, and in that a dagger,
Was I deliver'd with such dreadful ceremonies?
To you, sirs, and to your honours, I bequeath her,
And with her this: Whene'er I prove unworthy—
You know the rest—then strike it to her heart.
Oh! why's that rest conceal'd from me? Must I
Be made the hostage of a hellish trust?

For such I know I am; that's all my value.
But, by the love and loyalty I owe thee,
I'll free thee from the bondage of the slaves;
Straight to the senate, tell 'em all I know,
All that I think, all that my fears inform me.

Jaf. Is this the Roman virtue; this the blood
That boasts its purity with Cato's daughter?
Would she have e'er betray'd her Brutus?

Bel. No:

For Brutus trusted her. Wert thou so kind,
What would not Belvidera suffer for thee?

Jaf. I shall undo myself, and tell thee all.
Yet think a little, ere thou tempt me further;
Think I've a tale to tell will shake thy nature,
Melt all this boasted constancy thou talk'st of
Into vile tears and despicable sorrows:
Then if thou shouldst betray me!—

Bel. Shall I swear!

Jaf. No, do not swear: I would not violate
Thy tender nature, with so rude a bond:
But as thou hop'st to see me live my days,
And love thee long, lock this within thy breast:
I've bound myself, by all the strictest sacraments,
Divine and human—

Bel. Speak!

Jaf. To kill thy father—

Bel. My father!

Jaf. Nay, the throats of the whole senate
Shall bleed, my Belvidera. He, amongst us,
That spares his father, brother, or his friend,
Is damn'd.

Bel. Oh!

Jaf. Have a care, and shrink not even in thought:

For if thou dost—

Bel. I know it; thou wilt kill me.
Do, strike thy sword into this bosom: lay me
Dead on the earth, and then thou wilt be safe.
Murder my father! though his cruel nature
Has persecuted me to my undoing;
Driven me to basest wants; can I behold him,
With smiles of vengeance, butcher'd in his age?
The sacred fountain of my life destroy'd?
And canst thou shed the blood that gave me being?
Nay, be a traitor too, and sell thy country?
Can thy great heart descend so vilely low,
Mix with hir'd slaves, bravoës, and common stabbers,

Nose-slitters, alley-lurking villains! join
With such a crew, and take a ruffian's wages,
To cut the throats of wretches as they sleep?

Jaf. Thou wrong'st me, Belvidera! I've engaged
With men of souls; fit to reform the ill
Of all mankind: there's not a heart amongst them
But's stout, as death, yet honest as the nature

Of man first made, ere fraud and vice were fashion.

Bel. What's he, to whose curst hands last night thou gav'st me?

Was that well done? Oh! I could tell a story, Would rouse thy lion heart out of its den, And make it rage with terrifying fury.

Jaf. Speak on, I charge thee.

Bel. O my love! If e'er

Thy Belvidera's peace deserv'd thy care, Remove me from this place. Last night, last night!

Jaf. Distract me not, but give me all the truth.

Bel. No sooner wert thou gone, and I alone, Left in the pow'r of that old son of mischief; No sooner was I lain on my sad bed, But that vile wretch approach'd me, loose, unbutton'd,

Ready for violation: Then my heart Throbb'd with its fears: Oh, how I wept and sigh'd,

And shrank and trembled! wish'd in vain for him That should protect me! Thou, alas! wert gone.

Jaf. Patience, sweet heav'n, till I make vengeance sure.

Bel. He drew the hideous dagger forth, thou gav'st him,

And with upbraiding smiles, he said, Behold it: This is the pledge of a false husband's love: And in my arms then press'd, and would have clasp'd me;

But with my cries, I scar'd his coward heart, Till he withdrew, and mutter'd vows to hell. These are thy friends! with these thy life, thy honour,

Thy love, all stak'd, and all will go to ruin.

Jaf. No more: I charge thee keep this secret close.

Clear up thy sorrows; look as if thy wrongs Were all forgot, and treat him like a friend, As no complaint were made. No more; retire, Retire, my life, and doubt not of my honour; I'll heal its failings, and deserve thy love,

Bel. Oh! should I part with thee, I fear thou wilt

In anger leave me, and return no more.

Jaf. Return no more! I would not live without thee

Another night, to purchase the creation.

Bel. When shall we meet again?

Jaf. Anon, at twelve

I'll steal myself to thy expecting arms: Come like a travell'd dove, and bring thee peace.

Bel. Indeed!

Jaf. By all our loves.

Bel. 'Tis hard to part:

But sure no falsehood ever look'd so fairly. Farewell; remember twelve. [Exit.]

Jaf. Let heav'n forget me,

When I remember not thy truth, thy love.

Enter PIERRE.

Pier. Jaffier.

Jaf. Who calls?

Pier. A friend, that could have wish'd I have found thee otherwise employed. What, hunt

A wife, on the dull soil! Sure a staunch husband Of all hounds is the dullest. Wilt thou never, Never be wean'd from caudles and confections? What feminine tales hast thou been list'ning to, Of unair'd shirts, catarrhs and tooth-ach, got By thin-sol'd shoes? Damnation! that a fellow, Chosen to be a sharer in the destruction

Of a whole people, should sneak thus into corners To ease his fulsome lusts, and fool his mind.

Jaf. May not a man then trifle out an hour With a kind woman, and not wrong his calling?

Pier. Not in a cause like ours.

Jaf. Then, friend, our cause Is in a damn'd condition: for I'll tell thee, That cankerworm, call'd lechery, has touch'd it; 'Tis tainted vilely. Wouldst thou think it? Renault (That mortify'd, old, wither'd, winter rogue) He visited her last night, like a kind guardian: Faith! she has some temptation, that's the truth on't.

Pier. He durst not wrong his trust.

Jaf. 'Twas something late, though, To take the freedom of a lady's chamber.

Pier. Was she in bed?

Jaf. Yes, faith, in virgin sheets, White as her bosom, Pierre, dish'd neatly up, Might tempt a weaker appetite to taste. Oh! how the old fox stunk, I warrant thee, When the rank fit was on him!

Pier. Patience guide me!

He's us'd no violence?

Jaf. No, no; out on't, violence!

Play'd with her neck; brush'd her with his grey beard;

But not a jot of violence.

Pier. Damn him.

Jaf. Ay, so say I: but hush, no more on't. All hitherto is well, and I believe Myself no monster yet: Sure it is near the hour We all should meet for our concluding orders: Will the ambassador be here in person?

Pier. No, he has sent commission to that villain, Renault,

To give the executing charge:

I'd have thee be a man, if possible, And keep thy temper; for a brave revenge Ne'er comes too late.

Jaf. Fear not, I am cool as patience.

Pier. He's yonder, coming this way through the hall;

His thoughts seem full.

Jaf. Prythee retire, and leave me With him alone: I'll put him to some trial; See how his rotten part will bear the touching.

Pier. Be careful, then. [Exit.]

Jaf. Nay, never doubt, but trust me.

What! be a devil, take a damning oath For shedding native blood! Can there be a sin In merciful repentance? Oh, this villain!

Enter RENAULT.

Ren. Perverse and peevish: What a slave is man

To let his rebel passions master him! Dispatch the tool her husband—that were well. Who's there?

Jaf. A man.

Ren. My friend, my near ally, The hostage of your faith, my beauteous charge, is very well.

Jaf. Sir, are you sure of that? Stands she in perfect health? Beats her pulse even; Neither too hot nor cold?

Ren. What means that question?

Jaf. Oh, women have fantastic constitutions, Inconstant in their wishes, always wavering, And never fix'd. Was it not boldly done, Even at first sight, to trust the thing I lov'd (A tempting treasure too) with youth so fierce

And vigorous as thine? but thou art honest.

Ren. Who dares accuse me?

Jaf. Curs'd be he that doubts

Thy virtue! I have try'd it, and declare,
Were I to choose a guardian of my honour,
I'd put it in thy keeping: for I know thee.

Ren. Know me!

Jaf. Ay, know thee. There's no falsehood
in thee:

Thou look'st just as thou art. Let us embrace.
Now wouldst thou cut my throat, or I cut thine.

Ren. You dare not do't.

Jaf. You lie, sir.

Ren. How!

Jaf. No more,

'Tis a base world, and must reform, that's all.

Enter SPINOSA, THEODORE, ELLIOTT, REVILLI-DO, DURAND, BROMVEIL, and the rest of the Conspirators.

Ren. Spinosa! Theodore!

Spin. The same.

Ren. You are welcome.

Spin. You are trembling, sir.

Ren. 'Tis a cold night, indeed, and I am aged;
Full of decay and natural infirmities:

Re-enter PIERRE.

We shall be warm, my friends, I hope, tomorrow.

Pier. 'Twas not well done; thou shouldst have strok'd him,

And not have gall'd him.

Jaf. Damn him, let him chew on't.

Heav'n! where am I? beset with cursed fiends,
That wait to damn me! What a devil's man,
When he forgets his nature—hush, my heart.

Ren. My friends, 'tis late; are we assembled all?

To-morrow's rising sun must see you all
Deck'd in your honours. Are the soldiers ready?

Pier. All, all.

Ren. You, Durand, with your thousand must possess

St. Mark's; you, captain, know your charge already,

'Tis to secure the ducal palace: You,
Be all this done with the least tumult possible,
'Till in each place you post sufficient guards:
Then sheathe your swords in every breast you
meet.

Jaf. Oh! reverend cruelty! damn'd bloody villain!

Ren. During this execution, Durand, you
Must in the midst keep your battalia fast;
And, Theodore, be sure to plant the cannon
That may command the streets;
This done, we'll give the general alarm,
Apply petards, and force the ar'snal gates;
Then fire the city round in several places,
Or with our cannon (if it dare resist)
Batter to ruin. But above all I charge you,
Shed blood enough; spare neither sex nor age,
Name nor condition; if there live a senator
After to-morrow, though the dullest rogue
That e'er said nothing, we have lost our ends.
If possible, let's kill the very name
Of senator, and bury it in blood.

Jaf. Merciless, horrid slave—Ay, blood
enough!

Shed blood enough, old Renault! how thou charm'st me!

Ren. But one thing more, and then farewell, till fate

Join us again, or sep'rate us for ever.

First let's embrace. Heav'n knows who next shall thus

Wing ye together; but let's all remember,
We wear no common cause upon our swords:
Let each man think that on his single virtue
Depends the good and fame of all the rest;
Eternal honour, or perpetual infamy.

You droop, sir.

Jaf. No; with most profound attention
I've heard it all, and wonder at thy virtue.
Oh, Belvidera! take me to thy arms,
And show me where's my peace, for I have lost it. [Exit.]

Ren. Without the least remorse then, let's resolve

With fire and sword t'exterminate these tyrants;
Under whose weight this wretched country labours,

The means are only in our hands to crown them.

Pier. And may those pow'rs above that are propitious

To gallant minds, record this cause and bless it.

Ren. Thus happy, thus secure of all we wish for,

Should there, my friends, be found among us one
False to this glorious enterprise, what fate,
What vengeance were enough for such a villain?

Ell. Death here without repentance, hell
hereafter.

Ren. Let that be my lot, if as here I stand,
Listed by fate among her darling sons,
Though I had one only brother, dear by all
The strictest ties of nature; could I have such a friend

Join'd in this cause, and had but ground to fear
He meant foul play; may this right hand drop
from me,

If I'd not hazard all my future peace,
And stab him to the heart before you. Who,
Who would do less? Wouldst thou not,
Pierre, the same?

Pier. You've singled me, sir, out for this hard question.

As if it were started only for my sake!
Am I the thing you fear? Here, here's my bosom,
Search it with all your swords. Am I a traitor?

Ren. No: but I fear your late commended
friend

Is little less. Come, sirs, 'tis now no time
To trifle with our safety. Where's this Jaffier?

Spin. He left the room just now, in strange disorder.

Ren. Nay, there is danger in him: I observ'd him;

During the time I took for explanation,
He was transported from most deep attention
To a confusion which he could not smother,
His looks grew full of sadness and surprise,
All which betray'd a wavering spirit in him,
That labour'd with reluctancy and sorrow.
What's requisite for safety, must be done
With speedy execution; he remains
Yet in our power: I, for my own part, wear
A dagger—

Pier. Well.

Ren. And I could wish it—

Pier. Where?

Ren. Buried in his heart.

Pier. Away; we're yet all friends,

No more of this, 'twill breed ill blood among us.

Spin. Let us all draw our swords, and search the house,
Pull him from the dark hole where he sits brooding

O'er his cold fears, and each man kill his share of him.

Pier. Who talks of killing? Who's he'll shed the blood

That's dear to me? is't you, or you, or you, sir? What, not one speak! how you stand gaping all On your grave oracle, your wooden god there! Yet not a word! Then, sir, I'll tell you a secret; Suspicion's but at best a coward's virtue.

[To Renault.

Ren. A coward! [Handles his Sword.

Pier. Put up thy sword, old man; Thy hand shakes at it. Come, let's heal this breach; I am too hot, we yet may all live friends.

Spin. Till we are safe, our friendship cannot be so.

Pier. Again! Who's that?

Spin. 'Twas I.

Theo. And I.

Ren. And I.

Omnes. And all.

Ren. Who are on my side?

Spin. Every honest sword.

Let's die like men, and not be sold like slaves.

Pier. One such word more, by heav'n I'll to the senate,

And hang ye all, like dogs, in clusters.

Why peep your coward swords half out their shells?

Why do you not all brandish them like mine? You fear to die, and yet dare talk of killing.

Ren. Go to the senate, and betray us! haste! Secure thy wretched life; we fear to die Less than thou dar'st be honest.

Pier. That's rank falsehood.

Fear'st not thou death! Fie, there's a knavish itch In that salt blood, an utter foe to smarting. Had Jaffier's wife prov'd kind, he'd still been true.

Faugh, how that stinks! thou die, thou kill my friend!

Or thou! or thou! with that lean wither'd face. Away, 'disperse all to your several charges, And meet to-morrow where your honour calls you.

I'll bring that man, whose blood you so much thirst for,

And you shall see him venture for you fairly—Hence! hence, I say. (Exit Renault, angrily.

Spin. I fear we've been to blame, And done too much.

Theo. 'Twas too far urg'd against the man you lov'd.

Rev. Here, take our swords, and crush them with your feet.

Spin. Forgive us, gallant friend.

Pier. Nay, now you've found

The way to melt, and cast me as you will. Whence rose all this discord?

Oh, what a dangerous precipice have we 'scap'd!

How near a fall was all we'd long been building! What an eternal blot had stain'd our glories, If one, the bravest and the best of men, Had fall'n a sacrifice to rash suspicion, Butcher'd by those, whose cause he came to cherish!

Come but to-morrow, all your doubts shall end, }
And to your loves, me better recommend, } That I've preserv'd your fame, and sav'd my } friend. [Exeunt.

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—The Rialto.

Enter JAFFIER and BELVIDERA.

Jaf. Where dost thou lead me? Every step I move,

Methinks I tread upon some mangled limb Of a rack'd friend. Oh, my charming ruin! Where are we wandering?

Bel. To eternal honour. To do a deed shall chronicle thy name Among the glorious legends of those few That have sav'd sinking nations. Thy renown Shall be the future song of all the virgins, Who by thy piety have been preserv'd From horrid violation. Every street Shall be adorn'd with statues to thy honour; And at thy feet this great inscription written, Remember him that propp'd the fall of Venice.

Jaf. Rather, remember him, who, after all The sacred bonds of oaths, and holier friendship, In fond compassion to a woman's tears, Forgot his manhood, virtue, truth, and honour, To sacrifice the bosom that reliev'd him. Why wilt thou damn me?

Bel. Oh, inconstant man! How will you promise; how will you deceive! Do, return back, replace me in my bondage, Tell all thy friends how dangerously thou lov'st me,

And let thy dagger do its bloody office. Or if thou think'st it nobler, let me live, Till I'm a victim to the hateful lust Of that infernal devil.

Last night, my love!

Jaf. Name it not again: It shows a beastly image to my fancy, Will wake me into madness. Destruction, swift destruction, fall on my coward head.

Bel. Delay no longer then, but to the senate, And tell the dismal'st story ever utter'd: Tell 'em what bloodshed, rapines, desolations, Have been prepar'd, how near's the fatal hour. Save thy poor country, save the reverend blood Of all its nobles, which to-morrow's dawn Must else see shed.

Jaf. Oh! think what then may prove my lot: By all heav'n's powers, prophetic truth dwells in thee;

For every word thou speak'st, strikes through my heart;

Just what thou'st made me, take me, Belvidera, And lead me to the place where I'm to say This bitter lesson; where I must betray My truth, my virtue, constancy, and friends. Must I betray my friend? Ah! take me quickly: Secure me well before that thought's renew'd; If I relapse once more, all's lost for ever.

Bel. Hast thou a friend more dear than Belvidera?

Jaf. No; thou'st my soul itself; wealth, friendship, honour, All present joys, and earnest of all future, Are summ'd in thee.

Come, lead me forward, now, like a tame lamb To sacrifice. Thus, in his fatal garlands

Deck'd fine and pleas'd, the wanton skips and plays,
 Trots by th' enticing, flatt'ring priestess' side,
 And much transported with its little pride,
 Forgets his dear companions of the plain;
 Till, by her bound, he's on the altar lain, Yet then too hardly bleats, such pleasure's in the pain.

Enter Officer and six Guards.

Offi. Stand! who goes there?

Bel. Friends.

Offi. But what friends are you?

Bel. Friends to the senate, and the state of Venice.

Offi. My orders are to seize on all I find
 At this late hour, and bring 'em to the council,
 Who are now sitting.

Jaf. Sir, you shall be obey'd.
 Now the lot's cast, and, fate, do what thou wilt. [Excunt guarded.]

SCENE II.—The Senate-house, where appear sitting the DUKE of VENICE, PRIULI, and other Senators.

Duke. Antony, Priuli, senators of Venice,
 Speak, why are we assembled here this night?
 What have you to inform us of, concerns
 The state of Venice, honour, or its safety?

Pri. Could words express the story I've to
 tell you,
 Fathers, these tears were useless, these sad tears
 That fall from my old eyes; but there is cause
 We all should weep, tear off these purple robes,
 And wrap ourselves in sackcloth, sitting down
 On the sad earth, and cry aloud to heav'n:
 Heav'n knows, if yet there be an hour to come
 Ere Venice be no more.

All Sen. How!
Pri. Nay, we stand
 Upon the very brink of gaping ruin.
 Within this city's form'd a dark conspiracy,
 To massacre us all, our wives and children,
 Kindred and friends, our palaces and temples
 To lay in ashes: nay, the hour too fix'd;
 The swords, for aught I know, drawn e'en
 this moment,
 And the wild waste begun. From unknown hands
 I had this warning; but, if we are men,
 Let's not be tamely butcher'd, but do something
 That may inform the world, in after ages,
 Our virtue was not ruin'd, though we were.
[A Noise without.]
 Room, room, make room for some prisoners—

Enter Officer and Guards.

Duke. Speak, there. What disturbance?

Offi. Two prisoners have the guards seiz'd
 in the street,
 Who say, they come to inform this reverend senate
 About the present danger.

Enter JAFFIER and Officer.

All Sen. Give 'em entrance—Well, who are
 you?

Jaf. A villain,
 Would every man, that hears me,
 Would deal so honestly, and own his title.

Duke. 'Tis rumour'd, that a plot has been contriv'd
 Against this state; and you've a share in't too.
 If you are a villain, to redeem your honour

Unfold the truth, and be restor'd with mercy.

Jaf. Think not, that I to save my life came
 hither;

I know its value better; but in pity
 To all those wretches whose unhappy dooms
 Are fix'd and seal'd. You see me here before you,
 The sworn and covenanted foe of Venice:
 But use me as my dealings may deserve,
 And I may prove a friend.

Duke. The slave capitulates,
 Give him the tortures.

Jaf. That you dare not do;
 Your fear won't let you, not the longing itch
 To hear a story which you dread the truth of:
 Truth, which the fear of smart shall ne'er get
 from me.

Cowards are scar'd with threat'nings; boys are whipt

Into confessions: but a steady mind
 Acts of itself, ne'er asks the body counsel.
 Give him the tortures! Name but such a thing
 Again, by heav'n I'll shut these lips for ever.
 Not all your racks, your engines, or your
 wheels,

Shall force a groan away, that you may guess at.

Duke. Name your conditions.

Jaf. For myself full pardon,
 Besides the lives of two-and-twenty friends,
 Whose names are here enroll'd—Nay, let their crimes

Be ne'er so monstrous, I must have the oaths
 And sacred promise of this reverend council,
 That, in a full assembly of the senate
 The thing I ask be ratify'd. Swear this,
 And I'll unfold the secret of your danger.

Duke. Propose the oath.

Jaf. By all the hopes
 Ye have of peace and happiness hereafter,
 Swear.—Ye swear?

All Sen. We swear.

Jaf. And, as ye keep the oath,
 May you, and your posterity be bless'd,
 Or curs'd for ever.

All Sen. Else be curs'd for ever.

Jaf. Then here's the list, and with't the full disclose
 Of all that threatens you. [Delivers a Paper.]
 Now, fate, thou hast caught me.

Duke. Give order that all diligent search
 be made

To seize these men, their characters are public;
 The paper intimates their rendezvous
 To be at the house of a fam'd Grecian courtesan,
 Call'd Aquilina; see that place secur'd.
 You, Jaffier, must with patience bear till morning
 To be our prisoner.

Jaf. Would the chains of death
 Had bound me safe, ere I had known this minute.

Duke. Captain, withdraw your prisoner.

Jaf. Sir, if possible,
 Lead me where my own thoughts themselves
 may lose me;

Where I may doze out what I've left of life,
 Forget myself, and this day's guilt and falsehood.
 Cruel remembrance, how shall I appease thee?

(Exit guarded.)

Offi. [Without] More traitors; room, room; room, make room, there.

Duke. How's this? guards!
 Where are our guards? Shut up the gates,
 the treason's
 Already at our doors.

Enter Officer.

Offi. My lords, more traitors,
Seiz'd in the very act of consultation;
Furnish'd with arms and instruments of mischief.
Bring in the prisoners.

Enter PIERRE, RENAULT, THEODORE, ELLIOTT, REVILLIDO, and other Conspirators, in Fetters.

Pier. You, my lords, and fathers
(As you are pleas'd to call yourselves), of Venice;
If you sit here to guide the course of justice,
Why these disgraceful chains upon the limbs
That have so often labour'd in your service?
Are these the wreaths of triumph ye bestow
On those, that bring you conquest home, and honours?

Duke. Go on; you shall be heard, sir.

Ant. And be hang'd too, I hope.

Pier. Are these the trophies I've deserv'd for fighting

Your battles with confederated powers?

When winds and seas conspir'd to overthrow
you;

And brought the fleets of Spain to your own harbours;

When you, great duke, shrunk trembling in your palace,

And saw your wife, the Adriatic, plough'd,
Like a lewd whore, by bolder prows than yours,
Stepp'd not I forth, and taught your loose Venetians

The task of honour, and the way to greatness?
Rais'd you from your capitulating fears

To stipulate the terms of su'd-for peace?

And this my recompense! if I'm a traitor, Produce my charge; or show the wretch that's base

And brave enough to tell me I'm a traitor.

Duke. Know you one Jaffier?

[Conspirators murmur.]

Pier. Yes, and know his virtue.

His justice, truth, his general worth, and sufferings
From a hard father, taught me first to love him.

Enter JAFFIER, guarded.

Duke. See him brought forth.

Pier. My friend too bound! nay then
Our fate has conquer'd us, and we must fall.
Why droops the man whose welfare's so much
mine,

They're but one thing? These reverend tyrants,
Jaffier,

Call us traitors. Art thou one, my brother?

Jaf. To thee, I am the falsest, veriest slave,
That e'er betray'd a generous, trusting friend,
And gave up honour to be sure of ruin.

All our fair hopes, which morning was t' have crown'd,

Has this curs'd tongue o'erthrown.

Pier. So, then all's over:

Venice has lost her freedom, I my life.

No more! Farewell!

Duke. Say; will you make confession
Of your vile deeds, and trust the senate's mercy?

Pier. Curs'd be your senate: curs'd your constitution:

The curse of growing factions and divisions,
Still vex your councils, shake your public safety,
And make the robes of government you wear
Hateful to you, as these base chains to me.

Duke. Pardon, or death?

Pier. Death! honourable death!

Ren. Death's the best thing we ask, or you can give,

No shameful bonds, but honourable death.

Duke. Break up the council. Captain, guard your prisoners.

Jaffier, you're free, but these must wait for judgment.

[Exeunt all the Senators.]

Pier. Come, where's my dungeon? Lead me to my straw:

It will not be the first time I've lodg'd hard
To do the senate service.

Jaf. Hold, one moment.

Pier. Who's he disputes the judgment of the senate?

Presumptuous rebel—on— [Strikes Jaffier.]

Jaf. By heav'n, you stir not!

I must be heard; I must have leave to speak.

Thou hast disgrac'd me, Pierre, by a vile blow:
Had not a dagger done thee nobler justice?

But use me as thou wilt, thou canst not wrong me,
For I am fallen beneath the basest injuries:

Yet look upon me with an eye of mercy,

With pity and with charity behold me:

But as there dwells a godlike nature in thee,
Listen with mildness to my supplications.

Pier. What whining monk art thou? what holy cheat,

That wouldst encroach upon my credulous ears,
And cant'st thus vilely? Hence! I know thee not:
Leave, hypocrite.

Jaf. Not know me, Pierre?

Pier. No, I know thee not! What art thou?

Jaf. Jaffier, thy friend, thy once lov'd, valu'd
friend!

Though now deserv'dly scorn'd, and us'd most hardly.

Pier. Thou, Jaffier! thou, my once lov'd, valu'd friend!

By heav'n's thou liest; the man so call'd, my
friend,

Was generous, honest, faithful, just, and valiant;
Noble in mind, and in his person lovely;

Dear to my eyes, and tender to my heart:

But thou, a wretched, base, false, worthless
coward,

Poor, even in soul, and loathsome in thy aspect;
All eyes must shun thee, and all hearts detest thee.

Pr'ythee avoid; nor longer cling thus round me,
Like something baneful, that my nature's chill'd at.

Jaf. I have not wrong'd thee, by these tears
I have not.

Pier. Hast thou not wrong'd me? Dar'st thou call thyself

That once lov'd, valu'd friend of mine,
And swear thou hast not wrong'd me? Whence these chains?

Whence the vile death which I may meet this moment?

Whence this dishonour, but from thee, thou false one?

Jaf. All's true; yet grant one thing, and I've done asking.

Pier. What's that?

Jaf. To take thy life, on such conditions
The counsel have propos'd: thou, and thy friends,
May yet live long, and to be better treated.

Pier. Life! ask my life! confess! record myself
A villain, for the privilege to breathe!

And carry up and down this cursed city,
A discontented and repining spirit,

Burthensome to itself, a few years longer;
To lose it, may be at last, in a lewd quarrel
For some new friend, treacherous and false as thou art!

No, this vile world and I have long been jangling,
And cannot part on better terms than now,
When only men, like thee, are fit to live in't.

Jaf. By all that's just—

Pier. Swear by some other powers,
For thou hast broke that sacred oath too lately.

Jaf. Then, by that hell I merit, I'll not leave thee,

Till, to thyself, at least thou'rt reconcil'd,
However thy resentment deal with me.

Pier. Not leave me!

Jaf. No; thou shalt not force me from thee.
Use me reproachfully, and like a slave;
Tread on me, buffet me, heap wrongs on wrongs
On my poor head; I'll bear it all with patience
Shall weary out thy most unfriendly cruelty:
Lie at thy feet, and kiss 'em, though they spurn me;
Till wounded by my sufferings, thou relent,
And raise me to thy arms, with dear forgiveness.

Pier. Art thou not—

Jaf. What?

Pier. A traitor?

Jaf. Yes.

Pier. A villain?

Jaf. Granted.

Pier. A coward, a most scandalous coward;
Spiritless, void of honour; one who has sold
Thy everlasting fame, for shameless life?

Jaf. All, all and more, much more: my faults are numberless.

Pier. And wouldst thou have me live on terms like thine;

Base, as thou art false—

Jaf. No; 'tis to me that's granted:
The safety of thy life was all I aim'd at,
In recompense for faith and trust so broken.

Pier. I scorn it more, because preserv'd by thee;
And, as when first my foolish heart took pity
On thy misfortunes, sought thee in thy miseries,
Reliev'd thy wants, and rais'd thee from the state
Of wretchedness, in which thy fate had plung'd
thee,

To rank thee in my list of noble friends;
All I receiv'd, in surety for thy truth,
Were unregarded oaths, and this, this dagger, Giv'n with a worthless pledge, thou since hast
stol'n:

So I restore it back to thee again;
Swearing by all those pow'rs which thou hast violated,

Never, from this curs'd hour to hold communion, Friendship, or interest, with thee, though our
years

Were to exceed those limited the world.
Take it—farewell—for now I owe thee nothing.

Jaf. Say thou wilt live then.

Pier. For my life, dispose it
Just as thou wilt, because 'tis what I'm tir'd with.

Jaf. Oh, Pierre!

Pier. No more.

Jaf. My eyes won't lose the sight of thee,
But languish after thee, and ache with gazing.

Pier. Leave me—Nay, then thus, thus I throw thee from me;
And curses, great as is thy falsehood, catch thee. [Exit.]

Jaf. Amen.

He's gone, my father, friend, preserver,

And here's the portion he has left me:

[Holds the Dagger up.]

This dagger. Well remember'd! with this dagger,
I gave a solemn vow of dire importance;
Parted with this, and Belvidera together.
Have a care, mem'ry, drive that thought no further:

No, I'll esteem it as a friend's last legacy;
Treasure it up within this wretched bosom,
Where it may grow acquainted with my heart,
That when they meet, they start not from each other.

So now for thinking—A blow, call'd a traitor,
villain,

Coward, dishonourable coward; fough!
Oh! for a long sound sleep, and so forget it.
Down, busy devil!

Enter BELVIDERA.

Bel. Whither shall I fly?
Where hide me and my miseries together?
Where's now the Roman constancy I boasted?
Sunk into trembling fears and desperation,
Not daring to look up to that dear face
Which us'd to smile, eve'n on my faults; but,
down,

Bending these miserable eyes on earth,
Must move in penance, and implore much mercy.

Jaf. Mercy! kind heav'n has surely endless stores,

Hoarded for thee, of blessings yet untasted:
Oh, Belvidera! I'm the wretched'st creature
E'er crawl'd on earth.

My friend too, Belvidera, that dear friend,
Who, next to thee, was all my health rejoic'd in,
Has us'd me like a slave, shamefully us'd me:
'T would break thy pitying heart to hear the story.

Bel. What has he done?

Jaf. Before we parted,
Ere yet his guards had led him to his prison,
Full of severest sorrows for his sufferings,
With eyes o'erflowing, and a bleeding heart,
As at his feet I kneel'd and su'd for mercy,
With a reproachful hand he dash'd a blow:
He struck me, Belvidera! by heav'n, he struck me!
Buffeted, call'd me traitor, villain, coward.
Am I a coward? Am I a villain? Tell me:
Thou'rt the best judge, and mad'st me, if I am so!
Damnation! Coward!

Bel. Oh! forgive him, Jaffier;
And, if his sufferings wound thy heart already,
What will they do to-morrow?

Jaf. Ah!

Bel. To-morrow,
When thou shalt see him stretch'd in all the agonies

Of a tormenting and a shameful death;
His bleeding bowels, and his broken limbs,
Insulted o'er, by a vile, butchering villain;
What will thy heart do then? Oh! sure 'twill stream,

Like my eyes now.

Jaf. What means thy dreadful story?
Death, and to-morrow! Broken limbs and bowels!

Bel. The faithless senators, 'tis they've decreed it:

They say, according to our friends' request,
They shall have death, and not ignoble bondage:
Declare their promis'd mercy all has forfeited:
False to their oaths, and deaf to intercession, Warrants are pass'd for public death tomorrow.

Jaf. Death! doom'd to die! condemn'd unheard! unpleaded!

Bel. Nay, cruel'st racks and torments are preparing

To force confession from their dying pangs.
Oh! do not look so terribly upon me!

How your lips shake, and all your face disorder'd!
What means my love?

Jaf. Leave me, I charge thee, leave me—
Strong temptations

Wake in my heart.

Bel. For what?

Jaf. No more, but leave me.

Bel. Why?

Jaf. Oh! by heav'n, I love thee with that fondness,

I would not have thee stay a moment longer
Near these curs'd hands: Are they not cold upon thee?

[Pulls the Dagger half out of his Bosom, and puts it back again.]

Bel. No, everlasting comfort's in thy arms.
To lean thus on thy breast, is softer ease
Than downy pillows, deck'd with leaves of roses.

Jaf. Alas! thou think'st not of the thorns
'tis fill'd with:

Fly, ere they gall thee. There's a lurking serpent,
Ready to leap and sting thee to the heart:
Art thou not terrified?

Bel. No.

Jaf. Call to mind

What thou hast done, and whither thou hast brought me.

Bel. Hah!

Jaf. Where's my friend? my friend, thou smiling mischief!

Nay, shrink not, now 'tis too late; thou shouldst have fled

When thy guilt first had cause; for dire revenge
Is up, and raging for my friend. He groans!

Hark, how he groans! his screams are in my ears
Already; see, they've fix'd him on the wheel,

And now they tear him—Murder! Perjur'd
senate!

Murder—Oh!—Hark thee, traitress, thou hast done this!

Thanks to thy tears, and false persuading love.
How her eyes speak! Oh, thou bewitching creature!

[Fumbling for his Dagger.]

Madness can't hurt thee. Come, thou little trembler,

Creep even into my heart, and there lie safe:
Tis thy own citadel—Hah—yet stand off.

Heav'n must have justice, and my broken vows
Will sink me else beneath its reaching mercy.

I'll wink, and then 'tis done—

Bel. What means the lord

Of me, my life, and love? What's in thy bosom,
Thou grasp'st at so? Nay, why am I thus treated?

[Draws the Dagger and offers to stab her.]

Jaf. Know, Belvidera, when we parted last,
I gave this dagger with thee, as in trust,

To be thy portion if I e'er prov'd false.
On such condition, was my truth believ'd:

But now 'tis forfeited, and must be paid for.
[Offers to stab her again.]

Bel. Oh! Mercy!

[Kneeling.]

Jaf. Nay, no struggling.

Bel. Now then, kill me.

[Leaps on his Neck, and kisses him.]

Jaf. I am, I am a coward; witness heav'n,

Witness it, earth, and every being witness:

'Tis but one blow! yet by immortal love,
I cannot longer bear a thought to harm thee.

[He throws away the Dagger and embraces her.]

The seal of Providence is sure upon thee:

And thou wert born for yet unheard-of wonders.

Oh! thou wert either born to save or damn me.

By all the power that's giv'n me o'er my soul,

By thy resistless tears and conquering smiles,

By the victorious love that still waits on thee,

Fly to thy cruel father, save my friend,

Or all our future quiet's lost for ever.

Fall at his feet, cling round his reverend knees,

Speak to him with thy eyes, and with thy tears,

Melt his hard heart, and wake dead nature in him,

Crush him in th' arms, torture him with thy

softness;

Nor till thy prayers are granted, set him free,

But conquer him, as thou hast conquer'd me.

[Exeunt.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—An Apartment in PRIULI'S House.

Enter PRIULI.

Pri. Why, cruel heav'n, have my unhappy days
Been lengthen'd to this sad one? Oh! dishonour
And deathless infamy is fallen upon me.

Was it my fault? Am I a traitor? No.

But then, my only child, my daughter wedded;

There my best blood runs foul, and a disease

Incurable has seiz'd upon my memory.

Enter BELVIDERA, in a long mourning Veil.

Bel. He's there, my father, my inhuman father,
That for three years has left an only child

Expos'd to all the outrages of fate,

And cruel ruin!—oh—

Pri. What child of sorrow

Art thou, that comes wrapt in weeds of sadness,

And mov'st as if thy steps were tow'rd's a grave?

Bel. A wretch who from the very top of happiness

Am fall'n into the lowest depths of misery,

And want your pitying hand to raise me up again.

Pri. What wouldst thou beg for?

Bel. Pity and forgiveness.

[Throws up her Veil.]

By the kind, tender names of child and father,
Hear my complaints, and take me to your love.

Pri. My daughter!

Bel. Yes, your daughter.

Pri. Don't talk thus.

Bel. Yes, I must; and you must hear too.

I have a husband.

Pri. Damn him.

Bel. Oh! do not curse him;

He would not speak so hard a word towards you

On any terms, howe'er he deals with me.

Pri. Ha! what means my child?

Bel. Oh! my husband, my dear husband,

Carries a dagger in his once kind bosom,

To pierce the heart of your poor Belvidera.

Pri. Kill thee!

Bel. Yes, kill me. When he pass'd his faith

And covenant against your state and senate,

He gave me up a hostage for his truth:

With me a dagger and a dire commission,

Whene'er he fail'd, to plunge it through this
bosom.

I learnt the danger, chose the hour of love

T' attempt his heart, and bring it back to honour.
Great love prevail'd, and bless'd me with success!
He came, confess'd, betray'd his dearest friends
For promis'd mercy. Now they're doom'd to suffer.

Gall'd with remembrance of what then was sworn,

If they are lost, he vows t' appease the gods
With his poor life, and make my blood th' atonement.

Pri. Heav'n's!

Bel. If I was ever then your care, now hear me;
Fly to the senate, save the promis'd lives
Of his dear friends, ere mine be made the sacrifice.

Pri. Oh, my heart's comfort!

Bel. Will you not, my father?
Weep not, but answer me.

Pri. By heav'n I will.

Not one of them but what shall be immortal.
Canst thou forgive me all my follies past?
I'll henceforth be indeed a father; never,
Never more thus expose, but cherish thee,
Dear as the vital warmth that feeds my life,
Dear as these eyes that weep in fondness o'er thee.
Peace to thy heart. Farewell.

Bel. Go and remember,
'Tis Belvidera's life her father pleads for.

[Exeunt severally.]

SCENE II.—A Garden.

Enter JAFFIER.

Jaf. Final destruction seize on all the world.
Bend down ye heav'n's, and shutting round
this earth,
Crush the vile globe into its first confusion!

Enter BELVIDERA.

Bel. My life— [Meeting him.]

Jaf. My plague— [Turning from her.]

Bel. Nay, then I see my ruin.
If I must die!

Jaf. Nor let the thoughts of death perplex
thy fancy;

But answer me to what I shall demand,
With a firm temper and unshaken spirit.

Bel. I will, when I've done weeping—

Jaf. Fie, no more on't—
How long is't since that miserable day
We wedded first.

Bel. Oh! h h!

Jaf. Nay, keep in thy tears,
Lest they unman me too.

Bel. Heav'n knows I cannot;
The words you utter sound so very sadly,
The streams will follow—

Jaf. Come, I'll kiss 'em dry then.

Bel. But wasn't a miserable day?

Jaf. A curs'd one.

Bel. I thought it otherwise; and you've often sworn,
In the transporting hours of warmest love,
When sure you spoke the truth, you've sworn you bless'd it.

Jaf. 'Twas a rash oath.

Bel. Then why am I not curs'd too?

Jaf. No, Belvidera; by th' eternal truth,
I dote with too much fondness.

Bel. Still so kind?

Still then do you love me?

Jaf. Man ne'er was blest
Since the first pair met, as I have been.

Bel. Then sure you will not curse me?

Jaf. No. I'll bless thee.

I came on purpose, Belvidera, to bless thee.
'Tis now, I think, three years, we've liv'd together.

Bel. And may no fatal minute ever part us,
Till, reverend grown for age and love, we go
Down to one grave, as our last bed, together;
There sleep in peace, till an eternal morning.

Jaf. Did I not say, I came to bless thee?

Bel. You did.

Jaf. Then hear me, bounteous heav'n:
Pour down your blessings on this beauteous head,
Where everlasting sweets are always springing,
With a continual giving hand: let peace,
Honour, and safety, always hover round her;
Feed her with plenty; let her eyes ne'er see
A sight of sorrow, nor her heart know mourning:
Crown all her days with joy, her nights with rest,
Harmless as her own thoughts; and prop her
virtue,

To bear the loss of one that too much lov'd;
And comfort her with patience in our parting.

Bel. How! Parting, parting!

Jaf. Yes, for ever parting;
I have sworn, Belvidera, by yon heav'n,
That best can tell how much I lose to leave thee,
We part this hour for ever.

Bel. O! call back

Your cruel blessing; stay with me and curse me.

Jaf. Now hold, heart, or never.

Bel. By all the tender days we've liv'd together,
Pity my sad condition; speak, but speak.

Jaf. Oh! h h!

Bel. By these arms, that now cling round
thy neck,

By these poor streaming eyes—

Jaf. Murder! unhold me:

By th' immortal destiny that doom'd me.

[Draws the Dagger.]

To this curs'd minute, I'll not live one longer;
Resolve to let me go, or see me fall—

Hark, the dismal bell [Passing-bell tolls.]
Tolls out for death! I must attend its call too;

For my poor friend, my dying Pierre, expects me:
He sent a message to require I'd see him
Before he died, and take his last forgiveness.
Farewell, for ever.

Bel. Leave thy dagger with me,
Bequeath me something—Not one kiss at parting?

Oh! my poor heart, when wilt thou break?

[Going out, looks back at him.]

Jaf. Yet stay:

We have a child, as yet a tender infant:
Be a kind mother to him when I'm gone;
Breed him in virtue, and the paths of honour,
But never let him know his father's story;
I charge thee, guard him from the wrongs my fate
May do his future fortune, or his name.

Now—nearer yet— [Approaching each other.]
Oh! that my arms were rivetted

Thus round thee ever! But my friend! my oath!
This and no more. [Kisses her.]

Bel. Another, sure another,
For that poor little one you've ta'en such care of.
I'll give him truly.

Jaf. So now farewell.

Bel. For ever?

Jaf. Heav'n knows for ever; all good angels guard thee. [Exit.]

Bel. All ill ones sure had charge of me this moment.

Curs'd be my days, and doubly curs'd my nights.

Oh! give me daggers, fire, or water:
How I could bleed, how burn, how drown,
the waves
Huzzing and booming round my sinking head,
Till I descended to the peaceful bottom!
Oh! there's all quiet, here all rage and fury:
The air's too thin, and pierces my weak brain;
I long for thick, substantial sleep; Hell! hell!
Burst from the centre, rage and roar aloud,
If thou art half so hot, so mad as I am. [Exit.]

SCENE III.—A Scaffold, and a Wheel prepared for the Execution of PIERRE.

Enter Officer, PIERRE, Guards, Executioner, and a great Rabble.

Pier. My friend not come yet?

Enter JAFFIER.

Jaf. Oh, Pierre!

Pier. Yet nearer.

Dear to my arms, though thou'st undone my fame,
I can't forget to love thee. Pr'ythee, Jaffier,
Forgive that filthy blow my passion dealt thee;
I'm now preparing for the land of peace,
And fain would have the charitable wishes
Of all good men, like thee, to bless my journey.

Jaf. Good! I am the vilest creature, worse than e'er

Suffer'd the shameful fate thou'rt going to taste of.

Offi. The time grows short, your friends are dead already.

Jaf. Dead!

Pier. Yes, dead, Jaffier; they've all died like men too,

Worthy their character.

Jaf. And what must I do?

Pier. Oh, Jaffier!

Jaf. Speak aloud thy burthen'd soul,
And tell thy troubles to thy tortur'd friend.

Pier. Friend! Couldst thou yet be a friend, a generous friend,

I might hope comfort from thy noble sorrows.
Heav'n knows, I want a friend.

Jaf. And I a kind one,

That would not thus scorn my repenting virtue,
Or think, when he's to die, my thoughts are idle.

Pier. No! live, I charge thee, Jaffier.

Jaf. Yes, I will live:

But it shall be to see thy fall reveng'd
At such a rate, as Venice long shall groan for.

Pier. Wilt thou?

Jaf. I will, by heav'n.

Pier. Then still thou'rt noble,
And I forgive thee. Oh!—yet—shall I trust thee?

Jaf. No; I've been false already.

Pier. Dost thou love me?

Jaf. Rip up my heart, and satisfy thy doubtings.

Pier. Curse on this weakness. [Weeps.]

Jaf. Tears! Amazement! Tears!

I never saw thee melted thus before;
And know there's something labouring in thy bosom,

That must have vent: Though I'm a villain,
tell me.

Pier. See'st thou that engine?

[Pointing to the Wheel.]

Jaf. Why?

Pier. Is't fit a soldier, who has liv'd with honour,
Fought nation's quarrels, and been crown'd with conquest

Be expos'd a common carcass on a wheel?

Jaf. Hah!

Pier. Speak! is't fitting?

Jaf. Fitting!

Pier. Yes; is't fitting?

Jaf. What's to be done?

Pier. I'd have thee undertake

Something that's noble, to preserve my memory
From the disgrace that's ready to attain it.

Offi. The day grows late, sir.

Pier. I'll make haste. Oh, Jaffier!

Though thou'st betray'd me, do me some way justice.

Jaf. No more of that: thy wishes shall be satisfied;

I have a wife, and she shall bleed: my child too,
Yield up his little throat, and all

T' appease thee— [Going away, Pierre holds him.]

Pier. No—this—no more. [Whispers Jaffier]

Jaf. Ha! is't then so?

Pier. Most certainly.

Jaf. I'll do it.

Pier. Remember.

Offi. Sir!

Pier. Come, now I'm ready.

[He and Jaffier ascend the Scaffold.]

Captain, you should be a gentleman of honour;
Keep off the rabble, that I may have room

To entertain my fate, and die with decency.

Come. [Takes off his Gown, Executioner prepares to bind him.]

You'll think on't. [To Jaffier.]

Jaf. 'Twon't grow stale before to-morrow.

Pier. Now, Jaffier! now I'm going. Now—

[Executioner having bound him.]

Jaf. Have at thee,

Thou honest heart, then—here— [Stabs him.]

And this is well too. [Stabs himself.]

Pier. Now thou hast indeed been faithful.

This was done nobly—We have deceiv'd the senate.

Jaf. Bravely.

Pier. Ha, ha, ha—oh! oh!

[Dies.]

Jaf. Now, ye curs'd rulers,

Thus of the blood y've shed, I make libation
And sprinkle it mingling. May it rest upon you,

And all your race. Be henceforth peace a stranger
Within your walls; let plagues and famine waste

Your generation—Oh, poor Belvidera!

Sir, I have a wife, bear this in safety to her,

A token that with my dying breath I bless'd her,

And the dear little infant left behind me.

I'm sick—I'm quiet. [Dies. Scene shuts upon them.]

SCENE IV.—An Apartment at PRIULI'S.

Soft Music. Enter BELVIDERA, distracted, led by two of her Women; PRIULI and Servants.

Pri. Strengthen her heart with patience, pitying heav'n.

Bel. Come; come, come, come, come, nay, come to bed,

Pr'ythee, my love. The winds; hark how they whistle;

And the rain beats: Oh! how the weather shrinks me!

You are angry now, who cares? Pish, no indeed,
Choose then; I say you shall not go, you shall not;

Whip your ill nature; get you gone then. Oh!

Are you return'd? See, father, here he's come again:

Am I to blame to love him? O, thou dear one,
Why do you fly me? Are you angry still then?
Jaffier, where art thou? father, why do you do thus?

Stand off, don't hide him from me. He's here somewhere.

Stand off, I say: What gone? Remember't, tyrant:

I may revenge myself for this trick, one day.
I'll do't—I'll do't.

Enter Officer.

Pri. News, what news?

[Officer whispers Priuli.]

Off. Most sad, sir;

Jaffier, upon the scaffold, to prevent
A shameful death, stabb'd Pierre, and next himself;
Both fell together.

Pri. Daughter!

Bel. Ha! look there!

My husband bloody, and his friend too! Murder!
Who has done this? Speak to me, thou sad vision:

On these poor trembling knees I beg it. Vanish'd—

Here they went down—Oh, I'll dig, dig the den up!

You shan't delude me thus. Hoa, Jaffier, Jaffier,
Peep up, and give me but a look. I have him!
I've got him, father: Oh!

My love! my dear! my blessing! help me!
help me!

They have hold on me, and drag me to the bottom.

Nay—now they pull so hard—farewell—

[Dies. The Curtain falls slowly to Music.]

THE ORPHAN OF CHINA;

OR, The Unhappy Marriage. Tragedy by Thomas Otway. Acted at the Duke's Theatre 1680. The plot is founded on the history of Brandon, in a novel called English Adventures, published in 1667. The language is truly poetical, tender, and sentimental, the circumstances are affecting and the catastrophe is distressful. Yet there is somewhat improbable in the particular on which all the distresses are founded; and we must own that we incline to the opinion of that person, who, on first seeing it, exclaimed, "Oh! what an infinite deal of mischief would a farthing rushlight have prevented!" We cannot avoid remarking, says the Biographia Dramatica, that the compassion of the audience has commonly appeared misplaced; it lighting in general on the whining, irresolute Castalio, instead of falling, where it ought to do, on the more spirited and open-hearted Polydore, who, in consequence of concealments on the side of his brother, which he could not have any reason to expect, and by which he is really injured, is tempted in his love and resentment to an act which involves him in greater horror and distress than any of the other characters can undergo, from the more bloody effects it produces. This partiality has, however, always appeared to us to arise from some strokes of libertinism thrown into the early parts of Polydore's character, which give an air of looseness to it, and prejudice the audience against him through the whole play. As Dr. Johnson observes, "it is one of the few pieces that keep possession of the stage, and has pleased for almost a century, through all the vicissitudes of dramatic fashion. Of this play nothing new can easily be said. It is a domestic tragedy drawn from middle life. Its whole power is upon the affections; for it is not written with much comprehension of thought, or elegance of expression. But if the heart is interested, many other beauties may be wanting, yet not be missed." Voltaire, who (from his egre- gious vanity) seldom spoke of an English author but in a strain of ridicule, has sarcastically, yet not without some ap- pearance of truth, observed of the impetuous Chamont: "There is a brother of Monimia, a soldier of fortune, who, be- cause he and his sister are cherished and maintained by this worthy family, abuses them all round. 'Do me justice, you old Pul,' says he to the father, 'or, damme, I'll set your house on fire.'—'My dear boy,' says the accommodating old gentleman, 'you shall have justice.'"

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A Garden.

Enter CASTALIO, POLYDORE, and Page.

Cas. POLYDORE, our sport
Has been to-day much better for the danger:
When on the brink the foaming boar I met,
And in his side thought to have lodg'd my spear,
The desperate savage rush'd within my force,
And bore me headlong with him down the rock.

Pol. But then—

Cas. Ay, then, my brother, my friend, Polydore,
Like Perseus mounted on his winged steed,
Came on, and down the dang'rous precipice leap'd

To save Castalio.—'Twas a godlike act!

Pol. But when I came, I found you conqueror.
Oh! my heart danc'd, to see your danger past!
The heat and fury of the chase was cold,
And I had nothing in my mind but joy.

Cas. So, Polydore, methinks, we might in war
Rush on together; thou shouldst be my guard,
And I be thine. What is't could hurt us then?
Now half the youth of Europe are in arms,
How fulsome must it be to stay behind,
And die of rank diseases here at home!

Pol. No, let me purchase in my youth renown,
To make me lov'd and valu'd when I'm old;
I would be busy in the world, and learn,
Not like a coarse and useless dunghill weed,
Fix'd to one spot, and rot just as I grow.

Cas. Our father
Has ta'en himself a surfeit of the world,
And cries, it is not safe that we should taste it.
I own, I have duty very pow'ful in me:
And though I'd hazard all to raise my name,
Yet he's so tender, and so good a father,
I could not do a thing to cross his will.

Pol. Castalio, I have doubts within my heart,
Which you, and only you, can satisfy.
Will you be free and candid to your friend?

Cas. Have I a thought my Polydore should not know?

What can this mean?

Pol. Nay, I'll conjure you too,
By all the strictest bonds of faithful friendship,
To show your heart as naked in this point,
As you would purge you of your sins to heav'n.
And should I chance to touch it near, bear it
With all the suff'rance of a tender friend.

Cas. As calmly as the wounded patient bears
The artist's hand, that ministers his cure.

Pol. That's kindly said.—You know our father's ward,

The fair Monimia:—is your heart at peace?
Is it so guarded, that you could not love her?

Cas. Suppose I should?

Pol. Suppose you should not, brother?

Cas. You'd say, I must not.

Pol. That would sound too roughly Twixt friends and brothers, as we two are.

Cas. Is love a fault?

Pol. In one of us it may be—
What, if I love her?

Cas. Then I must inform you
I lov'd her first, and cannot quit the claim;
But will preserve the birthright of my passion.

Pol. You will?

Cas. I will.

Pol. No more; I've done.

Cas. Why not?

Pol. I told you I had done.

But you, Castalio, would dispute it.

Cas. No;

Not with my Polydore:—though I must own
My nature obstinate, and void of suff'rance;
I could not bear a rival in my friendship,
I am so much in love, and fond of thee.

Pol. Yet you will break this friendship!

Cas. Not for crowns.

Pol. But for a toy you would, a woman's toy.
Unjust Castalio!

Cas. Pr'ythee, where's my fault?

Pol. You love Monimia.

Cas. Yes.

Pol. And you would kill me,
If I'm your rival?

Cas. No;—sure we're such friends,
So much one man, that our affections too
Must be united, and the same as we are.

Pol. I dote upon Monimia.

Cas. Love her still;

Win, and enjoy her.

Pol. Both of us cannot.

Cas. No matter

Whose chance it prove; but let's not quarrel for't.

Pol. You would not wed Monimia, would you?

Cas. Wed her!

No—were she all desire could wish, as fair
As would the vainest of her sex be thought,
With wealth beyond what woman's pride
could waste,

She should not cheat me of my freedom.—Marry!
When I am old and weary of the world,
I may grow desperate,

And take a wife to mortify withal.

Pol. It is an elder brother's duty so

To propagate his family and name.

You would not have yours die, and buried with you?

Cas. Mere vanity, and silly dotage, all:—
No, let me live at large, and when I die—

Pol. Who shall possess th' estate you leave?

Cas. My friend,

If he survives me; if not, my king,
Who may bestow't again on some brave man,
Whose honesty and services deserve one.

Pol. 'Tis kindly offer'd.

Cas. By yon heaven, I love
My Polydore beyond all worldly joys;
And would not shock his quiet, to be blest
With greater happiness than man e'er tasted.

Pol. And, by that heaven, eternally I swear,
To keep the kind Castalio in my heart.
Whose shall Monimia be?

Cas. No matter whose.

Pol. Were you not with her privately last night?

Cas. I was; and should have met her here
again.

The opportunity shall now be thine;
But have a care, by friendship I conjure thee,
That no false play be offer'd to thy brother.
Urg'e all thy powers to make thy passion prosper;
But wrong not mine.

Pol. By heaven, I will not.

Cas. If't prove thy fortune, Polydore, to conquer

(For thou hast all the arts of soft persuasion),
Trust me, and let me know thy love's success,
That I may ever after stifle mine.

Pol. Though she be dearer to my soul than rest
To weary pilgrims, or to misers gold,
To great men pow'r, or wealthy cities pride;
Rather than wrong Castalio, I'd forget her.

[Exeunt Castalio and Polydore.

Enter MONIMIA.

Mon. Pass'd not Castalio and Polydore
this way?

Mon. Sure some ill fate's upon me:

Distrust and heaviness sit round my heart,
And apprehension shocks my tim'rous soul.
Why was not I laid in my peaceful grave
With my poor parents, and at rest as they are?
Instead of that, I'm wand'ring into cares.—
Castalio! O Castalio! thou hast caught
My foolish heart; and, like a tender child,
That trusts his plaything to another hand,
I fear its harm, and fain would have it back.
Come near, Cordelio; I must chide you, sir.

Page. Why, madam, have I done you any wrong?

Mon. I never see you now; you have been kinder;

Perhaps I've been ungrateful. Here's money for you.

Page. Madam, I'd serve you with my soul.

Mon. Tell me, Cordelio (for thou oft hast heard Their friendly converse, and their bosom secrets),
Sometimes, at least, have they not talk'd of me?

Page. O madam! very wickedly they have talk'd!

But I am afraid to name it; for, they say,
Boys must be whipp'd, that tell their masters' secrets.

Mon. Fear not, Cordelio; it shall ne'er be known;

For I'll preserve the secret as 'twere mine.
Polydore cannot be so kind as I.

I'll furnish thee with all thy harmless sports,
With pretty toys, and thou shalt be my page.

Page. And truly, madam, I had rather be so.
Methinks you love me better than my lord;

For he was never half so kind as you are.
What must I do?

Mon. Inform me how thou'st heard
Castalio and his brother use my name.

Page. With all the tenderness of love,
You were the subject of their last discourse.
At first I thought it would have fatal prov'd;
But as the one grew hot, the other cool'd,
And yielded to the frailty of his friend;
At last, after much struggling, 'twas resolv'd—

Mon. What, good Cordelio?

Page. Not to quarrel for you.

Mon. I would not have 'em, by my dearest
hopes;

I would not be the argument of strife.
But surely my Castalio won't forsake me,
And make a mock'ry of my easy love!
Went they together?

Page. Yes, to seek you, madam.
Castalio promis'd Polydore to bring him,
Where he alone might meet you,
And fairly try the fortune of his wishes.

Mon. Am I then grown so cheap, just to
be made

A common stake, a prize for love in jest?
Was not Castalio very loath to yield it?
Or was it Polydore's unruly passion,
That heighten'd the debate?

Page. The fault was Polydore's.
Castalio play'd with love, and smiling show'd
The pleasure, not the pangs of his desire.
He said, no woman's smiles should buy his freedom:

And marriage is a mortifying thing. [Exit.]

Mon. Then I am ruin'd! if Castalio's false,
Where is there faith and honour to be found?
Ye gods, that guard the innocent, and guide
The weak, protect and take me to your care.
O, but I love him! There's the rock will wreck me!
Why was I made with all my sex's fondness,
Yet want the cunning to conceal its follies?
I'll see Castalio, tax him with his falsehoods,
Be a true woman, rail, protest my wrongs;
Resolve to hate him, and yet love him still.

Re-enter CASTALIO and POLYDORE.

He comes.

Cas. Madam, my brother begs he may have leave

To tell you something that concerns you nearly.
I leave you, as becomes me, and withdraw.

Mon. My lord Castalio!

Cas. Madam!

Mon. Have you purpos'd
To abuse me palpably? What means this usage?
Why am I left with Polydore alone?

Cas. He best can tell you. Business of importance

Calls me away: I must attend my father.

Mon. Will you then leave me thus?

Cas. But for a moment.

Mon. It has been otherwise: the time has been,
When business might have stay'd, and I been heard.

Cas. I could for ever hear thee; but this time
Matters of such odd circumstances press me,
That I must go. [Exit.]

Mon. Then go, and, if't be possible, for ever.
Well, my lord Polydore, I guess your business,
And read th' ill-natur'd purpose in your eyes.

Pol. If to desire you more than misers wealth,
Or dying men an hour of added life;

If softest wishes, and a heart more true
Than ever suffer'd yet for love disdain'd,
Speak an ill nature, you accuse me justly.

Mon. Talk not of love, my lord, I must not bear it.

Pol. Who can behold such beauty, and be silent?

Desire first taught us words. Man, when created,

At first alone long wander'd up and down
Forlorn, and silent as his vassal beasts:
But when a heav'n-born maid, like you, appear'd,
Strange pleasures fill'd his eyes and fir'd his heart,
Unloos'd his tongue, and his first talk was love.

Mon. The first created pair indeed were
bless'd;

They were the only objects of each other,
Therefore he courted her, and her alone;
But in this peopled world of beauty, where There's roving room, where you may court, and ruin

A thousand more, why need you talk to me?

Pol. Oh! I could talk to thee for ever. Thus Eternally admiring, fix, and gaze
On those dear eyes; for every glance they send Darts through my soul.

Mon. How can you labour thus for my undoing?

I must confess indeed, I owe you more
Than ever I can hope, or think, to pay.
There always was a friendship 'twixt our families;

And therefore when my tender parents dy'd,
Whose ruin'd fortunes too expir'd with them,
Your father's pity and his bounty took me,
A poor and helpless orphan, to his care.

Pol. 'Twas Heav'n ordain'd it so, to make me happy.

Hence with this peevish virtue, 'tis a cheat;
And those who taught it first were hypocrites.
Come, these soft, tender limbs were made for yielding.

Mon. Here on my knees, by heav'n's blest
pow'r I swear, [Kneels.]

If you persist, I ne'er henceforth will see you,
But rather wander through the world a beggar,
And live on sordid scraps at proud men's doors;
For though to fortune lost, I'll still inherit
My mother's virtues, and my father's honour.

Pol. Intolerable vanity! your sex
Was never in the right; y'are always false,
Or silly; ev'n your dresses are not more
Fantastic than your appetites; you think
Of nothing twice; opinion you have none.
To-day y'are nice, to-morrow not so free;
Now smile, then frown; now sorrowful, then glad;

Now pleas'd, now not: and all, you know not why!

Mon. Indeed, my lord,
I own my sex's follies; I have 'em all;
And, to avoid its fault, must fly from you.
Therefore, believe me, could you raise me high
As most fantastic woman's wish could reach,
And lay all nature's riches at my feet;
I'd rather run a savage in the woods,
Amongst brute beasts, grow wrinkled and
deform'd,

So I might still enjoy my honour safe,
From the destroying wiles of faithless men. [Exit.]

Pol. Who'd be that sordid thing call'd man?
I'll yet possess my love, it shall be so. [Excunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—A Saloon.

Enter ACASTO, CASTALIO, POLYDOR, and Attendants.

Acas. To-day has been a day of glorious sport: When you, Castalio, and your brother left me, Forth from the thickets rush'd another boar, So large, he seem'd the tyrant of the woods, With all his dreadful bristles rais'd up high, They seem'd a grove of spears upon his back; Foaming he came at me, where I was posted Best to observe which way he'd lead the chase, Whetting his huge large tusks, and gaping wide, As if he already had me for his prey! Till brandishing my well-pois'd javelin high, With this bold executing arm I struck The ugly brindled monster to the heart.

Cas. The actions of your life were always wondrous.

Acas. No flattery, boy! an honest man can't live by't;

It is a little sneaking art, which knaves Use to cajole and soften fools withal. If thou hast flattery in thy nature, out with't, Or send it to a court, for there 'twill thrive.

Cas. Your lordship's wrongs have been So great, that you with justice may complain; But suffer us, whose younger minds ne'er felt Fortune's deceits, to court her, as she's fair: Were she a common mistress, kind to all, Her worth would cease, and half the world grow idle.

Methinks I would be busy.

Pol. So would I, Not loiter out my life at home, and know No further than one prospect gives me leave.

Acas. Busy your minds then, study arts and men;

Learn how to value merit, though in rags, And scorn a proud, ill-manner'd knave in office.

Enter SERINA.

Ser. My lord, my father!

Acas. Blessings on my child! My little cherub, what hast thou to ask me?

Ser. I bring you, sir, most glad and welcome news;

The young Chamont, whom you've so often wish'd for, Is just arriv'd, and entering.

Acas. By my soul, And all my honours, he's most dearly welcome; Let me receive him like his father's friend.

Enter CHAMONT.

Welcome, thou relict of the best lov'd man! Welcome from all the turmoils, and the hazards Of certain danger, and uncertain fortune! Welcome as happy tidings after fears.

Cham. Words would but wrong the gratitude I owe you!

Should I begin to speak, my soul's so full, That I should talk of nothing else all day.

Enter MONIMIA.

Mon. My brother!

Cham. O my sister, let me hold thee Long in my arms. I've not beheld thy face These many days; by night I've often seen thee In gentle dreams, and satisfy'd my soul With fancy'd joys, till morning cares awak'd me.

Another sister! sure, it must be so; Though I remember well I had but one: But I feel something in my heart that prompts, And tells me, she has claim and interest there.

Acas. Young soldier, you've not only studied war,

Courtship, I see, has been your practice too, And may not prove unwelcome to my daughter.

Cham. Is she your daughter? then my heart told true,

And I'm at least her brother by adoption; For you have made yourself to me a father, And by that patent I have leave to love her.

Ser. Monimia, thou hast told me men are false, Will flatter, feign, and make an art of love: Is Chamont so? no, sure, he's more than man; Something that's near divine, and truth dwells in him.

Acas. Thus happy, who would envy pompous pow'r,

The luxury of courts, or wealth of cities? Let there be joy through all the house this day!

In ev'ry room let plenty flow at large! It is the birth-day of my royal master!

You have not visited the court, Chamont, Since your return?

Cham. I have no bus'ness there; I have not slavish temperance enough T' attend a favourite's heels, and watch his smiles, Bear an ill office done me to my face, And thank the lord that wrong'd me for his favour.

Acas. This you could do. [To his Sons.

Cas. I'd serve my prince.

Acas. Who'd serve him?

Cas. I would, my lord.

Pol. And I; both would.

Acas. Away!

He needs not any servants such as you. Serve him! he merits more than man can do! He is so good, praise cannot speak his worth; So merciful, sure he ne'er slept in wrath! So just, that, were he but a private man, He could not do a wrong! How would you serve him?

Cas. I'd serve him with my fortune here at home,

And serve him with my person in his wars: Watch for him, fight for him, bleed for him.

Pol. Die for him, As ev'ry true-born, loyal subject ought.

Acas. Let me embrace ye both! now, by the souls

Of my brave ancestors, I'm truly happy! For this, be ever blest my marriage day! Blest be your mother's memory, that bore you; And doubly blest be that auspicious hour That gave ye birth!

Enter a Servant.

Serv. My lord, th' expected guests are just arriv'd.

Acas. Go you and give 'em welcome and reception.

[Exeunt Castalio and Polydore.

Cham. My lord, I stand in need of your assistance,

In something that concerns my peace and honour.

Acas. Spoke like the son of that brave man I lov'd!

So freely, friendly, we convers'd together. Whate'er it be, with confidence impart it; Thou shalt command my fortune and my sword.

Cham. I dare not doubt your friendship, nor your justice,
Your bounty shown to what I hold most dear,
My orphan sister, must not be forgotten!

Acas. Pr'ythee no more of that, it grates
my nature.

Cham. When our dear parents dy'd, they dy'd together;

One fate surpris'd 'em, and one grave receiv'd 'em;
My father, with his dying breath, bequeath'd
Her to my love; my mother, as she lay
Languishing by him, call'd me to her side, Took me in her fainting arms, wept, and
embrac'd me;

Then press'd me close, and, as she observ'd
my tears,

Kiss'd them away; said she, "Chamont, my son,
By this, and all the love I ever show'd thee,
Be careful of Monimia: watch her youth;
Let not her wants betray her to dishonour;
Perhaps kind heav'n may raise some friend."

Then sigh'd,

Kiss'd me again; so bless'd us, and expir'd.
Pardon my grief.

Acas. It speaks an honest nature.

Cham. The friend heav'n rais'd was you;
you took her up,

An infant, to the desert world expos'd,
And prov'd another parent.

Acas. I've not wrong'd her.

Cham. Far be it from my fears.

Acas. Then why this argument?

Cham. My lord, my nature's jealous, and you'll bear it.

Acas. Go on.

Cham. Great spirits bear misfortunes hardly;
Good offices claim gratitude; and pride,
Where pow'r is wanting, will usurp a little,
And make us (rather than be thought behind hand)

Pay over price.

Acas. I cannot guess your drift;
Distrust you me?

Cham. No, but I fear her weakness
May make her pay her debt at any rate:
And to deal freely with your lordship's goodness,
I've heard a story lately much disturbs me.

Acas. Then first charge her; and if th' offence be found Within my reach, though it should touch my nature,

In my own offspring, by the dear remembrance
Of thy brave father, whom my heart rejoic'd in,
I'd prosecute it with severest vengeance. [Exit.

Cham. I thank you, from my soul.

Mon. Alas, my brother! What have I done?
My heart quakes in me; in your settled face,
And clouded brow, methinks I see my fate.
You will not kill me?

Cham. Pr'ythee, why dost thou talk so?

Mon. Look kindly on me then; I cannot bear
Severity; it daunts, and does amaze me;
My heart's so tender, should you charge me rough,

I should but weep, and answer you with sobbing;
But use me gently, like a loving brother,
And search through all the secrets of my soul.

Cham. Fear nothing, I will show myself a brother,

A tender, honest, and a loving brother.
You've not forgot our father?

Mon. I never shall.

Cham. Then you'll remember too he was a man
That liv'd up to the standard of his honour,
And priz'd that jewel more than mines of wealth:
He'd not have done a shameful thing but once:
Though kept in darkness from the world, and hidden,

He could not have forgiv'n it to himself.
This was the only portion that he left us;
And I more glory in't than if possess'd
Of all that ever fortune threw on fools.
'Twas a large trust, and must be manag'd nicely;
Now if, by any chance, Monimia,
You have soil'd this gem, and taken from its value,
How will you account with me?

Mon. I challenge envy,
Malice, and all the practices of hell,
To censure all the actions of my past
Unhappy life, and taint me if they can!

Cham. I'll tell thee, then; three nights ago, as I Lay musing in my bed, all darkness round me,
A sudden damp struck to my heart, cold sweat Dew'd all my face, and trembling seiz'd my limbs:

My bed shook under me, the curtains started,
And to my tortur'd fancy there appear'd
The form of thee, thus beauteous as thou art;
Thy garments flowing loose, and in each hand
A wanton lover, who by turns caress'd thee
With all the freedom of unbounded pleasure.
I snatch'd my sword, and in the very moment
Darted it at the phantom; straight it left me;
Then rose, and call'd for lights, when, O dire omen!

I found my weapon had the arras pierc'd,
Just where that famous tale was interwoven,
How the unhappy Theban slew his father.

Mon. And for this cause my virtue is suspected!
Because in dreams your fancy has been ridden,
I must be tortur'd waking!

Cham. Have a care;
Labour not to be justify'd too fast:
Hear all, and then let justice hold the scale,
What follow'd was the riddle that confounds me.
Through a close lane, as I pursu'd my journey,
And meditating on the last night's vision,
I spy'd a wrinkled hag, with age grown double
Picking dry sticks, and mumbling to herself:
Her eyes with scalding rheum were gall'd
and red:

Cold palsy shook her head, her hands seem'd
wither'd,
And on her crooked shoulders had she wrapp'd
The tatter'd remnant of an old strip'd hanging,
Which serv'd to keep her carcass from the cold;
So there was nothing of a piece about her.
Her lower weeds were all o'er coarsely patch'd
With diff'rent colour'd rags, black, red, white, yellow,

And seem'd to speak variety of wretchedness.
I ask'd her of my way, which she inform'd me:
Then crav'd my charity, and bade me hasten
To save a sister! At that word I started!

Mon. The common cheat of beggars; every day
They flock about our doors, pretend to gifts
Of prophecy, and telling fools their fortunes.

Cham. Oh! but she told me such a tale,
Monimia,

As in it bore great circumstance of truth;
Castalio and Polydore, my sister.

Mon. Ha! [fail you?

Cham. What, alter'd? does your courage

Now, by my father's soul, the witch was honest.
Answer me, if thou hast not lost to them
Thy honour at a sordid game?

Mon. I will,
I must, so hardly my misfortune loads me,
That both have offer'd me their love 's most true.

Cham. And 'tis as true too they have both undone thee.

Mon. Though they both with earnest vows
Have press'd my heart, if e'er in thought I yielded
To any but Castalio—

Cham. But Castalio!

Mon. Still will you cross the line of my discourse.

Yes, I confess that he has won my soul
By gen'rous love and honourable vows,
Which he this day appointed to complete,
And make himself by holy marriage mine.

Cham. Art thou then spotless? hast thou still preserv'd

Thy virtue white, without a blot, untainted?

Mon. When I'm unchaste, may heaven reject my prayers;

Or more, to make me wretched, may you know it!

Cham. Oh then, Monimia, art thou dearer
to me

Than all the comforts ever yet bless'd man.
But let not marriage bait thee to thy ruin.
Trust not a man; we are by nature false,
Dissembling, subtle, cruel, and unconstant;
When a man talks of love, with caution trust him;
But if he swears, he'll certainly deceive thee.
I charge thee, let no more Castalio sooth thee;
Avoid it, as thou wouldst preserve the peace
Of a poor brother, to whose soul thou'rt precious.

Mon. I will.

Cham. Appear as cold, when next you meet,
as great ones,
When merit begs; then shalt thou see how soon
His heart will cool, and all his pains grow easy. [Exit.

Mon. Yes, I will try him, torture him severely;
For, O Castalio, thou too much hast wrong'd me,
In leaving me to Polydore's ill usage.

He comes! and now, for once, O love, stand neuter.

Whilst a hard part's perform'd; for I must tempt, Wound his soft nature, though my heart aches for't.

Re-enter CASTALIO.

Cas. Monimia, my angel! 'twas not kind
To leave me here alone.

Re-enter POLYDORE, with Page, at the Door.

Pol. Here place yourself, and watch my brother thoroughly;

Pass not one circumstance without remark.

[Apart to Page, and exit.

Cas. When thou art from me, every place is desert,

And I, methinks, am savage and forlorn:
Thy presence only 'tis can make me blest,
Heal my unquiet mind, and tune my soul.

Mon. O the bewitching tongues of faithless
men!

'Tis thus the false hyena makes her moan,
To draw the pitying traveller to her den:
Your sex are so, such false dissemblers all;
With sighs and plaints y' entice poor women's hearts,

And all that pity you are made your prey.

Cas. What means my love? Oh, how have I deserv'd

This language from the sovereign of my joys?
Stop, stop these tears, Monimia, for they fall
Like baneful dew from a distemper'd sky:
I feel 'em chill me to my very heart.

Mon. Oh, you are false, Castalio, most forsworn!

Attempt no further to delude my faith;
My heart is fix'd, and you shall shak't no more.

Cas. Who told you so? What hell-bred villain durst

Profane the sacred business of my love?

Mon. Your brother, knowing on what terms
I'm here,

Th' unhappy object of your father's charity,
Licentiously discours'd to me of love,
And durst affront me with his brutal passion.

Cas. 'Tis I have been to blame, and only I;
False to my brother, and unjust to thee.

For, oh! he loves thee too, and this day own'd it, Tax'd me with mine, and claim'd a right above me.

Mon. And was your love so very tame to shrink?

Or, rather than lose him, abandon me?

Cas. I, knowing him precipitate and rash, Seem'd to comply with his unruly will;
Lest he in rage might have our loves betray'd,
And I for ever had Monimia lost.

Mon. Could you then, did you, can you own it too?

'Twas poorly done, unworthy of yourself!
And I can never think you meant me fair.

Cas. Is this Monimia? Surely no! till now
I ever thought her dove-like, soft, and kind.
Who trusts his heart with woman's surely lost:
You were made fair on purpose to undo us,
While greedily we snatch th' alluring bait,
And ne'er distrust the poison that it hides.

Mon. When love ill-plac'd, would find a means to break—

Cas. It never wants pretences or excuse.

Mon. Man therefore was a lordlike creature
made,

Rough as the winds, and as inconstant too:
A lofty aspect given him for command;
Easily soften'd when he would betray.

Like conqu'ring tyrants, you our breasts invade;
But soon you find new conquests out, and leave
The ravag'd province ruinate and waste.

If so, Castalio, you have serv'd my heart,
I find that desolation's settled there,
And I shall ne'er recover peace again.

Cas. Who can hear this and bear an equal mind?

Since you will drive me from you, I must go:
But, O Monimia! when thou hast banish'd me,
No creeping slave, though tractable and dull
As artful woman for her ends would choose,
Shall ever dote as I have done.

Mon. Castalio, stay! we must not part. I find
My rage ebbs out, and love flows in apace.
These little quarrels love must needs forgive.
Oh! charm me with the music of thy tongue,
I'm ne'er so blest as when I hear thy vows,
And listen to the language of thy heart.

Cas. Where am I? Surely Paradise is round
me!

Sweets planted by the hand of heaven grow
here,

And every sense is full of thy perfection.

Sure, framing thee, heaven took unusual care ;
As its own beauty it design'd thee fair,
And form'd thee by the best lov'd angel there.

[Exeunt.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—A Garden.

Enter POLYDORE and Page.

Pol. Were they so kind? Express it to me all
In words; 'twill make me think I saw it too.

Page. At first I thought they had been mortal foes:

Monimia rag'd, Castalio grew disturb'd:
Each thought the other wrong'd; yet both so haughty,
They scorn'd submission, though love all the while

'The rebel play'd, and scarce could be contain'd.

Pol. But what succeeded?

Page. Oh, 'twas wondrous pretty!
For of a sudden all the storm was past:
A gentle calm of love succeeded it:
Monimia sigh'd and blush'd; Castalio swore;
As you, my lord, I well remember, did
To my young sister, in the orange grove,
When I was first preferr'd to be your page.

Pol. Boy, go to your chamber, and prepare your lute. [Exit Page.]

Happy Castalio! now, by my great soul,
My ambitious soul, that languishes to glory,
I'll have her yet; by my best hopes, I will;
She shall be mine, in spite of all her arts.
But for Castalio why was I refus'd?
Has he supplanted me by some foul play?
Traduc'd my honour? Death! he durst not do't.
It must be so: we parted, and he met her,
Half to compliance brought by me; surpris'd
Her sinking virtue, till she yielded quite.
So poachers pick up tired game,
While the fair hunter's cheated of his prey.
Boy!

Enter a Servant.

Serv. Oh, the unhappiest tidings tongue e'er told!

Pol. The matter?

Serv. Oh! your father, my good master,
As with his guests he sat in mirth rais'd high,
And chas'd the goblet round the joyful board,
A sudden trembling seiz'd on all his limbs;
His eyes distorted grew, his visage pale,
His speech forsook him, life itself seem'd fled;
And all his friends are waiting now about him.

Enter ACASTO and Attendants.

Acas. Support me, give me air, I'll yet recover.
'Twas but a slip decaying nature made;
For she grows weary near her journey's end.
Where are my sons? Come near, my Polydore!
Your brother—where's Castalio?

Serv. My lord,
I've search'd, as you commanded, all the house!
He and Monimia are not to be found.

Acas. Not to be found? then where are all my friends?

'Tis well—

I hope they'll pardon an unhappy fault
My unmannerly infirmity has made!
Death could not come in a more welcome hour;
For I'm prepar'd to meet him; and, methinks,
Would live and die with all my friends about me.

Enter CASTALIO.

Cas. Angels preserve my dearest father's life!
Oh! may he live till time itself decay,
Till good men wish him dead, or I offend him!
Acas. Thank you, Castalio: give me both your hands.

So now, methinks,
I appear as great as Hercules himself,
Supported by the pillars he had rais'd.

Enter SERINA.

Ser. My father!

Acas. My heart's darling!

Ser. Let my knees
Fix to the earth. Ne'er let my eyes have rest,
But wake and weep, till heaven restore my father.

Acas. Rise to my arms, and thy kind pray'rs are answer'd.

For thou'rt a wondrous extract of all goodness;
Born for my joy, and no pain's felt when near
thee.

Chamont!

Enter CHAMONT.

Cham. My lord, may't prove not an unlucky
omen!

Many I see are waiting round about you,
And I am come to ask a blessing too.

Acas. May'st thou be happy!

Cham. Where?

Acas. In all thy wishes.

Cham. Confirm me so, and make this fair one
mine:

I am unpractis'd in the trade of courtship,
And know not how to deal love out with art:
Onsets in love seem best like those in war,
Fierce, resolute, and done with all the force;
So I would open my whole heart at once,
And pour out the abundance of my soul.

Acas. What says Serina? Canst thou love a soldier?

One born to honour, and to honour bred?
One that has learn'd to treat e'en foes with
kindness,
To wrong no good man's fame, nor praise himself?

Ser. Oh! name not love, for that's ally'd to joy;

And joy must be a stranger to my heart,
When you're in danger. May Chamont's good fortune

Render him lovely to some happier maid!
Whilst I, at friendly distance, see him blest,
Praise the kind gods, and wonder at his virtues.

Acas. Chamont, pursue her, conquer, and possess her,

And, as my son, a third of all my fortune
Shall be thy lot.

Chamont, you told me of some doubts that press'd you:

Are you yet satisfy'd that I'm your friend?

Cham. My lord, I would not lose that satisfaction,

For any blessing I could wish for:
As to my fears, already I have lost them:
They ne'er shall vex me more, nor trouble you.

Acas. I thank you.

My friends, 'tis late:

Now my disorder seems all past and over,
And I, methinks, begin to feel new health.

Cas. Would you but rest, it might restore you quite.

Acas. Yes, I'll to bed; old men must humour weakness.

Good night, my friends! Heav'n guard you all!
Good night!

To-morrow early we'll salute the day,
Find out new pleasures, and redeem lost time.

[Exeunt all but Chamont and Chaplain.]

Cham. If you're at leisure, sir, we'll waste an hour:

'Tis yet too soon to sleep, and 'twill be charity
To lend your conversation to a stranger.

Chap. Sir, you're a soldier?

Cham. Yes.

Chap. I love a soldier;

And had been one myself, but that my parents
Would make me what you see me.

Cham. Have you had long dependance on this family?

Chap. I have not thought it so, because my time's

Spent pleasantly. My lord's not haughty nor imperious,

Nor I gravely whimsical: he has good nature.
His sons too are civil to me, because

I do not pretend to be wiser than they are;
I meddle with no man's business but my own;

So meet with respect, and am not the jest of the family.

Cham. I'm glad you are so happy.

A pleasant fellow this, and may be useful. [Aside.]
Knew you my father, the old Chamont?

Chap. I did; and was most sorry when we lost him.

Cham. Why, didst thou love him?

Chap. Ev'ry body lov'd him; besides, he was my patron's friend.

Cham. I could embrace thee for that very notion:

If thou didst love my father, I could think
Thou wouldst not be an enemy to me.

Chap. I can be no man's foe.

Cham. Then, pr'ythee, tell me;

Think'st thou the lord Castalio loves my sister?

Chap. Love your sister?

Cham. Ay, love her.

Chap. Either he loves her, or he much has wrong'd her.

Cham. How wrong'd her? have a care; for this may lay

A scene of mischief to undo us all.

But tell me, wrong'd her, saidst thou?

Chap. Ay, sir, wrong'd her.

Cham. This is a secret worth a monarch's
fortune:

What shall I give thee for't? thou dear physician
Of sickly souls, unfold this riddle to me,
And comfort mine —

Chap. I would hide nothing from you willingly.

Cham. By the reverenc'd soul

Of that great honest man that gave me being,
Tell me but what thou know'st concerns my honour,

And, if I e'er reveal it to thy wrong,

May this good sword ne'er do me right in battle!

May I ne'er know that blessed peace of mind,
That dwells in good and pious men like thee!

Chap. I see your temper's mov'd, and I will trust you.

Cham. Wilt thou?

Chap. I will; but if it ever 'scape you —

Cham. It never shall.

Chap. Then this good day, when all the house

When mirth and kind rejoicing fill'd each room,
As I was walking in the grove I met them.

Cham. What, met them in the grove together?

Chap. I, by their own appointment, met them there,

Receiv'd their marriage vows, and join'd their hands.

Cham. How! married?

Chap. Yes, sir.

Cham. Then my soul's at peace:

But why would you so long delay to give it?

Chap. Not knowing what reception it may find

With old Acasto; may be, I was too cautious
To trust the secret from me.

Cham. What's the cause

I cannot guess, though 'tis my sister's honour,

I do not like this marriage,

Huddled i'the dark, and done at too much venture;

The business looks with an unlucky face.

Keep still the secret; for it ne'er shall 'scape me,

Not ev'n to them, the new match'd pair. Farewell!

Believe my truth, and know me for thy friend.

[Exeunt.]

Re-enter CASTALIO, with MONIMIA.

Cas. Young Chamont and the chaplain!
sure 'tis they!

No matter what's contriv'd, or who consulted,
Since my Monimia's mine; though this sad look

Seems no good boding omen to our bliss;

Else, pr'ythee, tell me why that look cast down,

Why that sad sigh, as if thy heart was breaking?

Mon. Castalio, I am thinking what we've done:

The heavenly powers were sure displeas'd to-day;

For, at the ceremony as we stood,

And as your hand was kindly join'd with mine,

As the good priest pronounc'd the sacred words,

Passion grew big, and I could not forbear,

Tears drown'd my eyes, and trembling seiz'd
my soul.

What should that mean?

Cas. Oh, thou art tender all!

Gentle and kind as sympathising nature!

Re-enter POLYDORE, unobserved.

But wherefore do I dally with my bliss?

The night's far spent, and day draws on apace;

To bed, my love, and wake till I come thither.

Mon. 'Twill be impossible:

You know your father's chamber's next to mine,

And the least noise will certainly alarm him.

Cas. No more, my blessing.

What shall be the sign?

When shall I come? for to my joys I'll steal,

As if I ne'er had paid my freedom for them.

Mon. Just three soft strokes upon the chamber door;

And at that signal you shall gain admittance:

But speak not the least word; for, if you should,

'Tis surely heard, and all will be betray'd.

Cas. Oh! doubt it not, Monimia; our joys

Shall be as silent as the ecstatic bliss

Of souls, that by intelligence converse.

Away, my love! first take this kiss. Now haste:

I long for that to come, yet grudge each minute past. [Exit Monimia.]

My brother wand'ring too so late this way!

Pol. Castalio!

Cas. My Polydore, how dost thou?

How does our father? is he well recover'd?

Pol. I left him happily repos'd to rest:

He's still as gay as if his life was young.

But how does fair Monimia?

Cas. Doubtless well:

A cruel beauty, with her conquest pleas'd,
Is always joyful, and her mind in health.

Pol. Is she the same Monimia still she was?
May we not hope she's made of mortal mould?

Cas. She's not woman else:
Though I'm grown weary of this tedious hoping;
We're in a barren desert stray'd too long.

Pol. Yet may relief be unexpected found,
And love's sweet manna cover all the field.
Met ye to-day?

Cas. No; she has still avoided me:
I wish I'd never meddled with the matter;
And would enjoin thee, Polydore—

Pol. To what?

Cas. To leave this peevish beauty to herself.

Pol. What, quit my love? as soon I'd quit
my post

In fight, and like a coward run away.
No, by my stars, I'll chase her till she yields
To me, or meets her rescue in another.

Cas. But I have wondrous reasons on my side,
That would persuade thee, were they known.

Pol. Then speak 'em:

What are they? Came ye to her window here
To learn 'em now? Castalio, have a care;
Use honest dealing with a friend and brother.
Believe me, I'm not with my love so blinded,
But can discern your purpose to abuse me:
Quit your pretences to her.

You say you've reasons: why are they conceal'd?

Cas. To-morrow I may tell you.

Pol. Why not now?

Cas. It is a matter of such consequence,
As I must well consult ere I reveal.
But prythee cease to think I would abuse thee,
Till more be known.

Pol. When you, Castalio, cease
To meet Monimia unknown to me,
And then deny it slavishly, I'll cease
To think Castalio faithless to his friend.
Did I not see you part this very moment?

Cas. It seems you've watch'd me then?

Pol. I scorn the office.

Cas. Prythee avoid a thing thou may'st repent.

Pol. That is, henceforward making leagues
with you.

Cas. Nay, if ye're angry, Polydore, good night.
[Exit.]

Pol. Good night, Castalio, if ye're in such haste.
He little thinks I've overheard th' appointment:
But to his chamber's gone to wait awhile,
Then come and take possession of my love.
This is the utmost point of all my hopes;
Or now she must, or never can be mine.
Oh, for a means now how to counterplot,
And disappoint this happy elder brother!
In every thing we do or undertake,
He soars above me, mount what height I can,
And keeps the start he got of me in birth.
Cordelio!

Re-enter Page.

Page. My lord!

Pol. Come hither, boy!

Thou hast a pretty, forward, lying face,
And may'st in time expect preferment. Canst thou Pretend to secrecy, cajole and flatter
Thy master's follies, and assist his pleasures?

Page. My lord, I could do any thing for you,
And ever be a very faithful boy.

Command, whate'er's your pleasure I'll observe;
Be it to run, or watch, or to convey
A letter to a beauteous lady's bosom;
At least, I am not dull, and soon should learn.

Pol. 'Tis pity then thou shouldst not be employ'd.

Go to my brother, he's in his chamber now,
Undressing, and preparing for his rest;
Find out some means to keep him up awhile:
Tell him a pretty story, that may please
His ear; invent a tale, no matter what:
If he should ask of me, tell him I'm gone
To bed, and sent you there to know his pleasure,
Whether he'll hunt to-morrow.

But do not leave him till he's in his bed;
Or if he chance to walk again this way,
Follow, and do not quit him, but seem fond
To do him little offices of service.

Perhaps at last it may offend him; then Retire, and wait till I come in. Away:
Succeed in this, and be employ'd again.

Page. Doubt not, my lord: he has been always kind

To me; would often set me on his knee,
Then give me sweetmeats, call me pretty boy,
And ask me what the maids talk'd of at nights.

Pol. Run quickly then, and prosperous be thy wishes. [Exit Page.]

Here I'm alone, and fit for mischief.
I heard the sign she order'd him to give.

"Just three soft strokes against the chamber door;
But speak not the least word, for if you should,
It's surely heard, and we are both betray'd."

Blest heav'ns, assist me but in this dear hour,
And my kind stars be but propitious now,
Dispose of me hereafter as you please.

Monimia! Monimia! [Gives the Sign.]

Flo. [At the Window] Who's there?

Pol. 'Tis I.

Flo. My lord Castalio?

Pol. The same.

How does my love, my dear Monimia?

Flo. Oh!

She wonders much at your unkind delay;
You've staid so long, that at each little noise
The wind but makes, she asks if you are coming.

Pol. Tell her I'm here, and let the door be open'd. [Florella withdraws.]

Now boast, Castalio, triumph now, and tell
Thyself strange stories of a promis'd bliss!

[Exit into the House.]

Re-enter CASTALIO and Page.

Page. Indeed, my lord, 'twill be a lovely morning:

Pray let us hunt.

Cas. Go, you're an idle prattler:
I'll stay at home to-morrow; if your lord
Thinks fit, he may command my hounds. Go, leave me;

I must to bed.

Page. I'll wait upon your lordship,
If you think fit, and sing you to repose.

Cas. No, my kind boy.

Good night: commend me to my brother.

Page. Oh!

You never heard the last new song I learn'd;
It is the finest, prettiest song indeed,

Of my lord and my lady, you know who,
that were caught

Together, you know where. My lord, indeed
it is.

Cas. You must be whipp'd, youngster, if you get such songs as those are.

What means this boy's impertinence to-night?

[Aside.

Page. Why, what must I sing, pray, my dear lord?

Cas. Psalms, child, psalms.

Page. O dear me! boys that go to school learn psalms;

But pages, that are better bred, sing lampoons.

Cas. Well, leave me; I'm weary.

Page. Indeed, my lord, I can't abide to leave you.

Cas. Why, wert thou instructed to attend me?

Page. No, no, indeed, my lord, I was not. But I know what I know.

Cas. What dost thou know?—'Sdeath! what can all this mean? [Aside.

Page. Oh! I know who loves somebody.

Cas. What's that to me, boy?

Page. Nay, I know who loves you too.

Cas. That's a wonder! pry'these tell it me.

Page. 'Tis—'tis—I know who—but will you give me the horse, then?

Cas. I will, my child.

Page. It is my lady Monimia, look you; but don't you tell her I told you: she'll give me no more playthings then. I heard her say so, as she lay abed, man.

Cas. Talk'd she of me when in her bed, Cordelio?

Page. Yes; and I sung her the song you made too; and she did so sigh, and look with her eyes!

Cas. Hark! what's that noise?

Take this; be gone, and leave me.

You knave, you little flatterer, get you gone. [Exit Page.

Surely it was a noise, hist!—only fancy;

For all is hush'd, as nature were retir'd.

'Tis now, that guided by my love, I go

To take possession of Monimia's arms.

Sure Polydore's by this time gone to bed.

[Knocks.

She hears me not; sure she already sleeps!

Her wishes could not brook so long delay,

And her poor heart has beat itself to rest.

[Knocks.

Once more —

Flo. [At the Window] Who's there, that comes thus rudely to disturb our rest?

Cas. 'Tis I.

Flo. Who are you? what's your name?

Cas. Suppose the lord Castalio.

Flo. I know you not.

The lord Castalio has no business here.

Cas. Ha! have a care! what can this mean? Whoe'er thou art, I charge thee, to Monimia fly: Tell her I'm here, and wait upon my doom.

Flo. Whoe'er you are, you may repent this outrage:

My lady must not be disturb'd. Good night!

Cas. She must! tell her she shall! go, I'm in haste,

And bring her tidings from the state of love.

Flo. Sure the man's mad!

Cas. Or this will make me so.

Obey me, or, by all the wrongs I suffer, I'll scale the window and come in by force; Let the sad consequence be what it will!

This creature's trifling folly makes me mad!

Flo. My lady's answer is, you may depart.

She says she knows you: you are Polydore, Sent by Castalio, as you were to-day, T' affront and do her violence again.

Cas. I'll not believe't.

Flo. You may, sir.

Cas. Curses blast thee!

Flo. Well, 'tis a fine cool ev'ning! and I hope May cure the raging fever in your blood! Good night.

Cas. And farewell all that's just in woman! This is contriv'd, a study'd trick, to abuse My easy nature, and torment my mind! 'Tis impudence to think my soul will bear it! Let but to-morrow, but to-morrow come, And try if all thy arts appease my wrong; Till when, be this detested place my bed;

[Lies down.

Where I will ruminate on woman's ills, Laugh at myself, and curse th' inconstant sex. Faithless Monimia! O Monimia!

Enter ERNESTO.

Ern. Either

My sense has been deluded, or this way I heard the sound of sorrow; 'tis late night, And none, whose mind's at peace, would wander now.

Cas. Who's there?

Ern. Castalio!—My lord, why in this posture, Stretch'd on the ground? your honest, true old servant,

Your poor Ernesto, cannot see you thus. Rise, I beseech you.

Cas. Oh, leave me to my folly.

Ern. I can't leave you,

And not the reason know of your disorders. Remember how, when young, I in my arms Have often borne you, pleas'd you in your pleasures,

And sought an early share in your affection. Do not discard me now, but let me serve you.

Cas. Thou canst not serve me.

Ern. Why?

Cas. Because my thoughts Are full of woman; thou, poor wretch, art past them.

Ern. I hate the sex.

Cas. 'Then I'm thy friend, Ernesto! [Rises. I'd leave the world for him that hates a woman! Woman, the fountain of all human frailty! What mighty ills have not been done by woman? Who was't betray'd the capitol? A woman! Who lost Mark Antony the world? A woman! Who was the cause of a long ten years war, And laid at last old Troy in ashes? Woman! Destructive, damnable, deceitful woman!

Woman, to man first as a blessing given; When innocence and love were in their prime, Happy awhile in Paradise they lay; But quickly woman long'd to go astray: Some foolish new adventure needs must prove, And the first devil she saw, she chang'd her love: To his temptations lewdly she inclin'd Her soul, and for an apple damn'd mankind.

[Exeunt.

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—A Chamber.

Enter CASTALIO.

Cas. Wish'd morning's come! And now upon the plains,

And distant mountains, where they feed their flocks,
The happy shepherds leave their homely huts,
And with their pipes proclaim the new-born day.
There's no condition sure so curs'd as mine—
Monimia! O Monimia!

Enter MONIMIA and FLORELLA.

Mon. I come!
I fly to my ador'd Castalio's arms,
My wishes' lord. May every morn begin
Like this: and, with our days, our loves renew!

Cas. Oh—

Mon. Art thou not well, Castalio? Come lean
Upon my breast, and tell me where's thy pain.

Cas. 'Tis here—'tis in my head—'tis in my
heart—

'Tis every where: it rages like a madness,
And I most wonder how my reason holds.
No more, Monimia, of your sex's arts:
They're useless all—I'm not that pliant tool;
I know my charter better—I am man,
Obstinate man, and will not be enslav'd!

Mon. You shall not fear't; indeed my nature's easy:

I'll ever live your most obedient wife!
Nor ever any privilege pretend
Beyond your will; for that shall be my law;—
Indeed I will not.

Cas. Nay, you shall not, madam;
By yon bright heaven, you shall not: all the day
I'll play the tyrant, and at night forsake thee;
Nay, if I've any too, thou shalt be made
Subservient to all my looser pleasures;
For thou hast wrong'd Castalio.

Mon. Oh, kill me here, or tell me my offence!
I'll never quit you else; but on these knees,
Thus follow you all day, till they're worn bare,
And hang upon you like a drowning creature.
Castalio!—

Cas. Away!—Last night! last night!—

Mon. It was our wedding night.

Cas. No more!—Forget it!

Mon. Why! do you then repent?

Cas. I do.

Mon. O heaven!

And will you leave me thus?—Help! help!
Florella!

[Castalio drags her to the Door, breaks from her, and exit.]

Help me to hold this yet lov'd, cruel man!
Castalio!—Oh! how often has he sworn,
Nature should change—the sun and stars grow dark,

Ere he would falsify his vows to me!
Make haste, confusion, then! Sun, lose thy light!
And stars, drop dead with sorrow to the earth,
For my Castalio's false!
False as the wind, the waters, or the weather!
Cruel as tigers o'er their trembling prey!
I feel him in my breast; he tears my heart,
And at each sigh he drinks the gushing blood!
Must I be long in pain?

Enter CHAMONT.

Cham. In tears, Monimia!

Mon. Whoe'er thou art,
Leave me alone to my belov'd despair!

Cham. Lift up thy eyes, and see who comes to cheer thee!

Tell me the story of thy wrongs, and then
See if my soul has rest, till thou hast justice.

Mon. My brother!

Cham. Yes, Monimia, if thou think'st
That I deserve the name, I am thy brother.

Mon. O Castalio!

Cham. Ha!

Name me that name again! my soul's on fire
Till I know all!—There's meaning in that name:—

I know he is thy husband; therefore trust me
With all the following truth.

Mon. Indeed, Chamont,
There's nothing in it but the fault of nature:
I'm often thus seiz'd suddenly with grief,
I know not why.

Cham. You use me ill, Monimia;
And I might think, with justice, most severely
Of this unfaithful dealing with your brother.

Mon. Truly I'm not to blame. Suppose I'm fond,

And grieve for what as much may please another?
Should I upbraid the dearest friend on earth
For the first fault? You would not do so, would you?

Cham. Not if I'd cause to think it was a friend.

Mon. Why do you then call this unfaithful dealing?

I ne'er conceal'd my soul from you before:
Bear with me now, and search my wounds
no further;

For every probing pains me to the heart.

Cham. 'Tis sign there's danger in't, and must be prob'd.

Where's your new husband? Still that thought disturbs you—

What! only answer me with tears?—Castalio!—
Nay, now they stream:—

Cruel, unkind Castalio!—Is't not so?

Mon. I cannot speak;—grief flows so fast upon me,

It chokes, and will not let me tell the cause.
Oh!—

Cham. My Monimia! to my soul thou'rt dear
As honour to my name!

Why wilt thou not repose within my breast
The anguish that torments thee?

Mon. Oh! I dare not.

Cham. I have no friend but thee. [confide] We must
In one another.—Two unhappy orphans,
Alas, we are! and when I see thee grieve,
Methinks it is a part of me that suffers.

Mon. Could you be secret?

Cham. Secret as the grave.

Mon. But when I've told you, will you keep your fury

Within its bounds? Will you not do some rash
And horrid mischief? For indeed, Chamont,
You would not think how hardly I've been us'd
From a dear friend—from one that has my soul
A slave, and therefore treats it like a tyrant.

Cham. I will be calm.—But has Castalio
wrong'd thee?

Has he already wasted all his love?

What has he done?—quickly! for I'm all trembling

With expectation of a horrid tale!

Mon. Oh! could you think it?

Cham. What?

Mon. I fear he'll kill me!

Cham. Ha!

Mon. Indeed I do: he's strangely cruel to me;
Which, if it last, I'm sure must break my heart.

Cham. What has he done?

Mon. Most barbarously us'd me.
Just as we met, and I, with open arms,
Ran to embrace the lord of all my wishes,
Oh then —

Cham. Go on!

Mon. He threw me from his breast,
Like a detested sin.

Cham. How!

Mon. As I hung too
Upon his knees, and begg'd to know the cause,
He dragg'd me, like a slave, upon the earth,
And had no pity on my cries.

Cham. How! did he
Dash thee disdainfully away, with scorn?

Mon. He did.

Cham. What! throw thee from him?

Mon. Yes, indeed he did!

Cham. So may this arm
Throw him to th' earth, like a dead dog despis'd.
Lameness and leprosy, blindness and lunacy,
Poverty, shame, pride, and the name of villain,
Light on me, if, Castalio, I forgive thee!

Mon. Nay, now, Chamont, art thou unkind as he is!

Didst thou not promise me thou wouldst be calm?

Keep my disgrace conceal'd?

Alas, I love him still; and though I ne'er
Clasp him again within these longing arms,
Yet bless him, bless him, gods, where'er he goes!

Enter ACASTO.

Acas. Sure some ill fate is tow'rd's me; in my house

I only meet with oddness and disorder.

Just this very moment

I met Castalio too—

Cham. Then you met a villain.

Acas. Ha!

Cham. Yes, a villain!

Acas. Have a care, young soldier,
How thou'rt too busy with Acasto's fame.
I have a sword, my arm's good old acquaintance: —

Villain to thee.

Cham. Curse on thy scandalous age,
Which hinders me to rush upon thy throat,
And tear the root up of that cursed bramble!

Acas. Ungrateful ruffian! sure my good old friend

Was ne'er thy father! Nothing of him's in thee!
What have I done, in my unhappy age,
To be thus us'd? I scorn to upbraid thee, boy!
But I could put thee in remembrance —

Cham. Do.

Acas. I scorn it.

Cham. No, I'll calmly hear the story;
For I would fain know all, to see which scale
Weighs most.—Ha! is not that good old Acasto?
What have I done?—Can you forgive this folly?

Acas. Why dost thou ask it?

Cham. 'Twas the rude o'erflowing
Of too much passion—Pray, my lord, forgive me. [Kneels.

Acas. Mock me not, youth! I can revenge
a wrong.

Cham. I know it well—but for this thought of mine,

Pity a madman's frenzy, and forget it.

Acas. I will; but henceforth pr'ythee be more kind. [Raises him.

Whence came the pause?

Cham. Indeed I've been to blame;
For you've been my father—
You've been her father too.

[Takes Monimia by the Hand.

Acas. Forbear the prologue,
And let me know the substance of thy tale.

Cham. You took her up, a little tender flower,
Just sprouted on a bank, which the next frost
Had nipp'd; and with a careful, loving hand,
Transplanted her into your own fair garden,
Where the sun always shines: there long she flourish'd;

Grew sweet to sense, and lovely to the eye;
Till at the last a cruel spoiler came,
Cropp'd this fair rose, and rifled all its sweetness,
Then cast it like a loathsome weed away.

Acas. You talk to me in parables, Chamont:
You may have known that I'm no wordy man.
Fine speeches are the instruments of knaves,
Or fools, that use them when they want good
sense:

But honesty

Needs no disguise or ornament. Be plain.

Cham. Your son—

Acas. I've two; and both, I hope, have honour.

Cham. I hope so too; but—

Acas. Speak.

Cham. I must inform you,

Once more, Castalio—

Acas. Still Castalio!

Cham. Yes;

Your son Castalio has wrong'd Monimia!

Acas. Ha! wrong'd her?

Cham. Marry'd her.

Acas. I'm sorry for't.

Cham. Why sorry?

By yon blest heaven, there's not a lord
But might be proud to take her to his heart.

Acas. I'll not deny't.

Cham. You dare not; by the gods,
You dare not. All your family combin'd
In one damn'd falsehood, to outdo Castalio,
Dare not deny't.

Acas. How has Castalio wrong'd her?

Cham. Ask that of him. I say my sister's wrong'd:

Monimia, my sister, born as high
And noble as Castalio,—Do her justice,
Or, by the gods, I'll lay a scene of blood
Shall make this dwelling horrible to nature.
I'll do't.—Hark you, my lord, your son Castalio, Take him to your closet, and there teach him manners.

Acas. You shall have justice.

Cham. Nay, I will have justice!
Who'll sleep in safety that has done me wrong?
My lord, I'll not disturb you to repeat
The cause of this; I beg you (to preserve
Your house's honour) ask it of Castalio. [Exit.

Acas. Farewell, proud boy.—

Monimia!

Mon. My lord.

Acas. You are my daughter.

Mon. I am, my lord, if you'll vouchsafe to own me.

Acas. When you'll complain to me, I'll prove a father. [Exit.

Mon. Now I'm undone for ever! Who on earth

Is there so wretched as Monimia?
First by Castalio cruelly forsaken;
I've lost Acasto now; his parting frowns

May well instruct me rage is in his heart.
I shall be next abandon'd to my fortune,
Thrust out, a naked wand'rer to the world,
And branded for the mischievous Monimia!
What will become of me? My cruel brother
Is framing mischiefs too, for aught I know,
That may produce bloodshed and horrid murder!
I would not be the cause of one man's death,
To reign the empress of the earth; nay, more,
I'd rather lose for ever my Castalio,
My dear, unkind Castalio. [Sits down.]

Enter POLYDORE.

Pol. Monimia weeping!
I come, my love, to kiss all sorrow from thee.
What mean these sighs, and why thus beats thy heart?

Mon. Let me alone to sorrow; 'tis a cause
None e'er shall know; but it shall with me die.

Pol. Happy, Monimia, he to whom these sighs,
These tears, and all these languishings are paid!
I know your heart was never meant for me;
That jewel's for an elder brother's price.

Mon. My lord!

Pol. Nay, wonder not; last night I heard
His oaths, your vows, and to my torment saw
Your wild embraces; heard the appointment
made;

I did, Monimia, and I curs'd the sound.
Wilt thou be sworn, my love? wilt thou be ne'er
Unkind again?

Mon. Banish such fruitless hopes!
Have you sworn constancy to my undoing?
Will you be ne'er my friend again?

Pol. What means my love?

Mon. Away! what meant my lord
Last night?

Pol. Is that a question now to be demanded?

Mon. Was it well done
To assault my lodging at the dead of night,
And threaten me if I deny'd admittance—
You said you were Castalio.

Pol. By those eyes,
It was the same: I spent my time much better.

Mon. Ha!—have a care!

Pol. Where is the danger near me?

Mon. I fear you're on a rock will wreck your quiet,
And drown your soul in wretchedness for ever.
A thousand horrid thoughts crowd on my memory.

Will you be kind, and answer me one question?

Pol. I'd trust thee with my life; on that soft
bosom

Breathe out the choicest secrets of my heart,
Till I had nothing in it left but love.

Mon. Nay, I'll conjure you, by the gods and angels,

By the honour of your name, that's most con-
cern'd,

To tell me, Polydore, and tell me truly,
Where did you rest last night?

Pol. Within thy arms.

Mon. 'Tis done. [Faints.]

Pol. She faints!—no help!—who waits?—
A curse

Upon my vanity, that could not keep
The secret of my happiness in silence!
Confusion! we shall be surpris'd anon;
And consequently all must be betray'd.
Monimia!—she breathes!—Monimia!

Mon. Well—

Let mischiefs multiply! let every hour
Of my loath'd life yield me increase of horror!
O let the sun, to these unhappy eyes,
Ne'er shine again, but be eclips'd for ever!
May every thing I look on seem a prodigy,
To fill my soul with terrors, till I quite Forget I ever had humanity,
And grow a curser of the works of nature!

Pol. What means all this?

Mon. O Polydore! if all
The friendship e'er you vow'd to good Castalio
Be not a falsehood; if you ever lov'd
Your brother, you've undone yourself and me.

Pol. Which way can ruin reach the man
that's rich,
As I am, in possession of thy sweetness?

Mon. Oh! I'm his wife!

Pol. What says Monimia?

Mon. I am Castalio's wife!

Pol. His marry'd, wedded wife?

Mon. Yesterday's sun
Saw it perform'd!

Pol. My brother's wife?

Mon. As surely as we both
Must taste of misery, that guilt is thine.

Pol. Oh! thou may'st yet be happy!

Mon. Couldst thou be Happy, with such a weight upon thy soul?

Pol. It may be yet a secret.—I'll go try
To reconcile and bring Castalio to thee!
Whilst from the world I take myself away,
And waste my life in penance for my sin.

Mon. Then thou wouldst more undo me:
heap a load

Of added sins upon my wretched head!

Wouldst thou again have me betray thy brother,
And bring pollution to his arms?—Curs'd
thought!

Oh! when shall I be mad indeed! [Exit.]

Pol. Then thus I'll go—
Full of my guilt, distracted where to roam:
I'll find some place where adders nest in winter,
Loathsome and venomous; where poisons hang
Like gums against the walls: there I'll inhabit,
And live up to the height of desperation.
Desire shall languish like a with'ring flower,
Horror shall fright me from those pleasing harms,
And I'll no more be caught with beauty's charms. [Exit.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—A Garden.

CASTALIO discovered lying on the Ground.
Soft Music.

Cas. See where the deer trot after one another:
No discontent they know; but in delightful
Wildness and freedom, pleasant springs, fresh herbage,

Calm harbours, lusty health and innocence,
Enjoy their portion:—if they see a man,
How will they turn together all, and gaze
Upon the monster!

Once in a season too they taste of love:
Only the beast of reason is its slave;
And in that folly drudges all the year.

Enter ACASTO.

Acas. Castalio! Castalio!

Cas. Who's there

So wretched but to name Castalio?

Acas. I hope my message may succeed.

Cas. My father!
Tis joy to see you, though where sorrow's nourish'd.

Acas. Castalio, you must go along with me,
And see Monimia.

Cas. Sure my lord but mocks me:
Go see Monimia?

Acas. I say, no more dispute.
Complaints are made to me that you have
wrong'd her.

Cas. Who has complain'd?

Acas. Her brother to my face proclaim'd her wrong'd,

And in such terms they've warm'd me.

Cas. What terms? Her brother! Heaven!
Where learn'd he that?

What, does she send her hero with defiance?
He durst not sure affront you?

Acas. No, not much:

But—

Cas. Speak, what said he?

Acas. That thou wert a villain:
Methinks I would not have thee thought a villain.

Cas. Shame on the ill-manner'd brute!
Your age secur'd him; he durst not else have said

Acas. By my sword,
I would not see thee wrong'd, and bear it vilely:
Though I have pass'd my word she shall have justice.

Cas. Justice! to give her justice would undo her.

Think you this solitude I now have chosen,
Wish'd do have grown one piece
With this cold clay, and all without a cause?

Enter CHAMONT.

Cham. Where is the hero, famous and re-nown'd

For wronging innocence, and breaking vows;
Whose mighty spirit, and whose stubborn heart,
No woman can appease, nor man provoke?

Acas. I guess, Chamont, you come to seek Castalio?

Cham. I come to seek the husband of Monimia.

Cas. The slave is here.

Cham. I thought ere now to have found you
Atoning for the ills you've done Chamont:
For you have wrong'd the dearest part of him.
Monimia, young lord, weeps in this heart;
And all the tears thy injuries have drawn From her poor eyes, are drops of blood from hence.

Cas. Then you are Chamont?

Cham. Yes, and I hope no stranger
To great Castalio.

Cas. I've heard of such a man,
That has been very busy with my honour.
I own I'm much indebted to you, sir,
And here return the villain back again
You sent me by my father.

Cham. Thus I'll thank you. [Draws.

Acas. By this good sword, who first presumes to violence,
Makes me his foe. [Draws and interposes.

Cas. Sir, in my younger years with care
you taught me

That brave revenge was due to injur'd honour:
Oppose not then the justice of my sword,
Lest you should make me jealous of your love.

Cham. Into thy father's arms thou fly'st for safety,

Because thou know'st that place is sanctify'd

With the remembrance of an ancient friendship.

Cas. I am a villain, if I will not seek thee,
Till I may be reveng'd for all the wrongs
Done me by that ungrateful fair thou plead'st for.

Cham. She wrong'd thee? By the fury in
my heart,

Thy father's honour's not above Monimia's;
Nor was thy mother's truth and virtue fairer.

Acas. Boy, don't disturb the ashes of the dead
With thy capricious follies; the remembrance
Of the lov'd creature that once fill'd these arms—

Cham. Has not been wrong'd.

Cas. It shall not.

Cham. No, nor shall Monimia, though a helpless orphan, destitute
Of friends and fortune, though th' unhappy sister
Of poor Chamont, whose sword is all his portion,
B' oppress'd by thee, thou proud, imperious traitor!

Cas. Ha! set me free.

Cham. Come both.

Cas. Sir, if you'd have me think you did not take

This opportunity to show your vanity,
Let's meet some other time, when by ourselves
We fairly may dispute our wrongs together.

Cham. Till then I am Castalio's friend. [Exit.

Acas. Would I'd been absent when this boist'rous brave

Came to disturb thee thus. I'm griev'd I hinder'd
Thy just resentment—But, Monimia—

Cas. Damn her!

Acas. Don't curse her.

Cas. Did I?

Acas. Yes.

Cas. I'm sorry for't.

Acas. Methinks, if, as I guess, the fault's but small,

It might be pardon'd.

Cas. No.

Acas. What has she done?

Cas. That she's my wife, may heaven and you forgive me!

Acas. Be reconcil'd then.

Cas. No.

Acas. For my sake,
Castalio, and the quiet of my age.

Cas. Why will you urge a thing my nature starts at?

Acas. Pr'ythee forgive her.

Cas. Lightnings first shall blast me!
I tell you, were she prostrate at my feet,
Full of her sex's best dissembled sorrows,
And all that wondrous beauty of her own,
My heart might break, but it should never soften.

Acas. Did you but know the agonies she feels—
She flies with fury over all the house;
Through every room of each apartment, crying,
"Where's my Castalio? Give me my Castalio!"
Except she sees you, sure she'll grow distracted!

Cas. Ha! will she? Does she name Castalio?
And with such tenderness? Conduct me quickly
To the poor lovely mourner.

Acas. Then wilt thou go? Blessings attend thy purpose!

Cas. I cannot hear Monimia's soul's in sadness,
And be a man: my heart will not forget her.

Acas. Delay not then; but haste and cheer thy love.

Cas. Oh! I will throw my impatient arms about her!

In her soft bosom sigh my soul to peace;

Till through the panting breast she finds the way
To mould my heart, and make it what she will.
Monimia! Oh!

[Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—A Chamber.

Enter MONIMIA.

Mon. Stand off, and give me room;
I will not rest till I have found Castalio,
My wish's lord, comely as the rising day.
I cannot die in peace till I have seen him.

Enter CASTALIO.

Cas. Who talks of dying, with a voice so sweet
That life's in love with it?

Mon. Hark! 'tis he that answers.
Where art thou?

Cas. Here, my love.

Mon. No nearer, lest I vanish.

Cas. Have I been in a dream then all this while?
And art thou but the shadow of Monimia?
Why dost thou fly me thus?

Mon. Oh! were it possible that we could drown
In dark oblivion but a few past hours,
We might be happy.

Cas. Is't then so hard, Monimia, to forgive
A fault, where humble love, like mine, implores thee?

For I must love thee, though it prove my ruin.
I'll kneel to thee, and weep a flood before thee.
Yet pr'ythee, tyrant, break not quite my heart;
But when my task of penitence is done,
Heal it again, and comfort me with love.

Mon. If I am dumb, Castalio, and want words
To pay thee back this mighty tenderness,
It is because I look on thee with horror,
And cannot see the man I have so wrong'd.

Cas. Thou hast not wrong'd me.

Mon. Ah! alas, thou talk'st
Just as thy poor heart thinks. Have not I wrong'd thee?

Cas. No.

Mon. Still thou wander'st in the dark, Castalio;
But wilt, ere long, stumble on horrid danger.

Cas. My better angel, then do thou inform me
What danger threatens me, and where it lies;
Why wert thou (pr'ythee smile, and tell me why),
When I stood waiting underneath the window,
Deaf to my cries, and senseless of my pains?

Mon. Did I not beg thee to forbear inquiry?
Read'st thou not something in my face, that speaks

Wonderful change, and horror from within me?

Cas. If, lab'ring in the pangs of death,
Thou wouldst do any thing to give me ease,
Unfold this riddle ere my thoughts grow wild,
And let in fears of ugly form upon me.

Mon. My heart won't let me speak it; but remember,

Monimia, poor Monimia, tells you this:
We ne'er must meet again—

Cas. Ne'er meet again?

Mon. No, never.

Cas. Where's the power
On earth, that dares not look like thee, and say so?
Thou art my heart's inheritance: I serv'd
A long and faithful slavery for thee;
And who shall rob me of the dear-bought blessing?

Mon. Time will clear all; but now let this content you:

Heaven has decreed, and therefore, I've resolv'd

(With torment I must tell it thee, Castalio),
Ever to be a stranger to thy love,
In some far distant country waste my life,
And from this day to see thy face no more.

Cas. Why turn'st thou from me; I'm alone
already.

Methinks I stand upon a naked beach,
Sighing to winds, and to the seas complaining,
Whilst afar off the vessel sails away,
Where all the treasure of my soul's embark'd;
Wilt thou not turn?—Oh! could those eyes
but speak,

I should know all, for love is pregnant in 'em;
They swell, they press their beams upon me still:
Wilt thou not speak? If we must part for ever,
Give me but one kind word to think upon,
And please myself withal, whilst my heart's breaking.

Mon. Ah! poor Castalio!

[Exit.]

Cas. What means all this? Why all this stir to plague

A single wretch? If but your word can shake
This world to atoms, why so much ado
With me? think me but dead, and lay me so.

Enter POLYDORE.

Pol. To live, and live a torment to myself,
What dog would bear't, that knew but his condition?

We've little knowledge, and that makes us
cowards,

Because it cannot tell us what's to come.

Cas. Who's there?

Pol. Why, what art thou?

Cas. My brother Polydore?

Pol. My name is Polydore.

Cas. Canst thou inform me—

Pol. Of what?

Cas. Of my Monimia?

Pol. No. Good day!

Cas. In haste!

Methinks my Polydore appears in sadness.

Pol. Indeed! and so to me does my Castalio.

Cas. Do I?

Pol. Thou dost.

Cas. Alas, I've wondrous reason!

I'm strangely alter'd, brother, since I saw thee.

Pol. Why?

Cas. I'll tell thee, Polydore; I would repose
Within thy friendly bosom all my follies;
For thou wilt pardon 'em, because they're mine.

Pol. Be not too credulous; consider first,
Friends may be false. Is there no friendship false?

Cas. Why dost thou ask me that? Does this appear

Like a false friendship, when, with open arms
And streaming eyes, I run upon thy breast?

Oh! 'tis in thee alone I must have comfort!

Pol. I fear, Castalio, I have none to give thee.

Cas. Dost thou not love me then?

Pol. Oh, more than life;

I never had a thought of my Castalio,
Might wrong the friendship we had vow'd together.

Hast thou dealt so by me?

Cas. I hope I have.

Pol. Then tell me why this morning, this disorder?

Cas. O Polydore, I know not how to tell thee;
Shame rises in my face, and interrupts
The story of my tongue.

Pol. I grieve, my friend.

Knows any thing which he's ashamed to tell me.

Cas. Oh, much too oft. Our destiny contriv'd
To plague us both with one unhappy love!
Thou, like a friend, a constant, gen'rous friend,
In its first pangs didst trust me with thy passion,
Whilst I still smooth'd my pain with smiles
before thee,

And made a contract I ne'er meant to keep.

Pol. How!

Cas. Still new ways I studied to abuse thee,
And kept thee as a stranger to my passion,
Till yesterday I wedded with Monimia.

Pol. Ah! Castalio, was that well done?

Cas. No; to conceal't from thee was much a fault.

Pol. A fault! when thou hast heard
The tale I'll tell, what wilt thou call it then?

Cas. How my heart throbs!

Pol. First, for thy friendship, traitor,
I cancel't thus: after this day I'll ne'er
Hold trust or converse with the false Castalio!
This witness, heaven.

Cas. What will my fate do with me?
I've lost all happiness, and know not why!
What means this, brother?

Pol. Perjur'd, treach'rous wretch,
Farewell!

Cas. I'll be thy slave, and thou shalt use me
Just as thou wilt, do but forgive me.

Pol. Never.

Cas. Oh! think a little what thy heart is doing:

How, from our infancy, we hand in hand
Have trod the path of life in love together.
One bed has held us, and the same desires,
The same aversions, still employ'd our thoughts.
Whene'er had I a friend that was not Polydore's
Or Polydore a foe that was not mine?
E'en in the womb we embrac'd; and wilt thou now,

For the first fault, abandon and forsake me?
Leave me, amidst afflictions, to myself,
Plung'd in the gulf of grief, and none to help me?

Pol. Go to Monimia; in her arms thou'lt find Repose; she has the art of healing sorrows.

Cas. What arts?

Pol. Blind wretch! thou husband? there's a question!

Is she not a—

Cas. What?

Pol. Whore? I think that word needs no explaining.

Cas. Alas! I can forgive e'en this to thee;
But let me tell thee, Polydore, I'm griev'd
To find thee guilty of such low revenge,
To wrong that virtue which thou couldst not ruin.

Pol. It seems I lie then!

Cas. Should the bravest man
That e'er wore conq'ring sword, but dare to whisper
What thou proclaim'st, he were the worst of liars.

My friend may be mistaken.

Pol. Damn the evasion!

Thou mean'st the worst! and he's a base-born villain

That said I lied!

Cas. A base-born villain!

Pol. Yes! thou never cam'st
From old Acasto's loins: the midwife put
A cheat upon my mother; and, instead
Of a true brother, in the cradle by me

Plac'd some coarse peasant's cub, and thou art he!

Cas. Thou art my brother still.

Pol. Thou liest!

Cas. Nay, then—

[Draws.

Yet I am calm.

Pol. A coward's always so.

Cas. Ah!—ah!—that stings home! Coward!

Pol. Ay, base-born coward! villain!

Cas. This to thy heart, then, though my mother bore thee!

[They fight; Polydore drops his Sword, and runs on Castalio's.

Pol. Now my Castalio is again my friend.

Cas. What have I done? my sword is in thy breast.

Pol. So would I have it be, thou best of men,
Thou kindest brother, and thou truest friend!

Cas. Ye gods! we're taught that all your works are justice:

Ye're painted merciful, and friends to innocence:
If so, then why these plagues upon my head?

Pol. Blame not the heav'ns, 'tis Polydore has wrong'd thee;

I've stain'd thy bed; thy spotless marriage joys
Have been polluted by thy brother's lust.

Cas. By thee?

Pol. By me, last night, the horrid deed
Was done, when all things slept but rage and incest.

Cas. Now, where's Monimia? Oh!

Enter MONIMIA.

Mon. I'm here! who calls me?

Methought I heard a voice
Sweet as the shepherd's pipe upon the mountains,
When all his little flock's at feed before him.
But what means this? here's blood!

Cas. Ay, brother's blood!

Art thou prepar'd for everlasting pains?

Pol. Oh! let me charge thee, by th' eternal
justice,

Hurt not her tender life!

Cas. Not kill her?

Mon. That task myself have finish'd: I shall die
Before we part: I've drunk a healing draught
For all my cares, and never more shall wrong
thee.

Pol. Oh, she's innocent.

Cas. Tell me that story,

And thou wilt make a wretch of me indeed.

Pol. Hadst thou, Castalio, us'd me like a friend,
This ne'er had happen'd; hadst thou let me know
Thy marriage, we had all now met in joy:

But, ignorant of that,

Hearing th' appointment made, enrag'd to think
Thou hadst undone me in successful love,
I, in the dark, went and supply'd thy place;
Whilst all the night, midst our triumphant joys,
The trembling, tender, kind, deceiv'd Monimia,
Embrac'd, caress'd, and call'd me her Castalio.

[Dies.

Mon. Now, my Castalio, the most dear of men,
Wilt thou receive pollution to thy bosom,
And close the eyes of one that has betray'd thee?

Cas. O, I'm the unhappy wretch, whose cursed fate

Has weigh'd thee down into destruction with him:
Why then thus kind to me!

Mon. When I'm laid low i'th' grave, and quite forgotten,

May'st thou be happy in a fairer bride!

But none can ever love thee like Monimia.

When I am dead, as presently I shall be
(For the grim tyrant grasps my heart already),
Speak well of me: and if thou find ill tongues
Too busy with my fame, don't hear me wrong'd;
'Twill be a noble justice to the memory
Of a poor wretch, once honour'd with thy love. [Dies.]

Enter CHAMONT and ACASTO.

Cham. Gape, earth, and swallow me to quick destruction,
If I forgive your house!
Ye've overpower'd me now!
But, hear me, heav'n!—Ah! here's a scene of
death!

My sister, my Monimia, breathless!—Now,
Ye pow'rs above, if ye have justice, strike!
Strike bolts through me, and through the curs'd
Castalio!

Cas. Stand off! thou hot-brain'd, boisterous, noisy ruffian!

And leave me to my sorrows.

Cham. By the love
I bore her living, I will ne'er forsake her;
But here remain till my heart burst with sobbing.

Cas. Vanish, I charge thee! or—

[Draws a Dagger.]

Cham. Thou canst not kill me!
That would be kindness, and against thy nature!

Acas. What means Castalio? Sure thou wilt not pull

More sorrows on thy aged father's head!
Tell me, I beg you, tell me the sad cause
Of all this ruin.

Cas. Thou, unkind Chamont,
Unjustly hast pursu'd me with thy hate,
And sought the life of him that never wrong'd
thee:

Now, if thou wilt embrace a noble vengeance,
Come join with me, and curse—

Cham. What?

Acas. Have patience.

Cas. Patience! preach it to the winds,
To roaring seas, or raging fires! for curs'd
As I am now, 'tis this must give me patience:
Thus I find rest, and shall complain no more.

[Stabs himself.]

Chamont, to thee my birthright I bequeath:—
Comfort my mourning father—heal his griefs;

[Acasto faints into the Arms of a Servant.]
For I perceive they fall with weight upon him—
And, for Monimia's sake, whom thou wilt find
I never wrong'd, be kind to poor Serina—
Now all I beg is, lay me in one grave
Thus with my love—Farewell! I now am—nothing. [Dies.]

Cham. Take care of good Acasto, whilst I go To search the means by which the fates have plagu'd us.

'Tis thus that heav'n its empire does maintain:
It may afflict; but man must not complain.

[Exeunt.]

PHILIPS.

AMBROSE PHILIPS was descended from a very ancient and considerable family of that name in Leicestershire. He was born about the year 1671, and received his education at St. John's College, Cambridge. During his stay at the university he wrote his Pastorals, which acquired him at this time a high reputation. He also, in 1700 published a life of John Williams, Lord Keeper of the Great Seal, Bishop of Lincoln, and Archbishop of York, in the reigns of King James and Charles I. in which are related some remarkable occurrences in those times, both in church and state; with an appendix, giving an account of his benefactions to St. John's College. When he quitted the university, and came to London, he became a constant attendant at, and one of the wits of, Button's coffee-house, where he obtained the friendship and intimacy of many of the celebrated geniuses of that age, more particularly of Sir Richard Steele, who, in the first volume of his Tatler, has inserted a little poem of Mr. Philips's, which he calls a Winter Piece, dated from Copenhagen, and addressed to the Earl of Dorset, on which he bestows the highest encomiums: and, indeed, so much justice is there in these his commendations that even Pope himself, who had a fixed aversion for the author, while he affected to despise his other works, used always to except this from the number. Sir R. Steele intended to produce Mr. Philips's Pastorals with a critical comparison of them, in favour of Philips, with Pope's; but Pope artfully took the task upon himself, and, in a paper in The Guardian, by drawing the like comparison, and giving a like preference, but on principles of criticism apparently fallacious tried to point out the absurdity of such a judgment. A quarrel ensued; Pope was too much for Philips in wit; and Philips would have been too much for Pope in fisty-cuffs, if he had made his appearance at Button's, where a rod had been hung up for him by Philips. Pope wisely avoided the argumentum baculinum. Mr. Philips's circumstances were in general, through his life, not only easy, but rather affluent, in consequence of his being connected, by his political principles with persons of great rank and consequence. He was, soon after the accession of King George I, put into the commission of the peace; and, in 1717, appointed one of the commissioners of the lottery; and, on his friend Dr. Boulter's being made primate of Ireland, he accompanied that prelate across St. George's Channel, where he had considerable preferments bestowed on him, and was elected a member of the House of Commons there, as representative for the county of Armagh. In Sept. 1754, he was appointed register of the Prerogative Court in Dublin. At length, having purchased an annuity for life of four hundred pounds, he came over to England some time in the year 1748, but did not long enjoy his fortune, being struck with a palsy, of which he died June 18, 1749, in his 78th year, at his lodgings near Vauxhall.

THE DISTREST MOTHER.

ACTED at Drury Lane, 1719. This play is little more than a translation from the Andromaque of Racine. It is, however, very well translated, the poetry pleasing, and the incidents of the story so affecting that although it is, like all the French tragedies, rather too heavy and declamatory, yet it never fails bringing tears into the eyes of a sensible audience; and will, perhaps, ever continue to be a stock play on the lists of the theatres. The original author, however, has deviated from history and Philips likewise followed his example in making Hermione kill herself on the body of Pyrrhus, who had been slain by her instigation; whereas, on the contrary, she not only survived, but became wife to Orestes. How far the licentia poetica will authorize such oppositions to well-known facts of history, is, however, a point concerning which we have not time at present to enter into a disquisition. Dr. Johnson observes, that such a work requires no uncommon powers; but that the friends of Philips exerted every art to promote his interest. Before the appearance of the play, a whole Spectator, none indeed of the best, was devoted to its praise; while it yet continued to be acted, another Spectator was written, to tell what impression it made upon Sir Roger de Coverley; and on the first night a select audience, says Pope, was called together to applaud it.

*Attendants on Pyrrhus

SCENE.—A great Hall in the Court of PYRRHUS, at BUTHROTOS, the capital City of EPIRUS.

A C T I.

SCENE. I.

Enter ORESTES, PYLADES, and Attendants.

Ores. O PYLADES! what's life without a friend!
At sight of thee my gloomy soul cheers up,
My hopes revive, and gladness dawns within me.
After an absence of six tedious moons,
How could I hope to find my Pylades,
My joy, my comfort! on this fatal shore!
Even in the court of Pyrrhus? in these realms,
These hated realms, so cross to all my wishes.
O, my brave friend! may no blind stroke of fate
Divide us more, and tear me from myself.

Pyl. O prince! O my Orestes! O my friend!
Thus let me speak the welcome of my heart.

[Embraces.]

Since I have gain'd this unexpected meeting,
Blest be the powers that barr'd my way to Greece,
And kept me here! e'er since the unhappy day
When warring winds (Epirus full in view)
Sunder'd our barks on the loud stormy main.

Ores. It was, indeed, a morning full of horror!

Pyl. A thousand boding cares have rack'd
my soul

In your behalf. Often, with tears, I mourn'd
The fatal ills, to which your life's involv'd;
And grudg'd you dangers which I could not share.
I fear'd to what extremities the black despair
That prey'd upon your mind, might have betray'd you,

And lest the gods, in pity to your woes,
Should hear your prayers, and take the life you loath'd.

But now with joy I see you!—The retinue,
And numerous followers that surround you here,
Speak better fortunes, and a mind dispos'd
To relish life.

Ores. Alas! my friend, who knows
The destiny to which I stand reserv'd!
I come in search of an inhuman fair;
And live or die, as she decrees my fate.

Pyl. You much surprise me, prince! I thought you cur'd

Of your unpity'd, unsuccessful passion.
Why, in Epirus, should you hope to find
Hermione less cruel, than at Sparta?
I thought her pride, and the disdainful manner
In which she treated all your constant sufferings,
Had broke your fetters, and assur'd your
freedom:

Asham'd of your repulse, and slighted vows,
You hated her; you talk'd of her no more:
Prince, you deceiv'd me.

Ores. I deceiv'd myself.
Do not upbraid the unhappy man that loves thee.
Thou know'st I never hid my passion from thee;
Thou saw'st it, in its birth, and in its progress;
And when at last the hoary king, her father,
Great Menelaus, gave away his daughter,

His lovely daughter, to the happy Pyrrhus,
Th' avenger of his wrongs, thou saw'st my grief,
My torture, my despair; and how I dragg'd,
From sea to sea, a heavy chain of woes.
O Pylades! my heart has bled within me,
To see thee, press'd with sorrows not thy own,
Still wand'ring with me like a banish'd man,
Watchful, and anxious for thy wretched friend,
To temper the wild transports of my mind,
And save me from myself.

Pyl. Why thus unkind?
Why will you envy me the pleasing task
Of generous love, and sympathising friendship?

Ores. Thou miracle of truth! But hear me on.
When in the midst of my disastrous fate,
I thought how the divine Hermione,
Deaf to the vows, regardless of my plaints,
Gave up herself, and all her charms, to Pyrrhus;
Thou may'st remember, I abhor'd her name,
Strove to forget her, and repay her scorn.
I made my friends, and even myself, believe
My soul was freed. Alas! I did not see,
That all the malice of my heart was love.
Triumphing thus, and yet a captive still,
In Greece I landed; and in Greece I found
The assembled princes all alarm'd with fears,
In which their common safety seem'd concern'd.
I join'd them: for I hop'd that war and glory
Might fill my mind, and take up all my thoughts;
And that my shatter'd soul, impair'd with grief,
Once more would reassume its wonted vigour,
And every idle passion quit my breast.

Pyl. The thought was worthy Agamemnon's
son.

Ores. But see the strange perverseness of my stars,
Which throws me on the rock I strove to shun!
The jealous chiefs, and all the states of Greece,
With one united voice complain of Pyrrhus;
That now, forgetful of the promise giv'n,
And mindless of his godlike father's fate,
Astyanax he nurses in his court;
Astyanax, the young, surviving hope
Of ruin'd Troy; Astyanax, descended
From a long race of kings—great Hector's son.

Pyl. A name still dreadful in the ears of Greece!
But, prince, you'll cease to wonder why the child
Lives thus protected in the court of Pyrrhus,
When you shall hear the bright Andromache,
His lovely captive, charms him from his purpose:
The mother's beauty guards the helpless son.

Ores. Your tale confirms what I have heard;
and hence

Spring all my hopes. Since my proud rival woos
Another partner to his throne and bed,
Hermione may still be mine. Her father,
The injur'd Menelaus, thinks already
His daughter slighted, and th' intended nuptials
Too long delay'd. I heard his loud complaints
With secret pleasure; and was glad to find

*Th' ungrateful maid neglected in her turn,
And all my wrongs aveng'd in her disgrace.*

Pyl. Oh, may you keep your just resentments warm!

Ores. Resentments! O my friend, too soon I found

They grew not out of hatred. I am betray'd:
I practise on myself, and fondly plot
My own undoing. Goaded on by love,
I canvass'd all the suffrages of Greece;
And here I come, their sworn ambassador,
To speak their jealousies, and claim this boy.

Pyl. Pyrrhus will treat your embassy with scorn.

Full of Achilles, his redoubted sire,
Pyrrhus is proud, impetuous, headstrong, fierce;
Made up of passions: will he then be sway'd,
And give to death the son of her he loves?

Ores. Oh, would he render up Hermione,
And keep Astyanax, I should be blest!
He must; he shall: Hermione is my life,
My soul, my rapture!—I'll no longer curb
The strong desire that hurries me to madness:
I'll give a loose to love; I'll bear her hence;
I'll tear her from his arms; I'll—O, ye gods!
Give me Hermione, or let me die!

But tell me, Pylades, how stand my hopes?
Is Pyrrhus still enamour'd with her charms?
Or dost thou think he'll yield me up the prize,
The dear, dear prize, which he has ravish'd
from me?

Pyl. I dare not flatter your fond hopes so far;
The king indeed, cold to the Spartan princess,
Turns all his passion to Andromache,
Hector's afflicted widow. But in vain,
With interwoven love and rage, he sues
The charming captive, obstinately cruel.
Oft he alarms her for her child, confin'd
Apart; and when her tears begin to flow,
As soon he stops them, and recalls his threats,
Hermione a thousand times has seen
His ill-requited vows return to her;
And takes his indignation all for love.

What can be gather'd from a man so various?
He may, in the disorder of his soul,
Wed her he hates, and punish her he loves.

Ores. But tell me how the wrong'd Hermione Brooks her slow nuptials, and dishonour'd charms?

Pol. Hermione would fain be thought to scorn

Her wavering lover, and disdain his falsehood;
But, spite of all her pride and conscious beauty,
She mourns in secret her neglected charms,
And oft has made me privy to her tears;
Still threatens to be gone, yet still she stays,
And sometimes sighs, and wishes for Orestes,

Ores. Ah, were those wishes from her heart,
my friend,

I'd fly in transport— [Flourish within.]

Pyl. Hear! The king approaches:
To give you audience. Speak your embassy
Without reserve: urge the demands of Greece;
And, in the name of all her kings, require
That Hector's son be given into your hands.
Pyrrhus, instead of granting what they ask,
To speed his love, and win the Trojan dame,
Will make it merit to preserve her son.
But, see: he comes!

Ores. Meanwhile, my Pylades,
Go, and dispose Hermione to see
Her lover, who is come thus far, to throw

Himself, in all his sorrows, at her feet.

[Exit Pylades.]

Enter PYRRHUS, PHOENIX, and Attendants.

Before I speak the message of the Greeks,
Permit me, sir, to glory in the title
Of their ambassador; since I behold
Troy's vanquisher, and great Achilles' son,
Nor does the son rise short of such a father:
If Hector fell by him, Troy fell by you.
But what your father never would have done,
You do. You cherish the remains of Troy;
And, by an ill-tim'd pity, keep alive
The dying embers of a ten years' war.
Have you so soon forgot the mighty Hector?
The Greeks remember his high brandish'd sword,
That fill'd their state with widows and with orphans;

For which they call for vengeance on his son.
Who knows what he may one day prove?
Who knows

But he may brave us in our ports, and fill'd
With Hector's fury, set our fleets on blaze?
You may, yourself, live to repent your mercy.
Comply then with the Grecians' just demands;
Sate their vengeance, and preserve yourself.

Pyr. The Greeks are for my safety more concern'd

Than I desire. I thought your kings were met
On more important counsel. When I heard
The name of their ambassador, I hop'd
Some glorious enterprise was taking birth.

Is Agamemnon's son dispatch'd for this?
And do the Grecian chiefs, renown'd in war,
A race of heroes, join in close debate,
To plot an infant's death? What right has Greece
To ask his life? Must I, must I alone,
Of all her scepter'd warriors, be deny'd
To treat my captive as I please? Know, prince,
When Troy lay smoking on the ground, and each
Proud victor shar'd the harvest of the war,
Andromache, and this her son, were mine;
Were mine by lot. And who shall wrest them from me?

Ulysses bore away old Priam's queen;
Cassandra was your own great father's prize.
Did I concern myself in what they won?
Did I send embassies to claim their captives?

Ores. But, sir, we fear for you, and for ourselves.

Troy may again revive, and a new Hector
Rise in Astyanax. Then think betimes—

Pyr. Let dastard souls be timorously wise:
But tell them, Pyrrhus knows not how to form
Far fancied ills, and dangers out of sight.

Ores. Sir, call to mind the unrival'd strength of Troy;

Her walls, her bulwarks, and her gates of brass;
Her kings, her heroes, and embattled armies.

Pyr. I call them all to mind; and see them all
Confus'd in dust; all mix'd in one wide ruin!
All but a child, and he in bondage held.

What vengeance can we fear from such a Troy?
If they have sworn to extinguish Hector's race,
Why was their vow for twelve long months
deferr'd?

Why was he not in Priam's bosom slain?
He should have fall'n among the slaughter'd heaps, Whelm'd under Troy. His death had then been just.

My fury then was without bounds; but now,
My wrath appeas'd, must I be cruel still

And, deaf to all the tender calls of pity,
Like a cool murderer, bathe my hands in blood?
An infant's blood? No, prince; go bid the Greeks

Mark out some other victim; my revenge
Has had its fill. What has escap'd from Troy
Shall not be sav'd to perish in Epirus.

Ores. I need not tell you, sir, Astyanax
Was doom'd to death in Troy; nor mention how
The crafty mother sav'd her darling son.
The Greeks do now but urge their former sentence:

Nor is't the boy, but Hector, they pursue;
The father draws their vengeance on the son:
The father, who so oft in Grecian blood
Has drench'd his sword; the father, whom the Greeks

May seek e'en here. Prevent them, sir, in time.

Pyr. No! let them come; since I was born to wage

Eternal wars. Let them now turn their arms
On him who conquer'd for them. Let them come;
And in Epirus seek another Troy.

'Twas thus they recompens'd my godlike sire;
Thus was Achilles thank'd. But, prince, remember,

Their black ingratitude then cost them dear.

Ores. Shall Greece then find a rebel son in Pyrrhus?

Pyr. Have I then conquer'd to depend on Greece?

Ores. Hermione will sway your soul to peace,
And mediate 'twixt her father and yourself.
Her beauty will enforce my embassy.

Pyr. Hermione may have her charms, and I
May love her still, though not her father's slave.
I may, in time, give proofs that I'm a lover;
But never must forget that I'm a king.
Meanwhile, sir, you may see fair Helen's
daughter:

I know how near in blood you stand ally'd.
That done, you have my answer, prince. The Greeks,

No doubt, expect your quick return.

[Exit Orestes and Attendant.]

Phoe. Sir, do you send your rival to the princess?

Pyr. I am told that he has lov'd her long.

Phoe. If so,
Have you not cause to fear the smother'd flame
May kindle at her sight, and blaze anew;
And she be wrought to listen to his passion?

Pyr. Ay, let them, Phoenix; let them love their fill:

Let them go hence; let them depart together:
Together let them sail for Sparta; all my ports
Are open to them both. From what constraint, What irksome thoughts, should I then be re-
liev'd!

Phoe. But, sir—

Pyr. I shall another time, good Phoenix,
Unbosom to thee all my thoughts: for see,
Andromache appears. [Exit Phoenix.]

Enter ANDROMACHE and CEPHISA.

May I, madam,
Flatter my hopes so far as to believe
You come to seek me here?

Andro. This way, sir, leads
To those apartments where you guard my son.
Since you permit me, once a day, to visit
All I have left of Hector and of Troy,

I go to weep a few sad moments with him.

I have not yet to-day embrac'd my child;

I have not held him in my widow'd arms.

Pyr. Ah, madam, should the threats of Greece prevail,

You'll have occasion for your tears indeed.

Andro. Alas! what threats? What can alarm the Greeks?

There are no Trojans left.

Pyr. Their hate to Hector

Can never die: the terror of his name

Still shakes their souls, and makes them dread his son.

Andro. A mighty honour for victorious
Greece,

To fear an infant, a poor friendless child!

Who smiles in bondage, nor yet knows himself

The son of Hector, and the slave of Pyrrhus.

Pyr. Weak as he is, the Greeks demand his life,
And send no less than Agamemnon's son
To fetch him hence.

Andro. And, sir, do you comply

With such demands? This blow is aim'd at me.

How should the child avenge his slaughter'd sire?

But, cruel men! they will not have him live

To cheer my heavy heart, and ease my bonds.

I promis'd to myself in him a son,

In him a friend, a husband, and a father.

But I must suffer sorrow heap'd on sorrow,

And still the fatal stroke must come from you.

Pyr. Dry up those tears; I must not see you weep;

And know, I have rejected their demands.

The Greeks already threaten me with war;

But, should they arm, as once they did for Helen,

And hide the Adriatic with their fleets;

Should they prepare a second ten years' siege,

And lay my towers and palaces in dust;

I am determined to defend your son,

And rather die myself than give him up.

But, madam, in the midst of all these dangers,

Will you refuse me a propitious smile?

Hated of Greece, and press'd on every side,

Let me not, madam, while I fight your cause,

Let me not combat with your cruelties,

And count Andromache amongst my foes.

Andro. Consider, sir, how this will sound in Greece!

How can so great a soul betray such weakness?

Let not men say, so generous a design

Was but the transport of a heart in love.

Pyr. Your charms will justify me to the world.

Andro. How can Andromache, a captive queen,

O'erwhelm'd with grief, a burden to herself,

Harbour a thought of love? Alas! what charms

Have these unhappy eyes, by you condemn'd

To weep for ever? Talk of it no more.

To reverence the misfortunes of a foe;

To succour the distress'd; to give the son

To an afflicted mother; to repel

Confederate nations, leagu'd against his life;

Unbrib'd by love, untterrify'd by threats,

To pity, to protect him: these are cares,

These are exploits worthy Achilles' son.

Pyr. Will your resentments, then, endure for ever?

Must Pyrrhus never be forgiven? 'Tis true,

My sword has often reek'd in Phrygian blood,

And carry'd havoc through your royal kindred;

But you, fair princess, amply have aveng'd

Old Priam's vanquish'd house! and all the woes

I brought on them, fall short of what I suffer.
We both have suffer'd in our turns; and now
Our common foes shall teach us to unite.

Andro. Where does the captive not behold
a foe?

Pyr. Forget the term of hatred, and behold
A friend in Pyrrhus. Give me but to hope,
I'll free your son, I'll be a father to him:
Myself will teach him to avenge the Trojans.
I'll go in person to chastise the Greeks,
Both for your wrongs and mine. Inspir'd by you,
What would I not achieve? Again shall Troy
Rise from its ashes: this right arm shall fix
Her seat of empire, and your son shall reign.

Andro. Such dreams of greatness suit not my condition:

His hopes of empire perish'd with his father.
No; thou imperial city, ancient Troy,
Thou pride of Asia, founded by the gods!
Never, oh never, must we hope to see Those bulwarks rise, which Hector could not guard!

Sir, all I wish for is some quiet exile,
Where far from Greece remov'd, and far from
you,

I may conceal my son, and mourn my husband.
Your love creates me envy. Oh, return!
Return to your betroth'd Hermione.

Pyr. Why do you mock me thus? you know, I cannot.

You know my heart is yours; my soul hangs on you;

You take up every wish: my waking thoughts,
And nightly dreams, are all employ'd on you.
'Tis true, Hermione was sent to share
My throne and bed; and would with transport hear

The vows which you neglect.

Andro. She has no Troy,
No Hector to lament: she has not lost
A husband by your conquests. Such a husband!
(Tormenting thought!) whose death alone has
made

Your sire immortal. Pyrrhus and Achilles
Are both grown great by my calamities.

Pyr. Madam, 'tis well! 'tis very well! I find Your will must be obey'd; imperious captive,
It shall. Henceforth I blot you from my mind;
You teach me to forget your charms; to hate you:
For know, inhuman beauty, I have lov'd
Too well to treat you with indifference.
Think well upon it; my disorder'd soul
Wavers between th' extremes of love and rage.
I have been too tame; I will awake to vengeance!
The son shall answer for the mother's scorn.
The Greeks demand him; nor will I endanger
My realms, to pleasure an ungrateful woman.

Andro. Then he must die! alas, my son
must die!

He has no friend, no succour left, beside
His mother's tears, and his own innocence.

Pyr. Go, madam, visit this unhappy son.
The sight of him may bend your stubborn heart,
And turn to softness your unjust disdain.
I shall once more expect your answer. Go;
And think, while you embrace the captive boy,
Think, that his life depends on your resolves.

[Exeunt Pyrrhus and Attendants.]

Andro. I'll go, and in the anguish of my heart,
Weep o'er my child; if he must die, my life
Is wrapt in his; I shall not long survive.
'Tis for his sake that I have suffer'd life,

Groan'd in captivity, and out-liv'd Hector.

Yes, my Astyanax, we'll go together!
Together to the realms of night we'll go! . }
There to thy ravish'd eyes thy sire I'll show, }
And point him out among the shades below. }

[Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE 1.

Enter HERMIONE and CLEONE.

Her. Well, I'll be rul'd, Cleone; I will see him:
I have told Pylades that he may bring him;
But trust me, were I left to my own thoughts,
I should forbid him yet.

Cle. And why forbid him?

Is he not, madam, still the same Orestes?
Orestes, whose return you oft have wish'd?
The man whose sufferings you so late lamented,
And often prais'd his constancy and love?

Her. That love, that constancy, so ill requited,
Upbraids me to myself. I blush to think How I have us'd him, and would shun his presence.

What will be my confusion when he sees me,
Neglected and forsaken, like himself?

Will he not say, is this the scornful maid,
The proud Hermione, that tyranniz'd
In Sparta's court, and triumph'd in her charms?
Her insolence at last is well repaid.

I cannot bear the thought.

Cle. You wrong yourself

With unbecoming fears. He knows to well Your beauty and your worth. Your lover comes not

To offer insults, but to repeat his vows,
And breathe his ardent passion at your feet.
But, madam, what's your royal father's will?
What orders do your letters bring from Sparta?

Her. His orders are, if Pyrrhus still delay
The nuptials, and refuse to sacrifice
This Trojan boy, I should with speed embark,
And with their embassy return to Greece.

Cle. What would you more? Orestes comes in time

To save your honour. Pyrrhus cools apace:
Prevent his falsehood, and forsake him first.

I know you hate him; you have told me so.

Her. Hate him! My injur'd honour bids me hate him.

The ungrateful man, to whom I fondly gave
My virgin heart! the man I lov'd so dearly;
The man I doated on. O, my Cleone!
How is it possible I should not hate him?

Cle. Then give him over, madam. Quit his court,

And with Orestes—

Her. No! I must have time

To work up all my rage; to meditate
A parting full of horror! My revenge
Will be but too much quicken'd by the traitor.

Cle. Do you then wait new insults, new affronts?

To draw you from your father! Then to leave you!
In his own court to leave you, for a captive!
If Pyrrhus can provoke you, he has done it.

Her. Why dost thou heighten my distress?
I fear

To search out my own thoughts, and sound
my heart.

Be blind to what thou seest: believe me cur'd:
Flatter my weakness; tell me I have conquer'd:
Think that my injur'd soul is set against him;

And do thy best to make me think so too.

Cle. Why would you loiter here then?

Her. Let us fly!

Let us be gone! I leave him to his captive!
Let him go kneel, and supplicate his slave.
Let us be gone! But what if he repent?
What, if the perjur'd prince again submit,
And sue for pardon? What, if he renew
His former vows? But, oh, the faithless man!
He slights me; drives me to extremities. However,
I'll stay, Cleone, to perplex their loves:
I'll stay, till, by an open breach of contract,
I make him hateful to the Greeks. Already
Their vengeance have I drawn upon the son;
The second embassy shall claim the mother;
I will redouble all my griefs upon her.

Cle. Ah, madam! whither does your rage transport you?

Andromache, alas! is innocent.

A woman plung'd in sorrow, dead to love;
And when she thinks on Pyrrhus, 'tis with horror.

Her. Would I had done so too! he had not then

Betray'd my easy faith. But I, alas!
Discover'd all the fondness of my soul;
I made no secret of my passion to him,
Nor thought it dangerous to be sincere.
My eyes, my tongue, my actions spoke my heart.

Cle. Well might you speak without reserve, to one

Engag'd to you by solemn oaths and treaties.

Her. His ardour, too, was an excuse to mine:
With other eyes he saw me then. Cleone,
Thou may'st remember, every thing conspir'd
To favour him: my father's wrongs aveng'd;
The Greeks triumphant; fleets of Trojan spoils;
His mighty sire's, his own immortal fame,
His eager love; all, all conspir'd against me.
But I have done; I'll think no more of Pyrrhus:
Orestes wants not merit, and he loves me.
My gratitude, my honour, both plead for him;
And if I've power o'er my own heart, 'tis his.

Cle. Madam, he comes—

Her. Alas! I did not think
He was so near! I wish I might not see him.

Enter ORESTES.

How am I to interpret, sir, this visit?
Is it a compliment of form, or love?

Ores. Madam, you know my weakness.
'Tis my fate

To love unpity'd; to desire to see you;
And still to swear each time shall be the last.
My passion breaks through my repeated oaths,
And every time I visit you I'm perjur'd.
Even now I find my wounds all bleed afresh;
I blush to own it, but I know no cure.
I call the gods to witness, I have tried
Whatever man could do (but tried in vain),
To wear you from my mind. Through stormy seas,

And savage climes, in a whole year of absence,
I courted dangers, and I long'd for death.

Her. Why will you, prince, indulge this mournful tale?

It ill becomes the ambassador of Greece
To talk of dying and of love. Remember.
The kings you represent: shall their revenge
Be disappointed by your ill-tim'd passion?
Discharge your embassy. 'Tis not Orestes
The Greeks desire should die.

Ores. My embassy

Is at an end; for Pyrrhus has refus'd
To give up Hector's son. Some hidden power
Protects the boy.

Her. Faithless, ungrateful man! [Aside.

Ores. I now prepare for Greece; but ere I go,
Would hear my final doom pronounc'd by you.
What do I say? I do already hear it!
My doom is fix'd: I read it in your eyes.

Her. Will you then still despair? be still suspicious?

What have I done? wherein have I been cruel?
'Tis true, you find me in the court of Pyrrhus;
But 'twas my royal father sent me hither.
And who can tell but I have shar'd your griefs?
Have I ne'er wept in secret? never wish'd
To see Orestes?

Ores. Wish'd to see Orestes!

O joy! O ecstasy! My soul's entranc'd!
O charming princess! O transcendant maid!
My utmost wish!—Thus, thus let me express
My boundless thanks!—I never was unhappy.
Am I Orestes?

Her. You are Orestes:

The same, unalter'd, generous, faithful lover;
The prince whom I esteem, whom I lament,
And whom I fain would teach my heart to love.

Ores. Ay, there it is!—I have but your esteem,
While Pyrrhus has your heart.

Her. Believe me, prince,
Were you as Pyrrhus, I should hate you.

Ores. No.

I should be blest, I should be lov'd as he is!
Yet all this while I die by your disdain,
While he neglects your charms, and courts
another.

Her. And who has told you, prince, that I'm neglected?

Has Pyrrhus said—(Oh, I shall go distracted!)
Has Pyrrhus told you so? or is it you
Who think thus meanly of me?—Sir, perhaps,
All do not judge like you.

Ores. Madam, go on;

Insult me still; I'm us'd to bear your scorn.

Her. Why am I told how Pyrrhus loves or hates?—

Go, prince, and arm the Greeks against the rebel;
Let them lay waste his country, rase his towns,
Destroy his fleets, his palaces—himself!

Go, prince, and tell me then how much I love him.

Ores. To hasten his destruction, come
yourself;

And work your royal father to his ruin.

Her. Mean while he weds Andromache.

Ores. Ah, princess!

What is't I hear?

Her. What infamy for Greece,

If he should wed a Phrygian, and a captive!

Ores. Is this your hatred, madam?—'Tis in vain
To hide your passion; every thing betrays it:
Your looks, your speech, your anger, nay,
your silence;

Your love appears in all; your secret flame Breaks out the more, the more you would conceal it.

Her. Your jealousy perverts my meaning still,
And wrests each circumstance to your disquiet:
My very hate is construed into fondness.

Ores. Impute my fears, if groundless, to my love.

Her. Then hear me, prince. Obedience to a father

First brought me hither; and the same obedience
 Detains me here, till Pyrrhus drive me hence,
 Or my offended father shall recall me.
 Tell this proud king that Menelaus scorns
 To match his daughter with a foe of Greece:
 Bid him resign Astyanax or me.
 If he persists to guard the hostile boy,
 Hermione embarks with you for Sparta.

[Exeunt Hermione and Cleone.]

Ores. Then is Orestes blest! my griefs are fled!
 Fled like a dream!—Methinks I tread in air!
 Pyrrhus, enamour'd of his captive queen,
 Will thank me, if I take her rival hence.
 He looks not on the princess with my eyes.
 Surprising happiness! unlook'd-for joy!
 Never let love despair. The prize is mine!
 Be smooth, ye seas, and ye propitious winds,
 Breathe from Epirus to the Spartan coasts!
 I long to view the sails unfurl'd!—But see!
 Pyrrhus approaches in a happy hour.

Enter PYRRHUS and PHOENIX.

Pyr. I was in pain to find you, prince.
 My warm,

Ungovern'd temper would not let me weigh
 The importance of your embassy, and hear
 You argue for my good. I was to blame.
 I since have pois'd your reasons: and I thank
 My good allies: their care deserves my thanks.
 You have convinc'd me, that the weal of Greece,
 My father's honour, and my own repose,
 Demand that Hector's race should be destroy'd.
 I shall deliver up Astyanax,
 And you yourself shall bear the victim hence.

Ores. If you approve it, sir, and are content
 To spill the blood of a defenceless child,
 The offended Greeks, no doubt, will be pleas'd.

Pyr. Closer to strain the knot of our alliance,
 I have determin'd to espouse Hermione.
 You come in time to grace our nuptial rites:
 In you the kings of Greece will all be present,
 And you have right to personate her father,
 As his ambassador and brother's son.
 Go, prince, renew your visit; tell Hermione,
 To-morrow I receive her from your hands.

Ores. Oh, change of fortune! Oh, undone
 Orestes! [Aside, and exit.]

Pyr. Well, Phoenix! am I still a slave to love?
 What think'st thou now? Am I myself again?

Phoe. 'Tis as it should be; this discovers Pyrrhus;

Shows all the hero: now you are yourself—
 The son, the rival of the great Achilles!
 Greece will applaud you, and the world confess
 Pyrrhus has conquer'd Troy a second time!

Pyr. Nay, Phoenix, now I but begin to triumph;

I never was a conqueror till now.
 Believe me, a whole host, a war of foes,
 May sooner be subdu'd than love. Oh, Phoenix!
 What ruin have I shunn'd? The Greeks, enrag'd,
 Hung o'er me like a gathering storm, and soon
 Had burst in thunder on my head; while I
 Abandon'd duty, empire, honour, all,
 To please a thankless woman!—One kind look
 Had quite undone me!

Phoe. O, my royal master!

The gods, in favour to you, made her cruel.

Pyr. Thou saw'st with how much scorn she treated me!

When I permitted her to see her son,
 I hop'd it might have work'd her to my wishes;

I went to see the mournful interview,
 And found her bath'd in tears and lost in passion.
 Wild with distress, a thousand times she call'd
 On Hector's name: and when I spoke in comfort,
 And promis'd my protection to her son,
 She kiss'd the boy, and call'd again on Hector.
 Does she then think that I preserve the boy,
 To sooth and keep alive her flame for Hector?

Phoe. No doubt she does; and thinks you favour'd in it;

But let her go, for an ungrateful woman!

Pyr. I know the thoughts of her proud stubborn heart:

Vain of her charms, and insolent in beauty,
 She mocks my rage; and when it threatens loudest,

Expects 'twill soon be humbled into love.
 But we shall change our parts, and she shall find
 I can be deaf like her, and steel my heart.
 She's Hector's widow; I, Achilles' son!
 Pyrrhus is born to hate Andromache.

Phoe. My royal master, talk of her no more;
 I do not like this anger. Your Hermione Should now engross your thoughts. 'Tis time to see her;

'Tis time you should prepare the nuptial rites,
 And not rely upon a rival's care:

It may be dangerous.

Pyr. But tell me, Phoenix,
 Dost thou not think the proud Andromache
 Will be enrag'd, when I shall wed the princess?

Phoe. Why does Andromache still haunt your thoughts?

What is't to you, be she enrag'd or pleas'd?
 Let her name perish—think of her no more.

Pyr. No, Phoenix, I have been too gentle with her;

I have check'd my wrath, and stifled my resentment:

She knows not yet to what degree I hate her.
 Let us return. I'll brave her to her face:

I'll give my anger its free course against her.
 Thou shalt see, Phoenix, how I'll break her pride.

Phoe. Oh, go not, sir! There's ruin in her eyes!

You do not know your strength. You'll fall before her,

Adore her beauty, and revive her scorn.

Pyr. That were indeed a most unmanly weakness!

Thou dost not know me, Phoenix.

Phoe. Ah, my prince!

You are still struggling in the toils of love.

Pyr. Canst thou then think I love this woman still?

One who repays my passion with disdain!
 A stranger, captive, friendless and forlorn;
 She and her darling son within my power;
 Her life a forfeit to the Greeks: yet I
 Preserve her son, would take her to my throne,
 Would fight her battles, and avenge her wrongs;
 And all this while she treats me as her foe!

Phoe. You have it in your power to be reveng'd.

Pyr. Yes, and I'll show my power! I'll give her cause

To hate me! her Astyanax shall die.

What tears will then be shed! How will she then
 In bitterness of heart reproach my name!

Then, to complete her woes, will I espouse
 Hermione—'twill stab her to the heart!

Phoe. Alas, you threaten like a lover still!

Pyr. Phoenix, excuse this struggle of my soul;
Tis the last effort of expiring love.

Phoe. Then hasten, sir, to see the Spartan
princess,
And turn the bent of your desires on her.

Pyr. Oh! 'tis a heavy task to conquer love,
And wean the soul from her accustom'd fondness.
But come—a long farewell to Hector's widow.
'Tis with a secret pleasure I look back,
And see the many dangers I have pass'd.
The merchant thus, in dreadful tempests tost,
Thrown by the waves on some unlook'd-for coast,
Oft turns, and sees, with a delighted eye,
Midst rocks and shelves the broken billows fly!
And, while the outrageous winds the deep deform,
Smiles on the tumult, and enjoys the storm.

[Exeunt.

A C T III.

SCENE I.

Enter PYLADES and ORESTES.

Pyl. For heaven's sake, sir, compose your ruffled mind,
And moderate your rage!

Ores. No, Pylades,
This is no time for counsel. I am deaf.
Talk not of reason. I have been too patient.
Life is not worth my care. My soul grows desperate.

I'll bear her off, or perish in th' attempt.
I'll force her from his arms—by heaven, I will!

Pyl. Well, 'tis agreed, my friend—we'll force her hence:

But still consider we are in Epirus.
The court, the guards, Hermione herself,
The very air we breathe, belongs to Pyrrhus.
Good gods! what tempted you to seek her here?

Ores. Lost to myself, I knew not what I did;
My purposes were wild. Perhaps I came
To menace Pyrrhus, and upbraid the woman.

Pyl. This violence of temper may prove fatal.

Ores. It must be more than man to bear
these shocks,

These outrages of fate, with temper.
He tells me that he weds Hermione,
And will to-morrow take her from my hand!
My hand shall sooner tear the tyrant's heart.

Pyl. Your passion blinds you, sir; he's not to blame.

Could you but look into the soul of Pyrrhus,
Perhaps you'll find it tortur'd like your own.

Ores. No, Pylades! 'tis all design. His pride,
To triumph over me, has chang'd his love.

The fair Hermione, before I came,
In all her bloom of beauty, was neglected.

Ah, cruel gods! I thought her all my own!
She was consenting to return to Sparta:

Her heart, divided betwixt rage and love,
Was on the wing to take its leave of Pyrrhus.

She heard my sighs, she pitied my complaints,
She prais'd my constancy. The least indifference

From this proud king, had made Orestes happy!

Pyl. So your fond heart believes!
Think not to force her hence;

But fly yourself from her destructive charms.

Ores. Talk no more!
I cannot bear the thought! She must be mine!

Did Pyrrhus carry thunder in his hand,
I'd stand the bolt, and challenge all his fury,

Ere I resign Hermione. By force
I'll snatch her hence, and bear her to my ships.

Have we forgot her mother Helen's rape?

Pyl. Will then Orestes turn a ravisher,
And blot his embassy?

Ores. O, Pylades!
My grief weighs heavy on me—'twill distract me!
The gods have set me as their mark, to empty
Their quivers on me. Leave me to myself.

Mine be the danger, mine the enterprize.
All I request of thee, is to return,

And in my place convey Astyanax
(As Pyrrhus has consented) into Greece.

Go, Pylades—

Pyl. Lead on, my friend, lead on!
Let us bear off Hermione! No toil,

No danger can deter a friend. Lead on!
Draw up the Greeks, summon your num'rous train;

The ships are ready, and the wind sits fair:

There eastward lies the sea; the rolling waves
Break on those palace-stairs. I know each pass,

Each avenue and outlet of the court.
This very night we'll carry her on board.

Ores. Thou art too good! I trespass on thy friendship:

But, oh! excuse a wretch, whom no man pities,
Except thyself: one, just about to lose

The treasure of his soul: whom all mankind
Conspire to hate, and one who hates himself.

When will my friendship be of use to thee?

Pyl. The question is unkind. But now,
remember,

To keep your counsels close, and hide your
thoughts;

Let not Hermione suspect. No more—
I see her coming, sir.

Ores. Away, my friend;
I am advis'd; my all depends upon it.

[Exit Pylades.

Enter HERMIONE and CLEONE.

Madam, your orders are obey'd; I have seen
Pyrrhus, my rival; and have gain'd him for you.

The king resolves to wed you.

Her. So I am told;
And, further, I am inform'd, that you, Orestes,

Are to dispose me for the intended marriage.

Ores. And are you, madam, willing to comply?

Her. What can I do? alas! my faith is promis'd:

Can I refuse what is not mine to give?
A princess is not at her choice to love;

All we have left us is a blind obedience:
And yet you see how far I had comply'd,

And made my duty yield to your entreaties.

Ores. Ah, cruel maid! you knew—but I have done.

All have a right to please themselves in love.
I blame you not. 'Tis true, I hop'd—but you

Are mistress of your heart, and I'm content.
'Tis fortune is my enemy, not you.

But, madam, I shall spare you further pain
On this uneasy theme, and take my leave.

[Exit.

Her. Cleone, couldst thou think he'd be so calm?

Cle. Madam, his silent grief sits heavy on him.
He is to be pitied. His too eager love

Has made him busy to his own destruction.
His threats have wrought this change of mind in Pyrrhus.

Her. Dost thou think Pyrrhus capable of fear?
Whom should the intrepid Pyrrhus fear? The Greeks?

Did he not lead their harass'd troops to conquest,
When they despair'd, when they retir'd from Troy,

And sought for shelter in their burning fleets?
Did he not then supply his father's place?
No, my Cleone, he is above constraint;
He acts unforc'd; and where he weds, he loves.

Cle. Oh, that Orestes had remain'd in Greece!
I fear to-morrow will prove fatal to him.

Her. Wilt thou discourse of nothing but Orestes?

Pyrrhus is mine again! Is mine for ever!
Oh, my Cleone, I am wild with joy!
Pyrrhus, the bold, the brave, the godlike Pyrrhus!
Oh, I could tell thee numberless exploits,
And tire thee with his battles. Oh, Cleone—

Cle. Madam, conceal your joy—I see Andromache—

She weeps, and comes to speak her sorrows to you.

Her. I would indulge the gladness of my
heart!

Let us retire—Her grief is out of season.

Enter ANDROMACHE and CEPHISA.

Andro. Ah, madam! whither, whither do you fly?

Where can your eyes behold a sight more pleasing

Than Hector's widow, suppliant and in tears?
I come not an alarm'd, a jealous foe,
To envy you the heart your charms have won—
The only man I sought to please, is gone;
Kill'd in my sight, by an inhuman hand.

Hector first taught me love; which my fond heart
Shall ever cherish, till we meet in death.

But, oh, I have a son! And you, one day,
Will be no stranger to a mother's fondness:

But heaven forbid that you should ever know
A mother's sorrow for an only son,

Her joy, her bliss, her last surviving comfort!
When every hour she trembles for his life!

Your power o'er Pyrrhus may relieve my fears.
Alas, what danger is there in a child,

Sav'd from the wreck of a whole ruin'd empire?
Let me go hide him in some desert isle:

You may rely upon my tender care
To keep him far from perils of ambition:

All he can learn of me will be to weep!

Her. Madam, 'tis easy to conceive your grief;
But it would ill become me to solicit

In contradiction to my father's will:
'Tis he who urges to destroy your son.

Madam, if Pyrrhus must be wrought to pity,
No woman does it better than yourself.

If you gain him, I shall comply of course.
[Exit with Cleone.]

Andro. Didst thou not mind with what disdain she spoke?

Youth and prosperity have made her vain;
She has not seen the fickle turns of life.

Ceph. Madam, were I as you I'd take her counsel;

I'll speak my own distress: one look from you
Will vanquish Pyrrhus, and confound the Greeks—

See, where he comes. Lay hold on this occasion.

Enter PYRRHUS and PHOENIX.

Pyr. Where is the princess? Did you not inform me

Hermione was here? [To Phoenix.]

Phoe. I thought so, sir.

Andro. Thou seest what mighty power my eyes have on him!

[To Cephisa.]

Pyr. What says she, Phoenix?

Andro. I have no hope left!

Phoe. Let us be gone—Hermione expects you.

Ceph. For heaven's sake, madam, break this sullen silence.

Andro. My child's already promis'd. [Apart.]

Ceph. But not given, [Apart.]

Andro. No, no!—My tears are vain!—His doom is fix'd! [Apart.]

Pyr. See if she deigns to cast one look upon us.
Proud woman!

Andro. I provoke him by my presence.
Let us retire.

Pyr. Come, let us satisfy
The Greeks, and give them up this Phrygian boy.

Andro. Ah, sir, recall those words!—What have you said?

If you give up my son, oh, give up me!
You, who so many times have sworn me

friendship,
Oh, heavens! will you not look with pity on me?

Is there no hope? Is there no room for pardon?
Pyr. Phoenix will answer you—my word is pass'd.

Andro. You, who would brave so many dangers for me.

Pyr. I was your lover then, I now am free.
To favour you, I might have spar'd his life;

But you would ne'er vouchsafe to ask it of me.
Now 'tis too late.

Andro. Oh, sir, excuse
The pride of royal blood, that checks my soul,

And knows not how to be importunate.
You know, alas! I was not born to kneel,

To sue for pity, and to own a master.
Pyr. No, in your heart you curse me! you disdain

My gen'rous flame, and scorn to be oblig'd.

But I shall leave you to your great resentments.
Let us go, Phoenix, and appease the Greeks.

Andro. Then let me die, and let me go to Hector.

Ceph. But, madam—
Andro. What can I do more? The tyrant

Sees my distraction, and insults my tears.
[To Cephisa.]

Behold, how low you have reduc'd a queen!
These eyes have seen my country laid in ashes,

My kindred fall in war, my father slain,
My husband dragg'd in his own blood, my son

Condemn'd to bondage, and myself a slave;
Yet, in the midst of these unheard-of woes,

'Twas some relief to find myself your captive;
And that my son, deriv'd from ancient kings,

Since he must serve, had Pyrrhus for his master.
When Priam kneel'd, the great Achilles wept:

I hop'd I should not find his son less noble.
I thought the brave were still the more compassionate.

Oh, do not, sir, divide me from my child!

If he must die—
Pyr. Phoenix, withdraw awhile.

[Exit Phoenix.]
Rise, madam. Yet you may preserve your son.

I find, whenever I provoke your tears,
I furnish you with arms against myself.

I thought my hatred fix'd before I saw you.
Oh, turn your eyes upon me while I speak!

And see if you discover in my looks
An angry judge, or an obdurate foe.
Why will you force me to desert your cause?
In your son's name I beg we may be friends!
Think, oh think,
(Tis the last time) you both may yet be happy!
I know the ties I break, the foes I arm;
I wrong Hermione; I send her hence;
And with her diadem I blind your brows.
Consider well; for 'tis of moment to you.
Choose to be wretched, madam, or a queen.
I leave you to your thoughts. When I return,
We'll to the temple. There you'll find your son;
And there be crown'd, or give him up for ever.

[Exit.

Ceph. I told you, madam, that, in spite of Greece,

You would o'errule the malice of your fortune.

Andro. Alas, Cephisa, what have I obtain'd?
Only a poor short respite for my son.

Ceph. You have enough approv'd your faith to Hector;

To be reluctant still would be a crime.

He would himself persuade you to comply.

Andro. How! wouldst thou give me Pyrrhus for a husband?

Ceph. Think you 'twill please the ghost of your dead husband,

That you should sacrifice his son? Consider,
Pyrrhus once more invites you to a throne;
Turns all his power against the foes of Troy,
Remembers not Achilles was his father,
Retracts his conquests, and forgets his hatred.

Andro. But how can I forget it? how can I Forget my Hector, treated with dishonour,
Depriv'd of funeral rites, and vilely dragg'd,
A bloody corpse, about the walls of Troy?

Can I forget the good old king, his father,
Slain in my presence—at the altar slain;
Which vainly for protection he embrac'd?

Hast thou forgot that dreadful night, Cephisa,
When a whole people fell? Methinks I see
Pyrrhus, enrag'd and breathing vengeance, enter
Amidst the glare of burning palaces:

I see him hew his passage through my brothers,
And, bath'd in blood, lay all my kindred waste.
Think, in this scene of horror, what I suffer'd!

This is the courtship I receiv'd from Pyrrhus;
And this the husband thou wouldst give me! No,
We both will perish first! I'll ne'er consent.

Ceph. Since you resolve Astyanax shall die,
Haste to the temple, bid your son farewell.—
Why do you tremble, madam?

Andro. O Cephisa!

Thou hast awaken'd all the mother in me.
How can I bid farewell to the dear child,
The pledge, the image of my much-lov'd lord!
But, oh! while I deliberate, he dies.

No, no, thou must not die, while I can save thee:
Oh! let me find out Pyrrhus—Oh, Cephisa!
Do you go find him.

Ceph. What must I say to him?

Andro. Tell him I love my son to such excess—

But dost thou think he means the child shall die?
Can love rejected turn to so much rage?

Ceph. Madam, he'll soon be here. Resolve on something.

Andro. Well then, assure him—

Ceph. Madam, of your love?

Andro. Alas, thou know'st that is not in my power.

Oh, my dead lord! Oh, Priam's royal house!

Oh, my Astyanax! at what a price

Thy mother buys thee!—Let us go.

Ceph. But whither?

And what does your unsettled heart resolve?

Andro. Come, my Cephisa, let us go together

To the sad monument which I have rais'd

To Hector's shade; where, in their sacred urn,

The ashes of my hero lie enclos'd,

The dear remains which I have sav'd from Troy;

There let me weep, there summon to my aid,

With pious rites, my Hector's awful shade;

Let him be witness to my doubts, my fears;

My agonizing heart, my flowing tears:

Oh! may he rise in pity from his tomb,

And fix his wretched son's uncertain doom.

[Exeunt.

A C T IV.

SCENE I.

Enter HERMIONE and CLEONE.

Cle. This unexpected silence, this reserve,
This outward calm, this settled frame of mind,
After such wrongs and insults, much surprise me!

You, who before could not command your rage,
When Pyrrhus look'd but kindly on his captive;

How can you bear unmov'd, that he should wed her,

And seat her on a throne which you should fill?

I fear this dreadful stillness in your soul!

'Twere better, madam—

Her. Have you call'd Orestes?

Cle. Madam, I have; his love is too impatient

Not to obey with speed the welcome summons.

His love-sick heart o'erlooks his unkind usage:

His ardour's still the same.—Madam, he's here.

Enter ORESTES.

Ores. Ah, madam, is it true? does then Orestes
At length attend you by your own commands?

What can I do?

Her. Orestes, do you love me?

Ores. What means that question, princess?

Do I love you?

My oaths, my perjuries, my hopes, my fears,
My farewell, my return—all speak my love.

Her. Avenge my wrongs, and I'll believe them all.

Ores. It shall be done. My soul has caught
th' alarm.

We'll spirit up the Greeks; I'll lead them on:

Your cause shall animate our fleets and armies.

Let us return; let us not lose a moment,

But urge the fate of this devoted land:

Let us depart.

Her. No, prince, let us stay here!

I will have vengeance here; I will not carry

This load of infamy to Greece, not trust

The chance of war to vindicate my wrongs.

Ere I depart, I'll make Epirus mourn.

If you avenge me, let it be this instant;

My rage brooks no delay; haste to the temple,

Haste, prince, and sacrifice him.

Ores. Whom?

Her. Why, Pyrrhus.

Ores. Pyrrhus! Did you say Pyrrhus?

Her. You demur.—

Oh, fly! be gone! give me not time to think.

Talk not of laws—he tramples on all laws.

Let me not hear him justified—away!

Ores. You cannot think I'll justify my rival.

Madam, your love has made him criminal.

You shall have vengeance; I'll have vengeance too:

But let our hatred be profess'd and open:
Let us alarm all Greece, denounce a war;
Let us attack him in his strength, and hunt
him down

By conquest. Should I turn base assassin,
'Twould sully all the kings I represent.

Her. Have not I been dishonour'd, set at nought,
Expos'd to public scorn?—And will you suffer
The tyrant, who dares use me thus, to live?
Know, prince, I hate him more than once I lov'd
him.

The gods alone can tell how once I lov'd him:
Yes, the false, perjur'd man, I once did love him;
And, spite of all his crimes and broken vows,
If he should live, I may relapse—who knows
But I to-morrow may forgive his wrongs?

Ores. First let me tear him piecemeal. He shall die.

But, madam, give me leisure to contrive
The place, the time, the manner of his death:
Yet I'm a stranger in the court of Pyrrhus;
Scarce have I set my foot within Epirus,
When you enjoin me to destroy the prince.
It shall be done this very night.

Her. But now,
This very hour, he weds Andromache;
The temple shines with pomp, the golden throne
Is now prepar'd, the joyful rites begin;
My shame is public—Oh, be speedy, prince!
My wrath's impatient—Pyrrhus lives too long!
Intent on love, and heedless of his person,
He covers with his guards the Trojan boy.
Now is the time; assemble all your Greeks;
Mine shall assist them; let their fury loose:
Already they regard him as a foe.

Be gone, Orestes! kill the faithless tyrant;
My love shall recompense the glorious deed.

Ores. Consider, madam—

Her. You but mock my rage!

I was contriving how to make you happy.
Think you to merit by your idle sighs,
And not attest your love by one brave action?
Go, with your boasted constancy! and leave
Hermione to execute her own revenge.
I blush to think how my too easy faith
Has twice been baffled in one shameful hour!

Ores. Hear me but speak!—You know I'll die to serve you!

Her. I'll go myself; I'll stab him at the altar;
Then drive the poniard, reeking with his blood,
Through my own heart. In death we shall unite.
Better to die with him, than live with you!

Ores. That were to make him blest, and me more wretched.

Madam, he dies by me. Have you a foe,
And shall I let him live? My rival too!
Ere yon meridian sun declines, he dies;
And you shall say that I deserve your love.

Her. Go, prince; strike home! and leave the rest to me.

Let all your ships stand ready for our flight.

[Exit Orestes.]

Cle. Madam, you'll perish in this bold attempt.

Her. Give me my vengeance, I'm content to perish.

I was to blame to trust it with another:
In my own hands it had been more secure.
Orestes hates not Pyrrhus as I hate him.
Oh, would Orestes, when he gives the blow,
Tell him he dies my victim!—Haste, Cleone,

Charge him to say, Hermione's resentments,
Not those of Greece, have sentenc'd him to death.
Haste, my Cleone! My revenge is lost,
If Pyrrhus knows not that he dies by me!

Cle. I shall obey your orders.—But I see
The king approach.—Who could expect him
here?

Her. O fly, Cleone, fly! and bid Orestes
Not to proceed a step before I see him.

[Exit Cleone.]

Enter PYRRHUS.

Pyr. Madam, I ought to shun an injur'd
princess.

Your distant looks reproach me; and I come
Not to defend, but to avow my guilt.

Pyrrhus will ne'er approve his own injustice,
Nor form excuses while his heart condemns him.
Discharge your anger on this perjur'd man!
For I abhor my crime, and should be pleas'd
To hear you speak your wrongs aloud: no terms,
No bitterness of wrath, nor keen reproach,
Will equal half the upbraidings of my heart.

Her. I find, sir, you can be sincere: you scorn
To act your crimes with fear, like other men.
A hero should be bold, above all laws;
Be bravely false, and laugh at solemn ties.

To be perfidious shows a daring mind!
And you have nobly triumph'd o'er a maid!

To court me—to reject me—to return—
Then to forsake me for a Phrygian slave—
To lay proud Troy in ashes; then to raise
The son of Hector, and renounce the Greeks,
Are actions worthy the great soul of Pyrrhus!

Pyr. Madam, go on! Give your resentment birth,

And pour forth all your indignation on me.

Her. 'Twould please your queen, should I upbraid your falsehood;

Call you perfidious, traitor, all the names
That injur'd virgins lavish on your sex;
I should o'erflow with tears, and die with grief,
And furnish out a tale to sooth her pride;
But, sir, I would not overcharge her joys.
If you would charm Andromache, recount
Your bloody battles, your exploits, your slaughters,

Your great achievements in her father's palace.
She needs must love the man, who fought so bravely,

And in her sight slew half her royal kindred!

Pyr. With horror I look back on my past
deeds!

I punish'd Helen's wrongs too far; I shed Too much of blood: but, madam, Helen's daughter

Should not object those ills the mother caus'd.
However, I'm pleas'd to find you hate me;
I was too forward to accuse myself;

The man who ne'er was lov'd, can ne'er be false.
Obedience to a father brought you hither;
And I stood bound by promise to receive you:
But our desires were different ways inclin'd;
And you, I own, were not oblig'd to love me.

Her. Have I not lov'd you then! perfidious man?
For you I slighted all the Grecian princes;
Forsook my father's house; conceal'd my wrongs,
When most provok'd; would not return to Sparta,

In hopes that time might fix your wavering heart.
I lov'd you when inconstant; and even now,
Inhuman king! that you pronounce my death

My heart still doubts if I should love or hate you—
But, oh, since you resolve to wed another,
Defer your cruel purpose till to-morrow,
That I may not be here to grace your triumph!
This is the last request I e'er shall make you.
See, if the barbarous prince vouchsafes an answer!

Go, then, to the lov'd Phrygian; hence! be gone!
And bear to her those vows that once were mine:
Go, in defiance to the avenging gods!
Be gone! the priest expects you at the altar;
But, tyrant, have a care I come not thither. [Exit.]

Enter PHOENIX.

Phoc. Sir, did you mind her threats? your life's in danger:

There is no trifling with a woman's rage.
The Greeks that swarm about the court, all hate you;

Will treat you as their country's enemy,
And join in her revenge: besides, Orestes
Still loves her to distraction. Sir, I beg—

Pyr. How, Phoenix, should I fear a woman's threats?

A nobler passion takes up all my thoughts:
I must prepare to meet Andromache.

Do thou place all my guards about her son:
If he be safe, Pyrrhus is free from fear. [Exit.]

Phoc. Oh, Pyrrhus! oh, what pity 'tis, the gods,
Who fill'd thy soul with every kingly virtue,
Form'd thee for empire and consummate
greatness,

Should leave thee so expos'd to wild desires,
That hurry thee beyond the bounds of reason!
[Flourish.]

But see, the queen,
Magnificent in royal pride, appears.
I must obey, and guard her son from danger.
[Exit.]

Enter ANDROMACHE and CEPHISA.

Ceph. Madam, once more you look and move a queen.

Your sorrows are dispers'd, your charms revive,
And every faded beauty blooms anew.

Andro. Yet all is not as I could wish, Cephisa.

Ceph. You see the king is watchful o'er your son;

Decks him with princely robes, with guards surrounds him.

Astyanax begins to reign already.

Andro. Pyrrhus is nobly minded; and I fain
Would live to thank him for Astyanax:

'Tis a vain thought. However, since my child
Has such a friend, I ought not to repine.

Ceph. These dark unfoldings of your soul
perplex me.

For heaven's sake, madam, let me know your griefs.

If you distrust my faith—

Andro. That were to wrong thee.

Oh, my Cephisa! This gay, borrow'd air,
This blaze of jewels, and this bridal dress,
Are but mock trappings, to conceal my woe:
My heart still mourns; I still am Hector's widow.

Ceph. Will you then break the promise
giv'n to Pyrrhus,

Blow up his rage again, and blast your hopes?

Andro. I thought, Cephisa, thou hadst known thy mistress.

Couldst thou believe I would be false to Hector?
Fall off from such a husband! Break his rest,

And call him to this hated light again,
To see Andromache in Pyrrhus' arms?
Would Hector, were he living, and I dead,
Forget Andromache, and wed her foe?

Ceph. I cannot guess what drift your thoughts pursue;

But, oh, I fear there's something dreadful in it!
Must then Astyanax be doom'd to die,
And you to linger out a life in bondage?

Andro. Know then the secret purpose of
my soul:

Andromache will not be false to Pyrrhus,
Nor violate her sacred love to Hector.

This hour I'll meet the king; the holy priest
Shall join us, and confirm our mutual vows.

This will secure a father to my child:

That done, I have no further use for life:

This pointed dagger, this determin'd hand,
Shall save my virtue, and conclude my woes.

Cephisa, thou

Wilt lend a hand to close thy mistress' eyes.

Ceph. Oh, never think that I will stay behind
you!

Andro. No, my Cephisa, I must have thee live.

I must commit into thy faithful hands

All that is dear and precious to my soul.

Live, and supply my absence to my child;

All that remains of Troy; a future progeny

Of heroes, and a distant line of kings,

In him, is all intrusted to thy care.

Tell him my soul repos'd itself on him,

When I resign'd my son to his protection.

Ceph. Oh, for a spirit to support my grief!
Is there aught more, before you go for ever?

Andro. Oh, my Cephisa! my swoln heart is full!

I have a thousand farewells to my son—

But tears break in! Grief interrupts my speech!

My soul o'erflows in fondness! Let him know
I died to save him—and would die again.

Season his mind with early hints of glory;

Make him acquainted with his ancestors;

Trace out their shining story in his thoughts;

Dwell on the exploits of his immortal father;

And sometimes let him hear his mother's name.

He must be taught to stifle his resentments,

And sacrifice his vengeance to his safety.

Should he prove headstrong, rash, or unadvis'd,

He then will frustrate all his mother's virtue,

Provoke his fate, and I shall die in vain.

Ceph. Alas, I fear I never shall outlive you!

Andro. No more; thy tears, Cephisa, will betray me;

Assume a cheerful look. But still remember—

[Flourish within.]

Hark how the trumpet, with its sprightly notes,

Proclaims th'appointed hour, and calls us hence:

Hector, I come once more a queen, to join thee!

Thus the gay victim, with fresh garlands crown'd,

Pleas'd with the sacred fire's enlivening sound,

Through gazing crowds, in solemn state proceeds,

And dress'd in fatal pomp magnificently bleeds.

[Exeunt.]

A C T V.

SCENE I.

Enter HERMIONE.

Her. What have I done? Where am I?

Where is Pyrrhus?

O ye gods! what mean these horrors? I'm undone

My soul is on the rack! I cannot bear it

Why do I wander like some guilty ghost?

What brought me to this place? What keeps me here?

The court of Pyrrhus has no room for me!
Do I still doubt if I should love or hate him?
Hard-hearted man! how unconcern'd he left me!
Did he once sigh? bestow one pitying look?
Once shed a tear? or speak one soft, kind word?
Did he so much as feign one moment's sorrow,
To calm my grief, and mitigate his falsehood?
Why am I still thus anxious for his life?
Why do I start at his impending fate?
Shall he then live? Shall the base traitor live
To laugh at my distress? No, let him perish!
Be quick, Orestes! Execute my orders!
Alas! my orders! Oh, preposterous guilt!
Can I decree the death of him I love?
Was it for this my soul delighted in him?
Was it for this I left my father's court?
Have I then cross'd so many realms and seas
To murder Pyrrhus?

Enter CLEONE.

Oh, Cleone, help me!
What have I done? Is Pyrrhus yet alive?
What say'st thou? Answer me. Where is the king?

Cle. Madam, I saw the cruel prince set forward,
Triumphant in his looks, and full of joy.
Still as he walk'd, his ravish'd eyes were fix'd
On the fair captive; while through shouting crowds

She pass'd along with a dejected air,
And seem'd to mourn her Hector to the last.

Her. Insulting tyrant! I shall burst with rage!
But say, Cleone, didst thou mark him well?
Was his brow smooth? Say, did there not appear
Some shade of grief? some little cloud of sorrow?
Did he not stop? Did he not once look back?
Didst thou approach him? Was he not confounded?

Did he not—Oh, be quick, and tell me all!

Cle. Madam, the tumult of his joy admits
No thought but love. Unguarded he march'd on,
'Midst a promiscuous throng of friends and foes,
His cares all turn upon Astyanax,
Whom he has lodg'd within the citadel,
Defended by the strength of all his guards.

Her. Enough! he dies! the traitor! Where's Orestes?

Cle. He's in the temple, with his whole retinue.

Her. Is he still resolute? Is he still determin'd?

Cle. Madam, I fear—

Her. How? Is Orestes false?

Does he betray me too?

Cle. A thousand doubts
Perplex his soul, and wound him with remorse;
His virtue and his love prevail by turns.
He told me Pyrrhus should not fall ignobly;
Pyrrhus, the warlike son of great Achilles,
He dreads the censure of the Grecian states,
Of all mankind, and fears to stain his honour.

Her. Poor tim'rous wretch! 'tis false! he basely fears

To cope with dangers, and encounter death!
'Tis that he fears. Am I bright Helen's daughter?
To vindicate her wrongs all Greece conspir'd;
For her confederate nations fought, and kings
were slain;

Troy was o'erthrown, and a whole empire fell.
My eyes want force to raise a lover's arm
Against a tyrant that has dar'd to wrong me!

Cle. Madam, like Helen, trust your cause to Greece.

Her. No; I'll avenge myself; I'll to the temple;
I'll overturn the altar, stab the priest;
I'll hurl destruction, like a whirlwind, round me!
They must not wed! they must not live! they shall not!

Let me be gone; I have no time to lose;
Stand off! hold me not! I am all distraction!
O Pyrrhus! tyrant! traitor! thou shalt bleed.

Enter ORESTES.

Ores. Madam, 'tis done: your orders are obey'd:

The tyrant lies expiring at the altar.

Her. Is Pyrrhus slain?

Ores. Even now he gasps in death.

Our Greeks, all undistinguish'd in the crowd,
Flock'd to the temple and dispers'd themselves
On every side the altar: I was there:
Pyrrhus observ'd me with a haughty eye,
And, proud to triumph over Greece in me,
From his own brows he took the diadem,
And bound it on the temples of his captive.
Receive, said he, my crown; receive my faith;
Mine and my people's sovereign reign for ever.
From this blest hour, a father to your son,
I'll scourge his foes: henceforward be he styl'd
The Trojan king: I swear it at the altar,
And call the gods to ratify my vows.
His subjects with loud acclamations shook
The spacious dome! our Greeks enrag'd cry'd out
"Revenge! revenge!" broke through the thronging press,

And rush'd tumultuous on the, unguarded king.
Pyrrhus awhile oppos'd their clashing swords,
And dealt his fatal blows on every side
With manly fierceness; till oppress'd by numbers,
Streaming with blood, all over gash'd with
wounds,

He reel'd, he groan'd, and at the altar fell.
Haste, madam, let us fly! haste to our ships!
They lie unmoor'd: our friends attend us there.

Her. What have they done?

Ores. Madam, forgive their rage.

I own your vengeance had been more complete
Had Pyrrhus fall'n by me; and had he known
Hermione chastis'd him by my arm.

Her. Peace, monster, peace! Go tell thy horrid tale

To savages, and howl it out in deserts.
Wouldst thou impute to me thy barbarous guilt?
Me wouldst thou make th' accomplice of thy crimes?

Hence, to thy Greeks, and boast thy foul exploits!

My soul abhors them! I disclaim the deed.
Be gone! I know thee not, thou fell barbarian!
What had he done? What could provoke thy madness

To assassinate so great, so brave a man?
Who set thee on?

Ores. Oh, grant me patience, heaven!

With your own lips did you not curse the tyrant,
Pronounce his death, and urge me to destroy
him?

Her. What if, transported by my boundless
passion,

I could not bear to see him wed another,
Were you t' obey a jealous woman's frenzy?
You should have div'd into my inmost thoughts:
My heart, though full of rage, was free from malice;

And all my anger was excess of love.
Why did you take me at my word? You saw
The struggles of my soul; you heard me rave:
You should have question'd me a thousand times,
Yet still have doubted, and have question'd on,
Before you ventur'd on a life so precious.

Ores. Hear me but speak. Heaven knows, against my will—

Her. Why did you not return? Why not consult me

A second time? and, undetermin'd still,
Again return, and still find new delays?
What had your rash officious Greeks, dire bloodhounds!

To do with my revenge? What drew you hither?
To bring on me the vengeful foes that haunt you?
Are these the fruits of your detested love?
Your fatal embassy, your hateful presence
Drove Pyrrhus to my rival, and destroys Both him and me. He might have lov'd me still,
Had you ne'er interpos'd. Avaunt! be gone!
And leave me in Epirus. I renounce
My friends, my country, Greece, and all mankind:

But chiefly I renounce thee! monster, thee!

[Exit.

Ores. Am I awake? where am I? Soft,
my soul;

Be not too rash. Was that Hermione?
Why should her anger thunder against me?
Was not this blood shed all by her command?
I am indeed a most outrageous monster!
A ruffian, murderer, a base assassin!
And all to please a false ungrateful woman.
Henceforward let the laws of nature cease;
And let the pale that severs right and wrong,
Things sacred and profane, be broken down;
Gods in their temples, kings upon their thrones,
Are not in safety while Orestes lives.
Oh, never more shall my torn mind be heal'd,
Nor taste the gentle comforts of repose!
A dreadful band of gloomy cares surround me,
And lay strong siege to my distracted soul.

Enter PYLADES, attended by Greeks.

Pyl. Haste, prince; let us be gone: 'tis death to stay.

Andromache reigns queen: she gives the alarm,
And vows revenge upon the foes of Pyrrhus.
The people arm and muster in the streets:
Our Greeks will not be able long to guard
The palace gates, and to secure our flight.
We must be speedy, sir.

Ores. You may depart,
My friends: Hermione and I remain.
Her cruelty has quite undone me. Go.

Pyl. Alas, unhappy princess! she's no more.

Ores. Hermione no more! O, all ye powers!

Pyl. Full of disorder, wildness in her looks,
With hands expanded, and dishevell'd hair,
Breathless and pale, with shrieks she sought
the temple;

In the mid-way she met the corpse of Pyrrhus:
She startled at the sight; then, stiff with horror,
Gaz'd frightful! Waken'd from the dire amaze,
She rais'd her eyes to heaven with such a look
As spoke her sorrows, and reproach'd the gods;
Then plung'd a poniard deep within her breast,
And fell on Pyrrhus, grasping him in death.

Ores. I thank you, gods: I never could expect
To be so wretched! You have been industrious
To finish your decrees; to make Orestes

A dreadful instance of your power to punish.
I'm singled out to bear the wrath of heaven.

Pyl. You hazard your retreat by these delays.
The guards will soon beset us. Your complaints
Are vain, and may be fatal.

Ores. True, my friend:
And therefore 'twas I thank'd the bounteous gods.
My fate's accomplish'd; I shall die content.
Oh, bear me hence. Blow winds!

Pyl. Let us be gone.

Ores. The murder'd lovers wait me. Hark!
they call.

Nay, if your blood still reeks, I'll mingle mine;
One tomb will hold us all.

Pyl. Alas! I fear
His raving will return with his misfortunes.

Ores. I am dizzy! Clouds! Quite lost in utter darkness!

Guide me, some friendly pilot! through the storm.
I shiver! Oh, I freeze! So—light returns;
'Tis the grey dawn. See, Pylades! behold,
I am encompass'd with a sea of blood!

The crimson billows! Oh, my brain's on fire!

Pyl. How is it, sir? Repose yourself on me.

Ores. Pyrrhus, what wouldst thou? How he glares!

What envious hand has clos'd thy wounds?
Have at thee.

It is Hermione that strikes. Confusion!
She catches Pyrrhus in her arms. Oh, save me!
How terrible she looks! She knits her brow;
She frowns me dead; she frights me into madness.
Where am I? Who are you?

Pyl. Alas, poor prince!
Help to support him. How he pants for breath!

Ores. This is most kind, my Pylades. Oh, why,
Why was I born to give thee endless trouble?

Pyl. All will go well: he settles into reason.

Ores. Who talks of reason? Better to have none,

Than not enough. Run, some one, tell my Greeks
I will not have them touch the king. Now, now!
I blaze again! See there: look where they come;
A shoal of furies. How they swarm about me!
My terror! Hide me! Oh, their snaky locks!
Hark, how they hiss! See, see their flaming brands!
Now they let drive at me! How they grin,
And shake their iron whips! My ears! what yelling!

And see, Hermione! she sets them on.
Thrust not your scorpions thus into my bosom!
Oh, I am stung to death! Dispatch me soon!
There—take my heart, Hermione! Tear it out!
Disjoint me! kill me! Oh, my tortur'd soul!

Pyl. Kind heaven, restore him to his wonted
calm!

Oft have I seen him rave, but never thus.
Quite spent! Assist me, friends, to bear him off.
Our time is short: should his strong rage return,
'T would be beyond our power to force him hence.
Away, my friends! I hear the portal open.

[Exeunt.

Enter PHOENIX, attended by Guards.

Phoc. All, all are fled! Orestes is not here!
Triumphant villains! The base, giddy rabble,
Whose hands should all have been employ'd with fire,
To waste the fleet, flock'd round the dying
princess:

And, while they stand agaze, the Greeks embark.
Oh, 'tis too plain! this sacrilegious murder
Was authoriz'd. The ambassador's escape

Declares his guilt. Most bloody embassy!
Most unexampled deeds! Where, where, ye gods,
Is majesty secure, if in your temples

You give it no protection? See, the queen.

A Flourish of Trumpets. Enter ANDROMACHE and CEPHISA with Attendants.

Andro. Yes, ye inhuman Greeks! the time will come

When you shall dearly pay your bloody deeds!
How should the Trojans hope for mercy from you,
When thus you turn your impious rage on Pyrrhus?

Pyrrhus, the bravest man in all your league;
The man, whose single valour made you triumph.

[A dead March behind.]
Is my child there?

Ceph. It is the corpse of Pyrrhus;
The weeping soldiers bear him on their shields.

Andro. Ill-fated prince! too negligent of life,
And too unwary, of the faithless Greeks!
Cut off in the fresh rip'ning prime of manhood,
E'en in the prime of life! thy triumphs new,
And all thy glories in full blossom round thee!
The very Trojans would bewail thy fate.

Ceph. Alas! then will your sorrows never end?

Andro. Oh, never, never! — While I live,
my tears

Will never cease; for I was born to grieve.
Give present orders for the funeral pomp.

[To Phoenix.]

Let him be rob'd in all his regal state;
Place round him every shining mark of honour;
And let the pile that consecrates his ashes,
Rise like his fame, and blaze above the clouds.

[Exit Phoenix. A Flourish of Trumpets.]

Ceph. The sound proclaims th' arrival of the prince,

The guards conduct him from the citadel.

Andro. With open arms I'll meet him! —
O Cephisa!

A springing joy, mix'd with a soft concern,
A pleasure, which no language can express,
An ecstasy that mothers only feel,
Plays round my heart, and brightens up my
sorrow,

Like gleams of sunshine in a low'ring sky.
Though plung'd in ills, and exercis'd in care,
Yet never let the noble mind despair.

When press'd by dangers, and beset with foes,
The gods their timely succour interpose;
And when our virtue sinks, o'erwhelm'd with
grief,

By unforeseen expedients bring relief. [Exeunt.]

ROWE.

NICHOLAS ROWE, son of John Rowe, Esq. sergeant at law, was born at Little Borkford, in Bedfordshire, anno 1675. His education was begun at a private seminary in Highgate, from whence he was removed to Westminster school, where he was perfected in classical literature under Doctor Busby. His father, designing him for his own profession, entered him, at sixteen years of age, a student of the Middle Temple. He soon made considerable progress in the law, and might have cut a figure in that profession, if the love of poetry and the belles lettres had not too much attracted his attention. At the age of twenty-five he wrote his first tragedy, The Ambitious Step-mother, the great success of which made him entirely lay aside all thoughts of the law. Dr. Johnson demands: "Whence then has Rowe his reputation? From the reasonableness and propriety of some of his scenes, from the elegance of his diction, and the suavity of his verse. He seldom moves either pity or terror, but he often elevates the sentiments; he seldom pierces the breast, but he always delights the ear, and often improves the understanding." Being a great admirer of Shakespeare, he gave the public an edition of his plays, to which he prefixed an account of that great man's life. But the most considerable of Mr. Rowe's performances, was a translation of Lucan's Pharsalia, which he just lived to finish, but not to publish; for it did not appear in print till ten years after his death. His attachment to the Muses, however, did not entirely unfit him for business; for when the Duke of Queensberry was secretary of state, he made Mr. Rowe his under-secretary for public affairs; but, after the Duke's death, the avenues to his preferment being stopped, he passed his time in retirement during the rest of Queen Anne's reign. On the accession of George I, he was made poet laureat, and one of the land-surveyors of the customs in the port of London. He was also Clerk of the council to the Prince of Wales, and the Lord Chancellor Parker made him his secretary for the presentations; but he did not long enjoy these promotions, for he died Dec. 6. 1718 in the 45th year of his age.

THE FAIR PENITENT.

ACTED at Lincoln's Inn Fields 1705. This, as Dr. Johnson observes, 'is one of the most pleasing tragedies on the stage, where it still keeps its turns of appearing, and probably will long keep them; for there is scarcely any work of any poet at once so interesting by the fable, and so delightful by the language. The story is domestic, and therefore easily received by the imagination, and assimilated to common life; the diction is exquisitely harmonious, and soft or sprightly as occasion requires. The character of Lothario seems to have been expanded by Richardson into Lovelace; but he has excelled his original in the moral effect of the fiction. Lothario, with gaiety which can not be hated, and bravery which cannot be despised, retains too much of the spectators kindness. It was in the power of Richardson alone to teach us at once esteem and detestation, to make virtuous resentment overpower all the benevolence which wit, and elegance, and courage, naturally excite; and to loose at last the hero in the villain. In the year 1699 Mr. Powell played Lothario, and his dresser Warren performed the dead Lothario, unknown to Powell. About the middle of the distressful scene, Powell called aloud for his man, who answered him as loudly from the bier on the stage, "Here, Sir!" Powell ignorant of the part his man was acting, repeated immediately, "Come here this moment, you rascal! or I'll break all the bones in your skin." Warren knew his hasty temper; therefore, without any reply, jumped off, with all his sables about him, which unfortunately were tied fast to the handles of the bier, and dragged it after him. But this was not all; the laugh and roar began in the audience, till it frightened poor Warren so much, that, with the bier at his tail, he drew down Calista, and overwhelmed her with the table, lamp, book, bones, together with all the lumber of the chancel-house. He lugged, till he broke off his trammels, and made his escape; and the play, at once, ended with immoderate fits of laughter SCENE.—SCIOLTO's Palace and the Garden, with some Part of the Street near it, in GENOA.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A Garden belonging to SCIOLOTO'S Palace.Enter ALTAMONT and HORATIO.

Alt. Let this auspicious day be ever sacred,
No mourning, no misfortunes happen on it:
Let it be mark'd for triumphs and rejoicings;
Let happy lovers ever make it holy,
Choose it to bless their hopes, and crown their wishes.

This happy day, that gives me my Calista.

Hor. Yes, Altamont; to-day thy better stars
Are join'd to shed their kindest influence on thee;
Sciolto's noble hand, that rais'd thee first,
Half dead and drooping o'er thy father's grave,
Completes its bounty, and restores thy name
To that high rank and lustre which it boasted,
Before ungrateful Genoa had forgot
The merit of thy god-like father's arms;
Before that country, which he long had serv'd
In watchful councils and in winter camps,
Had cast off his white age to want and wretchedness,

And made their court to factions by his ruin.

Alt. Oh, great Sciolto!—Oh, my more than father!

Let me not live, but at thy very name
My eager heart springs up, and leaps with joy.
When I forget the vast, vast debt I owe thee—
Forget! (but 'tis impossible) then let me
Forget the use and privilege of reason,
Be driven from the commerce of mankind,
To wander in the desert among brutes,
To be the scorn of earth, and curse of heav'n!

Hor. So open, so unbounded was his goodness,
It reach'd even me, because I was thy friend.
When that great man I lov'd, thy noble father,
Bequeath'd thy gentle sister to my arms,
His last dear pledge and legacy of friendship,
That happy tie made me Sciolto's son;
He call'd us his, and with a parent's fondness,
Indulg'd us in his wealth, bless'd us with plenty,
Heal'd all our cares, and sweeten'd love itself.

Alt. By heav'n, he found my fortunes so abandon'd,

That nothing but a miracle could raise 'em:
My father's bounty, and the state's ingratitude,
Had stripp'd him bare, nor left him e'en a grave.
I done myself, and sinking with his ruin,
I had no wealth to bring, nothing to succour him,
But fruitless tears.

Hor. Yet what thou couldst thou didst,
And didst it like a son; when his hard creditors,
Urg'd and assisted by Lothario's father
(Foe to thy house, and rival of their greatness),
By sentence of the cruel law forbade
His venerable corpse to rest in earth,
Thou gav'st thyself a ransom for his bones;
Heav'n, who beheld the pious act, approv'd it,
And bade Sciolto's bounty be its proxy,
To bless thy filial virtue with abundance.

Alt. But see, he comes, the author of my happiness,

The man who sav'd my life from deadly sorrow,
Who bids my days be blest with peace and plenty,
And satisfies my soul with love and beauty.

Enter SCIOLOTO; he runs to ALTAMONT, and embraces him.

Sci. Joy to thee, Altamont! Joy to myself!
Joy to this happy morn, that makes thee mine;

That kindly grants what nature had deny'd me,
And makes me father of a son like thee.

Alt. My father! Oh, let me unlade my breast,
Pour out the fulness of my soul before you;
Show ev'ry tender, ev'ry grateful thought,
This wondrous goodness stirs. But 'tis impossible,
And utterance all is vile; since I can only
Swear you reign here, but never tell how much.

Sci. O, noble youth! I swear, since first I knew thee,

Ev'n from that day of sorrow when I saw thee
Adorn'd and lovely in thy filial tears,
The mourner and redeemer of thy father,
I set thee down and seal'd thee for my own:
Thou art my son, ev'n near me as Calista.
Horatio and Lavinia too are mine;

[Embraces Hor.
All are my children, and shall share my heart.
But wherefore waste we thus this happy day?
The laughing minutes summon thee to joy,
And with new pleasures court thee as they pass;
Thy waiting bride ev'n chides thee for delaying,
And swears thou com'st not with a bridegroom's haste.

Alt. Oh! could I hope there was one thought of Altamont,
One kind remembrance in Calista's breast,
The winds, with all their wings, would be too slow

To bear me to her feet. For, oh, my father!
Amidst the stream of joy that hears me on,
Blest as I am, and honour'd in your friendship,
There is one pain that hangs upon my heart.

Sci. What means my son?

Alt. When, at your intercession,
Last night, Calista yielded to my happiness,
Just ere we parted, as I seal'd my vows
With rapture on her lips, I found her cold,
As a dead lover's statue on his tomb;
A rising storm of passion shook her breast,
Her eyes a piteous show'r of tears let fall,
And then she sigh'd as if her heart were breaking.

With all the tend'rest eloquence of love
I begg'd to be a sharer in her grief:
But she, with looks averse, and eyes that froze me,
Sadly reply'd, her sorrows were her own,
Nor in a father's power to dispose of.

Sci. Away! it is the coz'nage of their sex;
One of the common arts they practise on us:
To sigh and weep then when their hearts beat high
With expectation of the coming joy.
Thou hast in camps and fighting fields been bred,
Unknowing in the subtleties of women;
The virgin bride, who swoons with deadly fear,
To see the end of all her wishes near,
When blushing from the light and public eyes,
To the kind covert of the night she flies,
With equal fires to meet the bridegroom moves,
Melts in his arms, and with a loose she loves.

[Exeunt.

Enter LOTHARIO and ROSSANO.

Loth. The father, and the husband!

Ros. Let them pass.

They saw us not.

Loth. I care not if they did;

Ere long I mean to meet 'em face to face,
And gall 'em with my triumph o'er Calista.

Ros. You lov'd her once.

Loth. I lik'd her, would have marry'd her,
But that it pleas'd her father to refuse me,

To make this honourable fool her husband;
For which, if I forget him, may the shame
I mean to brand his name with, stick on mine.

Ros. She, gentle soul, was kinder than her father.

Loth. She was, and oft in private gave me hearing;

Till, by long list'ning to the soothing tale,
At length her easy heart was wholly mine.

Ros. I've heard you oft describe her haughty,
insolent,
And fierce with high disdain: it moves my wonder,
That virtue thus defended, should be yielded
A prey to loose desires.

Loth. Hear then I'll tell thee:

Once in a lone and secret hour of night,
When ev'ry eye was clos'd, and the pale moon
And stars alone shone conscious of the theft,
Hot with the Tuscan grape, and high in blood,
Hap'ly I stole unheeded to her chamber.

Ros. That minute sure was lucky.

Loth. Oh, 'twas great!

I found the fond, believing, love-sick maid,
Loose, unattir'd, warm, tender, full of wishes;
Fierceness and pride, the guardians of her honour,

Were charm'd to rest, and love alone was waking.
Within her rising bosom all was calm,
As peaceful seas that know no storms, and only
Are gently lifted up and down by tides.

I snatch'd the glorious, golden opportunity,
And with prevailing, youthful ardour press'd her;
Till, with short sighs, and murmuring reluctance,
The yielding fair one gave me perfect happiness.
Ev'n all the live-long night we pass'd in bliss,
In ecstasies too fierce to last for ever;
At length the morn and cold indifference came;
When, fully sated with the luscious banquet,
I hastily took leave, and left the nymph
To think on what was past, and sigh alone.

Ros. You saw her soon again?

Loth. Too soon I saw her:

For, oh! that meeting was not like the former:
I found my heart no more beat high with transport,

No more I sigh'd and languish'd for enjoyment;
'Twas past, and reason took her turn to reign,
While ev'ry weakness fell before her throne.

Ros. What of the lady?

Loth. With uneasy fondness

She hung upon me, wept, and, sigh'd and swore
She was undone; talk'd of a priest and marriage;
Of flying with me from her father's pow'r;
Call'd ev'ry saint and blessed angel down,
To witness for her that she was my wife.
I started at that name.

Ros. What answer made you?

Loth. None; but pretending sudden pain and illness,

Escap'd the persecution. Two nights since,
By message urg'd and frequent importunity,
Again I saw her. Straight with tears and sighs, With swelling breasts, with swooning and distraction,

With all the subtleties and pow'ful arts
Of wilful woman lab'ring for her purpose,
Again she told the same dull, nauseous tale.
Unmov'd, I begg'd her spare th' ungrateful subject,

Since I resolv'd, that love and peace of mind
Might flourish long inviolate betwixt us,

Never to load it with the marriage chain:

That I would still retain her in my heart,
My ever gentle mistress and my friend;

But for those other names of wife and husband,
They only meant ill nature, cares, and quarrels.

Ros. How bore she this reply?

Loth. At first her rage was dumb, and wanted words;

But when the storm found way, 'twas wild and loud:

Mad as the priestess of the Delphic god,
Enthusiastic passion swell'd her breast,
Enlarg'd her voice, and ruffled all her form.
Proud, and disdainful of the love I proffer'd,
She call'd me villain! monster! base betrayer!

At last, in very bitterness of soul,
With deadly imprecations on herself,
She vow'd severely ne'er to see me more;

Then bid me fly that minute: I obey'd,
And, bowing, left her to grow cool at leisure.

Ros. She has relented since, else why this message,

To meet the keeper of her secrets here
This morning?

Loth. See the person whom you nam'd.

Enter LUCILLA.

Well, my ambassadress, what must we treat of?
Come you to menace war and proud defiance,
Or does the peaceful olive grace your message?
Is your fair mistress calmer? Does she soften?
And must we love again? Perhaps she means
To treat in juncture with her new ally,
And make her husband party to th' agreement.

Luc. Is this well done, my lord? Have you put off

All sense of human nature? Keep a little,
A little pity, to distinguish manhood.
Lest other men, though cruel, should disclaim you,
And judge you to be number'd with the brutes.

Loth. I see thou'st learn'd to rail.

Luc. I've learn'd to weep:

That lesson my sad mistress often gives me:
By day she seeks some melancholy shade,
To hide her sorrows from the prying world;
At night she watches all the long, long hours,
And listens to the winds and beating rain,
With sighs as loud, and tears that fall as fast.
Then ever and anon she wrings her hands,
And cries, false, false Lothario!

Loth. Oh, no more!

I swear thou'lt spoil thy pretty face with crying,
And thou hast beauty that may make thy fortune:
Some keeping cardinal shall dote upon thee,
And barter his church treasure for thy freshness.

Luc. What! shall I sell my innocence and
youth,

For wealth or titles, to perfidious man?
To man, who makes his mirth of our undoing!
The base, profess'd betrayer of our sex!
Let me grow old in all misfortunes else,
Rather than know the sorrows of Calista!

Loth. Does she send thee to chide in her behalf?
I swear thou dost it with so good a grace,
That I could almost love thee for thy frowning.

Luc. Read there, my lord, there, in her own sad lines, [Giving a Letter.

Which best can tell the story of her woes,
That grief of heart which your unkindness gives her.

Loth. [Reads] Your cruelty — Obedience to my father — give my hand to Altamont.

By heav'n, 'tis well! such ever be the gifts
With which I greet the man whom my soul hates. [Aside.

But to go on—

—wish—heart—honour—too faithless—weakness—to-morrow—last trouble—lost
Calista.

Women, I see, can change as well as men.
She writes me here, forsaken as I am,
That I should bind my brows with mournful willow,

For she has giv'n her hand to Altamont:
Yet tell the fair inconstant—

Luc. How, my lord!

Loth. Nay, no more angry words: say to Calista,

The humblest of her slaves shall wait her pleasure;
If she can leave her happy husband's arms,
To think upon so lost a thing as I am.

Luc. Alas! for pity, come with gentler looks:
Wound not her heart with this unmanly triumph;
And though you love her not, yet swear you do;
So shall dissembling once be virtuous in you.

Loth. Ha! who comes here?

Luc. The bridegroom's friend, Horatio.
He must not see us here. To-morrow early
Be at the garden gate.

Loth. Bear to my love

My kindest thoughts, and swear I will not fail her.

[Lothario putting up the Letter hastily, drops it as he goes out. Exeunt Lothario and Rossario one Way, Lucilla
another.

Enter HORATIO.

Hor. Sure 'tis the very error of my eyes;
Waking I dream, or I beheld Lothario;
He seem'd conferring with Calista's woman:
At my approach they started and retir'd.
What business could he have here, and with her?
I know he bears the noble Altamont
Profess'd and deadly hate—What paper's this?

[Taking up the Letter.

Ha! To Lothario!—'Sdeath! Calista's name!

[Opens it and reads.

*Your cruelty has at length determined me;
and I have resolv'd this morning to yield a perfect obedience to my father, and to give my hand to Altamont, in spite of my weakness for the false Lothario. I could almost wish I had that heart and that honour to bestow with it, which you have robbed me of:—*

Damnation! to the rest—

But, oh! I fear, could I retrieve 'em, I should again be undone by the too faithless, yet too lovely Lothario. This is the last weakness of my pen, and to-morrow shall be the last in which I will indulge my eyes.
Lucilla shall conduct you, if you are kind enough to let me see you; it shall be the last trouble you shall meet with from the lost

CALISTA.

The lost, indeed! for thou art gone as far
As there can be perdition. Fire and sulphur!
Hell is the sole avenger of such crimes.
Oh, that the ruin were but all thy own!
Thou wilt ev'n make thy father curse his age:
At sight of this black scroll, the gentle Altamont
(For, oh! I know his heart is set upon thee)
Shall droop and hang his discontented head,
Like merit scorn'd by insolent authority,

And never grace the public with his virtues.—
What if I give this paper to her father?
It follows that his justice dooms her dead,
And breaks his heart with sorrow; hard return
For all the good his hand has heap'd on us!
Hold, let me take a moment's thought—

Enter LAVINIA.

Lav. My lord!

Trust me it joys my heart that I have found you.
Inquiring wherefore you had left the company,
Before my brother's nuptial rites were ended,
They told me you had felt some sudden illness.

Hor. It were unjust—No, let me spare my
friend,

Lock up the fatal secret in my breast,
Nor tell him that which will undo his quiet.

Lav. What means my lord?

Hor. Ha! said'st thou, my Lavinia?

Lav. Alas! you know not what you make me suffer.

Wherefore is that sigh? And wherefore are your eyes

Severely rais'd to heav'n? The sick man thus,
Acknowledging the summons of his fate,
Lifts up his feeble hands and eyes for mercy,
And with confusion thinks upon his exit.

Hor. Oh, no! thou hast mistook my sickness quite;

These pangs are of the soul. Would I had met
Sharpest convulsions, spotted pestilence,
Or any other deadly foe to life,
Rather than heave beneath this load of thought!

Lav. Alas! what is it? Wherefore turn you
from me?

Why did you falsely call me your Lavinia,
And swear I was Horatio's better half,
Since now you mourn unkindly by yourself,
And rob me of my partnership of sadness?

Hor. Seek not to know what I would hide from all,

But most from thee. I never knew a pleasure,
Aught that was joyful, fortunate, or good,
But straight I ran to bless thee with the tidings,
And laid up all my happiness with thee:
But wherefore, wherefore should I give thee
pain?

Then spare me, I conjure thee; ask no further;
Allow my melancholy thoughts this privilege,
And let 'em brood in secret o'er their sorrows.

Lav. It is enough; chide not, and all is well!
Forgive me if I saw you sad, Horatio,
And ask'd to weep out part of your misfortunes:
I wou't press to know what you forbid me.
Yet, my lov'd lord, yet you must grant me this,
Forget your cares for this one happy day,
Devote this day to mirth, and to your Altamont;
For his dear sake, let peace be in your looks.

Ev'n now the jocund bridegroom waits your
wishes,

He thinks the priest has but half bless'd his marriage,

Till his friend hails him with the sound of joy.

Hor. Oh, never, never, never! Thou art innocent:

Simplicity from ill, pure native truth,
And candour of the mind, adorn thee ever;
But there are such, such false ones, in the world,
'Twould fill thy gentle soul with wild amazement
To hear their story told.

Lav. False ones, my lord!

Hor. Fatally fair they are, and in their smiles

The graces, little loves, and young desires inhabit;
But all that gaze upon 'em are undone;
For they are false, luxurious in their appetites,
And all the heav'n they hope for is variety:
One lover to another still succeeds,
Another, and another after that,
And the last fool is welcome as the former;
Till having lov'd his hour out, he gives place,
And mingles with the herd that went before him.

Lav. Can there be such, and have they peace of mind?

Have they, in all the series of their changing,
One happy hour? If women are such things,
How was I form'd so diff'rent from my sex?
My little heart is satisfy'd with you;
You take up all her room as in a cottage
Which harbours some benighted princely
stranger,

Where the good man, proud of his hospitality,
Yields all his homely dwelling to his guest,
And hardly keeps a corner for himself.

Hor. Oh, were they all like thee, men would adore 'em,

And all the business of their lives be loving;
The nuptial band should be the pledge of peace,
And all domestic cares and quarrels cease!
The world should learn to love by virtuous rules,
And marriage be no more the jest of fools.

[Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—A Hall.

Enter CALISTA and LUCILLA.

Cal. Be dumb for ever, silent as the grave,
Nor let thy fond, officious love disturb
My solemn sadness with the sound of joy.
If thou wilt sooth me, tell some dismal tale
Of pining discontent, and black despair;
For, oh! I've gone around through all my
thoughts,

But all are indignation, love, or shame,
And my dear peace of mind is lost for ever.

Luc. Why do you follow still that wand'- ring fire,

That has misled your weary steps, and leaves you
Benighted in a wilderness of woe,
That false Lothario? Turn from the deceiver;
Turn, and behold where gentle Altamont,
Sighs at your feet, and woos you to be happy.

Cal. Away! I think not of him. My sad soul
Has form'd a dismal, melancholy scene,
Such a retreat as I would wish to find;
An unfrequented vale, o'ergrown with trees
Mossy and old, within whose lonesome shade
Ravens and birds ill-omen'd only dwell:
No sound to break the silence, but a brook
That bubbling winds among the weeds: no mark
Of any human shape that had been there,
Unless a skeleton of some poor wretch,
Who had long since, like me, by love undone,
Sought that sad place out to despair and die in.

Luc. Alas, for pity!

Cal. There I fain would hide me
From the base world, from malice, and from
shame;

For 'tis the solemn counsel of my soul
Never to live with public loss of honour:
'Tis fix'd to die, rather than bear the insolence
Of each affected she that tells my story,
And blesses her good stars that she is virtuous.
To be a tale for fools! Scorn'd by the women,
And pity'd by the men! Oh, insupportable!

Luc. Oh, hear me, hear your ever faithful creature!

By all the good I wish, by all the ill
My trembling heart forebodes, let me entreat you Never to see this faithless man again;
Let me forbid his coming.

Cal. On thy life
I charge thee no: my genius drives me on;
I must, I will behold him once again:
Perhaps it is the crisis of my fate,
And this one interview shall end my cares.
My lab'ring heart, that swells with indignation,
Heaves to discharge the burden; that once done,
The busy thing shall rest within its cell,
And never beat again.

Luc. Trust not to that:
Rage is the shortest passion of our souls:
Like narrow brooks that rise with sudden show'rs.
It swells in haste, and falls again as soon;
Still as it ebbs the softer thoughts flow in,
And the deceiver, love, supplies its place.

Cal. I have been wrong'd enough to arm
my temper

Against the smooth delusion; but, alas!
(Chide not my weakness, gentle maid, but pity me)

A woman's softness hangs about me still;
Then let me blush, and tell thee all my folly.
I swear I could not see the dear betrayer
Kneel at my feet and sigh to be forgiv'n,
But my relenting heart would pardon all,
And quite forget 'twas he that had undone me.

[Exit Lucilla.]

Ha! Altamont! Calista, now be wary,
And guard thy soul's excesses with dissembling:
Nor let this hostile husband's eyes explore
The warring passions and tumultuous thoughts
That rage within thee, and deform thy reason.

Enter ALTAMONT.

Alt. Be gone, my cares, I give you to the winds,
Far to be borne, far from the happy Altamont;
Calista is the mistress of the year;
She crowns the seasons with suspicious beauty,
And bids ev'n all my hours be good and joyful.

Cal. If I were ever mistress of such happiness,
Oh! wherefore did I play th'unthrifty fool,
And, wasting all on others, leave myself
Without one thought of joy to give me comfort?

Alt. Oh, mighty love! Shall that fair face profane
This thy great festival with frowns and sadness?
I swear it sha'not be, for I will woo thee
With sighs so moving, with so warm a transport,
That thou shalt catch the gentle flame from me,
And kindle into joy.

Cal. I tell thee, Altamont,
Such hearts as ours were never pair'd above:
Ill suited to each other: join'd, not match'd;
Some sullen influence, a foe to both,
Has wrought this fatal marriage to undo us.
Mark but the frame and temper of our minds,
How very much we differ. Ev'n this day,
That fills thee with such ecstasy and transport,
To me brings nothing that should make me
bless it,

Or think it better than the day before,
Or any other in the course of time,
That duly took its turn, and was forgotten.

Alt. If to behold thee as my pledge of happiness,
To know none fair, none excellent, but thee:

If still to love thee with unweary'd constancy,
Through ev'ry season, ev'ry change of life,
Be worth the least return of grateful love,
Oh, then let my Calista bless this day,
And set it down for happy.

Cal. 'Tis the day
In which my father gave my hand to Altamont;
As such, I will remember it for ever.

Enter SCIOLTO, HORATIO, and LAVINIA.

Sci. Let mirth go on, let pleasure know
no pause,

But fill up ev'ry minute of this day.
'Tis yours, my children, sacred to your loves;
The glorious sun himself for you looks gay;
He shines for Altamont and for Calista.
Let there be music, let the master touch
The sprightly string and softly-breathing flute,
Till harmony rouse ev'ry gentle passion;
Teach the cold maid to lose her fears in love,
And the fierce youth to languish at her feet.
Begin: ev'n age itself is cheer'd with music;
It wakes a glad remembrance of our youth,
Calls back past joys, and warms us into transport.

[Music.

Take care my gates be open, bid all welcome;
All who rejoice with me to-day are friends:
Let each indulge his genius, each be glad,
Jocund, and free, and swell the feast with mirth;
The sprightly bowl shall cheerfully go round,
None shall be grave, nor too severely wise;
Losses and disappointments, cares and poverty,
The rich man's insolence, and great man's scorn,
In wine shall be forgotten all. To-morrow
Will be too soon to think and to be wretched.
Oh grant, ye pow'rs, that I may see these happy,

[Pointing to Altamont and Calista.
Completely blest, and I have life enough!
And leave the rest indifferently to fate. [Exeunt.

Hor. What if, while all are here intent on revelling,

I privately went forth, and sought Lothario?
This letter may be forg'd! perhaps the wantonness
Of his vain youth, to stain a lady's fame;
Perhaps his malice to disturb my friend.

Oh, no! my heart forebodes it must be true.
Methought, ev'n now, I mark'd the starts of guilt
That shook her soul; though damn'd dissimulation
Screen'd her dark thoughts, and set to public view
A specious face of innocence and beauty.

With such smooth looks and many a gentle word,
The first fair she beguil'd her easy lord;
Too blind with love and beauty to beware,
He fell unthinking in the fatal snare;
Nor could believe that such a heav'nly face
Had bargain'd with the devil, to damn her wretched race. [Exit.

SCENE II.—The Garden of SCIOLTO'S Palace.

Enter LOTHARIO and ROSSANO.

Loth. To tell thee then the purport of my
thoughts;

The loss of this fond paper would not give me
A moment of disquiet, were it not
My instrument of vengeance on this Altamont;
Therefore I mean to wait some opportunity
Of speaking with the maid we saw this morning.

Ros. I wish you, sir, to think upon the danger
Of being seen; to-day their friends are round 'em;
And any eye that lights by chance on you,
Shall put your life and safety to the hazard.

[Exeunt.

Enter HORATIO.

Hor. Still I must doubt some mystery of
mischief,
Some artifice beneath. Lothario's father!
I know him well; he was sagacious, cunning,
Fluent in words, and bold in peaceful counsels,
But of a cold, unactive hand in war;
Yet, with these coward's virtues, he undid
My unsuspecting, valiant, honest friend.
This son, if same mistakes not, is more hot,
More open and unartful—

Re-enter LOTHARIO and ROSSANO.

Ha! he's here! Seeing him.
Loth. Damnation! He again!—This second time

To-day he has cross'd me like my evil genius.

Hor. I sought you, sir.

Loth. 'Tis well then I am found.

Hor. 'Tis well you are. The man who wrongs
my friend

To the earth's utmost verge I would pursue,
No place, though e'er so holy, should protect him;
No shape that artful fear e'er form'd should hide him,

Till he fair answer made, and did me justice.

Loth. Ha! dost thou know me? that I am Lothario?

As great a name as this proud city boasts of.
Who is this mighty man, then, this Horatio,
That I should basely hide me from his anger,
Lest he should chide me for his friend's displeasure?

Hor. The brave, 'tis true, do never shun
the light;

Just are their thoughts, and open are their tempers,

Still are they found in the fair face of day,
And heav'n and men are judges of their actions.

Loth. Such let 'em be of mine; there's not a purpose

Which my soul e'er fram'd, or my hand acted,
But I could well have bid the world look on,
And what I once durst do, have dar'd to justify.

Hor. Where was this open boldness, this free spirit,

When but this very morning I surpris'd thee,
In base, dishonest privacy, consulting
And bribing a poor mercenary wretch,
To sell her lady's secrets, stain her honour,
And, with a forg'd contrivance, blast her virtue?—
At sight of me thou fled'st.

Loth. Ha! fled from thee?

Hor. Thou fled'st, and guilt was on thee like a thief,

A pilferer, descry'd in some dark corner,
Who there had lodg'd, with mischievous intent,
To rob and ravage at the hour of rest,
And do a midnight murder on the sleepers.

Loth. Slave! villain!

[Offers to draw; Rossano holds him.

Ros. Hold, my lord! think where you are,
Think how unsafe and hurtful to your honour
It were to urge a quarrel in this place,
And shock the peaceful city with a broil.

Loth. Then, since thou dost provoke my vengeance, know

I would not, for this city's wealth, for all
Which the sea wafts to our Ligurian shore,
But that the joys I reap'd with that fond wanton,
The wife of Altamont, should be as public
As is the noon-day sun, air, earth, or water,

Or any common benefit of nature.

Think'st thou I meant the shame should be conceal'd?

Oh, no! by hell and vengeance, all I wanted
Was some fit messenger to bear the news
To the dull doating husband: now I have found
him,

And thou art he.

Hor. I hold thee base enough
To break through law, and spurn at sacred order,
And do a brutal injury like this.

Yet mark me well, young lord; I think Calista
Too nice, too noble, and too great of soul,
To be the prey of such a thing as thou art.
'Twas base and poor, unworthy of a man,
To forge a scroll so villanous and loose,
And mark it with a noble lady's name:

These are the mean dishonest arts of cowards,
Who, bred at home in idleness and riot,
Ransack for mistresses th' unwholesome stews,
And never know the worth of virtuous love.

Loth. Think'st thou I forg'd the letter? Think so still,

Till the broad shame come staring in thy face,
And boys shall hoot the cuckold as he passes.

Hor. Away! no woman could descend so low:
A skipping, dancing, worthless tribe you are;
Fit only for yourselves, you herd together;
And when the circling glass warms your vain
hearts,

You talk of beauties that you never saw,
And fancy raptures that you never knew.

Loth. But that I do not hold it worth my leisure,
I could produce such damning proof—

Hor. 'Tis false!

You blast the fair with lies, because they scorn
you,

Hate you like age, like ugliness and impotence:
Rather than make you blest, they would die
virgins,

And stop the propagation of mankind.

Loth. It is the curse of fools to be secure,
And that be thine and Altamont's. Dream on;
Nor think upon my vengeance till thou feel'st it.

Hor. Hold, sir; another word, and then farewell.

Though I think greatly of Calista's virtue,
And hold it far beyond thy power to hurt;
Yet, as she shares the honour of my Altamont,
That treasure of a soldier, bought with blood,
And kept at life's expense, I must not have (Mark me, young sir) her very name profan'd.
Learn to restrain the licence of your speech;
'Tis held you are too lavish. When you are met
Among your set of fools, talk of your dress,
Of dice, of whores, of horses, and yourselves;
'Tis safer, and becomes your understandings.

Loth. What if we pass beyond this solemn order,

And, in defiance of the stern Horatio,
Indulge our gayer thoughts, let laughter loose,
And use his sacred friendship for our mirth?

Hor. 'Tis well, sir, you are pleasant—

Loth. By the joys

Which my soul yet has uncontrol'd pursu'd,
I would not turn aside from my least pleasure,
Though all thy force were arm'd to bar my way;
But like the birds, great nature's happy commoners,

That haunt in woods, in meads, and flow'ry gardens,

Rifle the sweets and taste the choicest fruits,

Yet scorn to ask the lordly owner's leave.

Hor. What liberty has vain presumptuous
youth,

That thou shouldst dare provoke me unchastis'd?
But henceforth, boy, I warn thee, shun my walks.
If in the bounds of this forbidden place
Again thou'rt found, expect a punishment,
Such as great souls, impatient of an injury,
Exact from those who wrong 'em much, ev'n
death;

Or something worse: an injur'd husband's
vengeance

Shall print a thousand wounds, tear thy fine form,
And scatter thee to all the winds of heav'n.

Loth. Is then my way in Genoa prescrib'd
By a dependent on the wretched Altamont,
A talking sir, that brawls for him in taverns,
And vouches for his valour's reputation?

Hor. Away! thy speech is fouler than thy manners.

Loth. Or, if there be a name more vile, his parasite;

A beggar's parasite!

Hor. Now learn humanity,

[Offers to strike him; Rossano interposes.

Since brutes and boys are only taught with blows.

Loth. Damnation! [They draw.

Ros. Hold, this goes no further here.

Loth. Oh, Rossano!

Or give me way, or thou'rt no more my friend.

Ros. Sciolto's servants, sir, have ta'en th'
alarm;

You'll be oppress'd by numbers. Be advis'd,
Or I must force you hence.

Loth. This wo'not brook delay;

West of the town a mile, among the rocks,
Two hours ere noon, to-morrow, I expect thee,
Thy single hand to mine.

Hor. I'll meet thee there.

Loth. To-morrow, oh, my better stars! tomorrow

Exert your influence; shine strongly for me;
'Tis not a common conquest I would gain,
Since love as well as arms must grace my triumph.

[Exeunt Lothario and Rossano.

Hor. Two hours ere noon to-morrow! ha!
ere that

He sees Calista! Oh, unthinking fool—
What if I urg'd her with the crime and danger?
If any spark from heav'n remain unquench'd Within her breast, my breath perhaps may wake it.

Could I but prosper there, I would not doubt
My combat with that loud vain-glorious boaster.
Were you, ye fair, but cautious whom ye trust,
Did you but think how seldom fools are just.
So many of your sex would not in vain
Of broken vows, and faithless men, complain:
Of all the various wretches love has made,
How few have been by men of sense betray'd?
Convinc'd by reason, they your pow'r confess,
Pleas'd to be happy, as you're pleas'd to bless,
And, conscious of your worth, can never love
you less. [Exit

ACT III.

SCENE I.—An Apartment in SCIOLTO'S Palace.

Enter SCIOLTO and CALISTA.

Sci. Now, by my life, my honour, 'tis too much!

Have I not mark'd thee, wayward as thou art

Perverse and sullen all this day of joy?
When every heart was cheer'd and mirth went round,
Sorrow, displeasure, and repining anguish
Sat on thy brow.

Cal. Is then the task of duty half perform'd?
Has not your daughter given herself to Altamont, Yielded the native freedom of her will
To an imperious husband's lordly rule,
To gratify a father's stern command?

Sci. Dost thou complain?

Cal. For pity do not frown then,
If in despite of all my vow'd obedience,
A sigh breaks out, or a tear falls by chance:
For, oh! that sorrow which has drawn your anger,
Is the sad native of Calista's breast.

Sci. Now by the sacred dust of that dear saint
That was thy mother; by her wondrous goodness,
Her soft, her tender, most complying sweetness,
I swear, some sullen thought that shuns the light,
Lurks underneath that sadness in thy visage.
But mark me well, though by yon heaven I
love thee

As much, I think, as a fond parent can;
Yet shouldst thou (which the pow'rs above forbid)
E'er stain the honour of thy name with infamy,
I'll cast thee off, as one whose impious hands
Had rent asunder nature's nearest ties,
Which once divided, never join again.
To-day I've made a noble youth thy husband;
Consider well his worth; reward his love;
Be willing to be happy, and thou art so.

[Exit.

Cal. How hard is the condition of our sex,
Through ev'ry state of life the slaves of man!
In all the dear delightful days of youth
A rigid father dictates to our wills,
And deals out pleasure with a scanty hand.
To his, the tyrant husband's reign succeeds;
Proud with opinion of superior reason,
He holds domestic business and devotion
All we are capable to know, and shuts us,
Like cloister'd idiots, from the world's acquaintance,

And all the joys of freedom. Wherefore are we
Born with high souls, but to assert ourselves,
Shake off this vile obedience they exact,
And claim an equal empire o'er the world?

[She sits down.

Enter HORATIO.

Hor. She's here! yet, oh! my tongue is at a loss.
Teach me, some pow'r, that happy art of speech,
To dress my purpose up in gracious words;
Such as may softly steal upon her soul,
And never waken the tempestuous passions.
By heav'n she weeps!—Forgive me, fair Calista,

[She starts up.

If I presume on privilege of friendship,
To join my grief to yours, and mourn the evils
That hurt your peace, and quench those eyes in tears.

Cal. To steal unlook'd for, on my private
sorrow,
Speaks not the man of honour, nor the friend,
But rather means the spy.

Hor. Unkindly said!

For, oh! as sure as you accuse me falsely,
I come to prove myself Calista's friend.

Cal. You are my husband's friend, the friend
of Altamont!

Hor. Are you not one? Are you not join'd
by heav'n,

Each interwoven with the other's fate?
Then who can give his friendship but to one?
Who can be Altamont's and not Calista's?

Cal. Force, and the wills of our imperious rulers,

May bind two bodies in one wretched chain;
But minds will still look back to their own choice.

Hor. When souls that should agree to will
the same,

To have one common object for their wishes,
Look different ways, regardless of each other,
Think what a train of wretchedness ensues:
Love shall be banish'd from the genial bed,
The night shall all be lonely and unquiet,
And ev'ry day shall be a day of cares.

Cal. Then all the boasted office of thy friendship,

Was but to tell Calista what a wretch she is.
Alas! what needeth that?

Hor. Oh! rather say,

I came to tell her how she might be happy;
To sooth the secret anguish of her soul;
To comfort that fair mourner, that forlorn one,
And teach her steps to know the paths of peace.

Cal. Say, thou, to whom this paradise is known,

Where lies the blissful region? Mark my way
to it;

For, oh! 'tis sure, I long to be at rest.

Hor. Then—to be good is to be happy—
Angels

Are happier than mankind, because they're better.

Guilt is the source of sorrow; 'tis the fiend,
'Th' avenging fiend, that follows us behind
With whips and stings. The blest know none of this,

But rest in everlasting peace of mind,
And find the height of all their heav'n is goodness.

Cal. And what bold parasite's officious tongue
Shall dare to tax Calista's name with guilt?

Hor. None should; but 'tis a busy, talking
world,

That with licentious breath blows like the wind,
As freely on the palace as the cottage.

Cal. What mystic riddle lurks beneath thy words,

Which thou wouldst seem unwilling to express,
As if it meant dishonour to my virtue?

Away with this ambiguous shuffling phrase,
And let thy oracle be understood.

Hor. Lothario!

Cal. Ha! what wouldst thou mean by him?

Hor. Lothario and Calista!—Thus they join
Two names, which heav'n decreed should never meet.

Hence have the talkers of this populous city
A shameful tale to tell, for public sport,
Of an unhappy beauty, a false fair one,
Who plighted to a noble youth her faith,
When she had giv'n her honour to a wretch.

Cal. Death and confusion! Have I liv'd to this?
Thus to be treated with unmanly insolence!
To be the sport of a loose ruffian's tongue!
Thus to be us'd! thus! like the vilest creature
That ever was a slave to vice and infamy.

Hor. By honour and fair truth, you wrong me much;

For, on my soul, nothing but strong necessity
Could urge my tongue to this ungrateful office.

I came with strong reluctance, as if death
Had stood across my way to save your honour,
Yours and Sciolto's, yours and Altamont's;
Like one who ventures through a burning pile,
To save his tender wife, with all her brood
Of little fondlings, from the dreadful ruin.

Cal. Is this the famous friend of Altamont,
For noble worth and deeds of arms renown'd?
Is this the tale-bearing officious fellow,
That watches for intelligence from eyes;
This wretched Argus of a jealous husband,
That fills his easy ears with monstrous tales,
And makes him toss, and rave, and wreak
at length

Bloody revenge on his defenceless wife,
Who guiltless dies, because her fool ran mad?

Hor. Alas! this rage is vain; for if your fame
Or peace be worth your care, you must be calm,
And listen to the means are left to save 'em.
'Tis now the lucky minute of your fate.

By me your genius speaks, by me it warns you,
Never to see that curs'd Lotbario more;
Unless you mean to be despis'd, be shunn'd
By all our virtuous maids and noble matrons;
Unless you have devoted this rare beauty
To infamy, diseases, prostitution—

Cal. Dishonour blast thee, base, unmanner'd slave!

That dar'st forget my birth, and sacred sex,
And shock me with the rude, unhallow'd sound!

Hor. Here kneel, and in the awful face of heav'n

Breathe out a solemn vow, never to see,
Nor think, if possible, on him that ruin'd thee;
Or, by my Altamont's dear life, I swear,
This paper; nay, you must not fly—This paper,

[Holding her.
This guilty paper shall divulge your shame.

Cal. What mean'st thou by that paper?
What contrivance

Hast thou been forging to deceive my father;
To turn his heart against his wretched daughter;
That Altamont and thou may share his wealth?
A wrong like this will make me ev'n forget
The weakness of my sex.—Oh, for a sword,
To urge my vengeance on the villain's hand
That forg'd the scroll!

Hor. Behold! Can this be forg'd?

See where Calista's name—

[Showing the Letter near.

Col. To atoms thus, [Tearing it.
Thus let me tear the vile, detested falsehood,
The wicked, lying evidence of shame.

Hor. Confusion!

Cal. Henceforth, thou officious fool,
Meddle no more, nor dare, ev'n on thy life,
To breathe an accent that may touch my virtue.
I am myself the guardian of my honour,
And will not bear so insolent a monitor.

Enter ALTAMONT.

Alt. Where is my life, my love, my charming bride,
Joy of my heart, and pleasure of my eyes?
Disorder'd!—and in tears!—Horatio too!
My friend is in amaze—What can it mean?
Tell me, Calista, who has done thee wrong,
That my swift sword may find out the offender,
And do thee ample justice.

Cal. Turn to him.

Alt. Horatio!

Cal. To that insolent.

Alt. My friend!

Could he do this? Have I not found him just,
Honest as truth itself? and could he break
The sanctity of friendship? Could he wound
The heart of Altamont in his Calista?

Cal. I thought what justice I should find from thee!

Go fawn upon him, listen to his tale,
Thou art perhaps confederate in his mischief,
And wilt believe the legend, if he tells it.

Alt. Oh, impious! what presumptuous wretch shall dare

To offer at an injury like that?

Priesthood, nor age, nor cowardice itself,
Shall save him from the fury of my vengeance.

Cal. The man who dar'd to do it was Horatio;
Thy darling friend; 'twas Altamont's Horatio.
But mark me well; while thy divided heart,
Dotes on a villain that has wrong'd me thus,
No force shall drag me to thy hated bed.

Nor can my cruel father's pow'r do more
Than shut me in a cloister: there, well pleas'd,
Religious hardships will I learn to bear,

To fast and freeze at midnight hours of pray'r:
Nor think it hard, within a lonely cell,

With melancholy, speechless saints to dwell;
But bless the day I to that refuge ran,

Free from the marriage chain, and from that tyrant, man. [Exit.

Alt. She's gone; and as she went, ten thousand fires

Shot from her angry eyes; as if she meant
Too well to keep the cruel vow she made.

Now, as thou art a man, Horatio, tell me,
What means this wild confusion in thy looks;

As if thou wert at variance with thyself,
Madness and reason combating with thee,

And thou wert doubtful which should get the better?

Hor. I would be dumb for ever; but thy fate
Has otherwise decreed it. Thou hast seen

That idol of thy soul, that fair Calista;
Thou hast beheld her tears.

Alt. I have seen her weep;
I have seen that lovely one, that dear Calista,

Complaining, in the bitterness of sorrow,
That thou, my friend Horatio, thou hast wrong'd her.

Hor. That I have wrong'd her! Had her eyes been fed

From that rich stream which warms her heart, and number'd

For ev'ry falling tear a drop of blood,
It had not been too much; for she has ruin'd

thee,
Ev'n thee, my Altamont. She has undone thee.

Alt. Dost thou join ruin with Calista's name?
What is so fair, so exquisitely good?

Is she not more than painting can express,
Or youthful poets fancy when they love?

Does she not come, like wisdom, or good fortune, Replete with blessings, giving wealth and honour?

Hor. It had been better thou hadst liv'd a beggar,

And fed on scraps at great men's surly doors,
Than to have match'd with one so false, so fatal.

Alt. It is too much for friendship to allow thee.
Because I tamely bore the wrong thou didst her,

Thou dost avow the barb'rous, brutal part,
And urge the injury ev'n to my face.

Hor. I see she has got possession of thy heart,

She has charm'd thee, like a siren, to her bed,
With looks of love, and with enchanting sounds:
Too late the rocks and quicksands will appear,
When thou art wreck'd upon the faithless shore,
Then vainly wish thou hadst not left thy friend,
To follow her delusion.

Alt. If thy friendship

Does churlishly deny my love a room,
It is not worth my keeping; I disclaim it.

Hor. Canst thou so soon forget what I've been to thee?

I shad' the task of nature with thy father,
And form'd with care thy unexperienc'd youth
To virtue and to arms.

Thy noble father, oh, thou light young man!
Would he have us'd me thus? One fortune fed us;

For his was ever mine, mine his, and both
Together flourish'd, and together fell.
He call'd me friend, like thee: would he have left me

Thus for a woman, and a vile one, too?

Alt. Thou canst not, darst not mean it!
Speak again,

Say, who is vile; but dare not name Calista.

Hor. I had not spoke at first, unless compell'd,
And forc'd to clear myself; but since thus urg'd
I must avow, I do not know a viler.

Alt. Thou wert my father's friend; he lov'd thee well;

A kind of venerable mark of him
Hangs round thee, and protects thee from my vengeance.

I cannot, dare not lift my sword against thee,
But henceforth never let me see thee more.

[Going out.

Hor. I love thee still, ungrateful as thou art,
And must and will preserve thee from dishonour,
Ev'n in despite of thee.

[Holds him.

Alt. Let go my arm.

Hor. If honour be thy care, if thou wouldst live
Without the name of credulous, wittol husband,
Avoid thy bride, shun her detested bed,
The joys it yields are dash'd with poison —

Alt. Off!

To urge me but a minute more is fatal.

Hor. She is polluted, stain'd —

Alt. Madness and raging!

But hence —

Hor. Dishonour'd by the man you hate —

Alt. I pr'ythee loose me yet, for thy own sake,
If life be worth thy keeping —

Hor. By Lothario.

Alt. Perdition take thee, villain, for the falsehood!

[Strikes him.

Now, nothing but thy life can make atonement.

Hor. A blow! thou hast us'd me well —

[Draws.

Alt. This to thy heart —

Hor. Yet hold — By heav'n his father's in his face!

Spite of my wrongs, my heart runs o'er with tenderness,

And I could rather die myself than hurt him.

Alt. Defend thyself; for by much-wrong'd love,
I swear, the poor evasion shall not save thee.

Hor. Yet hold — thou know'st I dare.

[They fight.

Enter LAVINIA, who runs between their Swords.

Lav. My brother, my Horatio! Is it possible?

Oh, turn your cruel swords upon Lavinia.

If you must quench your impious rage in blood,
Behold, my heart shall give you all her store,
To save those dearer streams that flow from yours.

Alt. 'Tis well thou hast found a safeguard;
none but this,

No pow'r on earth, could save thee from my fury.

Hor. Safety from thee!

Away, vain boy! Hast thou forgot the rev'rence
Due to my arm, thy first, thy great example,
Which pointed out thy way to noble daring,
And show'd thee what it was to be a man?

Lav. What busy, meddling fiend, what foe to goodness,
Could kindle such a discord?

Hor. Ask'st thou what made us foes? 'Twas base ingratitude,
'Twas such a sin to friendship, as heav'n's mercy,
That strives with man's untoward, monstrous wickedness,

Unwearied with forgiving, scarce could pardon.
He who was all to me, child, brother, friend,
With barb'rous, bloody malice, sought my life.

Alt. Thou art my sister, and I would not make thee

The lonely mourner of a widow'd bed;
Therefore thy husband's life is safe: but warn him,
No more to know this hospitable roof.
He has but ill repaid Sciolto's bounty.

We must not meet; 'tis dangerous. Farewell.

[He is going, Lavinia holds him.

Lav. Stay, Altamont, my brother, stay;

Alt. It cannot, sha'not be — you must not

Lav. Look kindly, then. [hold me.

Alt. Each minute that I stay,

Is a new injury to fair Calista.
From thy false friendship, to her arms I'll fly;
Then own, the joys which on her charms attend,
Have more than paid me for my faithless friend.

[Breaks from Lavinia, and exit.

Hor. Oh, raise thee, my Lavinia, from the earth.
It is too much; this tide of flowing grief,
This wondrous waste of tears, too much to give
To an ungrateful friend, and cruel brother.

Lav. Is there not cause for weeping? Oh, Horatio!

A brother and a husband were my treasure,
'Twas all the little wealth that poor Lavinia
Sav'd from the shipwreck of her father's fortunes.
One half is lost already. If thou leav'st me,
If thou shouldst prove unkind to me, as Altamont,

Whom shall I find to pity my distress,
To have compassion on a helpless wanderer,
And give her where to lay her wretched head?

Hor. Why dost thou wound me with thy soft complainings?

Though Altamont be false, and use me hardly,
Yet think not I impute his crimes to thee.

Talk not of being forsaken; for I'll keep thee
Next to my heart, my certain pledge of happiness.

Lav. Then you will love me still, cherish me ever,

And hide me from misfortune in your bosom?

Hor. But for the love I owe the good Sciolto,
From Genoa, from falsehood and inconstancy,
To some more honest, distant clime I'd go.

Nor would I be beholden to my country,
For aught but thee, the partner of my flight.

Lav. And I would follow thee; forsake, for thee,
My country, brother, friends, ev'n all I have

Though mine's a little all, yet were it more,
And better far, it should be left for thee,
And all that I would keep should be Horatio.
So, when a merchant sees his vessel lost,
Though richly freighted from a foreign coast,
Gladly, for life, the treasure he would give,
And only wishes to escape, and live:
Gold and his gains no more employ his mind;
But driving o'er the billows with the wind,
Cleaves to one faithful plank, and leaves the rest behind. [Exeunt.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—A Garden.

LOTHARIO and CALISTA discovered.

Loth. Weep not, my fair; but let the god
of love

Laugh in thy eyes, and revel in thy heart,
Kindle again his torch, and hold it high,
To light us to new joys. Nor let a thought
Of discord, or disquiet past, molest thee;
But to a long oblivion give thy cares,
And let us melt the present hour in bliss.

Cal. Seek not to sooth me with thy false endearments,

To charm me with thy softness: 'tis in vain:
Thou canst no more betray, nor I be ruin'd.
The hours of folly and of fond delight,
Are wasted all, and fled; those that remain
Are doom'd to weeping, anguish, and repentance.
I come to charge thee with a long account
Of all the sorrows I have known already,
And all I have to come; thou hast undone me.

Loth. Unjust Calista! dost thou call it ruin
To love as we have done; to melt, to languish,
To wish for somewhat exquisitely happy,
And then be blest ev'n to that wish's height?
To die with joy, and straight to live again;
Speechless to gaze, and with tumultuous transport—

Cal. Oh, let me hear no more; I cannot bear it;

'Tis deadly to remembrance. Let that night,
That guilty night, be blotted from the year;
For 'twas the night that gave me up to shame,
To sorrow, to the false Lothario.

Loth. Hear this, ye pow'rs! mark, how the fair deceiver

Sadly complains of violated truth;
She calls me false, ev'n she, the faithless she,
Whom day and night, whom heav'n and earth,
have heard

Sighing to vow, and tenderly protest,
Ten thousand times, she would be only mine;
And yet, behold, she has giv'n herself away,
Fled from my arms, and wedded to another,
Ev'n to the man whom most I hate on earth.—

Cal. Art thou so base to upbraid me with a crime,

Which nothing but thy cruelty could cause?
If indignation raging in my soul,
For thy unmanly insolence and scorn,
Urg'd me to do a deed of desperation,
And wound myself to be reveng'd on thee,
Think whom I should devote to death and hell,
Whom curse as my undoer, but Lothario;
Hadst thou been just, not all Sciolto's pow'r,
Not all the vows and pray'rs of sighing Altamont,
Could have prevail'd, or won me to forsake thee.

Loth. How have I fail'd in justice, or in love?
Burns not my flame as brightly as at first?

Ev'n now my heart beats high, I languish for thee,
My transports are as fierce, as strong my wishes,
As if thou ne'er hadst bless'd me with thy beauty.

Cal. How didst thou dare to think that I would live

A slave to base desires and brutal pleasures,
To be a wretched wanton for thy leisure,
To toy and waste an hour of idle time with?
My soul disdains thee for so mean a thought.

Loth. The driving storm of passion will have way,

And I must yield before it. Wert thou calm,
Love, the poor criminal whom thou hast doom'd,
Has yet a thousand tender things to plead,
To charm thy rage, and mitigate his fate.

Enter ALTAMONT behind.

Alt. Ha! do I live and wake? [Aside.]

Cal. Hadst thou been true, how happy had
I been!

Not Altamont, but thou, hadst been my lord.
But wherefore nam'd I happiness with thee?
It is for thee, for thee, that I am curs'd;

For thee my secret soul each hour arraigns me,
Calls me to answer for my virtue stain'd,
My honour lost to thee: for thee it haunts me
With stern Sciolto vowing vengeance on me,
With Altamont complaining for his wrongs—

Alt. Behold him here— [Coming forward.]

Cal. Ah! [Starting.]

Alt. The wretch! whom thou hast made.
Curses and sorrows hast thou heap'd upon him,
And vengeance is the only good that's left.

[Drawing.]

Loth. Thou hast ta'en me somewhat unawares, 'tis true:

But love and war take turns, like day and night,
And little preparation serves my turn,
Equal to both, and arm'd for either field,
We've long been foes; this moment ends our quarrel;

Earth, heav'n, and fair Calista, judge the combat!

[They fight; Lothario falls.]

Oh, Altamont! thy genius is the stronger!
Thou hast prevail'd!—My fierce, ambitious soul
Declining droops, and all her fires grow pale;
Yet let not this advantage swell thy pride,
I conquer'd in my turn, in love I triumph'd.
Those joys are lodg'd beyond the reach of fate;
That sweet revenge comes smiling to my
thoughts,

Adorns my fall, and cheers my heart in dying.

[Dies.]

Cal. And what remains for me, beset with shame,

Encompass'd round with wretchedness? There is
But this one way to break the toil, and 'scape.

[She catches up Lothario's Sword, and offers to kill herself; Altamont runs to her, and wrests it
from her.]

Alt. What means thy frantic rage?

Cal. Off! let me go.

Alt. Oh! thou hast more than murder'd me;
yet still,

Still art thou here! and my soul starts with horror,
At thought of any danger that may reach thee.

Cal. Think'st thou I mean to live? to be forgiven?

Oh, thou hast known but little of Calista!
If thou hadst never heard my shame, if only
The midnight moon and silent stars had seen it,

I would not bear to be reproach'd by them,
But dig down deep to find a grave beneath,
And hide me from their beams.

Sci. [Within] What, ho! my son!

Cal. Is it the voice of thunder, or my father?
Madness! Confusion! let the storm come on,
Let the tumultuous roar drive all upon me;
Dash my devoted bark, ye surges, break it!
'Tis for my ruin that the tempest rises.
When I am lost, sunk to the bottom low,
Peace shall return, and all be calm again.

Enter SCIOLO.

Sci. Ev'n now Rossano leap'd the garden wall—

Ha! death has been among you—Oh, my fears!
Last night thou hadst a difference with thy friend,
The cause thou gav'st me for it, was a damn'd one.
Didst thou not wrong the man who told thee truth?

Answer me quick—

All. Oh! press me not to speak;
Ev'n now my heart is breaking, and the mention
Will lay me dead before you. See that body,
And guess my shame! my ruin! Oh, Calista!

Sci. It is enough! but I am slow to execute,
And justice lingers in my lazy hand;
Thus let me wipe dishonour from my name,
And cut thee from the earth, thou stain to goodness—

[Offers to kill Calista; Altamont holds him.]

Alt. Stay thee, Sciolto, thou rash father, stay,
Or turn the point on me, and through my breast
Cut out the bloody passage to Calista;
So shall my love be perfect, while for her
I die, for whom alone I wish'd to live.

Cal. No, Altamont; my heart, that scorn'd thy love,

Shall never be indebted to thy pity.
Thus torn, defac'd, and wretched as I seem,
Still I have something of Sciolto's virtue.
Yes, yes, my father, I applaud thy justice;
Strike home, and I will bless thee for the blow;
Be merciful, and free me from my pain;
'Tis sharp, 'tis terrible, and I could curse
The cheerful day, men, earth, and heav'n, and thee,

Ev'n thee, thou venerable, good, old man,
For being author of a wretch like me.

Sci. Thy pious care has giv'n me time to think,
And sav'd me from a crime; then rest, my sword;
To honour have I kept thee ever sacred,
Nor will I stain thee with a rash revenge.
But, mark me well, I will have justice done;
Hope not to bear away thy crimes unpunish'd:
I will see justice executed on thee,

Ev'n to a Roman strictness; and thou, nature,
Or whatsoe'er thou art that plead'st within me,
Be still; thy tender strugglings are in vain.

Cal. Then am I doom'd to live, and bear your triumph?

To groan beneath your scorn and fierce upbraiding,

Daily to be reproach'd, and have my misery
At morn, at noon, at night, told over to me?
Is this, is this the mercy of a father?

I only beg to die, and he denies me.

Sci. Hence from my sight! thy father cannot bear thee;

Fly with thy infamy to some dark cell,
Where, on the confines of eternal night,
Mourning, misfortune, cares, and anguish dwell;

Where ugly shame hides her opprobrious head,
And death and hell detested rule maintain;
There howl out the remainder of thy life,
And wish thy name may be no more remember'd.

Cal. Yes, I will fly to some such dismal place,
And be more curs'd than you can wish I were;
This fatal form, that drew on my undoing,
Fasting, and tears, and hardships, shall destroy;
Nor light, nor food, nor comfort will I know,
Nor aught that may continue hated life.

Then when you see me meagre, wan, and chang'd,
Stretch'd at my length, and dying in my cave,
On that cold earth I mean shall be my grave,
Perhaps you may relent, and sighing say,
At length her tears have wash'd her stains away;
At length 'tis time her punishment should cease;
Die, thou poor suffering wretch, and be at peace.

[Exit.]

Sci. Who of my servants wait there?

Enter two or three Servants.

Raise that body, and bear it in. On your lives
Take care my doors be guarded well, that none
Pass out, or enter, but by my appointment.

[Exeunt Servants, with Lothario's Body.]

Alt. There is a fatal fury in your visage,
It blazes fierce, and menaces destruction.
I tremble at the vengeance which you meditate
On the poor, faithless, lovely, dear Calista.

Sci. Hast thou not read what brave Virginius did?

With his own hand he slew his only daughter,
To save her from the fierce Decemvir's lust.
He slew her yet unspotted, to prevent
The shame which she might know. Then what should I do?

But thou hast ty'd my hand.—I wo'not kill her;
Yet, by the ruin she has brought upon us,
The common infamy that brands us both,
She sha'not 'scape.

Alt. You mean that she shall die then?

Sci. Ask me not what, nor how I have resolv'd,
For all within is anarchy and uproar.
Oh, Altamont! what a vast scheme of joy
Has this one day destroy'd? Well did I hope
This daughter would have bless'd my latter days;
That I should live to see you the world's wonder,
So happy, great, and good, that none were like you.

While I, from busy life and care set free,
Had spent the evening of my age at home,
Among a little prattling race of yours:
There, like an old man, talk'd awhile, and then Laid down and slept in peace. Instead of this,
Sorrow and shame must bring me to my grave—
Oh, damn her! damn her!

Enter a Servant.

Serv. Arm yourself, my lord:

Rossano, who but now escap'd the garden,
Has gather'd in the street a band of rioters,
Who threaten you and all your friends with ruin,
Unless Lothario be return'd in safety. [Exit.]

Sci. By heav'n, their fury rises to my wish,
Nor shall misfortune know my house alone;
But thou, Lothario, and thy race shall pay me
For all the sorrows which my age is curs'd with.
I think my name as great, my friends as potent,
As any in the state; all shall be summon'd;
I know that all will join their hands to ours,
And vindicate thy vengeance. When our force
Is full and arm'd, we shall expect thy sword

To join with us, and sacrifice to justice. [Exit.
All. There is a heavy weight upon my senses;
 A dismal, sullen stillness, that succeeds
 The storm of rage and grief, like silent death,
 After the tumult and the noise of life.
 Would it were death, as sure 'tis wondrous like it,
 For I am sick of living; my soul's pall'd,
 She kindles not with anger or revenge;
 Love was th' informing, active fire within:
 Now that is quench'd, the mass forgets to move,
 And longs to mingle with its kindred earth.

[Exit.

ACT V.

SCENE I.—A Room hung with black; on one Side LOTHARIO'S Body on a Bier; on the other a Table, with a Scull and other Bones, a Book and a Lamp on it.

CALISTA is discovered on a Couch, in black; her Hair hanging loose and disordered. After soft Music she rises and comes forward.

Cal. 'Tis well! these solemn sounds, this pomp of horror,
 Are fit to feed the frenzy in my soul.
 Here's room for meditation ev'n to madness,
 Till the mind burst with thinking. This dull flame
 Sleeps in the socket. Sure the book was left
 To tell me something;—for instruction then—
 He teaches holy sorrow and contrition,
 And penitence.—Is it become an art then?
 A trick that lazy, dull, luxurious gownmen
 Can teach us to do over? I'll no more on't;

[Throwing away the Book.

I have more real anguish in my heart,
 Than all their pedant discipline e'er knew.
 What charnel has been rifled for these bones?
 Fie! this is pageantry;—they look uncouthly.
 But what of that, if he or she that own'd 'em
 Safe from disquiet sit, and smile to see
 The farce their miserable relics play?
 But here's a sight is terrible indeed!
 Is this that haughty, gallant, gay Lothario,
 That dear, perfidious—Ah!—how pale he looks!
 And those dead eyes!
 Ascend, ye ghosts, fantastic forms of night,
 In all your different dreadful shapes ascend,
 And watch the present horror, if you can.

Enter SCIOLO.

Sci. This dead of night, this silent hour of darkness,
 Nature for rest ordain'd, and soft repose;
 And yet distraction and tumultuous jars,
 Keep all our frighted citizens awake:
 Amidst the gen'ral wreck, see where she stands,

[Pointing to Calista.

Like Helen, in the night when Troy was sack'd,
 Spectatress of the mischief which she made.

Cal. It is Sciolto! Be thyself, my soul,
 Be strong to bear his fatal indignation,
 That he might see thou art not lost so far,
 But somewhat still of his great spirit lives
 In the forlorn Calista.

Sci. Thou wert once
 My daughter.

Cal. Happy were it I had dy'd,
 And never lost that name.

Sci. That's something yet;
 Thou wert the very darling of my age:
 I thought the day too short to gaze upon thee,
 That all the blessings I could gather for thee,

By cares on earth, and by my pray'rs to heav'n,
 Were little for my fondness to bestow;

Why didst thou turn to folly then, and curse me?

Cal. Because my soul was rudely drawn from yours,

A poor, imperfect copy of my father;
 It was because I lov'd, and was a woman.

Sci. Hadst thou been honest, thou hadst been a cherubim;

But of that joy, as of a gem long lost,
 Beyond redemption gone, think we no more.
 Hast thou e'er dar'd to meditate on death?

Cal. I have, as on the end of shame and sorrow.

Sci. Ha! answer me! Say, hast thou coolly thought?

'Tis not the stoic's lessons got by rote,
 The pomp of words, and pedant dissertations,
 That can sustain thee in that hour of terror;
 Books have taught cowards to talk nobly of it,
 But when the trial comes they stand aghast;
 Hast thou consider'd what may happen after it?
 How thy account may stand, and what to answer?

Cal. I've turn'd my eyes inward upon myself,
 Where foul offence and shame have laid all waste;

Therefore my soul abhors the wretched dwelling,
 And longs to find some better place of rest.

Sci. 'Tis justly thought, and worthy of that spirit

That dwelt in ancient Latian breasts, when Rome
 Was mistress of the world. I would go on,
 And tell thee all my purpose; but it sticks
 Here at my heart, and cannot find a way.

Cal. Then spare the telling, if it be a pain,
 And write the meaning with your poniard here.

Sci. Oh! truly guess'd—seest thou this trembling hand?

[Holding up a Dagger.

Thrice justice urg'd—and thrice the slack'ning sinews

Forgot their office, and confess'd the father.
 At length the stubborn virtue has prevail'd;
 It must, it must be so—Oh! take it then,

[Giving the Dagger.

And know the rest untaught.

Cal. I understand you.

It is but thus, and both are satisfied.

[She offers to kill herself; Sciolto catches hold of her arm.

Sci. A moment, give me yet a moment's space.
 The stern, the rigid judge has been obey'd;
 Now nature, and the father, claim their turns.
 I've held the balance with an iron hand,
 And put off ev'ry tender human thought,
 To doom my child to death; but spare my eyes
 The most unnat'ral sight, lest their strings crack,
 My old brain split, and I grow mad with horror.

Cal. Ha! is it possible? and is there yet
 Some little, dear remain of love and tenderness
 For poor, undone Calista, in your heart?

Sci. Oh! when I think what pleasure I took
 in thee,

What joys thou gav'st me in thy prattling infancy,
 Thy sprightly wit, and early blooming beauty;
 How have I stood and fed my eyes upon thee,
 Then, lifting up my hands and wond'ring
 bless'd thee;

By my strong grief, my heart ev'n melts within me;

I could curse nature, and that tyrant, honour.

For making me thy father and thy judge;
Thou art my daughter still.

Cal. For that kind word,
Thus let me fall, thus humbly to the earth,
Weep on your feet, and bless you for this
goodness.

Oh! 'tis too much for this offending wretch,
This parricide, that murders with her crimes,
Shortens her father's age, and cuts him off,
Ere little more than half his years be number'd.

Sci. Would it were otherwise—but thou
must die.—

Cal. That I must die, it is my only comfort;
Death is the privilege of human nature,
And life without it were not worth our taking:
Come then,

Thou meagre shade; here let me breathe my last,
Charm'd with my father's pity and forgiveness,
More than if angels tun'd their golden viols,
And sung a requiem to my parting soul.

Sci. I'm summon'd hence; ere this my friends expect me.

There is I know not what of sad presage,
That tells me I shall never see thee more;
If it be so, this is our last farewell,
And these the parting pangs, which nature feels,
When anguish rends the heartstrings—Oh,
my daughter! [Exit.

Cal. Now think, thou curs'd Calista, now behold

The desolation, horror, blood, and ruin,
Thy crimes and fatal folly spread around,
That loudly cry for vengeance on thy head;
Yet heav'n, who knows our weak imperfect
natures,

How blind with passions, and how prone to evil,
Makes not too strict inquiry for offences,
But is aton'd by penitence and pray'r:
Cheap recompense! here 'twould not be receiv'd;
Nothing but blood can make the expiation,
And cleanse the soul from inbred deep pollution.
And see, another injur'd wretch appears,
To call for justice from my tardy hand.

Enter ALTAMONT.

All. Hail to you, horrors! hail, thou house
of death!

And thou, the lovely mistress of these shades,
Whose beauty gilds the more than midnight darkness,

And makes it grateful as the dawn of day.
Oh, take me in, a fellow mourner, with thee,
I'll number groan for groan, and tear for tear;
And when the fountain of thy eyes are dry,
Mine shall supply the stream, and weep for both.

Cal. I know thee well, thou art the injur'd Altamont!

Thou com'st to urge me with the wrongs I've done thee;

But know I stand upon the brink of life,
And in a moment mean to set me free
From shame and thy upbraiding.

All. Falsely, falsely
Dost thou accuse me! O, forbid me not
To mourn thy loss,
To wish some better fate had rul'd our loves,
And that Calista had been mine, and true.

Cal. Oh, Altamont! 'tis hard for souls like mine,
Mighty and fierce, to yield they've done amiss.
But, oh, behold! my proud, disdainful heart
Bends to thy gentler virtue. Yes, I own,
Such is thy truth, thy tenderness, and love,

That, were I not abandon'd to destruction,
With thee I might have liv'd for ages bless'd,
And died in peace within thy faithful arms.

Enter HORATIO.

Hor. Now mourn indeed, ye miserable pair!
For now the measure of your woes is full.
The great, the good Sciolto dies this moment.

Cal. My father!

All. That's a deadly stroke indeed.

Hor. Not long ago, he privately went forth,
Attended but by few, and those unbidden.
I heard which way he took, and straight pur-
su'd him;

But found him compass'd by Lothario's faction,
Almost alone, amidst a crowd of foes.

Too late we brought him aid, and drove them
back;

Ere that, his frantic valour had provok'd
The death he seem'd to wish for from their swords.

Cal. And dost thou bear me yet, thou patient earth?

Dost thou not labour with thy murd'rous weight?
And you, ye glitt'ring, heav'nly host of stars,
Hide your fair heads in clouds, or I shall blast you;
For I am all contagion, death, and ruin,
And nature sickens at me. Rest, thou world,
This parricide shall be thy plague no more;
Thus, thus I set thee free. [Stabs herself.

Hor. Oh, fatal rashness!

Enter SCIOLTO, pale and bloody, supported by Servants.

Cal. Oh, my heart!

Well may'st thou fail; for see, the spring that fed
Thy vital stream is wasted, and runs low.
My father! will you now, at last, forgive me,
If, after all my crimes, and all your suff'rings,
I call you once again by that dear name?
Will you forget my shame, and those wide
wounds?

Lift up your hand and bless me, ere I go
Down to my dark abode!

Sci. Alas, my daughter!

Thou hast rashly ventur'd in a stormy sea,
Where life, fame, virtue, all were wreck'd and lost.

But sure thou hast borne thy part in all the anguish,

And smarted with the pain. Then rest in peace:
Let silence and oblivion hide thy name,
And save thee from the malice of posterity;
And may'st thou find with heav'n the same forgiveness,

As with thy father here.—Die, and be happy.

Cal. Celestial sounds! Peace dawns upon
my soul,

And ev'ry pain grows less—Oh, gentle Altamont!
Think not too hardly of me when I'm gone;
But pity me—Had I but early known
Thy wondrous worth, thou excellent young man,
We had been happier both—Now 'tis too late;
And yet my eyes take pleasure to behold thee;
Thou art their last dear object—Mercy, heav'n!
[Dies.

Sci. Oh, turn thee from that fatal object,
Altamont!

Come near, and let me bless thee ere I die.
To thee and brave Horatio I bequeath
My fortunes—Lay me by thy noble father,
And love my memory as thou hast his;
For thou hast been my son—Oh, gracious heav'n!

Thou that hast endless blessings still in store
 For virtue and for filial piety,
 Let grief, disgrace, and want be far away;
 But multiply thy mercies on his head.
 Let honour, greatness, goodness, still be with him,
 And peace in all his ways—

Hor. The storm of grief bears hard upon his youth,

And bends him, like a drooping flow'r, to earth.
 By such examples are we taught to prove
 The sorrows that attend unlawful love.
 Death, or some worse misfortune, soon divide
 The injur'd bridegroom from his guilty bride.
 If you would have the nuptial union last,
 Let virtue be the bond that ties it fast.

[Exeunt.]

HUGHES.

THIS amiable man, and elegant author, was the son of a citizen of London, and was born at Marlborough, in Wiltshire, on the 29th of Jan. 1677, but received the rudiments of his education in private schools at London. Even in the very earliest parts of life his genius seemed to show itself equally inclined to each of the three sister arts, music, poetry, and design, in all which he made a very considerable progress. To his excellence in these qualifications, his contemporary and friend, Sir Richard Steele, bears the following extraordinary testimonial: "He may (says that author) be the emulation of more persons of different talents than any one I have ever known. His head, hands, or heart, were always employed in something worthy imitation. His pencil, his bow, or his pen, each of which he used in a masterly manner, were always directed to raise and entertain his own mind, or that of others, to a more cheerful prosecution of what is noble and virtuous." Such is the evidence borne to his talents by a writer of the first rank; yet he seems, for the most part, to have pursued these and other polite studies little further than by the way of agreeable amusements, under frequent confinement, occasioned by indisposition and a valetudinary state of health. Mr. Hughes had, for some time, an employment in the office of ordnance, and was secretary to two or three commissions under the great seal for the purchase of lands, in order to the better securing the docks and harbours at Portsmouth, Chatham, and Harwich. In the year 1717, the Lord Chancellor Cowper, to whom our author had not long been known, thought proper, without any previous solicitation, to nominate him his secretary for the commissions of the peace, and to distinguish him with singular marks of his favour and affection; and, upon his Lordship's laying down the great seal, he was, at the particular recommendation of this his patron, and with the ready concurrence of his successor the Earl of Macclesfield, continued in the same employment, which he held till the time of his decease, the 17th, of Feb. 1719, being the very night on which his celebrated tragedy of The Siege of Damascus made its first appearance on the stage; when, after a life mostly spent in pain and sickness, he was carried off by a consumption having but barely completed his 42d year, and at a period in which he had just arrived at an agreeable competence, and was advancing, with rapid steps, towards the pinnacle of fame and fortune. He was privately buried in the vault under the chancel of St Andrew's church, in Holborn.

THE SIEGE OF DAMASCUS.

ACTED at Drury Lane 1719. It is generally allowed, that the characters in this tragedy are finely varied and distinguished; that the sentiments are just and well adapted to the characters; that it abounds with beautiful descriptions, apt allusions to the manners and opinions of the times wherein the scene is laid, and with noble morals; that the diction is pure, unaffected and sublime, without any meteors of style or ambitious ornaments; and that the plot is conducted in a simple and clear manner. When it was offered to the managers of Drury Lane House, in the year 1718, they refused to act it, unless the author made an alteration in the character of Phocyas, who, in the original, had been prevailed upon to profess himself a Mahometan: pretending that he could not be a hero, if he changed his religion, and that the audience would not bear the sight of him after it, in how lively a manner never his remorse and repentance might be described. The author (being then in a very languishing condition) finding, if he did not comply, his relations would probably loose the benefit of the play, consented, though with reluctance, to new-model the character of Phocyas. The story on which this play is founded, is amply detailed in Mr. Gibbon's History, vol. V. p. 310, where we find the real name of Phocyas to have been Jonas. That author says, "Instead of a base renegade, Phocyas serves the Arabs as an honourable ally; instead of prompting their pursuit, he flies to the succour of his countrymen, and, after killing Caled and Daran, is himself mortally wounded, and expires in the presence of Eudocia, who professes her resolution to take the veil at Constantinople."

ACT I.

SCENE I.—The City.

Enter EUMENES, followed by a Crowd of People.

Eum. I'll hear no more. Be gone!
 Or stop your clam'rous mouths, that still are open
 To bawl sedition and consume our corn.
 If you will follow me, send home your women,
 And follow to the walls; there earn your safety,

As brave men should.—Pity your wives and children!

Yes, I do pity them, heav'n knows I do,
 E'en more than you; nor will I yield them up,
 Though at your own request, a prey to ruffians.—
Herbis, what news?

Enter HERBIS.

Her. News!—we're betray'd, deserted;
 The works are but half mann'd; the Saracens

Perceive it, and pour on such crowds, they blunt
Our weapons, and have drain'd our stores of
death.

What will you next?

Eum. I've sent a fresh recruit.

The valiant Phocyas leads them on — whose
deeds,

In early youth, assert his noble race;

A more than common ardour seems to warm
His breast, as if he lov'd and courted danger.

Her. I fear 'twill be too late.

Eum. I fear it too:

And though I brav'd it to the trembling crowd,
I've caught th' infection, and I dread th'event.

Would I had treated! — but 'tis now too late, —

[Aside.

Come, Herbis.

[Exeunt.

A great Shout. Re-enter HERBIS.

Her. So — the tide turns; Phocyas has driv'n it back.

The gate once more is ours.

Flourish. Re-enter EUMENES, with PHOCYAS, ARTAMON, etc.

Eum. Brave Phocyas, thanks! mine and the people's thanks.

Yet, that we may not lose this breathing space,
Hang out the flag of truce. You, Artamon,
Haste with a trumpet to th' Arabian chiefs,
And let them know, that, hostages exchang'd,
I'd meet them now upon the eastern plain.

[Exit Artamon.

Pho. What means Eumenes?

Eum. Phocyas, I would try,
By friendly treaty, if on terms of peace
They'll yet withdraw their pow'rs.

Pho. On terms of peace!

What peace can you expect from bands of robbers?

What terms from slaves but slavery? — You know
These wretches fight not at the call of honour,
That sets the princes of the world in arms.
Base-born, and starv'd, amidst their stony deserts,
Long have they view'd from far, with wishing
eyes,

Our fruitful vales, and all the verdant wealth
That crowns fair Lebanon's aspiring brows.
Here have the locusts pitch'd, nor will they leave These tasted sweets, these blooming fields of plenty,

For barren sands and native poverty,
Till driv'n away by force.

Eum. What can we do?

Our people in despair; our soldiers harass'd
With daily toil and constant nightly watch;
Our hopes of succour from the emperor
Uncertain; Eutyches not yet return'd,
That went to ask them; one brave army beaten;
Th' Arabians num'rous, cruel, flush'd with conquest.

Her. Besides, you know what frenzy fires
their minds,
Of their new faith, and drives them on to danger.

Eum. True: — they pretend the gates of Paradise

Stand ever open to receive the souls
Of all that die in fighting for their cause.

Pho. Then would I send their souls to Paradise,
And give their bodies to our Syrian eagles.
Our ebb of fortune is not yet so low,

To leave us desperate. Aids may soon arrive;
Mean time, in spite of their late bold attack,
The city still is ours; their force repell'd,
And therefore weaker: proud of this success,
Our soldiers too have gain'd redoubled courage,
And long to meet them on the open plain.
What hinders then but we repay this outrage,
And sally on their camp?

Eum. No — let us first

Believe th' occasion fair, by this advantage,
To purchase their retreat on easy terms:
That failing, we the better stand acquitted
To our own citizens. However, brave Phocyas,
Cherish this ardour in the soldiery,
And in our absence form what force thou canst;
Then if these hungry bloodhounds of the war
Should still be deaf to peace, at our return
Our widen'd gates shall pour a sudden flood
Of vengeance on them, and chastise their scorn.

[Exeunt.

SCENE II. — A Plain before the City. A Prospect of Tents at a distance.

Enter CALED, ABUDAH, and DARAN.

Daran. To treat, my chiefs! — What! are we merchants then,

That only come to traffic with those Syrians,
And poorly cheapen conquest on conditions?
No: we were sent to fight the caliph's battles,
Till every iron neck bend to obedience.

Another storm makes this proud city ours;
What need we treat? — I am for war and plunder.

Caled. Why, so am I; and but to save the lives

Of mussulmans, not Christians, I would treat.
I hate these Christian dogs; and 'tis our task,
As thou observ'st, to fight; our law enjoins it:
Heaven, too, is promis'd only to the valiant.
Oft has our prophet said, the happy plains
Above lie stretch'd beneath the blaze of swords.

Abu. Yet Daran's loath to trust that heaven
for pay;

This earth, it seems, has gifts that please him
more.

Caled. Check not his zeal, Abudah.

Abu. No; I praise it.

Yet I could wish that zeal had better motives.
Has victory no fruits but blood and plunder?
That we were sent to fight, 'tis true; but wherefore?

For conquest, not destruction. That obtain'd,
The more we spare, the caliph has more subjects,
And heaven is better serv'd. — But see, they come!

[Trumpets.

Enter EUMENES, HERBIS, and ARTAMON.

Caled. Well, Christians, we are met — and war awhile,

At your request, has still'd his angry voice,
To hear what you will purpose.

Eum. We come to know,

After so many troops you've lost in vain,
If you'll draw off in peace, and save the rest?

Her. Or rather to know first — for yet we know not —

Why on your heads you call our pointed arrows,

In our own just defence? What means this visit?
And why see we so many thousand tents
Rise in the air, and whiten all our fields?

Caled. Is that a question now? you had our summons,

When first we march'd against you, to surrender.
Two moons have wasted since, and now the third
Is in its wane. 'Tis true, drawn off awhile;
At Aiznadin we met and fought the powers
Sent by your emperor to raise our siege.
Vainly you thought us gone; we gain'd a conquest.

You see we are return'd; our hearts, our cause,
Our swords the same.

Her. But why those swords were drawn,
And what's the cause, inform us?

Eum. Speak your wrongs,
If wrongs you have receiv'd, and by what means
They may be now repair'd.

Abu. Then, Christians, hear,
And heaven inspire you to embrace its truth!
Not wrongs I avenge, but to establish right,
Our swords were drawn: for such is heaven's command

Immutable. By us great Mahomet,
And his successor, holy Abubeker,
Invite you to the faith.

Eum. Now, in the name of heaven, what faith is this,
That stalks gigantic forth thus arm'd with terrors,
As if it meant to ruin, not to save;
That leads embattled legions to the field,
And marks its progress out with blood and slaughter?

Her. Bold, frontless men! that impudently dare
To blend religion with the worst of crimes!
And sacrilegiously usurp that name,
To cover fraud, and justify oppression!

Eum. Where are your priests! What doctors of your law
Have you e'er sent to instruct us in its precepts,
To solve our doubts, and satisfy our reason,
And kindly lead us through the wilds of error,
To these new tracts of truth?—This would be friendship,

And well might claim our thanks.

Caled. Friendship like this
With scorn had been receiv'd: your numerous vices,
Your clashing sects, your mutual rage and strife,
Have driven religion, and her angel guards,
Like outcasts from among you. In her stead,
Usurping superstition bears the sway,
And reigns in mimic state, midst idol shows,
And pageantry of power. Who does not mark
Your lives, rebellious to your own great prophet,
Who mildly taught you?—Therefore Mahomet
Has brought the sword, to govern you by force.

Eum. O, solemn truths! though from an impious tongue! [Aside.
That we're unworthy of our holy faith,
To heaven, with grief and conscious shame,
we own.

But what are you that thus arraign our vices,
And consecrate your own?
Are you not sons of rapine, foes to peace,
Base robbers, murderers?

Caled. Christians, no.

Eum. Then say,
Why have you ravag'd all our peaceful borders?
Plunder'd our towns? and by what claim, e'en
You tread this ground? [now,

Her. What claim, but that of hunger?
The claim of ravenous wolves, that leave their dens

To prowl at midnight round some sleeping village,
Or watch the shepherd's folded flock for prey?

Caled. Blasphemer, know, your fields and towns are ours;

Our prophet has bestow'd them on the faithful,
And heaven itself has ratified the grant.

Eum. Oh! now indeed you boast a noble title!
What could your prophet grant? a hireling slave!
Not e'en the mules and camels which he drove,
Were his to give; and yet the bold impostor
Has canton'd out the kingdoms of the earth,
In frantic fits of visionary power,
To sooth his pride, and bribe his fellow madmen!

Caled. Was is for this you sent to ask a parley,
To affront our faith, and to traduce our prophet?
Well might we answer you with quick revenge
For such indignities—Yet hear, once more,
Hear this, our last demand; and, this accepted,
We yet withdraw our war. Be Christians still;
But swear to live with us in firm alliance,
To yield us aid, and pay us annual tribute.

Eum. No: should we grant you aid, we must be rebels;

And tribute is the slavish badge of conquest.
Yet since, on just and honourable terms,
We ask but for our own—Ten silken vests, Weighty with pearls and gems, we'll send your caliph;

Two, Caled, shall be thine; two thine, Abudah.
To each inferior captain we decree
A turban spun from our Damascus flax,
White as the snows of heaven; to every soldier
A scymitar. This, and of solid gold
Ten ingots, be the price to buy your absence.

Caled. This, and much more, even all your shining wealth,
Will soon be ours. Behold our march O'er half your land, like flame through fields of harvest;

And, last, view Aiznadin, that vale of blood!
There seek the souls of forty thousand Greeks,
That, fresh from life, yet hover o'er their bodies.
Then think, and then resolve.

Her. Presumptuous men!
What though you yet can boast successful guilt,
Is conquest only yours? Or dare you hope
That you shall still pour on the swelling tide,
Like some proud river that has left its banks,
Nor ever know repulse?

Eum. Have you forgot!
Not twice seven years are past, since e'en your prophet,
Bold as he was, and boasting aid divine,
Was by the tribe of Corish forc'd to fly,
Poorly to fly, to save his wretched life,
From Mecca to Medina?

Abu. No—forgot!
We well remember how Medina screen'd
That holy head, preserv'd for better days,
And ripening years of glory.

Daran. Why, my chiefs,
Will you waste time, in offering terms despis'd,
To these idolaters?—Words are but air,
Blows would plead better.

Caled. Daran, thou say'st true.
Christians, here end our truce. Behold, once
more

The sword of heaven is drawn! nor shall be sheath'd,
But in the bowels of Damascus.

Eum. That,
Or speedy vengeance and destruction, due
To the proud menacers, as heaven sees fit!

[Exeunt.

SCENE III.—A Garden.Enter EUDOCIA.

Eud. All's hush'd around!—No more the shout of soldiers,
And clash of arms, tumultuous, fill the air.
Methinks this interval of terror seems
Like that, when the loud thunder just has roll'd
O'er our affrighted heads, and, in the heavens,
A momentary silence but prepares
A second and a louder clap to follow.

Enter PHOCYAS.

O no—my hero comes with better omens,
And every gloomy thought is now no more.

Pho. Where is the treasure of my soul?—
Eudocia,
Behold me here impatient, like the miser,
That often steals in secret to his gold,
And counts, with trembling joy and jealous transport,

The shining heaps which he still fears to lose.

Eud. Welcome, thou brave, thou best deserving lover!

How do I doubly share the common safety,
Since 'tis a debt to thee!—But tell me, Phocyas,
Dost thou bring peace?—Thou dost, and I am happy!

Pho. Not yet, Eudocia; 'tis decreed by heaven,
I must do more to merit thy esteem.
Peace, like a frightened dove, has wing'd her flight
To distant hills, beyond these hostile tents;
And through them we must thither force our way,
If we would call the lovely wanderer back
To her forsaken home.

Eud. False, flattering hope!
Vanish'd so soon!—alas, my faithful fears
Return and tell me we must still be wretched!

Pho. Not so, my fair; if thou but gently smile,
Inspiring valour, and presaging conquest,
These barbarous foes to peace and love shall soon
Bechas'd, like fiends, before the morning light,
And all be calm again,

Eud. Is the truce ended?
Must war, alas! renew its bloody rage;
And Phocyas ever be expos'd to danger?

Pho. Think for whose sake danger itself has charms.

Dismiss thy fears: the lucky hour comes on Full fraught with joys, when my big soul no more
Shall labour with this secret of my passion,
To hide it from thy jealous father's eyes.

Just now, by signals from the plain, I've learn'd
That the proud foe refuse us terms of honour;
A sally is resolv'd; the citizens

And soldiers, kindled into sudden fury,
Press all in crowds, and beg I'll lead them on.
O, my Eudocia! if I now succeed—

Did I say, if?—I must, I will; the cause,
Is love, 'tis liberty, it is Eudocia!—

What then shall hinder,
But I may boldly ask thee of Eumenes,
Nor fear a rival's more prevailing claim?

Eud. May blessings still attend thy arms!—
Methinks

I've caught the flame of thy heroic ardour;
And now I see thee crown'd with palm and olive;
The soldiers bring thee back, with songs of triumph,

And loud applauding shouts; thy rescu'd country
Resounds thy praise; our emperor, Heraclius,
Decrees thee honours for a city sav'd;

And pillars rise of monumental brass,
Inscrib'd—"To Phocyas, the deliverer."

Pho. The honours and rewards, which thou hast nam'd,

Are bribes too little for my vast ambition.
My soul is full of thee!—Thou art my all,
Of fame, of triumph, and of future fortune.
'Twas love of thee first sent me forth in arms;
My service is all thine, to thee devoted;
And thou alone canst make e'en conquest
pleasing.

Eud. O, do not wrong thy merit, nor restrain it

To narrow bounds; but know, I best am pleas'd
To share thee with thy country. Oh, my Phocyas!
With conscious blushes oft I've heard thy vows,
And strove to hide, yet more reveal'd my heart;
But 'tis thy virtue justifies my choice,
And what at first was weakness, now is glory.

Pho. Forgive me, thou fair pattern of all
goodness,

If, in the transport of unbounded passion,
I still am lost to every thought but thee.

Yet sure to love thee thus is every virtue;
Nor need I more perfection.—Hark! I'm call'd.

[Trumpet sounds.

Eud. Then go—and heaven with all its angels guard thee.

Pho. Farewell!—for thee once more I draw the sword.

Now to the field, to gain the glorious prize;
'Tis victory—the word—Eudocia's eyes!

[Exeunt.

ACT II.

SCENE I.—The Governor's Palace.Enter EUMENES and HERBIS.

Her. Still I must say 'twas wrong, 'twas wrong, Eumenes;

And mark th' event!

Eum. What could I less? You saw
'Twas vain t'oppose it, whilst his eager valour,
Impatient of restraint—

Her. His eager valour!

His rashness, his hot youth, his valour's fever!
Must we, whose business 'tis to keep our walls,
And manage warily our little strength;

Must we at once lavish away our blood,
Because his pulse beats high, and his mad courage

Wants to be breath'd in some new enterprize?—
You should not have consented.

Eum. You forget.

'Twas not my voice alone, you saw the people
(And sure such sudden instincts are from heaven!)

Rose all at once to follow him, as if
One soul inspir'd them, and that soul was

Phocyas.

Her. I had indeed forgot, and ask your pardon.

I took you for Eumenes, and I thought
That, in Damascus, you had chief command.

Eum. What dost thou mean?

Her. Nay, who's forgetful now?

You say, the people—Yes, that very people,
That coward tribe that press'd you to surrender!

Well may they spurn at lost authority;
Whom they like better, better they'll obey.

Eum. O I could curse the giddy changeful
slaves,

But that the thought of this hour's great event
Possesses all my soul.—If we are beaten!—

Her. The poison works; 'tis well—I'll give him more. [Aside. True, if we're beaten, who shall answer that? Shall you, or I?—Are you the governor? Or say we conquer, whose is then the praise? Eum. I know thy friendly fears; that thou and I Must stoop beneath a beardless, rising hero! And in Heraclius' court it shall be said, Damascus, nay, perhaps the empire too, Ow'd its deliverance to a boy.—Why be it, So that he now return with victory; 'Tis honour greatly won, and let him wear it. Yet I could wish I needed less his service. Were Eutyches returned—

Her. That, that's my torture. [Aside. I sent my son to the emperor's court, in hopes His merit at this time might raise his fortunes; But Phocyas—curse upon his froward virtues!—Is reaping all this field of fame alone, Or leaves him scarce the gleanings of a harvest.

Eum. See Artamon, with hasty strides returning. He comes alone! Oh! friend, thy fears were just. What are we now, and what is lost Damascus?

Enter ARTAMON.

Art. Joy to Eumenes!

Eum. Joy!—is't possible? Dost thou bring news of victory?

Art. The sun Is set in blood, and from the western skies Has seen three thousand slaughter'd Arabs fall.

Her. Is Phocyas safe?

Art. He is, and crown'd with triumph.

Her. My fears indeed were just.

[Aside. Shout, Flourish. Eum. What noise is that?

Her. The people worshipping their new divinity: Shortly they'll build him temples.

Eum. Tell us, soldier, Since thou hast shar'd the glory of this action, Tell us how it began.

Art. At first the foe Seem'd much surpris'd; but taking soon the alarm, Gather'd some hasty troops, and march'd to meet us.

The captain of these bands look'd wild and fierce, His head unarm'd, as if in scorn of danger, And naked to the waist; as he drew near, He rais'd his arm, and shook a pond'rous lance: When all at once, as at a signal given, We heard the tecbir, so these Arabs call Their shouts of onset, when with loud appeal They challenge heaven, as if demanding conquest. The battle join'd, and through the barbarous host "Fight, fight, and paradise," was all the cry.

At last our leaders met; and gallant Phocyas— But what are words, to tell the mighty wonders We saw him then perform?—Their chief unhors'd,

The Saracens soon broke their ranks, and fled; And had not a thick evening fog arose, The slaughter had been double. But, behold, The hero comes!

Enter PHOCYAS, EUMENES meeting him.

Eum. Joy to brave Phocyas! Eumenes gives him back the joy he sent. The welcome news has reach'd this place before thee.

How shall thy country pay the debt she owes thee?

Pho. By taking this as earnest of a debt Which I owe her, and fain would better pay.

Her. In spite of envy I must praise him too. [Aside.

Phocyas, thou hast done bravely, and 'tis fit Successful virtue take a time to rest.

Fortune is fickle, and may change: besides, What shall we gain, if from a mighty ocean By sluices we draw off some little streams?

If thousands fall, ten thousands more remain. Nor ought we hazard worth so great as thine, Against such odds. Suffice what's done already: And let us now, in hopes of better days, Keep wary watch, and wait th' expected succours.

Pho. What!—to be coop'd whole months within our walls?

To rust at home, and sicken with inaction? The courage of our men will droop and die, If not kept up by daily exercise.

Again the beaten foe may force our gates; And victory, if slighted thus, take wing, And fly where she may find a better welcome.

Eum. Urge him no more:— I'll think of thy late warning; And thou shalt see I'll yet be governor.

[Aside to Her.

Enter a Messenger, with a Letter.

Pho. [Looking on it] 'Tis to Eumenes.

Eum. Ha! from Eutyches.

[Reads] The emperor, awaken'd with the danger

That threatens his dominions, and the loss At Aiznadin, has drain'd his garrisons To raise a second army. In a few hours We will begin our march. Sergius brings this, And will inform you further.—

Her. Heaven, I thank thee!

'Twas even beyond my hopes. [Aside.

Eum. But where is Sergius?

Mes. The letter, fastened to an arrow's head, Vvas shot into the town.

Eum. I fear he's taken.—

O Phocyas, Herbis, Artamon! my friends! You all are sharers in this news; the storm Is blowing o'er that hung like night upon us, And threaten'd deadly ruin. — Haste, proclaim The welcome tidings loud through all the city. Let sparkling lights be seen from every turret, To tell your joy, and spread their blaze to heaven. Prepare for feasts; danger shall wait at distance, And fear be now no more. The jolly soldier And citizen shall meet o'er their full bowls, Forget their toils, and laugh their cares away, And mirth and triumphs close this happy day.

[Exeunt Herbis and Artamon.

Pho. And may succeeding days prove yet more happy!

Well dost thou bid the voice of triumph sound Through all our streets; our city calls thee father: And say, Eumenes, dost thou not perceive A father's transport rise within thy breast, Whilst in this act thou art the hand of heaven, To deal forth blessings, and distribute joy?

Eum. The blessings heaven bestows are freely sent, And should be freely shar'd.

Pho. True—Generous minds Redoubled feel the pleasure they impart. For me, if I've deserv'd by arms or counsels, By hazards, gladly sought and greatly prosper'd,

Whate'er I've added to the public stock,
With joy I see it in Eumenes' hands,
And wish but to receive my share from thee.

Eum. I cannot, if I would, withhold thy share.
What thou hast done is thine, the fame thy own:
And virtuous actions will reward themselves.

Pho. Fame—What is that, if courted for herself?

Less than a vision; a mere sound, an echo,
That calls, with mimic voice, through woods
and labyrinths,

Her cheated lovers; lost and heard by fits,
But never fix'd: a seeming nymph, yet nothing.
Virtue indeed is a substantial good,

A real beauty; yet with weary steps,
Through rugged ways, by long, laborious service,
When we have trac'd, and woo'd, and won
the dame,

May we not then expect the dower she brings?

Eum. Well—ask that dowry; say, can Damascus pay it?

Her riches shall be tax'd; name but the sum,
Her merchants with some costly gems shall grace thee;

Nor can Heraclius fail to grant thee honours,
Proportion'd to thy birth and thy desert.

Pho. And can Eumenes think I would be brib'd

By trash, by sordid gold, to venal virtue?
What! serve my country for the same mean hire,

That can corrupt each villain to betray her?
Why is she sav'd from these Arabian spoilers,
If to be stripp'd by her own sons?—Forgive me
If the thought glows on my cheeks! I know
'Twas mention'd but to prove how much I scorn it.

Yes, Eumenes,
I have ambition—yet the vast reward
That swells my hopes, and equals all my wishes,
Is in thy gift alone—It is Eudocia.

Eum. Eudocia! Phocyas, I am yet thy friend,
And therefore will not hold thee long in doubt.
Thou must not think of her.

Pho. Not think of her!
Impossible.—She's ever present to me!
My life, my soul! She animates my being,
And kindles up my thoughts to worthy actions.
And why, Eumenes, why not think of her?
Is not my rank—

Eum. Forbear—What need a herald,
To tell me who thou art?—Yet once again—
Since thou wilt force me to a repetition,
I say, thou must not think of her.

My choice has destin'd her to Eutyches!

Pho. And has she then consented to that choice?

Eum. Has she consented?—What is her consent?

Is she not mine?

Pho. She is—and in that title,
Ev'n kings with envy may behold thy wealth,
And think their kingdoms poor!—And yet,
Eumenes,

Shall she, by being thine, be barr'd a privilege
Which ev'n the meanest of her sex may claim?
Thou wilt not force her?

Eum. Who has told thee so?
I'd force her to be happy.

Pho. That thou canst not.
What happiness subsists in loss of freedom?

Eum. 'Tis well, young man—Why then I'll learn from thee
To be a very tame, obedient father.

Thou hast already taught my child her duty.

I find the source of all her disobedience,

Her hate of me, her scorn of Eutyches.

Was this the spring of thy romantic bravery,
Thy boastful merit, thy officious service?

Pho. It was—with pride I own it—'twas Eudocia.

I have serv'd thee in serving her; thou know'st it.

Why wilt thou force me thus to be a braggart,

And tell thee that which thou shouldst tell thyself?

It grates my soul—I am not wont to talk thus.

But I recall my words—I have done nothing,

And would disclaim all merit, but my love.

Eum. Oh, no—say on, that thou hast sav'd Damascus;

Is it not so?—Look o'er her battlements,

See if the flying foe have left their camp!

Why are our gates yet clos'd, if thou hast freed us?

'Tis true thou'st fought a skirmish—What of that?

Had Eutyches been present—

Pho. Eutyches!

Why wilt thou urge my temper with that trifler?

Oh, let him come! that in yon spacious plain

We may together charge the thickest ranks,

Rush on to battle, wounds, and glorious death,

And prove who 'twas that best deserv'd Eudocia.

Eum. That will be seen ere long.—But since
I find

Thou arrogantly wouldst usurp dominion,

Believ'st thyself the guardian genius here,

And that our fortunes hang upon thy sword;

Be that first try'd—for know, that from this
moment,

Thou here hast no command. Farewell!—So stay,

Or hence and join the foe; thou hast thy choice. [Exit.

Pho. Spurn'd and degraded!—Proud, ungrateful man!

Am I a bubble then, blown up by thee,

And toss'd into the air, to make thee sport?

Hence to the foe! 'Tis well—Eudocia,

Oh, I will see thee, thou wrong'd excellence!

But how to speak thy wrongs, or my disgrace—

Impossible! Oh, rather let me walk,

Like a dumb ghost, and burst my heart in silence. [Exit.

SCENE II.—The Garden.

Enter EUDOCIA.

Eud. Why must we meet by stealth, like guilty lovers?

But 'twill not long be so. What joy 'twill be

To own my hero in his ripen'd honours,

And hear applauding crowds pronounce me
bless'd!

Sure he'll be here. See the fair rising moon,

Ere day's remaining twilight scarce is spent,

Hangs up her ready lamp, and with mild lustre

Drives back the hovering shade! Come, Phocyas, come;

This gentle season is a friend to love;

And now methinks I could with equal passion,

Meet thine, and tell thee all my secret soul.

Enter PHOCYAS.

He hears me. Oh, my Phocyas!—What, no
answer!

Art thou not he? or art some shadow?—Speak.

Pho. I am indeed a shadow—I am nothing,

Eud. What dost thou mean? For now I know thee, Phocyas.

Pho. And never can be thine!

It will have vent—Oh, barb'rous, curs'd—but hold—

I had forgot—It was Eudocia's father!

Oh, could I too forget how he has us'd me!

Eud. I fear to ask thee.

Pho. Dost thou fear?—Alas,

Then thou wilt pity me. Oh, gen'rous maid!

Thou hast charm'd down the rage that swell'd my heart,

And chok'd my voice; now I can speak to thee.

And yet 'tis worse than death what I have suffer'd;

It is the death of honour!—Yet that's little;

'Tis more, Eudocia, 'tis the loss of thee!

Eud. Hast thou not conquer'd? What are all these shouts,

This voice of gen'ral joy, heard far around?

What are these fires, that cast their glimm'ring light

Against the sky? Are not all these thy triumphs?

Pho. O name not triumph! Talk no more of conquest!

It is indeed a night of gen'ral joy;

But not to me! Eudocia, I am come

To take a last farewell of thee for ever.

Eud. A last farewell!

Pho. Yes.—How wilt thou hereafter

Look on a wretch despis'd, revil'd, cashier'd,

Stripp'd of command, like a base, beaten coward?

Thy cruel father—I have told too much;

I should not but for this have felt the wounds

I got in fight for him—now, now they bleed!

But I have done—and now thou hast my story,

Is there a creature so accurs'd as Phocyas?

Eud. And can it be? Is this then thy reward?

O Phocyas! never wouldst thou tell me yet

That thou hadst wounds; now I must feel them too.

For is it not for me thou hast borne this?

What else could be thy crime? Wert thou a traitor,

Hadst thou betray'd us, sold us to the foe—

Pho. Would I be yet a traitor, I have leave;

Nay, I am dar'd to it, with mocking scorn.

My crime indeed was asking thee; that only

Has cancell'd all, if I had any merit!

The city now is safe, my service slighted,

And I discarded like a useless thing;

Nay, hid be gone—and if I like that better,

Seek out new friends, and join yon barb'rous host!

Eud. Hold—let me think awhile.

[Walks aside.]

Though my heart bleed,

I would not have him see these dropping tears.

And wilt thou go then, Phocyas?

Pho. To my grave.

Where can I bury else this foul disgrace?

Eud. Art thou sure

Thou hast been us'd thus? art thou quite undone?

Pho. Yes, very sure. What dost thou mean?

Eud. That then it is a time for me—O, heav'n! that I

Alone am grateful to this wondrous man!

To own thee, Phocyas, thus—[Gives her Hand]

nay, glory in thee,

And show, without a blush, how much I love.

We must not part!

Pho. Then I am rich again! [Embraces her.]

O no, we will not part! Confirm it, heav'n!

Now thou shalt see how I will bend my spirit,
With what soft patience I will bear my wrongs,

Till I have weary'd out thy father's scorn:

Yet I have worse to tell thee—Eutyches—

Eud. Why wilt thou name him?

Pho. Now, ev'n now he's coming!

Just hov'ring o'er thee, like a bird of prey:

Thy father vows—for I must tell thee all—

'Twas this that wrung my heart, and rack'd my brain,

Ev'n to distraction!—vows thee to his bed;

Nay, threaten'd force, if thou refuse obedience.

Eud. Force! threaten'd force!—my father—where is nature?

Is that too banish'd from his heart?—O then

I have no father—How have I deserv'd this?

[Weeps.]

No home, but am henceforth an outcast orphan;

For I will wander to earth's utmost bounds,

Ere give my hand to that detested contract.

O save me, Phocyas! thou hast sav'd my father.

Must I yet call him so, this cruel father.

How wilt thou now deliver poor Eudocia?

Pho. See how we're join'd in exile! How our fate

Conspires to warn us both to leave this city!

Thou know'st the emperor is now at Antioch;

I have an uncle there, who when the Persian,

As now the Saracen, had nigh o'errun

The ravag'd empire, did him signal service,

And nobly was rewarded. There, Eudocia,

Thou might'st be safe, and I may meet with justice.

Eud. There—any where, so we may fly this place.

See, Phocyas, what thy wrongs and mine have wrought

In a weak woman's frame! for I have courage

To share thy exile now through ev'ry danger.

Danger is only here, and dwells with guilt,

With base ingratitude, and hard oppression.

Pho. Then let us lose no time, but hence this night.

The gates I can command, and will provide

The means of our escape. Some five hours hence,

'Twill then be turn'd of midnight, we may meet in the piazza of Honoria's convent.

Eud. I know it well; the place is most secure, And near adjoining to this garden wall.

There thou shalt find me.—Oh, protect us, heav'n!

Pho. Fear not; thy innocence will be our guard:

Some pitying angel will attend thy steps,

Guide thee unseen, and charm the sleeping foe,

Till thou art safe! Oh, I have suffer'd nothing,

Thus gaining thee, and this great gen'rous proof,

How bless'd I am in my Eudocia's love!

My only joy, farewell!

Eud. Farewell, my Phocyas!

I have no friend but thee—yet thee I'll call

Friend, father, lover, guardian!—Thou art all!

[Exeunt.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—CALED'S Tent.

Enter CALED and Attendants. SERGIUS held by Two Guards, bound with Cords.

Ser. Oh, mercy, mercy!

Caled. Mercy! what's that?—Look yonder on the field

Of our late fight! Go, talk of mercy there.

Will the dead hear thy voice?

Ser. Oh, spare me yet.

Caled. Thou wretch!—Spare thee? to what?
To live in torture?

Are not thy limbs all bruise'd, thy bones disjointed,
To force thee to confess? And wouldst thou drag,
Like a crush'd serpent, a vile, mangled being?
My eyes abhor a coward—Hence, and die!

Ser. Oh! I have told thee all—When first pursu'd,

I fix'd my letters on an arrow's point,
And shot them o'er the walls.

Caled. Hast thou told all?

Well, then thou shalt have mercy to requite thee:
Behold I'll send thee forward on thy errand.
Strike off his head; then cast it o'er the gates!
There let thy tongue tell o'er its tale again!

Ser. Oh, bloody Saracens!

[Exit Sergius, dragged away by the Guards.]

Enter ABUDAH.

Caled. Abudah, welcome!

Abu. Oh, Caled, what an evening was the last!

Caled. Name it no more; remembrance
sickens with it,

And therefore sleep is banish'd from this night;
Nor shall to-morrow's sun open his eye
Upon our shame, ere doubly we've redeem'd it.
Have all the captains notice?

Abu. I have walk'd

The rounds to-night, ere the last hour of pray'r,
From tent to tent, and warn'd them to be ready.
What must be done?

Caled. Thou know'st th' important news
Which we have intercepted by this slave,
Of a new army's march. The time now calls,
While these soft Syrians are dissolv'd in riot,
Fool'd with success, and not suspecting danger,
To form a new attack ere break of day;
So, like the wounded leopard, shall we rush
From out our covers on these drowsy hunters,
And seize them, unprepar'd to 'scape our vengeance.

Abu. Great captain of the armies of the faithful!

I know thy mighty and unconquer'd spirit;
Yet hear me, Caled, hear and weigh my doubts,
Our angry prophet frowns upon our vices,
And visits us in blood. Why else did terror,
Unknown before, seize all our stoutest bands?
The angel of destruction was abroad;
The archers of the tribe of 'Thoal fled,
So long renown'd, or spent their shafts in vain;
The feather'd flights err'd through the boundless air,

Or the death turn'd on him that drew the bow!
What can this bode?—Let me speak plainer yet;
Is it to propagate th' unspotted law
We fight? 'Tis well; it is a noble cause.
But much I fear infection is among us;
A boundless lust of rapine guides our troops.
We learn the Christian vices we chastise,
And, tempted with the pleasures of the soil,
More than with distant hopes of paradise,
I fear may soon—but oh, avert it, heav'n!
Fall ev'n a prey to our own spoils and conquests.

Caled. No—thou mistak'st; thy pious zeal deceives thee.

Our prophet only chides our sluggard valour.
Thou saw'st how in the vale of Honan once
The troops, as now defeated, fled confus'd
E'en to the gates of Mecca's holy city?

Till Mahomet himself there stopp'd their entrance,

A jav'lin in his hand, and turn'd them back
Upon the foe; they fought again and conquer'd.
Behold how we may best appease his wrath!
His own example points us out the way.

Abu. Well—be it then resolv'd. Th' indulgent hour

Of better fortune is, I hope, at hand.

And yet, since Phocyas has appear'd its champion
How has this city rais'd its drooping head!
As if some charm prevail'd where'er he fought;
Our strength seems wither'd, and our feeble weapons

Forget their wonted triumph—were he absent—

Caled. I would have sought him out in the last action,

To single fight, and put that charm to proof,
Had not a foul and sudden mist arose

Ere I arriv'd, to have restor'd the combat.

But let it be—'tis past. We yet may meet,
And 'twill be known whose arm is then the stronger.

Enter DARAN.

Daran. Health to the race of Ismael! and days
More prosp'rous than the last—a Christian captive

Is fall'n within my watch, and waits his doom.

Caled. Bring forth the slave.—O thou keen vulture, death!

Do we then feed thee only thus by morsels!
Whole armies never can suffice thy anger.

[Exit Daran.]

Re-enter DARAN, with PHOCYAS.

Whence, and what art thou?—Of Damascus?
—Daran,

Where didst thou find this dumb and sullen
thing,

That seems to lower defiance on our anger?

Daran. Marching in circuit, with the horse
thou gav'st me,

To observe the city gates, I saw from far
Two persons issue forth; the one advanc'd,
And ere he could retreat, my horsemen seiz'd him;
The other was a woman, and had fled,
Upon a signal giv'n at our approach,
And got within the gates. Wouldst thou know
more,

Himself, if he will speak, can best inform thee.

Caled. Have I not seen thy face?

Abu. He hears thee not;

His eyes are fix'd on earth; some deep distress
Is at his heart. This is no common captive.

[Apart to Caled.]

Caled. A lion in the toils! We soon shall tame him.

Still art thou dumb?—Nay, 'tis in vain to cast
Thy gloomy looks so oft around this place,
Or frown upon thy bonds—thou canst not 'scape.

Pho. Then be it so—the worst is past already,
And life is now not worth a moment's pause.
Do you not know me yet? Think of the man
You have most cause to curse, and I am he.

Caled. Ha! Phocyas?

Abu. Phocyas!—Mahomet, we thank thee!
Now dost thou smile again.

Caled. This is indeed a prize! [Aside.]

Is it because thou know'st what slaughter'd heaps

There yet unbury'd lie without the camp,

Whose ghosts have all this night, passing the Zorat,
Call'd from the bridge of death to thee to follow,
That now thou'rt here to answer to their cry?
Howe'er it be, thou know'st thy welcome.

Pho. Yes,
Thou proud, blood-thirsty Arab!—Well I know
What to expect from thee: I know ye all.
How should the author of distress and ruin
Be mov'd to pity? That's a human passion.
No—in your hungry eyes, that look revenge,
I read my doom. Where are your racks, your tortures?

I'm ready—lead me to them; I can bear
The worst of ills from you. You're not my friends,
My countrymen.—Yet were you men, I could
Unfold a story—But no more—Eumenes,
Thou hast thy wish, and I am now—a worm!

Abu. Leader of armies, hear him! for my mind
Presages good accruing to our cause
By this event.

[Apart to Caled.]

Caled. I tell thee then thou wrong'st us,
To think our hearts thus steel'd, or our ears deaf
To all that thou may'st utter. Speak, disclose
The secret woes that throb within thy breast.
Now, by the silent hours of night, we'll hear thee,
And mute attention shall await thy words.

Pho. This is not then the palace in Damascus!
If you will hear, then I indeed have wrong'd you.
How can this be?—When he, for whom I've fought,

Fought against you, has yet refus'd to hear me!
You seem surpris'd.—It was ingratitude
That drove me out, an exile, not a foe.

Abu. Is it possible?
Are these thy Christian friends?

Caled. 'Tis well—we thank them:
They help us to subdue themselves—But who
Was the companion of thy flight?—A woman,
So Daran said—

Pho. 'Tis there I am most wretched—
Oh, I am torn from all my soul held dear,
And my life's blood flows out upon the wound!
That woman—'twas for her—How shall I speak it?

Eudocia, oh, farewell!—I'll tell you then,
As fast as these heart-rending sighs will let me:
I lov'd the daughter of the proud Eumenes,
And long in secret woo'd her; not unwelcome
To her my visits; but I fear'd her father;
Who oft had press'd her to detested nuptials,
And therefore durst not, till this night of joy,
Avow to him my courtship. Now I thought her
Mine, by a double claim, of mutual vows,
And service yielded at his greatest need:
When, as I mov'd my suit, with sour disdain,
He mock'd my service and forbade my love,
Degraded me from the command I bore,
And with defiance bade me seek the foe.
How has his curse prevail'd!—The gen'rous maid
Was won by my distress to leave the city;
And cruel fortune made me thus your prey.

Abu. My soul is mov'd—Thou wert a man,
Oh, prophet!

Forgive, if 'tis a crime, a human sorrow
For injur'd worth, though in an enemy! [Aside.]

Pho. Now—since you've heard my story, set me free,
That I may save her yet, dearer than life,
From a tyrannic father's threaten'd force;
Gold, gems, and purple vests, shall pay my ransom;

Nor shall my peaceful sword henceforth be drawn
In fight, nor break its truce with you for ever.

Caled. No—there's one way, a better, and but one,

To save thyself, and make some reparation
For all the numbers thy bold hand has slain.

Pho. O, name it quickly, and my soul will bless thee!

Caled. Embrace our faith, and share with us our fortunes.

Pho. Then I am lost again!

Caled. What! when we offer,
Not freedom only, but to raise thee high,
To greatness, conquest, glory, heav'nly bliss?

Pho. To sink me down to infamy, perdition,
Here and hereafter! Make my name a curse
To present times, to ev'ry future age
A proverb and a scorn!—take back thy mercy,
And know I now disdain it.

Caled. As thou wilt.

The time's too precious to be wasted longer
In words with thee. Thou know'st thy doom
—farewell.

Abu. Hear me, Caled: grant him some short space;

Perhaps he will at length accept thy bounty.
Try him, at least.

[Apart to Caled.]

Caled. Well—be it so then. Daran, Guard well thy charge—Thou hast an hour
to live:

If thou art wise, thou may'st prolong that term;
If not—why—Fare thee well, and think of death.

[Exeunt Caled and Abudah. Daran waits at a distance.]

Pho. "Farewell, and think of death!" Was it not so?

Do murderers then preach morality?—
But how to think of what the living know not,
And the dead cannot, or else may not tell!—
What art thou, oh, thou great mysterious terror!
The way to thee we know! disease, famine,
Sword, fire, and all thy ever open gates,
That day and night stand ready to receive us.
But what's beyond them?—Who will draw that veil?

Yet death's not there—No, 'tis a point of time,
The verge 'twixt mortal and immortal beings.
It mocks our thoughts! On this side all is life;
And when we have reach'd it, in that very
instant,

'Tis past the thinking of! Oh! if it be
The pangs, the throes, the agonizing struggles
When soul and body part, sure I have felt it,
And there's no more to fear.

Daran. Suppose I now Dispatch him?—Right—What need to stay for orders?

I wish I durst!—Yet what I dare, I'll do.

[Aside.]
Your jewels, Christian—You'll not need these trifles. [Searches him.]

Pho. I pray thee, slave, stand off—My soul's too busy
To lose a thought on thee.

Re-enter ABUDAH.

Abu. What's this?—Forbear!
Who gave thee leave to use this violence?

[Takes the Jewels from Daran, and lays them on a Table.]

Daran. Deny'd my booty! curses on his head!
Was not the founder of our law a robber?

Why, 'twas for that I left my country's gods,
Menaph and Uzza. Better still be Pagan,
Than starve with a new faith. [Aside.

Abu. What dost thou mutter?

Daran, withdraw, and better learn thy duty.

[Exit Daran.]

Phocyas, perhaps thou know'st me not?

Pho. I know

Thy name, Abudah, and thy office here,
The second in command. What more thou art,
Indeed I cannot tell.

Abu. True; for thou yet
Know'st not I am thy friend.

Pho. Is't possible?—

Thou speak'st me fair.

Abu. What dost thou think of life?

Pho. I think not of it; death was in my thoughts.
On hard condition, life were but a load,
And I will lay it down.

Abu. Art thou resolv'd?

Pho. I am, unless thou bring'st me better terms
Than those I have rejected.

Abu. Think again.

Caled by me once more renews that offer.

Pho. Thou say'st thou art my friend: why dost thou try

To shake the settled temper of my breast?

My soul has just discharg'd her cumb'rous train
Of hopes and fears, prepar'd to take her voyage
To other seats, where she may rest in peace;
And now thou call'st me back, to beat again
The painful road of life—'tempt me no more
To be a wretch, for I despise the offer.

Abu. The gen'ral knows thee brave, and 'tis for that

He seeks alliance with thy noble virtues.

Pho. He knows me brave!—Why does he then thus treat me?

No, he believes I am so poor of soul,
That, barely for the privilege to live,
I would be bought his slave. But go, tell him
The little space of life, his scorn bequeath'd me,
Was lent in vain, and he may take the forfeit.

Abu. Why wilt thou wed thyself to misery,
When our faith courts thee to eternal blessings?
When truth itself is, like a seraph, come
To loose thy hands?—The light divine, whose beams

Pierc'd through the gloom of Hera's sacred cave,
And there illumin'd the great Mahomet,
Arabia's morning star, now shines on thee.

Arise, salute with joy the guest from heav'n,
Follow her steps, and be no more a captive.

Pho. But whither must I follow?—Answer that.
Is she a guest from heav'n? What marks divine,
What signs, what wonders, vouch her boasted mission?

Abu. What wonders?—Turn thy eye to Mecca! mark

How far from Caaba first, that hallow'd temple,
Her glory dawn'd!—then look how swift its
course,

As when the sun-beams, shooting through a cloud,

Drive o'er the meadow's face the flying shades!
Have not the nations bent before our swords,
Like ripen'd corn before the reaper's steel?

Why is all this? Why does success still wait
Upon our laws, if not to show that heav'n
First sent it forth, and owns it still by conquest?

Pho. Dost thou ask why is this?—Oh, why
indeed?

Where is the man can read heav'n's secret
counsels?

Why did I conquer in another cause,
Yet now am here?

Abu. I'll tell thee: thy good angel
Hasseiz'd thy hand unseen, and snatch'd thee out
From swift destruction: know, ere day shall dawn,

Damascus will in blood lament its fall!

We've heard what army is design'd to march
Too late to save her, Now, e'en now, our force
Is just preparing for a fresh assault.

Now too thou might'st revenge thy wrongs—
so Caled

Charg'd me to say, and more—that he invites
thee;

Thou know'st the terms—to share with him
the conquest.

Pho. Conquest! Revenge!—Hold, let me think—Oh, horror!

Revenge! Oh, what revenge? Bleed on, my
wounds,

For thus to be reveng'd, were it not worse
Than all that I can suffer?—But, Eudocia—

Where will she then?—Shield her, ye pitying pow'rs,

And let me die in peace!

Abu. Hear me once more,
'Tis all I have to offer; mark me now!

Caled has sworn Eudocia shall be safe.

Pho. Ha! safe—but how? A wretched captive too?

Abu. He swears she shall be free, she shall be thine.

Pho. Then I am lost indeed.

Abu. The time draws near, and I must quickly leave thee;

But first reflect, that in this fatal night

Slaughter and rapine may be loos'd abroad;

And while they roam with unextinguish'd rage,
Should she thou lov'st—(well may'st thou start)

—be made,

Perhaps unknown, some barb'rous soldier's prey;
Should she then fall a sacrifice to lust,

Or brutal fury—

Pho. Oh! this pulls my heart-strings! [Falls.
Earth open—save me, save me from that thought.

Abu. Nay, do not plunge thyself in black
despair;

Look up, poor wretch, thou art not shipwreck'd
yet;

Behold an anchor; am not I thy friend?

Pho. [Rises] Ha! Who, what art thou?

[Raves.

My friend? that's well; but hold—are all friends honest?

What's to be done?—Hush, hark! what voice is that?

Abu. There is no voice; 'tis yet the dead
of night;

The guards without keep silent watch around us.

Pho. Again it calls—'tis she—O, lead me to her!

Abu. Thy passion mocks thee with imagin'd sounds.

Pho. Sure 'twas Eudocia's voice cry'd out, Forbear!

What shall I do?—Oh, heav'n!

Abu. Heav'n shows thee what.

Nay, now it is too late; see Caled comes,

With anger on his brow. Quickly withdraw
To the next tent, and there—

Pho. [Rises] What do I see?

Damascus! conquest! ruin! rapes and murder!
Villains!—Is there no more?—Oh, save her,
save her!

[Exeunt Phocyas and Abudah.]

Re-enter CALED and DARAN.

Daran. Behold, on thy approach, they shift their ground.

Caled. 'Tis as thou say'st; he trifles with my mercy.

Daran. Speak, shall I fetch his head?

Caled. No, stay you here,

I cannot spare thee yet. Raphan, go thou.

[To an Officer.]

But hold—I've thought again—he shall not die.

Go, tell him he shall live till he has seen

Damascus sink in flames, till he behold

That slave, that woman idol he adores,

Or giv'n a prize to some brave Mussulman,

Or slain before his face; then if he sue

For death, as for a boon, perhaps we'll grant it.

[Exit Raphan.]

Daran. The captains wait thy orders.

Caled. Are the troops

Ready to march?

Daran. They are.

Caled. Mourn, thou haughty city!

The bow is bent, nor canst thou scape thy doom.

Who turns his back henceforth, our prophet curse him!

Daran. But who commands the trusty bands of Mecca?

Thou know'st their leader fell in the last fight.

Caled. 'Tis true; thou, Daran, well deserv'st that charge;

I've mark'd what a keen hatred, like my own,
Dwells in thy breast against these Christian dogs.

Daran. Thou dost me right.

Caled. And therefore I'll reward it.

Be that command now thine. And here, this sabre, Bless'd in the field by Mahomet himself,

At Caabar's prosp'rous fight, shall aid thy arm.

Daran. Thanks, my good chief; with this I'll better thank thee.

[Takes the Scimitar.]

Caled. Myself will lead the troops of the black standard,

And at the eastern gate begin the storm.

Daran. But why do we not move? 'twill soon be day.

Methinks I'm cold, and would grow warm with action.

Caled. Then haste and tell Abudah—O, thou'rt welcome!

Re-enter ABUDAH.

Thy charge awaits thee. Where's the stubborn captive?

Abu. Indeed he's brave. I left him for a moment
In the next tent. He's scarcely yet himself.

Caled. But is he ours?

Abu. The threats of death are nothing;
Though thy last message shook his soul, as winds
On the bleak hills bend down some lofty pine;
Yet still he held his root, till I found means,
Abating somewhat of thy first demand,
If not to make him wholly ours, at least
To gain sufficient to our end.

Caled. Say how?

Abu. Oft he inclin'd, oft started back; at last,
When just consenting, for awhile he paus'd,
Stood fix'd in thought, and lift his eyes to heaven;

Then, as with fresh recover'd force, cry'd out,
"Renounce my faith! Never."—I answer'd, "No,
That now he should not do it."

Caled. How?

Abu. Yet hear;

For since I saw him now so lost in passion,
That must be left to his more temp'rate thoughts.

Mean time I urg'd, conjur'd, at last constrain'd him,
By all he held most dear, nay, by the voice

Of Providence, that call'd him now to save,

With her belov'd, perhaps the lives of thousands,

No longer to resist his better fate,

But join his arms in present action with us,

And swear he would be faithful.

Caled. What, no more?

Then he's a Christian still!

Abu. Have patience yet;

For if by him we can surprise the city—

Caled. Say'st thou?

Abu. Hear what's agreed; but on the terms
That ev'ry unresisting life be spar'd.

I shall command some chosen, faithful bands;
Phocyas will guide us to the gate, from whence

He late escap'd; nor do we doubt but there

With ease to gain admittance.

Caled. This is something.

And yet I do not like this half ally.

Is he not still a Christian?—But no matter—

Mean time I will attack the eastern gate:

Who first succeeds gives entrance to the rest.

Hear all!—Prepare ye now for boldest deeds,

And know, the prophet will reward your valour.

Think that we all to certain triumph move;

Who falls in fight yet meets the prize above.

There, in the gardens of eternal spring,

While birds of Paradise around you sing,

Each, with his blooming beauty by his side,

Shall drink rich wines, that in full rivers glide;

Breathe fragrant gales o'er fields of spice that blow,

And gather fruits immortal as they grow;

Ecstatic bliss shall your whole pow'rs employ,

And ev'ry sense be lost in ev'ry joy. [Exeunt.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—A great Square in the City before the Governor's Palace.

Enter ABUDAH, Saracen Captains and Soldiers; with EUMENES, HERBIS, and other Christians, unarmed.

Eum. It must be so—farewell, devoted walls!
To be surprised thus!—Hell, and all ye fiends,

How did ye watch this minute for destruction!

Her. We've been betray'd by riot and debauch.
Curse on the traitor guard.

Eum. The guard above,

Did that sleep too?

Abu. Christians, complain no more,

What you have ask'd is granted. Are ye men,

And dare ye question thus, with bold impatience,

Eternal justice?—Know, the doom from heaven

Falls on your towers, resistless as the bolt

That fires the cedars on your mountain tops.

Be meek, and learn with humble awe to bear

The mitigated ruin. Worse had follow'd,

Had ye oppos'd our numbers. Now you're safe;

Quarter and liberty are giv'n to all;

And little do ye think how much ye owe

To one brave enemy, whom yet ye know not.

Enter ARTAMON, hastily.

Art. All's lost!—Ha!—Who are these?

Eum. All's lost indeed.
Yield up thy sword, if thou wouldst share our safety.

Thou com'st too late to bring us news.

Art. Oh!—no.

The news I bring is from the eastern guard.
Caled has forc'd the gate, and—but he's here.

[*A Cry without, Fly, fly, they follow—
Quarter, mercy, quarter!*

Caled. [Without] No quarter! Kill, I say.
Are they not Christians!

More blood! our prophet asks it.

Enter CALED and DARAN.

What, Abudah!

Well met!—But wherefore are the looks of peace?

Why sleeps thy sword?

Abu. Caled, our task is over.

Behold the chiefs! they have resign'd the palace.

Caled. And sworn t'obey our law?

Abu. No.

Caled. Then fall on.

Abu. Hold yet, and hear me—Heaven by me has spar'd

The sword its cruel task. On easy terms

We've gain'd a bloodless conquest.

Caled. I renounce it.

Curse on those terms! The city's mine by storm.
Fall on, I say.

Abu. Nay, then I swear ye shall not.

Caled. Ha!—Who am I?

Abu. The general—and I know
What reverence is your due.

[Caled gives Signs to his Men to fall on.
Nay, he who stirs,

First makes his way through me. My honour's pledg'd;

Rob me of that who dares. [They stop] I know
thee, Caled,

Chief in command; bold, valiant, wise, and
faithful;

But yet remember I'm a Mussulman;

Nay more, thou know'st, companion of the prophet;

And what we vow is sacred.

Caled. Thou'rt a Christian,
I swear thou art, and hast betray'd the faith.
Curse on thy new allies!

Abu. No more—this strife
But ill beseems the servants of the caliph,
And casts reproach—Christians, withdraw awhile:

I pledge my life to answer the conditions—[Exeunt Eumenes, Herbis, etc.

Why, Caled, do we thus expose ourselves
A scorn to nations that despise our law?

Thou call'st me Christian—What! Is it because I prize my plighted faith, that I'm a Christian?

Come, 'tis not well, and if—

Caled. What terms are yielded?

Abu. Leave to depart to all that will; an oath
First given no more to aid the war against us,
An unmolested march. Each citizen
To take his goods, not more than a mule's burden;
The chiefs six mules, and ten the governor;
Besides some few slight arms for their defence
Against the mountain robbers.

Caled. Now, by Mahomet,
Thou hast equip'd an army!

Abu. Canst thou doubt
The greatest part by far will choose to stay,

Receive our law, or pay th'accustomed tribute?
What fear we then from a few wretched bands
Of scatter'd fugitives?—Besides, thou know'st
What towns of strength remain yet unsubdu'd.
Let us appear this once like generous victors,
So future conquests shall repay this bounty,
And willing provinces ev'n court subjection.

Caled. Well—be it on thy head, if worse befall!

This once I yield—but see it thus proclaim'd
Through all Damascus, that who will depart, Must leave the place this instant—Pass, move on. [Exit.

SCENE II.—The Outside of a Nunnery.

Enter EUDOCIA.

Eud. Darkness is fled; and yet the morning light

Gives me more fears than did night's deadly gloom.

Within, without, all, all are foes—Oh, Phocyas,
Thou art perhaps at rest! would I were too!

[After a Pause.

This place has holy charms! rapine and murder
Dare not approach it, but are aw'd to distance.
I've heard that even these infidels have spar'd
Walls sacred to devotion—World, farewell!
Here will I hide me, till the friendly grave
Opens its arms, and shelters me for ever! [Exit.

Enter PHOCYAS.

Pho. Did not I hear the murmurs of a voice
This way?—A woman's too!—and seem'd complaining!

Hark!—No—O torture! Whither shall I turn me?
'Twas here last night we met. Dear, dear Eudocia?
Might I once more— [Going out, he meets her.

Eud. Who calls the lost Eudocia?

Sure 'tis a friendly voice!

Pho. 'Tis she—O rapture!

Eud. Is't possible—my Phocyas!

Pho. My Eudocia!

Do I yet call thee mine?

Eud. Do I yet see thee?

Yet hear thee speak? O how hast thou escap'd
From barbarous swords, and men that know not mercy?

Pho. I've borne a thousand deaths since our last parting.

But wherefore do I talk of death?—for now,
Methinks I'm rais'd to life immortal,
And feel I'm blest beyond the power of change;
For thee have triumph'd o'er the fiercest foes,
And turn'd them friends.

Eud. Amazement! Friends!

O all ye guardian powers!—Say on—O lead me,
Lead me through this dark maze of providence,
Which thou hast trod, that I may trace thy steps
With silent awe, and worship as I pass.

Pho. Inquire no more—thou shalt know all hereafter—

Let me conduct thee hence.

Eud. O whither next?

To what far distant home?—But 'tis enough
That, favour'd thus of heaven, thou art my guide.
And as we journey on the painful way,
Say, wilt thou then beguile the passing hours,
And open all the wonders of the story?
Where is my father?

Pho. Thou heavenly maid!

Know, I've once more, wrong'd as I am, even sav'd
Thy father's threaten'd life: nay, sav'd Damascus

From blood and slaughter, and from total ruin.
O didst thou know to what deadly gulfs
Of horror and despair I have been driven
This night, ere my perplex'd, bewilder'd soul
Could find its way!—thou saidst that thou wouldst chide?

I fear thou wilt: indeed I have done that,
I could have wish'd t'avoid—but for a cause
So lovely, so belov'd—

Eud. What dost thou mean?

I'll not indulge a thought that thou couldst do
One act unworthy of thyself, thy honour,
And that firm zeal against these foes of heaven:
Thou couldst not save thy life by meansinglorious.

Pho. Alas thou know'st me not—I'm man,
frail man,

To error born; and who, that's man, is perfect?
To save my life! O no, well was it risk'd
For thee! had it been lost, 'twere not too much,
And thou art safe:—O what wouldst thou have said,
If I had risk'd my soul to save Eudocia?

Eud. Ha, speak—Oh no, be dumb—it cannot be!
And yet thy looks are chang'd, thy lips grow pale.
Why dost thou shake?—Alas! I tremble too!
Thou couldst not, hast not sworn to Mahomet?

Pho. No—I should first have dy'd—nay, given up thee.

Eud. O Phocyas! was it well to try me thus?
And yet another deadly fear succeeds!
How came these wretches hither? Who reviv'd
Their fainting arms to unexpected triumph?
For while thou fought'st, and fought'st the Christian cause,

These batter'd walls were rocks impregnable,
Their towers of adamant. But, oh, I fear
Some act of thine—

Pho. No more—I'll tell the all;
I found the wakeful foe in midnight council,
Resolv'd ere day to make a fresh attack,
Keen for revenge, and hungry after slaughter—
Could my rack'd soul bear that, and think of thee?
Nay, think of thee expos'd a helpless prey
To some fierce ruffian's violating arms?
O, had the world been mine, in that extreme
I should have given whole provinces away;
Nay, all—and thought it little for my ransom!

Eud. For this then—Oh, thou hast betray'd
the city!

Distrustful of the righteous powers above,
That still protect the chaste and innocent!
And to avert a feign'd, uncertain danger,
Thou hast brought certain ruin on thy country!

Pho. No, the sword,
Which threaten'd to have fill'd the streets with
blood,

I sheath'd in peace; thy father, thou, and all
The citizens are safe, uncaptiv'd, free.

Eud. Safe! free! O no—life, freedom, every good,

Turns to a curse, if sought by wicked means!
Yet sure it cannot be! are these the terms
On which we meet?—No, we can never meet
On terms like these; the hand of death itself
Could not have torn us from each other's arms,
Like this dire act!

But, alas!

'Tis thou hast blasted all my joys for ever,
And cut down hope, like a poor, short-liv'd flower,
Never to grow again!

Pho. Cruel Eudocia!

If in my heart's dear anguish I've been forc'd
Awhile from what I was—dost thou reject me?

Think of the cause—

Eud. The cause! there is no cause—

Not universal nature could afford

A cause for this. What where dominion, pomp,
The wealth of nations, nay of all the world,
If weigh'd with faith unspotted, heavenly truth,
Thoughts free from guilt, the empire of the mind,
And all the triumph of a godlike breast,
Firm and unmov'd in the great cause of virtue?

Pho. No more—Thou waken'st in my tor-tur'd heart

The cruel, conscious worm, that stings to madness!
Oh, I'm undone! I know it, and can bear
To be undone for thee, but not to lose thee.

Eud. Poor wretch!—I pity thee!—but art
thou Phocyas,

The man I lov'd?—I could have dy'd with thee
Ere thou didst this: then we had gone together,
A glorious pair, and soar'd above the stars:
But never, never

Will I be made the curs'd reward of treason,
To seal thy doom, to bind a hellish league,
And to ensure thy everlasting woe.

Pho. What league?—'tis ended—I renounce it—thus— [Kneels.]

I bend to heaven and thee—O thou divine,
Thou matchless image of all perfect goodness!
Do thou but pity yet the wretched Phocyas,
Heaven will relent, and all may yet be well.

Eud. No—we must part.

Then do not think

Thy loss in me is worth one drooping tear:
But if thou wouldst be reconcil'd to heaven,
First sacrifice to heaven that fatal passion
Which caus'd thy fall; forget the lost Eudocia.
Canst thou forget her?—Oh! the killing torture,
To think 'twas love, excess of love, divorc'd us!
Farewell for—still I cannot speak that word,
These tears speak for me—O farewell— [Exit.]

Pho. [Raving] For ever!

Return, return and speak it; say, for ever!
She's gone—and now she joins the fugitives.
O hear, all gracious heaven! wilt thou at once
Forgive: and, oh, inspire me to some act
This day, that may in part redeem what's past!
Prosper this day, or let it be my last. [Exit.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—An open Place in the City.

Enter CALED and DARAN, meeting.

Caled. Soldier, what news? thou look'st as thou wert angry.

Daran. And, durst I say it so, my chief, I am;
I've spoke—If it offends, my head is thine;
Take it, and I am silent.

Caled. No, say on.

I know thee honest, and perhaps I guess
What knits thy brows in frowns—

Daran. Is this, my leader,
A conquer'd city?—View yon vale of palms:
Behold the vanquish'd Christian triumph still,
Rich in his flight, and mocks thy barren war.

Caled. The vale of palms?

Daran. Beyond those hills, the place
Where they agreed this day to meet and halt,
To gather all their forces; there disguis'd,
Just now I've view'd their camp—O, I could curse
My eyes for what they've seen.

Caled. What hast thou seen?

Daran. Why, all Damascus:—All its souls,
its life,

Its heart blood, all its treasure, piles of plate,
Crosses enrich'd with gems, arras and silks,
And vests of gold, unfolded to the sun,
That rival all his lustre!

Caled. How?

Daran. 'Tis true.

The bees are wisely bearing off their honey,
And soon the empty hive will be our own.

Caled. So forward too! curse on this foolish treaty!

Daran. Forward—it looks as if they had been forewarn'd.

By Mahomet, the land wears not the face
Of war, but trade! and thou wouldst swear its merchants

Were sending forth their loaded caravans
To all the neighb'ring countries.

Caled. Dogs! infidels! 'tis more than was allow'd!

Daran. And shall we not pursue them—Robbers! thieves!

That steal away themselves, and all they're worth,
And wrong the valiant soldier of his due?

Caled. The caliph shall know this—he shall, Abudah,

This is thy coward bargain—I renounce it [Aside.
Daran, we'll stop their march, and search.

Daran And strip—

Caled. And kill.

Daran. That's well. And yet I fear
Abudah's Christian friend.

Caled. If possible,
He should not know of this. No, nor Abudah:
By the seven heavens, his soul's a Christian too!
And 'tis by kindred instinct he thus saves
Their cursed lives, and taints our cause with mercy.

Daran. I knew my general would not suffer this,

Therefore I've troops prepar'd without the gate;
Just mounted for pursuit. Our Arab horse
Will in few minutes reach the place; yet still
I must repeat my doubts—that devil, Phocyas,
Will know it soon—I met him near the gate:
My nature sickens at him, and forebodes
I know not what of ill.

Caled. No more; away
With thy cold fears—we'll march this very instant,
And quickly make this thriftless conquest good:
The sword too has been wrong'd, and thirsts for blood. [Exeunt.

SCENE II.—A Valley full of Tents; Baggage and Harness lying up and down amongst them. The Prospect terminating with Palm Trees and Hills at a Distance.

Enter EUMENES, with Officers and Attendants.

Eum. [Entering] Sleep on—and angels be thy guard!—soft slumber
Has gently stole her from her griefs awhile;
Let none approach the tent—Are out-guards plac'd

On yonder hills? [To an Officer.

Off. They are.

Eum. [Striking his Breast] Damascus, O—
Still art thou here!—Let me entreat you, friends,
To keep strict order; I have no command,
And can but now advise you.

Off. You are still
Our head and leader.
We're all prepar'd to follow you.

Eum. I thank you.

The sun will soon go down upon our sorrows,
And, till to-morrow's dawn, this is our home:
Meanwhile, each, as he can, forget his loss,
And bear the present lot.

3 Off. Sir, I have mark'd
The camp's extent: 'tis stretch'd quite through the valley.

I think that more than half the city's here.

Eum. The prospect gives me much relief. I'm pleas'd,

My honest countrymen, t'observe your numbers:
And yet it fills my eyes with tears—'Tis said,
The mighty Persian wept, when he survey'd
His numerous army, but to think them mortal;
Yet he then flourish'd in prosperity.

Alas! what's that?—Prosperity!—a harlot,
That smiles but to betray!

Hear me, all gracious heaven,
Let me wear out my small remains of life,
Obscure, content with humble poverty,
Or, in affliction's hard but wholesome school,
If it must be—I'll learn to know myself,
And that's more worth than empire. But, O
heaven,

Curse me no more with proud prosperity!
It has undone me!—

Enter HERBIS.

Herbis! where, my friend,
Hast thou been this long hour?

Her. On yonder summit,
To take a farewell prospect of Damascus.

Eum. And is it worth a look?

Her. No—I've forgot it.
All our possessions are a grasp of air:
We're cheated, whilst we think we hold them fast:
And when they're gone, we know that they were nothing:

But I've a deeper wound.

Eum. Poor, good old man!
'Tis true—thy son—there thou'rt indeed unhappy.

Enter ARTAMON.

What, Artamon! art thou here, too?

Art. Yes, sir.

I never boasted much,
Yet, I've some honour, and a soldier's pride;
I like not these new lords.

Eum. Thou'rt brave and honest.
Nay, we'll not yet despair. A time may come,
When from these brute barbarians we may wrest
Once more our pleasant seats.—Alas! how soon
The flatterer, hope, is ready with his song,
To charm us to forgetfulness!—No more—
Let that be left to heaven.—See, Herbis, see,
Methinks we've here a goodly city yet.
Was it not thus our great forefathers liv'd,
In better times—in humble fields and tents,
With all their flocks and herds, their moving wealth?

See, too, where our own Pharphar winds his stream

Through the long vale, as if to follow us;
And kindly offers his cool wholesome draughts,
To ease us in our march!—Why, this is plenty.

Enter EUDOCIA.

My daughter!—wherefore hast thou left thy tent?
What breaks so soon thy rest?

Eud. Rest is not there,
Or I have sought in vain, and cannot find it.

Oh, no!—we're wanderers, it is our doom;
There is no rest for us.

Eum. Thou art not well.

Eud. I would, if possible, avoid myself.
I'm better now, near you.

Eum. Near me! alas,
The tender vine so wreathes its folded arms
Around some falling elm—It wounds my heart
To think thou follow'st but to share my ruin.
I have lost all but thee.

Eud. O, say not so!
You have lost nothing; no—you have preserv'd
Immortal wealth, your faith inviolate
To heaven and to your country.
Ruin is yonder, in Damascus, now
The seat abhorr'd of cursed infidels.
Infernal error, like a plague, has spread
Contagion through its guilty palaces,
And we are fled from death.

Eum. Heroic maid!
Thy words are balsam to my griefs. Eudocia,
I never knew thee till this day; I knew not
How many virtues I had wrong'd in thee!

Eud. If you talk thus, you have not yet forgiven me.

Eum. Forgiven thee!—Why, for thee it is,
thee only,
I think, heaven yet may look with pity on us;
Yes, we must all forgive each other now.
Poor Herbis, too—we both have been to blame.
O, Phocyas!—but it cannot be recall'd.
Yet, were he here, we'd ask him pardon too.
My child!—I meant not to provoke thy tears.

Eud. O, why is he not here? Why do I see Thousands of happy wretches, that but seem Undone, yet still are bless'd in innocence,
And why was he not one? [Aside.]

Enter an Officer.

Offi. Where is Eumenes?

Eum. What means thy breathless haste?

Offi. I fear there's danger:
For, as I kept my watch, I spy'd afar
Thick clouds of dust, and, on a nearer view,
Perceiv'd a body of Arabian horse
Moving this way. I saw them wind the hill,
And then lost sight of them.

Her. I saw them too,
Where the roads meet on t'other side these hills,
But took them for some band of Christian Arabs,
Crossing the country.—This way did they move?

Offi. With utmost speed.

Eum. If they are Christian Arabs,
They come as friends; if other, we're secure
By the late terms. Retire awhile, Eudocia,
Till I return. [Exit Eudocia.]
I'll to the guard myself.
Soldier, lead on the way.

Enter another Officer.

2 Offi. Arm! arm! we're ruin'd!
The foe is in the camp.

Eum. So soon?

2 Offi. They've quitted
Their horses, and with sword in hand have forc'd
Our guard; they say they come for plunder.

Eum. Villains!
Sure Caled knows not of this treachery!
Come on—we can fight still. We'll make them
know

What 'tis to urge the wretched to despair.

[Exeunt.]

Enter DARAN.

Daran. Let the fools fight at distance—Here's the harvest.

Reap, reap, my countrymen!—Ay, there—first clear

Those further tents—

[Looking between the Tents.]

What's here? a woman!—fair
She seems, and well attir'd!—It shall be so.
She's my first prize, and then— [Exit.]

Re-enter DARAN, with EUDOCIA.

Eud. [Struggling] Mercy! O, spare me! spare me!

Heaven, hear my cries!

Daran. Woman, thy cries are vain:
No help is near.

Enter PHOCYAS.

Pho. Villain, thou liest! take that,
To loose thy hold—

[Pushing at Daran with his Spear, who falls.
Eudocia!]

Eud. Phocyas! O, astonishment!
Then is it thus that heaven has heard my prayers?
I tremble still—and scarce have power to ask thee
How thou art here, or whence this sudden outrage?

Pho. Sure every angel watches o'er thy safety!
Thou seest 'tis death t'approach thee without awe,
And barbarism itself cannot profane thee.

Eud. Whence are these alarms?

Pho. Some stores remov'd, and not allow'd
by treaty,
Have drawn the Saracens to make a search.
Perhaps 'twill quickly be agreed—But, oh!
Thou know'st, Eudocia, I'm a banish'd man,
And 'tis a crime I'm here once more before thee;
Else, might I speak, 'twere better for the present,
If thou wouldst leave this place.

Eud. No—I have a father,
(And shall I leave him?) whom we both have wrong'd:

And yet, alas!
For this last act how would I thank thee,
Phocyas!—

I've nothing now but prayers and tears to give,
Cold, fruitless thanks!—But 'tis some comfort yet,
That fate allows this short reprieve, that thus
We may behold each other, and once more
May mourn our woes, ere yet again we part—

Pho. For ever!

'Tis then resolv'd—It was thy cruel sentence,
And I am here to execute that doom.

Eud. What dost thou mean?

Pho. [Kneeling] Thus at thy feet—

Eud. O, rise!

Pho. Never—No, here I'll lay my burden down;
I've tried its weight, nor can support it longer.
Take thy last look; if yet thy eyes can bear
To look upon a wretch accus'd, cast off
By heaven and thee—

Eud. Forbear.

O cruel man! Why wilt thou rack me thus?
Didst thou not mark—thou didst, when last we parted,

The pangs, the strugglings of my suffering soul;
That nothing but the hand of heaven itself
Could ever drive me from thee!—Dost thou now
Reproach me thus? or canst thou have a thought
That I can e'er forget thee?

Pho. [Rises] Have a care!

I'll not be tortur'd more with thy false pity!
No, I renounce it. See, I am prepar'd.

[Shows a Dagger.

Thy cruelty is mercy now.—Farewell!
And death is now but a release from torment!

Eud. Hold—stay thee yet!—O, madness of despair!

And wouldst thou die? Think, ere thou leap'st
the gulf,

When thou hast trod that dark, that unknown
way,

Canst thou return? What if the change prove worse?

O think, if then—

Pho. No—thought's my deadliest foe;
And therefore to the grave I'd fly to shun it!

Eud. O, fatal error!—Like a restless ghost,
It will pursue and haunt thee still; even there,
Perhaps, in forms more frightful.

How wilt thou curse thy rashness then! How start,
And shudder, and shrink back! yet how avoid
To put on thy new being?

Pho. I thank thee!

For now I'm quite undone—I gave up all
For thee before; but this, this bosom friend,
My last reserve—There—

[Throws away the Dagger.

Tell me now, Eudocia,
Cut off from hope, deny'd the food of life,
And yet forbid to die, what am I now?

Or what will fate do with me?

Eud. Oh! [Turns away, weeping.

Pho. Thou weep'st!

Canst thou shed tears, and yet not melt to mercy?

O say, ere yet returning madness seize me,
Is there in all futurity no prospect,

No distant comfort?

[Here they both continue silent for some Time.

Still thou art silent!

Hear then this last,

This only pray'r!—Heav'n will consent to this.

Let me but follow thee, where'er thou go'st,

But see thee, hear thy voice; be thou my angel,

To guide and govern my returning steps,

Till long contrition, and unweary'd duty,

Shall expiate my guilt.

Eud. No more—This shakes

My firmest thoughts, and if— [A Cry is heard.

What shrieks of death!

I fear a treach'rous foe have now

Begun a fatal harvest!—Haste,

Prevent—O, wouldst thou see me more with
comfort,

Fly, save them, save the threaten'd lives of Christians,

My father and his friends!—I dare not stay—

Heav'n be my guide, to shun this gath'ring ruin!

[Exit.

Enter CALED.

Caled. So, slaughter, do thy work! These hands look well.

[Looks on his Hands.

Phocyas! Thou'rt met—But whether thou art here

[Comes forward.

A friend or foe, I know not; if a friend,

Which is Eumenes' tent?

Pho. Hold, pass no further.

Caled. Say'st thou, not pass?

Pho. No—on thy life no further.

Caled. What, dost thou frown too?—Sure, thou know'st me not!

Pho. Not know thee?—Yes, too well I know thee now,

O murd'rous fiend! Why all this waste of blood?
Didst thou not promise—

Caled. Promise!—Insolence!

'Tis well, 'tis well; for now I know thee too.

Perfidious, mongrel slave! Thou double traitor!

False to thy first and to thy latter vows!

Villain!

Pho. That's well—go on—I swear I thank thee.

Speak it again, and strike it through my ear!

A villain! Yes, thou mad'st me so, thou devil!

And mind'st me now what to demand from thee.

Give, give me back my former self, my honour,

My country's fair esteem, my friends, my all—

Thou canst not—O thou robber!—Give me then

Revenge or death! The last I well deserve—

That yielded up my soul's best wealth to thee,

For which accurs'd be thou, and curs'd thy prophet!

Caled. Hear'st thou this, Mahomet?—Blas-pheming mouth!

For this thou soon shalt chew the bitter fruit

Of Zacon's tree, the food of fiends below.

Go—speed thee thither—

[Pushes at him with his Lance, which

Phocyas puts by, and kills him.

Pho. Go thou first thyself.

Caled. [Falls] O dog! thou gnaw'st my
heart!—

False Mahomet!

Is this then my reward?—O!—

[Dies.

Pho. Thanks to the gods, I have reveng'd my country!

[Exit.

Several Parties of Christians and Saracens pass over the further End of the Stage, fighting. The former are beaten. At last

EUMENES rallies them, and makes a stand;

then enter ABUDAH, attended.

Abu. Forbear, forbear, and sheathe the bloody sword.

Eum. Abudah! is this well?

Abu. No—I must own

You've cause.—O Mussulmans, look here! Behold

Where, like a broken spear, your arm of war

Is thrown to earth!

Eum. Ha! Caled?

Abu. Dumb and breathless.

Then thus has heaven chastis'd us in thy fall,

And thee for violated faith! Farewell,

Thou great, but cruel man!

Eum. This thirst of blood

In his own blood is quench'd.

Abu. Bear hence his clay

Back to Damascus. Cast a mantle first

O'er this sad sight: so should we hide his faults.—

Now hear, ye servants of the prophet, hear!

A greater death than this demands your tears,

For know, your lord, the caliph, is no more!

Good Abubeker has breath'd out his spirit

To him that gave it. Yet your caliph lives,

Lives now in Omar. See, behold his signet,

Appointing me, such is his will, to lead

His faithful armies warring here in Syria.

Alas!—foreknowledge sure of this event

Guided his choice! Obey me then, your chief.

For you, O Christians; know, with speed I came,

On the first notice of this foul design,

Or to prevent it, or repair your wrongs.

Your goods shall be untouch'd, your persons safe.

Nor shall our troops henceforth, on pain of death,

Molest your march.—If more you ask, 'tis granted.

Eum. Still just and brave! thy virtues would adorn

A purer faith! Thou, better than thy sect,
That dar'st decline from that to acts of mercy!
Pardon, Abudah, if thy honest heart
Makes us ev'n wish thee ours.

Abu. O Power Supreme!

That mad'st my heart, and know'st its inmost frame,

If yet I err, O lead me into truth,
Or pardon unknown error!—Now, Eumenes,
Friends, as we may be, let us part in peace.

[Exeunt severally.]

Re-enter ARTAMON and EUDOCIA.

Eud. Alas! but is my father safe?

Art. Heaven knows.

I left him just preparing to engage:
When, doubtful of th' event, he bade me haste
To warn his dearest daughter of the danger,
And aid your speedy flight.

Eud. My flight! but whither?

O no—if he is lost—

Art. I hope not so.

The noise is ceas'd. Perhaps they're beaten off.
We soon shall know;—here's one that can inform us.

Re-enter first Officer.

Soldier, thy looks speak well;—what says thy tongue?

1 Offi. The foe's withdrawn. Abudah has been here,

And has renew'd the terms. Caled is kill'd—

Art. Hold—first thank heaven for that!

Eud. Where is Eumenes?

1 Offi. I left him well: by his command I came
To search you out: and let you know this news.
I've more; but that—

Art. Is bad, perhaps, so says this sudden pause. Well, be it so; let's know it;

'Tis but life's checker'd lot.

1 Offi. Eumenes mourns

A friend's unhappy fall—Herbis is slain—

A settled gloom seem'd to hang heavy on him;
'Th' effect of grief, 'tis thought, for his lost son.
When on the first attack, like one that sought
The welcome means of death, with desp'rate valour

He press'd the foe, and met the fate he wish'd.

Art. See where Eumenes comes! What's this? He seems

To lead some wounded friend—Alas! 'tis—

[They withdraw to one side of the Stage.]

Re-enter EUMENES, leading in PHOCIAS, with an Arrow in his Breast.

Eum. Give me thy wound! O, I could bear it for thee!

This goodness melts my heart. What, in a moment

Forgetting all thy wrongs, in kind embraces
T' exchange forgiveness thus!

Pho. Moments are few,

And must not now be wasted. O Eumenes,
Lend me thy helping hand a little further;
O where, where is she? [They advance.]

Eum. Look, look here, Eudocia!

Behold a sight that calls for all our tears!

Eud. Phocyas, and wounded!—Oh, what cruel hand—

Pho. No, 'twas a kind one.—Spare thy tears, Eudocia!

For mine are tears of joy.—

Eud. Is't possible?

Pho. 'Tis done—the powers supreme have heard my prayer,

And prosper'd me with some fair deed this day:
I've fought once more, and for my friends,
my country.

By me the treach'rous chiefs are slain: awhile
I stopp'd the foe, till, warn'd by me before,
Of this their sudden march, Abudah came.
But first this random shaft had reach'd my breast.
Life's mingled scene is o'er—'tis thus that heaven
At once chastises, and, I hope, accepts me.

Eud. What shall I say to thee, to give thee comfort?

Pho. Say only thou forgiv'st me—O Eudocia!
No longer now my dazzled eyes behold thee
Through passion's mists; my soul now gazes
on thee,

And sees thee lovelier in unfading charms!
Bright as the shining angel host that stood—
Whilst I—but there it smarts.

Eud. Look down, look down,

Ye pitying powers! and help his pious sorrow!

Eum. 'Tis not too late, we hope, to give thee help.

See! yonder is my tent: we'll lead thee thither;
Come, enter there, and let thy wound be dress'd;
Perhaps it is not mortal.

Pho. No! not mortal?

No flatt'ry now. By all my hopes hereafter,
For the world's empire I'd not lose this death.
Alas! I but keep in my fleeting breath
A few short moments, till I have conjur'd you,
That to the world you witness my remorse
For my past errors and defend my fame.
For know, soon as this pointed steel's drawn out,
Life follows through the wound.

Eud. What dost thou say?

O, touch not yet the broken springs of life!
A thousand tender thoughts rise in my soul:
How shall I give them words? Oh, till this hour
I scarce have tasted woe!—this is indeed
To part—but, oh!—

Pho. No more—death is now painful!

But say, my friends, whilst I have breath to ask (For still methinks all your concerns are mine),
Whither have you design'd to bend your journey?

Eum. Constantinople is my last retreat,
If heaven indulge my wish; there I've resolv'd
To wear out the dark winter of my life,
An old man's stock of days—I hope not many.

Eud. There will I dedicate myself to heaven.
O, Phocyas, for thy sake, no rival else
Shall e'er possess my heart. My father too
Consents to this my vow. My vital flame
There, like a taper on the holy altar,
Shall waste away; till heav'n, relenting, hears
Incessant prayers for thee and for myself,
And wing my soul to meet with thine in bliss.
For in that thought I find a sudden hope,
As if inspir'd, springs in my breast, and tells me
That thy repenting frailty is forgiv'n,
And we shall meet again to part no more.

Pho. [Plucks out the Arrow] Then all is done
—'twas the last pang—at length—
I've given up thee, and the world now is—nothing.

[Dies.]

Eum. O Phocyas! Phocyas!

Alas! he hears not now, nor sees my sorrows! | A fruitless zeal, yet all I now can show;
 Yet will I mourn for thee, thou gallant youth! | Tears vainly flow for errors learn'd too late,
 As for a son—so let me call thee now. | When timely caution should prevent our fate.
 A much-wrong'd friend, and an unhappy hero! | [Exeunt.]

ISAAC BICKERSTAFF.

A NATIVE of Ireland, and for some time one of the most successful writers for the stage. He was probably born about the year 1735, having been appointed one of the pages of Lord Chesterfield, when he was Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, in 1746. He was once an officer of marines, but left the service with circumstances which do not reflect credit on him as a man. These circumstances not attacking the reputation of his writings, our readers will assist us in covering them with the charitable veil of oblivion; and we shall stand excused in the eyes of the feeling world for declining to conclude his Biography.

THE HYPOCRITE,

COMEDY by Isaac Bickerstaff. Acted at Drury Lane 1768. The general plot of this comedy is borrowed from the Tartuffe of Molière, and the principal character in it, viz. that of Doctor Cantwell, is a close copy from that great original. The conduct of the piece, however, is so greatly altered as to render it perfectly English, and the coquet Charlotte: is truly original and most elegantly spirited. The author has strongly pointed out the mischiefs and ruin which were frequently brought into the most noble and valuable families by the self-interested machinations of those skulking and pernicious vipers, those wolves in sheep's clothing, who at the troublesome and unsettled period in which this piece was first written, (by Cibber 1718) covering their private views beneath the mask of public zeal and sanctity, acted the part of the great serpent of old, first tempting to sin, and then betraying to punishment. It is an alteration of Cibber's Nonjuror. Scarcely any thing more than the character of Mawworm was written by the present author, who introduced it for the sake of Weston's comic talents. Few plays have had the advantage of better acting, and, in consequence, few had a greater share of success. It is one of the most valuable characteristics of this play, that while it severely satirizes hypocrisy, fanaticism (as in Mawworm), and outrageous pretensions to sanctity, it carefully distinguishes between these and rational piety. The play met with great success in the representation, taking a run of eighteen nights; the subject itself being its protection, and its enemies not daring to show any more at that time than a few smiles of silent contempt. The consequence, however, was what the author foresaw; that is to say, the stirring up a party against him, who would scarcely suffer any thing he wrote afterwards to meet with fair play, and making him the constant butt of Mist's Journal, and all the Jacobite faction. Nor do we think it by any means an improbable surmise, that the enmity and inveteracy of his antagonist Mr. Pope, and the set of wits who were connected with him, might have their original foundation traced from the appearance of this play.

DRAMATIS PERSONAE.

SIR JOHN LAMBERT.	COLONEL LAMBERT.	SEYWARD.	OLD LADY LAMBERT.	CHARLOTTE.
DOCTOR CANTWELL.	DARNLEY.	MAWORM.	YOUNG LADY LAMBERT.	BETTY.

SCENE. — London.

ACT I.

SCENE I. — A Hall in SIR JOHN LAMBERT'S House.

Enter SIR JOHN LAMBERT and COLONEL LAMBERT.

Col. L. PRAY consider, sir.

Sir J. So I do, sir, that I am her father, and will dispose of her as I please.

Col. L. I do not dispute your authority, sir; but as I am your son too, I think it my duty to be concerned for your honour. Have not you countenanced his addresses to my sister? has not she received them? — Mr. Darnley's birth and fortune are well known to you; and I dare swear, he may defy the world to lay a blemish on his character.

Sir J. Why then, sir, since I am to be catechised, I must tell you I do not like his character; he is a world-server, a libertine, and has no more religion than you have.

Col. L. Sir, we neither of us think it proper to make a boast of our religion; but, if you please to inquire, you will find that we go to church as orderly as the rest of our neighbours.

Sir J. Oh, you go to church! you go to church!—Wonderful! wonderful! to bow, and grin, and cough, and sleep: a fine act of devotion indeed.

Col. L. Well but, dear sir—

Sir J. Colonel, you are an Atheist.

Col. L. Pardon me, sir, I am none: it is a character I abhor; and next to that, I abhor the character of an enthusiast.<sup>1)</sup>

Sir J. Oh, you do so; an enthusiast!—this is the fashionable phrase, the bye-word, the nick-name, that our pleasure-loving generation give to those few who have a sense of true sanctity.

Col. L. Say, canting, sir.

Sir J. I tell you what, son, as I have told you more than once, you will draw some heavy judgment on your head one day or other.

Col. L. So says the charitable doctor Cantwell; you have taken him into your house, and in return he gives over half your family to the devil.

Sir J. Do not abuse the doctor, colonel; it is not the way to my favour. I know you cannot bear him, because he is not one of your mincing preachers.—He holds up the glass to your enormities, shows you to yourselves in your genuine colours.

Col. L. I always respect piety and virtue, sir; but there are pretenders to religion, as well as to courage; and as we never find the truly brave to be such as make much noise about their valour; so, I apprehend, the truly good seldom or never deal much in grimace.

Sir J. Very well, sir; this is very well.

Col. L. Besides, sir, I would be glad to know, by what authority the doctor pretends to exercise the clerical function.<sup>2)</sup> It does not appear clearly to me that he ever was in orders.

Sir J. That is no business of yours, sir.—But, I am better informed.—However, he has the call of zeal.

Col. L. Zeal!

Sir J. Why, colonel, you are in a passion.

Col. L. I own I cannot see with temper, sir, so many religious mountebanks impose on the unwary multitude; wretches, who make a trade of religion, and show an uncommon concern for the next world, only to raise their fortunes with greater security in this.

Sir J. Colonel, let me hear no more; I see you are too hardened to be converted now:

but since you think it your duty, as a son, to be concerned for my errors, I think it as much mine, as a father, to be concerned for yours. If you think fit to amend them, so; if not, take the consequence.

Col. L. Well, sir, may I ask you, without offence, if the reasons you have given me are your only reasons for discountenancing Mr. Darnley's addresses to my sister?

Sir J. Are they not flagrant? would you have me marry my daughter to a Pagan?<sup>1)</sup>

Col. L. He intends this morning paying his respects to you, in hopes to obtain your final consent; and desired me to be present as a mediator of articles between you.

Sir J. I am glad to hear it.

Col. L. That's kind indeed, sir.

Sir J. May be not, sir; for I will not be at home when he comes: and because I will not tell a lie for the matter, I'll go out this moment.

Col. L. Nay, dear sir—

Sir J. And, do you hear—because I will not deceive him either, tell him I would not have him lose his time in fooling after your sister—In short, I have another man in my head for her. [Exit.

Col. L. Another man! It would be worth one's while to know him: pray heaven this canting hypocrite has not got some beggarly rascal in his eye for her. I must rid the house of him at any rate, or all the settlement I can hope for from my father is a castle in the air.—My sister may be ruined too—here she comes. If there be another man in the case, she, no doubt, can let me into the secret.

Enter CHARLOTTE.

Sister, good morrow; I want to speak with you.

Char. Pr'ythee then, dear brother, don't put on that wise, politic face, as if your regiment was going to be disbanded, or sent to the West Indies, and you obliged to follow it.

Col. L. Come, come, a truce with your raillery: what I have to ask of you is serious, and I beg you would be so in your answer.

Char. Well, then, provided it is not upon the subject of love, I will be so—but make haste too—for I have not had my tea yet.

Col. L. Why it is, and it is not, upon that subject.

Char. Oh, I love a riddle dearly—Come—let's hear it.

Col. L. Nay, pshaw! if you will be serious, say so.

Char. O lard, sir! I beg your pardon—there—there's my whole form and features, totally disengaged and lifeless, at your service; now, put them in what posture of attention you think fit. [Leans on him awkwardly.

Col. L. Was there ever such a giddy devil!—Pr'ythee, stand up. I have been talking with my father, and he declares positively you shall not receive any further addresses from Mr. Darnley.

Char. Are you serious?

1) A religious sect, possessing much less of the charity of christians than any other of the numerous list of them with which the world is over-run; their prayers and sermons, contrary to the church of England, are all extempore. Mauworm shows them in their most zealous, Cantwell in their most unfavourable light.

2) The greater part of the preachers as well as auditors of this sect are tailors, cobblers, and others, who have had a call as they call it.

1) The intolerance of the Methodists, is carried to such a degree, that, even in their sermons, they most charitably condemn every person of any other persuasion than theirs, to the most horrible of all the burning fires of Tartarus; and, as they affect a very sanctified way of living themselves, all persons visiting that devil's hot-house the theatre, playing at cards, reading novels, etc., must meet with some still more terrible punishment, if possible.

Col. L. He said so this minute, and with some warmth.

Char. I am glad on't, with all my heart.

Col. L. How! glad!

Char. To a degree. Do you think a man has any more charms for me for my father's liking him? no, sir, if Mr. Darnley can make his way to me now, he is obliged to me, and to me only. Besides, now it may have the face of an amour indeed, now one has something to struggle for; there's difficulty, there's danger, there's the dear spirit of contradiction in it too—Oh! I like it mightily.

Col. L. I am glad this does not make you think the worse of Darnley—but my father's consent might have clapped a pair of horses more to your coach perhaps, and the want of it may pinch your fortune.

Char. Burn fortune; am not I a fine woman? and have not I twenty thousand pounds in my own hands?

Col. L. Yes, sister; but with all your charms, you have had them in your hands almost these four years.

Char. Pshaw! and have not I had the full swing of my own airs and humours these four years? but if I humour my father, I warrant he'll make it three or four thousand more, with some unlicked lout—a comfortable equivalent, truly!—No, no; let him light his pipe with his consent, if he please. Wilful against wise for a wager.

Col. L. But pray, sister, has my father ever proposed any other man to you?

Char. Another man! let me know why you ask, and I'll tell you.

Col. L. Why, the last words he said to me were, that he had another man in his head for you.

Char. And who is it? who is it? tell me, dear brother.

Col. L. Why, you don't so much as seem surprised.

Char. No; but I'm impatient, and that's as well.

Col. L. Why how now, sister?

Char. Why sure, brother, you know very little of female happiness, if you suppose the surprise of a new lover ought to shock a woman of my temper—don't you know that I am a coquette?

Col. L. If you are, you are the first that ever was sincere enough to own her being so.

Char. To a lover, I grant you; but not to you; I make no more of you than a sister: I can say any thing to you.

Col. L. I should have been better pleased, if you had not owned it to me—it's a hateful character.

Char. Ay, it's no matter for that, it's violently pleasant, and there's no law against it, that I know of.

Col. L. Darnley's like to have a hopeful time with you.

Char. Well, but don't you really know who it is my father intends me?

Col. L. Not I, really; but I imagined you might, and therefore thought to advise with you about it.

Char. Nay, he has not opened his lips to me yet—are you sure he is gone out?

Col. L. You are very impatient to know, methinks; what have you to do to concern yourself about any man but Darnley?

Char. O lud!<sup>1)</sup> O lud! pr'ythee, brother, don't be so wise; if you had an empty house to let, would you be displeased to hear there were two people about it? besides, to be a little serious, Darnley has a tincture of jealousy in his temper, which nothing but a substantial rival can cure.

Col. L. Oh, your servant, madam! now you talk reason. I am glad you are concerned enough for Darnley's faults, to think them worth your mending; ha! ha!

Char. Concerned! why, did I say that?—look you, I'll deny it all to him—well, if ever I'm serious with him again—

Col. L. Here he comes; be as merry with him as you please.

Enter DARNLEY.

Darn. My dear colonel, your servant.

Col. L. I am glad you did not come sooner; for in the humour my father left me, 'twould not have been a proper time for you to have pressed your affair—I touched upon't—but—I'll tell you more presently; in the mean time lose no ground with my sister.

Darn. I shall always think myself obliged to your friendship, let my success be what it will—Madam—your most obedient—what have you got there, pray?

Quick as her eyes, and as unfix'd as those—”

Darn. Pray, madam, what is't?

Char. “Favours to none, to all she smiles extends—”

Darn. Nay, I will see.

Char. “Oft she rejects, but never once offends.”

Col. L. Have a care: she has dipped into her own character, and she'll never forgive you, if you don't let her go through with it.

Darn. I beg your pardon, madam.

Char. “Bright as the sun her eyes the gazers strike, [Um—um—
And like the sun they shine on all alike.”

Darn. That is something like indeed.

Col. L. You would say so, if you knew all.

Darn. All what? pray what do you mean?

Col. L. Have a little patience: I'll tell you immediately.

Char. “If to her share some female errors fall, Look on her face—and you'll forget them all.”
Is not that natural, Mr. Darnley?

Darn. For a woman to expect, it is indeed.

Char. And can you blame her, when 'tis at the same time a proof of the poor man's passion and her power?

Darn. So that you think the greatest compliment a lover can make his mistress, is to give up his reason to her.

Char. Certainly; for what have your lordly sex to boast of but your understanding, and till that's entirely surrendered to her discretion, while the least sentiment holds out against her, a woman must be downright vain to think her conquest completed!

<sup>1)</sup> This word Nud is a corruption of Lord! we find such in all languages, where people think to cheat the devil by substituting a word something similar to the oath in its original form, and believe, if they do not swear in the exact word, that the sin is entirely atoned for. There are many other examples of this sort in English, where the most abominable oaths are softened down into a pretty little word, which seems to fit many a pretty little mouth, if we may judge from the frequency of their application by the female sex, though it must be confessed that they are totally ignorant of their meaning.

Darn. There we differ, madam; for, in my opinion, nothing but the most excessive vanity could value or desire such a conquest.

Char. Oh, d'ye hear him, brother? the creature reasons with me; nay, has the effrontery to think me in the wrong too! O lud! he'd make a horrid tyrant—positively I won't have him.

Darn. Well, my comfort is, no other man will easily know whether you'll have him or not.

Char. Am I not a vain, silly creature, Mr. Darnley?

Darn. A little bordering upon the baby, I must own.

Char. Laud!<sup>1)</sup> how can you love a body so then? but I don't think you love me though—do you?

Darn. Yes, faith, I do; and so shamefully, that I'm in hopes you doubt it.

Char. Poor man! he'd fain bring me to reason.

Darn. I would indeed.—Nay, were it but possible to make you serious only when you should be so, I should think you the most amiable—

Char. O lud! he's civil—

Darn. Come, come, you have good sense; use me but with that, and make me what you please.

Char. Laud! I don't desire to make any thing of you, not I.

Darn. Come then, be generous, and swear at least you'll never marry another.

Char. Ah, laud! now you have spoiled all again:—besides, how can I be sure of that, before I have seen this other man my brother spoke to me of?

Darn. What riddle's this?

Col. L. I told you, you did not know all. To be serious, my father went out but now, on purpose to avoid you.—In short, he absolutely retracts his promises; says, he would not have you fool away your time after my sister; and in plain terms told me, he had another man in his head for her.

Darn. Another man! who? what is he? did not he name him?

Col. L. No; nor has he yet spoke of him to my sister.

Darn. This is unaccountable!—what can have given him this sudden turn?

Col. L. Some whim our conscientious doctor has put in his head, I'll lay my life.

Darn. He! he can't be such a villain; he professes a friendship for me.

Col. L. So much the worse.

Darn. But on what pretence, what grounds, what reason, what interest, can he have to oppose me?

Col. L. Are you really now as unconcerned as you seem to be?

Char. You are a strange dunce, brother—you know no more of love than I do of a regiment—You shall see now how I'll comfort him—Poor Darnley, ha, ha, ha!

Darn. I don't wonder at your good humour, madam, when you have so substantial an opportunity to make me uneasy for life.

Char. O lud! how sentimentious he is! well, his reproaches have that greatness of soul—the confusion they give is insupportable,—

Enter BETTY.

Betty, is the tea ready?

Bet. Yes, madam.

Char. Mr. Darnley, your servant.

[Exit Charl. and Betty.]

Col. L. So; you have made a fine piece of work on't, indeed!

Darn. Dear Tom, pardon me if I speak a little freely; I own the levity of her behaviour, at this time, gives me harder thoughts than I once believed it possible to have of her.

Col. L. Indeed, my friend, you mistake her.

Darn. Nay, nay; had she any real concern for me, the apprehensions of a man's addresses, whom yet she never saw, must have alarmed her to some degree of seriousness.

Col. L. Not at all; for let this man be whom he will, I take her levity as a proof of her resolution to have nothing to say to him.

Darn. And pray, sir, may I not as well suspect, that this artful delay of her good nature to me now, is meant as a provisional defence against my reproaches, in case, when she has seen this man, she should think it convenient to prefer him.

Col. L. No, no; she's giddy, but not capable of so studied a falsehood.

Darn. But still, what could she mean by going away so abruptly?

Col. L. You grew too grave for her.

Darn. Why, who could bear such trifling?

Col. L. You should have laughed at her.

Darn. I can't love at that easy rate.

Col. L. No—if you could, the uneasiness would lie on her side.

Darn. Do you then really think she has any thing in her heart for me?

Col. L. Ay, marry,<sup>1)</sup> sir—ah! if you could but get her to own that seriously now; Lord! how you could love her!

Darn. And so I could, by heaven!

Col. L. Well, well, I'll undertake for her; if my father don't stand in the way, we are well enough.

Darn. What says my lady? you don't think she's against us?

Col. L. I dare say she is not. She's of so soft, so sweet a disposition—

Darn. Pr'ythee, how came so fine a woman to marry your father, with such a vast inequality of years?

Col. L. Want of fortune, Frank: she was poor and beautiful—he, rich and amorous—she made him happy, and he her—

Darn. A lady—

Col. L. And a jointure—now she's the only one in the family that has power with our precise doctor; and, I dare engage, she'll use it with him to persuade my father from any thing that is against your interest. By the way, you must know I have some shrewd suspicion that this sanctified rogue is in love with her.

Darn. In love!

Col. L. You shall judge by the symptoms—but hush!—here he comes with my grandmother—step this way, and I'll tell you.

Enter DOCTOR CANTWELL, OLD LADY LAMBERT, and SEYWARD.

Dr. C. Charles, step up into my study; bring down a dozen more of those manuals of devotion, with the last hymns I composed; and, when he calls, give them to M. Mawworm; and, do you hear, if any one inquires for me, say I am gone to Newgate<sup>1)</sup>, and the Marshalsea<sup>2)</sup>, to distribute alms.

[Exit Seyward.]

Old Lady L. Well but, worthy doctor, why will you go the prisons yourself—cannot you send the money?—ugly distempers are often caught there—have a care of your health; let us keep one good man, at least, amongst us,

Dr. C. Alas, madam, I am not a good man; I am a guilty, wicked sinner, full of iniquity; the greatest villain that ever breathed; every instant of my life is clouded with stains; it is one continued series of crimes and defilements; you do not know what I am capable of; you indeed take me for a good man; but the truth is, I am a worthless creature.

Old Lady L. Have you then stumbled? alas! if it be so, who shall walk upright? what horrid crime have you been hurried into, that calls for this severe self-accrimination?

Dr. C. None, madam, that perhaps humanity may call very enormous; yet am I sure, that my thoughts never stray a moment from celestial contemplations? do they not sometimes, before I am aware, turn to things of this earth? am I not often hasty, and surprised into wrath? nay, the instance is recent; for last night, being snarled at and bit by Minxy, your daughter-in-law's lap-dog, I am conscious I struck the little beast with a degree of passion, for which I have never been able to forgive myself since.

Old Lady L. Oh! worthy, humble soul! this is a slight offence, which your suffering and mortifications may well atone for.

Dr. C. No, madam, no; I want to suffer; I ought to be mortified; and I am obliged now to tell you, that, for my soul's sake, I must quit your good son's family; I am pampered too much here, live too much at my ease.

Old Lady L. Good doctor!

Dr. C. Alas, madam! it is not you that should shed tears; it is I ought to weep; you are a pure woman.

Old Lady L. I pure! who, I? no, no; sinful, sinful—but do not talk of quitting our family; what will become of us—for friendship—for charity—

Dr. C. Enough; say no more, madam; I submit; while I can do good, it is my duty.

Enter COLONEL LAMBERT and DARNLEY.

Col. L. Your ladyship's most humble servant.

Old Lady L. Grandson, how do you?

Darn. Good day to you, doctor!

Dr. C. Mr. Darnley, I am your most humble servant; I hope you and the good colonel will stay and join in the private duties of the family.

Old Lady L. No, doctor, no; it is too early; the sun has not risen upon them; but, I doubt not, the day will come.

Dr. C. I warrant, they would go to a play now!

Old Lady L. Would they—I am afraid they would.

Darn. Why, I hope it is no sin, madam; if I am not mistaken, I have seen your ladyship at a play.

Old Lady L. Me, sir! see me at a play! you may have seen the prince of darkness, or some of his imps, in my likeness, perhaps—

Darn. Well but, madam—

Old Lady L. Mr. Darnley, do you think I would commit murder?

Dr. C. No, sir, no; these are not the plants usually to be met with in that rank soil; the seeds of wickedness indeed sprout up every where too fast; but a playhouse is the devil's hot-bed—

Col. L. And yet, doctor, I have known some of the leaders of your tribe, as scrupulous as they are, who have been willing to gather fruit there for the use of the brethren—as in case of a benefit—

Dr. C. The charity covereth the sin: and it may be lawful to turn the wages of abomination to the comfort of the righteous.

Col. L. Ha, ha, ha!

Dr. C. Reprobate! reprobate!

Col. L. What is that you mutter, sirrah?

Old Lady L. Oh heavens!

Darn. Let him go, colonel.

Col. L. A canting hypocrite!

Dr. C. Very well, sir; your father shall know my treatment. [Exit.]

Old Lady L. Let me run out of the house; I shall have it fall upon my head, if I stay among such wicked wretches. O grandson! grandson! [Exit.]

Darn. Was there ever such an insolent rascal!

Col. L. The dog will one day provoke me to beat his brains out.

Darn. But what the devil is he? whence comes he?—what is his original?—how has he so ingratiated himself with your father, as to get footing in the house?

Col. L. Oh, sir, he is here in quality of chaplain; he was first introduced by the good old lady that's just gone out. You know, she has been a long time a frequenter of our modern conventicles, where it seems she got acquainted with this sanctified pastor. His disciples believe him a saint; and my poor father, who has been for some time tainted with their pernicious principles, has been led into the same snare.

Darn. Hah! here's your sister again.

Re-enter CHARLOTTE and DOCTOR CANTWELL.

Char. You'll find, sir, I will not be used thus; nor shall your credit with my father protect your insolence to me.

Col. L. What's the matter?

Char. Nothing; pray be quiet.—I don't want you—stand out of the way—how durst you bolt with such authority into my chamber, without giving me notice?

Darn. Confusion!

Col. L. Hold—if my father won't resent this, 'tis then time enough for me to do it.

Dr. C. Compose yourself, madam; I came by your father's desire, who, being informed that you were entertaining Mr. Darnley, grew impatient, and gave his positive commands that you attend him instantly, or he himself, he says, will fetch you.

Darn. Ay, now the storm is rising.

Dr. C. So, for what I have done, madam, I had his authority, and shall leave him to answer you.

Char. 'Tis false. He gave you no authority to insult me; or, if he had, did you suppose I would bear it from you? What is it you presume upon? your function? does that exempt you from the manners of a gentleman?

Dr. C. Shall I have an answer to your father, lady?

Char. I'll send him none by you.

Dr. C. I shall inform him so. [Exit.]

Char. A saucy puppy!

Col. L. Pray, sister, what has the fellow done to you?

Char. Nothing.

Darn. I beg you would tell us, madam.

Char. Nay, no great matter—but I was sitting carelessly in my dressing-room—a—fastening my garter, and this impudent cur comes bounce in upon me—

Darn. The rogue must be corrected.

Col. L. Yet, 'egad, I cannot help laughing at the accident; what a ridiculous figure she must make—ha! ha!

Char. Hah! you're as impudent as he, I think.

Darn. Now, dear Tom, speak to her before she goes.

Char. What does he say, brother?

Col. L. Why, he wants to have me speak to you; and I would have him do it himself.

Char. Ay, come, do, Darnley; I am in a good humour now.

Darn. Oh, Charlotte! my heart is bursting—

Char. Well, well; out with it then.

Darn. Your father now, I see, is bent on parting us—nay, what's worse perhaps, will give you to another—I cannot speak—imagine what I want from you.—

Char. Well—O lud! one looks so silly though when one is so serious—O dear,—in short, I cannot get it out.

Col. L. I warrant you; try again.

Char. O lud—well—if one must be teased, then—why, he must hope, I think.

Darn. Is't possible!—thus—

Col. L. Buz—not a syllable; she has done very well. I bar all heroics; if you press it too far, I'll hold<sup>1)</sup> six to four she's off again in a moment.

Darn. I'm silenced.

Char. Now am I on tiptoe<sup>2)</sup> to know what dd fellow my father has found out for me.

Darn. I'd give something to know him.

Char. He's in a terrible fuss at your being here, I find.

Col. L. 'Sdeath!<sup>3)</sup> here he comes.

Char. Now we are all in a fine pickle.

Enter Sir John Lambert hastily; and, look-

ACT II.

SCENE I. Antichamber at Sir J. LAMBERT'S.

Enter SEYWARD, with a writing in his hand.

Sey. 'Tis so—I have long suspected where his zeal would end, in the making of his private fortune. But then, to found it on the ruin of his patron's children!—I shudder at the villany! What desperation may a son be driven to, so barbarously disinherited!—Besides, his daughter, fair Charlotte, too, is wronged; wronged in the tenderest point: for so extravagant is this settlement, that it leaves her not a shilling, unless she marries with the doctor's consent: which is intended, by what I have heard, as an expedient to oblige her to marry the doctor himself. Now, 'twere but an honest part to let Charlotte know the snare that's laid for her. This deed's not signed, and may be yet prevented. It shall be so.

Enter Sir JOHN LAMBERT, Lady LAMBERT, and CHARLOTTE.

Sir. J. Oh! Seyward, your uncle wants you to transcribe some hymns.

Sey. Sir, I'll wait on him. [Exit.]

Char. A pretty, well-bred fellow, that.

Sir J. Ay, ay; but he has better qualities than his good breeding.

Char. He's always clean too.

Sir J. I wonder, daughter, when you will take notice of a man's real merit. Humph—well bred and clean, forsooth. Would not one think now she was describing a coxcomb? When do you hear my wife talk at this rate? and yet she is as young as your fantastical ladyship.

Lady L. Charlotte is of a cheerful temper, my dear; but I know you don't think she wants discretion.

Sir J. I shall try that presently; and you, my dear, shall judge between us. In short, daughter, your course of life is but one continued round of playing the fool to no purpose; and therefore I am resolved to make you think seriously, and marry.

Char. That I shall do before I marry, sir, you may depend upon it.

Sir J. Um—That I am not so sure of; but you may depend upon my having thought seriously, and that's as well; for the person I intend you is, of all the world, the only man who can make you truly happy.

Char. And, of all the world, sir, that's the only man I'll positively marry.

Lady L. You have great courage, Charlotte; if I had such a game to play, I should be frightened out of my wits.

Char. Lord! madam, he'll make nothing of it, depend upon it. [Aside.]

Sir J. Mind what I say to you. This wonderful man, I say—first, in his public character, is religious, zealous, and charitable.

Char. Very well, sir.

Sir J. In his private character, sober.

Char. I should hate a sot.

Sir J. Chaste.

Char. A hem!

[Stifling a laugh.]

Sir J. What is it you sneer at, madam?

You want one of your fine gentleman rakes, I suppose, that are snapping at every woman they meet with.

Char. No, no, sir: I am very well satisfied.—I—I should not care for such a sort of a man, no more than I should for one that every woman was ready to snap at.

Sir J. No, you'll be secure from jealousy; he has experience, ripeness of years—he is almost forty-nine. Your sex's vanity will have no charms for him.

Char. But all this while, sir, I don't find that he has charms for our sex's vanity. How does he look? Is he tall, well made? Does he dress, sing, talk, laugh, and dance well? Has he good hair, good teeth, fine eyes? Does he keep a chaise, coach, and vis-a-vis? Has he six prancing ponies? Does he wear the prince's uniform, and subscribe to Brookes's? <sup>1)</sup>

Sir J. Was there ever so profligate a creature? What will this age come to!

Lady L. Nay, Charlotte, here I must be against you. Now you are blind indeed. A woman's happiness has little to do with the pleasure her husband takes in his own person.

Sir J. Right.

Lady L. It is not how he looks, but how he loves, is the point.

Sir J. Good again.

Lady L. And a wife is much more secure that has charms for her husband, than when the husband has only charms for her.

Sir J. Admirable! go on, my dear.

Lady L. Do you think a woman of five-and-twenty may not be much happier with an honest man of fifty, than the finest woman of fifty with a young fellow of five-and-twenty?

Sir J. Mark that!

Char. Ay, but when two five-and-twenties come together—dear papa, you must allow they have a chance to be fifty times as pleasant and frolicsome.

Sir J. Frolicsome! Why, you sensual idiot, what have frolics to do with solid happiness? I am ashamed of you.—Go, you talk worse than a girl at a boarding-school.—Frolicsome! as if marriage was only a license for two people to play the fool according to law. Methinks, madam, you have a better example of happiness before your face.—Here's one has ten times your understanding, and she, you find, has made a different choice.

Char. Lord, sir, how you talk! you don't consider people's tempers. I don't say my lady is not in the right; but then you know, papa, she's a prude, and I am a coquette; she becomes her character very well, I don't deny it; and I hope you see every thing I do, is as consistent with mine.—Your wise people may talk what they will; but 'tis constitution governs us all; and be assured, you will no more be able to bring me to endure a man of forty-nine, than you can persuade my lady to dance in church to the organ.

Sir J. O horrible! My poor sister has ruined her: leaving her fortune in her own hands, has turned her brain. In short, Charlotte, your sentiments of life are shameful, and I am resolved, upon your instant reformation: therefore, as an earnest of your obedience, I shall first insist that you never see young Darnley more; for, in one word, the good and pious doctor Cantwell's the man I have decreed for your husband.

Char. Ho! ho! ho!

Sir J. 'Tis very well; this laugh you think becomes you, but I shall spoil your mirth—no more—give me a serious answer.

Char. I ask your pardon, sir; I should not have smiled indeed, could I suppose it possible that you were serious.

Sir J. You'll find me so.

Char. I'm sorry for it; but I have an objection to the doctor, sir, that most fathers think a substantial one.

Sir J. Name it.

Char. Why, sir, we know nothing of his fortune; he's not worth a groat.

Sir J. That's more than you know, madam; I am able to give him a better estate than I am afraid you'll deserve.

Char. How, sir?

Sir J. I have told you what's my will, and shall leave you to think on't.

Enter SEYWARD.

Sey. Sir, if you are at leisure, the doctor desires to speak with you, upon business of importance.

Sir J. Where is he?

Sey. In his own chamber, sir.

Sir J. I will come to him immediately.—[Exit Seyward.]—Daughter, I am called away, and therefore have only time to tell you, as my last resolution, doctor Cantwell is your husband, or I am no more your father.

[Exit.]

Char. O madam! I am at my wit's end; not for the little fortune I may lose in disobeying my father, but it startles me to find what a dangerous influence this fellow has over all his actions.

Lady L. Here's your brother.

Enter COLONEL LAMBERT.

Col. L. Madam, your most obedient—Well, sister, is the secret out? Who is this pretty fellow my father has picked up for you?

Char. Even our agreeable doctor.

Col. L. You are not serious?

Lady L. He's the very man, I can assure you, sir.

Col. L. Confusion! what would the cormorant devour the whole family? Your ladyship knows he is secretly in love with you too.

Lady L. Fie, fie, colonel.

Col. L. I ask your pardon, madam, if I speak too freely; but I am sure, by what I have seen, your ladyship must suspect something of it.

Lady L. I am sorry any body else has seen it; but, I must own, his behaviour to me of late, both in private and before company, has been something warmer than I thought became him.

Col. L. How are these opposites to be reconciled? Can the rascal have the assurance to think both points are to be carried?

Char. Truly, one would not suspect the gentleman to be so termagant.

Col. L. Especially while he pretends to be so shocked at all indecent amours. In the country be used to make the maids lock up the turkey-cocks every Saturday night, for fear they should gallant the hens on a Sunday.

Lady L. Oh! ridiculous!

Col. L. Upon my life, madam, my sister told me so.

Char. I tell you so, impudent—

Lady L. Fie, Charlotte; he only jests with you.

Char. How can you be such a monster, to stay playing the fool here, when you have more reason to be frightened out of your wits? You don't know perhaps, that my father declares he'll settle a fortune upon this fellow too.

Col. L. What do you mean?

Lady L. 'Tis too true; 'tis not three minutes since he said so.

Col. L. Nay then, 'tis time indeed his eyes were opened; and give me leave to say, madam, 'tis only in your power.

Lady L. What is't you propose?

Col. L. Why, if this fellow, which I'm sure of, is really in love with you, give him a fair opportunity to declare it, and leave me to make my advantage.

Lady L. I should be loth to do a wrong thing—

Char. Dear madam, it is the only way in the world to expose him to my father.

Lady L. I'll think of it.

Col. L. Pray do, madam; but in the mean time I must leave you—poor Darnley stays for me at the Smyrna<sup>1)</sup> and will sit upon thorns till I bring him an account of his new rival.

Char. Well, well, get you gone then; here is my grandmother. [Exit Colonel Lambert.]

Enter OLD LADY LAMBERT.

Lady L. This is kind, madam; I hope your ladyship's come to dine with us.

Old Lady L. No; don't be afraid: only in my way from Tottenham-court, I just called to see whether any dreadful accident happened to the family since I was here last.

Lady L. Accident! did your ladyship say?

Old Lady L. I shall be sorry, daughter, but not surprised, when I hear it; for there are goings on under this roof, that will bring temporal punishments along with them.

Lady L. Indeed, madam, you astonish me!

Old Lady L. We'll drop the subject; and I beg leave to address myself to you. Miss Charlotte; I see you have a bit of lace upon your neck; I desire to know what you wear it for.

Char. Wear it for, madam! it's the fashion.

Old Lady L. In short, I have been at my linen draper's to-day, and have bought you some thick muslin, which I desire you will make handkerchiefs of—for I must tell you that slight covering is indecent, and gives much offence.

Lady L. Indecent, did your ladyship say?

Old Lady L. Yes, daughter-in-law, doctor Cantwell complains to me that he can't sit at table, the sight of her bare neck disturbs him so; and he's a good man, and knows what indecency is.

Char. Yes, indeed, I believe he does, better.

than any one in this house. But you may tell the doctor from me, madam, that he is an impudent coxcomb<sup>1)</sup>, a puppy, and deserves to have his bones broke.

Old Lady L. Fie, Charlotte, fie! He speaks but for your good, and this is the grateful return you make.

Char. Grateful return, madam!—how can you be so partial to that hypocrite?—The doctor is one of those who start at a feather.—Poor good man! yet he has his vices of the graver sort—

Old Lady L. Come, come; I wish you would follow his precept, whose practice is conformable to what he teaches.—Virtuous man!—Above all sensual regards, he considers the world merely as a collection of dirt and pebble-stones.—How has he weaned me from temporal connections! My heart is now set upon nothing sublunary: and, I thank heaven, I am so insensible to every thing in this vain world, that I could see you, my son, my daughters, my brothers, my grandchildren, all expire before me; and mind it no more than the going out of so many snuffs of candle.

Char. Upon my word, madam, it is a very humane disposition you have been able to arrive at, and your family is much obliged to the doctor for his instructions.

Old Lady L. Well, child, I have nothing more to say to you at present; heaven mend you, that's all.

Lady L. But pray, madam, stay and dine with us.

Old Lady L. No, daughter, I have said it, and you know I never tell a lie; but here's my son, if you'll give me leave, I'll stay and speak to him.

Lady L. Your ladyship's time is your own.

Char. Ay, here's that abominable doctor.—This fellow puts me beyond my patience.

[Exeunt Lady L. and Char.]

Enter SIR JOHN LAMBERT and DOCTOR CANTWELL.

Sir J. Oh, madam, madam! I'm glad you're here to join me in solicitations to the doctor.—Here is my mother, friend, my mother; a pious woman; you will hear her, more worthy to advise you than I am.

Dr. C. Alas! the dear good lady, I will kiss her hand!—but what advice can she give me? The riches of this world, sir, have no charms for me; I am not dazzled with their false glare; and was I, I repeat it, to accept of the trust you want to repose in me, heaven knows, it would only be lest the means should fall into wicked hands, who would not lay it out as I would do, for the glory of heaven, and the good of my neighbour.

Old Lady L. What's the matter, son?

Dr. C. Nothing, madam; nothing.—But you were witness how the worthy colonel treated me this morning—Not that I speak it on my own account—for to be reviled is my portion.

Sir J. O the villain! the villain!

<sup>1)</sup> Coxcomb and Puppy, appellations much used by the fair sex, to signify their disapprobation of a gentleman, from his rudeness, for instance, in addressing every other female in the company but herself, and such-like misdemeanours. The gentlemen thus denominate the affected and over-dressed of their own sex. There are an immense number of other terms to express this idea; they will appear in the course of these sheets.

Dr. C. Indeed, I did not think he had so hard a nature.

Old Lady L. Ah! your charitable heart knows not the rancour that is in his.—His wicked sister too, has been here this moment, abusing this good man.

Dr. C. O sir, 'tis plain; 'tis plain; your whole family are in a combination against me—your son and daughter hate me; they think I stand between them and your favour: and indeed it is not fit I should do so; for, fallen as they are, they are still your children, and I an alien, an intruder, who ought in conscience to retire and heal those unhappy breaches.

Old Lady L. See; if the good man does not wipe his eyes!

Dr. C. Oh heavens! the thought of their ingratitude wounds me to the quick—but I'll remove this eyesore—here, Charles!

Enter SEYWARD.

Sir J. For goodness sake—

Dr. C. Bring me that writing, I gave you to lay up this morning.

Sir J. Make haste, good Charles; it shall be signed this moment. [Exit Seyward.]

Dr. C. Not for the world, sir John—every minute tends to corroborate my last intentions—I must not, will not take it, with the curses of your children.

Sir J. But consider, doctor—shall my wicked son then be heir to my lands, before repentance has entitled him to favour—No, let him depend upon you, whom he has wronged; perhaps, in time he may reflect on his father's justice, and be reconciled to your rewarded virtues.—If heaven should at last reclaim him, in you I know he still would find a fond forgiving father.

Dr. C. The imagination of so blest an hour, softens me to a tenderness I cannot support!

Old Lady L. Oh! the dear good man.

Sir J. With regard to my daughter, doctor, you know she is not wronged by it; because, if she proves not obstinate, she may still be happy.

Old Lady L. Yes, but the perverse wretch slights the blessing you propose for her.

Dr. C. We must allow, madam, female modesty a time, which often takes the likeness of distress: the commands of your good son might too suddenly surprise her—Maids must be gently dealt with—and might I humbly advise—

Sir J. Any thing you will: you shall govern me and her.

Dr. C. Then, sir, abate of your authority, and let the matter rest awhile.

Sir J. Suppose we were to get my wife to speak to her; women will often hear, from their own sex, what sometimes, even from the man they like, will startle them.

Dr. C. Then, with your permission, sir, I will take an opportunity of talking to my lady.

Sir J. She's now in her dressing-room; I'll go and prepare her for it. [Exit.]

Dr. C. You are too good to me, sir—too bountiful.

Enter SEYWARD.

Sey. Sir, Mr. Mawworm is without, and would be glad to be permitted to speak with you.

Old Lady L. Oh pray, doctor, admit him; I have not seen Mr. Mawworm this great while; he's a pious man, though in an humble estate; desire the worthy creature to walk in.

Enter MAWWORM.

—How do you do, M. Mawworm?

Maw. Thank your ladyship's axing<sup>1)</sup>—I'm but deady poorish indeed; the world and I can't agree—I got the books, doctor—and Mrs. Grunt bid me give her service to you, and thanks you for the eighteen-pence.

Dr. C. Hush, friend Mawworm! not a word more; you know I hate to have my little charities blazed about: a poor widow, madam, to whom I sent my mite.

Old Lady L. Give her this. [offers a purse to Mawworm.]

Dr. C. I'll take care it shall be given to her. [takes it.]

Old Lady L. But what is the matter with you, Mr. Mawworm?

Maw. I don't know what's the matter with me—I'm a breaking my heart—I think it's a sin to keep a shop.

Old Lady L. Why if you think it a sin, indeed—pray what's your business?

Maw. We deals in grocery, tea, small-beer, charcoal, butter, brickdust, and the like.

Old Lady L. Well, you must consult with your friendly director here.

Maw. I wants to go a preaching.

Old Lady L. Do you?

Maw. I'm almost sure I have had a call.

Old Lady L. Ay!

Maw. I have made several sermons already; I does them extrumperry,<sup>2)</sup> because I can't write; and now the devils in our alley says, as how my head's turned.

Old Lady L. Ay, devils indeed—but don't you mind them.

Maw. No, I don't—I rebukes them, and preaches to them, whether they will or not. We lets our house in lodgings to single men; and sometimes I gets them together, with one or two of the neighbours, and makes them all cry.

Old Lady L. Did you ever preach in public?

Maw. I got upon Kennington-common, the last review day; but the boys threw brickbats<sup>3)</sup> at me, and pinned crackers to my tail; and I have been afraid to mount ever since.

Old Lady L. Do you hear this, doctor? throw brickbats at him, and pin crackers to his tail! can these things be stood by?

Maw. I told them so—says I, I does nothing clandestinely<sup>4)</sup>; I stands here contagious<sup>5)</sup> to his majesty's guards, and I charge you upon your apparels<sup>6)</sup> not to mislist<sup>7)</sup> me.

Old Lady L. And had it no effect?

Maw. No more than if I spoke to so many postesses<sup>8)</sup>: but if he advises me to go a preaching, and quit my shop, I'll make an excrescence further into the country.

Old Lady L. An excursion, you would say.

Maw. I am but a sheep, but my bleatings shall be heard afar off; and that sheep shall become a shepherd: nay, if it be only as it were a shepherd's dog, to bark the stray lambs into the fold.

Old Lady L. He wants method, doctor.

Dr. C. Yes, madam; but there is the matter, and I despise not the ignorant.

Maw. He's a saint—till I went after him, I was little better than the devil; my conscience was tanned with sin, like a piece of neat's leather, and had no more feeling than the sole of my shoe; always a roving after fantastical delights: I used to go, every Sunday evening, to the Three Hats at Islington! it's a public-house! mayhap, your ladyship may know it: I was a great lover of skittles too, but now I can't bear them.

Old Lady L. What a blessed reformation!

Maw. I believe, doctor, you never know'd as how I was instigated<sup>1)</sup> one of the stewards of the reforming society. I convicted a man of five oaths, as last Thursday was a se'nnight, at the Pewter-platter, in the Borough; and another of three, while he was playing trap-ball in St. George's-fields: I bought this waistcoat out of my share of the money.

Old Lady L. But how do you mind your business?

Maw. We have lost almost all our customers; because I keeps extorting<sup>2)</sup> them whenever they come into the shop.

Old Lady L. And how do you live?

Maw. Better than ever we did: while we were worldly-minded, my wife and I (for I am married to as likely a woman as you shall see in a thousand) could hardly make things do at all; but since this good man has brought us into the road of the righteous, we have always plenty of every thing; and my wife goes as well dressed as a gentlewoman—we have had a child too.

Old Lady L. Merciful!

Maw. And between you and me, doctor, I believe Susy's breeding again.

Dr. C. Thus it is, madam; I am constantly told, though I can hardly believe it, a blessing follows wherever I come.

Maw. And yet, if you would hear how the neighbours reviles my wife; saying as how she sets no store by me, because we have words now and then; but as I says, if such was the case, would ever she have cut me down that there time as I was melancholy, and she found me hanging behind the door? I don't believe there's a wife in the parish would have done so by her husband.

Dr. C. I believe 'tis near dinner-time; and sir John will require my attendance.

Maw. Oh! I am troublesome—nay, I only come to you, doctor, with a message from Mrs. Grunt. I wish your ladyship heartily and heartily farewell; doctor, a good day to you.

Old Lady L. Mr. Mawworm, call on me some time this afternoon; I want to have a little private discourse with you; and, pray, my service to your spouse.

Maw. I will, madam; you are a malefactor<sup>3)</sup> to all goodness; I'll wait upon your ladyship; I will indeed: [going, returns] Oh, doctor, that's true; Susy desired me to give her kind love and respects to you. [Exit.]

Dr. C. Madam, if you please, I will lead you into the parlour.

Old Lady L. No, doctor, my coach waits at the door.

Enter SEYWARD.

Dr. C. Charles, you may lay those papers by again, but in some place where you'll easily find them; for I believe we shall have occasion for them some time this afternoon.

Sey. I'll take care, sir. [Exit Dr. C. and old Lady Lambert]—Occasion for them this afternoon!—Then there's no time to be lost; the coast is clear, and this is her chamber.—What's the matter with me? the thought of speaking to her throws me into a disorder. There's nobody within; I'll knock again.

Enter BETTY.

Is your lady busy?

Bet. I believe she's only reading, sir.

Sey. Will you do me the favour to let her know, if she's at leisure? I beg to speak with her upon some earnest business.

Enter CHARLOTTE.

Char. Who's that?

Bet. She's here.—Mr. Seyward, madam, desires to speak with you.

Char. Oh, your servant, Mr. Seyward.—Here, take this odious Homer, and lay him up again; he tires me.—[Exit Betty]—How could the blind wretch make such a horrid fuss about a fine woman, for so many volumes together, and give us no account of her amours? you have read him, I suppose, in the Greek, Mr. Seyward?

Sey. Not lately, madam.

Char. But do you so violently admire him now?

Sey. The critics say he has his beauties, madam; but Ovid has been always my favourite.

Char. Ovid—Oh, he is ravishing!

Sey. So art thou, to madness! [Aside.]

Char. Lord! how could one do, to learn Greek!—Were you a great while about it?

Sey. It has been half the business of my life, madam.

Char. That's cruel, now; then you think one could not be mistress of it in a month or two?

Sey. Not easily, madam.

Char. They tell me, it has the softest tone for love of any language in the world—I fancy I could soon learn it. I know two words of it already.

Sey. Pray, madam, what are they?

Char. Stay—let me see—Oh—ay—Zoe kai psuche.

Sey. I hope you know the English of them, madam.

Char. Oh lud! I hope there is no harm in it—I'm sure I heard the doctor say it to my lady—pray, what is it?

Sey. You must first imagine, madam, a tender lover gazing on his mistress; and then indeed they have a softness in them; as thus—Zoe kai psuche!—my life! my soul!

Char. Oh the impudent young rogue! how his eyes spoke too! what the deuce can he want with me! [Aside.]

Sey. I have startled her!—she muses! [Aside.]

Char. It always run in my head that this fellow had something in him above his condition; I'll know immediately. [Aside] Well, but your business with me, Mr. Seyward? you have something of love in your head, I'll lay my life on't.

Sey. I never durst own it, madam.

Char. Why; what's the matter?

Sey. My story is too melancholy to entertain a mind so much at ease as yours.

Char. Oh, I love melancholy stories of all things:—pray how long have you lived with your uncle, Mr. Seyward?

Sey. With doctor Cantwell, I suppose you mean, madam?

Char. Ay.

Sey. He's no uncle of mine, madam.

Char. You surprise me! not your uncle?

Sey. No, madam; but that's not the only character the doctor assumes, to which he has no right.

Char. Lord! I am concerned for you.

Sey. So you would, madam, if you knew all.

Char. I am already; but if there are any further particulars of your story, pray let me hear them; and should any services be in my power, I am sure you may command them.

Sey. You treat me with so kind, so gentle a hand, that I will unbosom myself to you.—My father, madam, was the younger branch of a genteel family in the north; his name Trueman—but dying while I was yet in my infancy, I was left wholly dependant on my mother; a woman really pious and well-meaning, but—in short, madam, doctor Cantwell fatally got acquainted with her, and as he is now your father's bosom counsellor, soon became her's. She died, madam, when I was but eight years old; and then I was, indeed, left an orphan.

Char. Melancholy!

Sey. She left doctor Cantwell her sole heir and executor; but I must do her the justice to say, I believe it was in the confirmation that he would take care of, and do justice to me: and, indeed, he has so far taken care of me, that he sent me to a seminary abroad; and for these three years last past has kept me with him.

Char. A seminary! Oh, heavens! but why have you not strove to do yourself justice?

Sey. Thrown so young into his power, as I was—unknown and friendless, but through his means, to whom could I apply for succour? nay, madam, I will confess, that on my return to England, I was first tainted with his enthusiastic notions myself; and, for some time, as much imposed upon by him, as others; till, by degrees, as he found it necessary to make use of, or totally discard me (which last he did not think prudent to do), he was obliged to unveil himself to me in his proper colours—And I believe I can inform you of some parts of his private character, that may be the means of detecting one of the wickedest impostors that ever practised upon credulity.

Char. But how has the wretch dared to treat you?

Sey. In his ill and insolent humours, madam, he has sometimes the presumption to tell me, that I am the object of his charity; and I own, madam, that I am humbled in my opinion, by his having drawn me into a connivance at some actions, which I can't look back on without horror.

Char. Indeed, you can't tell how I pity you; and depend upon it, if it be possible to serve you, by getting you out of the hands of this monster, I will.

Sey. Once more, madam, let me assure you, that your generous inclination would be a consolation to me in the worst misfortunes; and, even in the last moment of painful death, would give my heart a joy.

Char. Lord! the poor unfortunate boy loves me too—what shall I do with him? [Aside]—Pray, Mr. Seyward, what paper's that you have in your hand?—Is it relative to—

Sey. Another instance of the conscience and gratitude which animate our worthy doctor.

Char. You frighten me! pray, what is the purport of it? Is it neither signed nor sealed—

Sey. No, madam; therefore to prevent it, by this timely notice, was my business here with you; your father gave it to the doctor first, to show his counsel<sup>1</sup>); who having approved it, I understand this evening it will be executed.

Char. But what is it?

Sey. It grants to doctor Cantwell, in present, four hundred pounds per annum, of which this very house is part; and, at your father's death, invests him in the whole remainder of his freehold estate.—For you, indeed, there is a charge of four thousand pounds upon it, provided you marry with the doctor's consent; if not, 'tis added to my lady's jointure—But your brother, madam, is, without conditions, utterly disinherited.

Char. I am confounded!—What will become of us! my father now I find was serious—Oh, this insinuating hypocrite!—Let me see—ay—I will go this minute. Sir, dare you trust this in my hands for an hour only?

Sey. Any thing to serve you— [Bell rings.]

Char. Hark! they ring to dinner: pray, sir, step in: say I am obliged to dine abroad; and whisper one of the footmen to get a chair immediately; then do you take a proper occasion to slip out after me to Mr. Double's chambers in the Temple<sup>2</sup>); there I shall have time to talk further with you. [Exeunt.]

ACT III.

SCENE 1.—A Dressing-Room, with Table and Chairs.

Enter CHARLOTTE, with BETTY, taking off her cloak, etc.

Char. Has any one been to speak with me, Betty?

Bet. Only Mr. Darnley, madam; he said he would call again, and bid his servant stay below to give him notice when you came home.

Char. You don't know what he wanted?

Bet. No, madam; he seemed very uneasy at your being abroad.

Char. Well, go and lay up those things— [Exit Betty] Ten to one but his wise head has found out something to be jealous of;

<sup>2</sup>) The Temple takes its name from having been founded by the knight Templars. In the 13th century, here were frequently entertained the king, the pope's nuncio, foreign ambassadors, and other great personages. The professors of the common law purchased the building at the suppression of the knight Templars, and they were then first converted into inns, where the students keep their terms.

if he lets me see it, I shall be sure to make him infinitely easy—here he comes.

Enter DARNLEY.

Darn. Your humble servant, madam.

Char. Your servant, sir.

Darn. You have been abroad, I hear.

Char. Yes, and now I am come home, you see.

Darn. You seem to turn upon my words, madam! Is there any thing particular in them?

Char. As much as there is in my being abroad, I believe.

Darn. Might I not say you had been abroad, without giving offence?

Char. And might I not as well say I was come home, without your being so grave upon't?

Darn. Do you know any thing that should make me grave?

Char. I know, if you are so, I am the worst person in the world you can possibly show it to.

Darn. Nay, I don't suppose you do any thing you won't justify.

Char. Oh, then I find I have done something you think I can't justify.

Darn. I don't say that neither; perhaps I am wrong in what I have said; but I have been so often used to ask pardon for your being in the wrong, that I am resolved henceforth never to rely on the insolent evidence of my own senses.

Char. You don't know now perhaps that I think this pretty smart speech of yours is very dull; but, since that's a fault you can't help, I will not take it ill; come now, be as sincere on your side, and tell me seriously—Is not what real business I had abroad the very thing you want to be made easy in?

Darn. If I thought you would make me easy, I would own it.

Char. Now we come to the point.—Tomorrow morning then I give you my word, to let you know it all; till then, there is a necessity for its being a secret; and I insist upon your believing it.

Darn. But pray, madam, what am I to do with private imagination in the mean time? that is not in my power to confine; and sure you won't be offended, if, to avoid the tortures that may give me, I beg you'll trust me with the secret now.

Char. Don't press me; for, positively, I will not.

Darn. Will not—can not had been a kinder term—Is my disquiet of so little moment to you?

Char. Of none, while your disquiet dares not trust the assurances I have given you. If you expect I should confide in you for life, don't let me see you dare not take my word for a day; and, if you are wise, you'll think so fair a trial a favour.—Come, come, there's nothing shows so low a mind, as those grave and insolent jealousies.

Darn. However, madam, mine you won't find so low as you imagine; and since I see your tyranny arises from your mean opinion of me, 'tis time to be myself, and disavow your power; you use it now beyond my bearing; not only impose on me to disbelieve my senses, but do it with such an imperious air, as if my manly reason were your slave; and this despicable frame that follows you, durst show no signs of life but what you vouchsafe to give it.

Char. You are in the right: go on—suspect me still—believe the worst you can—'tis all true—I don't justify myself.—Why do you trouble me with your complaints? if you are master of that manly reason you have boasted, give a manly proof of it; at once resume your liberty; despise me; go off in triumph now, like a king in a tragedy.

Darn. Is this the end of all then? and are those tender protestations you have made me (for such I thought them) when, with a kind reluctance, you gave me something more than hope—what all—Oh, Charlotte! all come to this?

Char. Oh, lud! I am growing silly; if I hear on, I shall tell him every thing; 'tis but another struggle and I shall conquer it.—So, you are not gone, I see.

Darn. Do you then wish me gone, madam?

Char. Your manly reason will direct you.

Darn. This is too much—my heart can bear no more—What, am I rooted here?

Enter SEYWARD.

Char. At last I am relieved—Well, Mr. Seyward, is it done?

Sey. I did not stir from the desk till it was entirely finished.

Char. Where's the original?

Sey. This is it, madam.

Char. Very well; that, you know, you must keep; but come, we must lose no time; we will examine this in the next room—now I feel for him. [Exit.]

Darn. This is not to be borne—Pray, Mr. Charles, what business have you with that lady?

Sey. Sir!

Darn. I must know, young man.

Sey. Not quite so young, but I can keep a secret, and a lady's too—you'll excuse me, sir! [Exit.]

Darn. 'Sdeath! to be laughed at by every body—I shall run distracted—this young fellow should repent his pertness, did not this house protect him—this is Charlotte's contrivance to distract me—but what?—Oh! I have love enough to bear this, and ten times as much.

Enter COLONEL LAMBERT.

Col. L. What, in raptures!

Darn. Pr'ythee—I am unfit to talk with you.

Col. L. What, is Charlotte in her airs again?

Darn. I know not what she is.

Col. L. Do you know where she is?

Darn. Retired this moment to her chamber with the young fellow there—the doctor's nephew.

Col. L. Why, you are not jealous of the doctor, I hope?

Darn. Perhaps she'll be less reserved to you, and tell you wherein I have mistaken her.

Col. L. Poor Frank! every plot I lay upon my sister's inclination for you, you are sure to ruin by your own conduct.

Darn. I own I have too little temper, and too much real passion, for a modish lover.

Col. L. Come, come! make yourself easy once more; I'll undertake for you: if you'll fetch a cool turn in the Park, upon Constitution hill, in less than half an hour I'll come to you, and make you perfectly easy.

Darn. Dear Tom, you are a friend indeed!—I have a thousand things—but you shall find me there. [Exit.]

Enter CHARLOTTE and SEYWARD.

Col. L. How now, sister; what have you done to Darnley? the poor fellow looks as if he had killed your parrot.

Char. Pshaw! you know him well enough! I've only been setting him a love lesson; it a little puzzles him to get through it at first, but he'll know it all by to-morrow—you will be sure to be in the way, Mr. Seyward.

Sey. Madam, you may depend upon me; I have my full instructions. [Exit.

Col. L. O, ho! here's the business then; and it seems Darnley was not to be trusted with it; ha! ha!—and, pry'thee, what is the mighty secret that is transacting between Seyward and you?

Char. That's what he would have known, indeed; but you must know, I don't think it proper to let you tell him neither, for all your sly manner of asking.

Col. L. Pray take your own time, dear madam; I am not in haste to know, I assure you.

Char. Well, but hold; on second thoughts, you shall know part of this affair between Seyward and me; nay, I give you leave to tell Darnley too, on some conditions; 'tis true, I did design to have surprised you—but now my mind's altered, that's enough.

Col. L. Ay, for any mortal's satisfaction—but here comes my lady.

Enter LADY LAMBERT.

Lady L. Away, away, colonel and Charlotte; both of you away this instant.

Char. What's the matter, madam?

Lady L. I am going to put the doctor to his trial, that's all. I have considered the proposal you have made me to-day, colonel, and am convinced it ought not to be delayed an instant; so just now I told the doctor, in a half-whisper, that I should be glad to have a word in private with him here; and he said he would wait upon me presently: but must I play a traitorous part now, and instead of persuading you to the doctor, persuade the doctor against you?

Char. Dear madam, why not? one moment's truce with the prude, I beg of you; don't startle at his first declaration, but let him go on, till he shows the very bottom of his ugly heart.

Lady L. I warrant you, I'll give a good account of him—but, as I live, here he comes!

Char. Come then, brother, you and I will be comode, and steal off. [Exeunt Charlotte and Col. L. who listens.

Enter DOCTOR CANTWELL.

Dr. C. Here I am, madam, at your ladyship's command; how happy am I that you think me worthy—

Lady L. Please to sit, sir.

Dr. C. Well but, dear lady, ha! you can't conceive the joyousness I feel at this so much desired interview. Ah! ah! I have a thousand friendly things to say to you: and how stands your precious health? is your naughty cold abated yet? I have scarce closed my eyes these two nights with my concern for you.

Lady L. Your charity is too far concerned for me.

Dr. C. Ah! don't say so; don't say so; you merit more than mortal man can do for you.

Lady L. Indeed, you overrate me.

Dr. C. I speak it from my heart: indeed, indeed, indeed I do.

Lady L. O dear! you hurt my hand, sir.

Dr. C. Impute it to my zeal, and want of words for expression: precious soul! I would not hurt you for the world: no, it would be the whole business of my life—

Lady L. But to the affair I would speak to you about.

Dr. C. Ah! thou heavenly woman!

Lady L. Your hand need not be there, sir.

Dr. C. I was admiring the softness of this silk. They are indeed come to prodigious perfection in all manufactures: how wonderful is human art! Here it disputes the prize with nature; that all this soft and gaudy lustre should be wrought from the labours of a poor worm!

Lady L. But our business, sir, is upon another subject; sir John informs me, that he thinks himself under no obligations to Mr. Darnley, and therefore resolves to give his daughter to you.

Dr. C. Such a thing has been mentioned, madam; but, to deal sincerely with you, that is not the happiness I sigh after; there is a soft and serious excellence for me, very different from what your step-daughter possesses.

Lady L. Well, sir, pray be sincere, and open your heart to me.

Dr. C. Open my heart! can you then, sweet lady, be yet a stranger to it? has no action of my life been able to inform you of my real thoughts?

Lady L. Well, sir, I take all this, as I suppose you intend it, for my good and spiritual welfare.

Dr. C. Indeed, I mean you cordial service.

Lady L. I dare say you do: you are above the low, momentary views of this world.

Dr. C. Why, I should be so; and yet, alas! I find this mortal clothing of my soul is made like other men's, of sensual flesh and blood, and has its frailties.

Lady L. We all have those, but yours are well corrected by your divine and virtuous contemplations.

Dr. C. Alas! madam, my heart is not of stone: I may resist, call all my prayers, my fastings, tears, and penance, to my aid; but yet, I am not an angel; I am still but a man; and virtue may strive, but nature will be uppermost. I love you then, madam.

Lady L. Hold, sir! suppose I now should let my husband, your benefactor, know the favour you design him?

Dr. C. You cannot be so cruel!

Lady L. Nor will, on this condition; that instantly you renounce all claim and title to Charlotte, and use your utmost interest with sir John, to give her, with her full fortune, to Mr. Darnley.

Enter COLONEL LAMBERT.

Col. L. Villain! monster! perfidious and ungrateful traitor! your hypocrisy, your false zeal, is discovered; and I am sent here, by the hand of insulted heaven, to lay you open to my father, and expose you to the world.

Dr. C. Ha!

Lady L. O, unthinking colonel!

Col. L. Well, sir, what have you to say for yourself?

Dr. C. I have nothing to say to you, colonel, nor for you—but you shall have my prayers.

Col. L. Why, you profligate hypocrite! do you think to carry off your villany with that sanctified air?

Dr. C. I know not what you mean, sir; I have been in discourse here with my good lady, by permission of your worthy father.

Col. L. Dog! did my father desire you to talk of love to my lady?

Dr. C. Call me not dog, colonel: I hope we are both brother Christians.—Yes, I will own I did beg leave to talk to her of love: for, alas! I am but a man; yet if my passion for your dear sister, which I cannot control, be sinful—

Lady L. Your noise, I perceive, is bringing up sir John; manage with him as you will at present: I will withdraw, for I have an after-game to play, which may yet put this wretch effectually into our power. [Exit.

Enter SIR JOHN LAMBERT.

Sir J. What uproar is this?

Col. L. Nothing, sir, nothing; only a little broil of the good doctor's here—You are well rewarded for your kindnesses; and he would fain pay it back with triple interest to your wife: in short, I took him here in the very fact of making a criminal declaration of love to my lady.

Dr. C. Why, why, sir John, would you not let me leave your house? I knew some dreadful method would be taken to drive me hence—O, be not angry, good colonel: but indeed, and indeed, you use me cruelly.

Sir J. Horrible, wicked, creature!—Doctor, let me hear it from you.

Dr. C. Alas, sir, I am in the dark as much as you; but it should seem, for what purpose he best knows, your son hid himself hereabouts; and while I was talking to my lady, rushed in upon us—you know the subject, sir, on which I was to entertain her; and I might speak of my love for your daughter with more warmth than, perhaps, I ought; which the colonel overhearing, he might possibly imagine I was addressing my lady herself; for I will not suspect, no, heaven forbid, I will not suspect that he would intentionally forge a falsehood to dishonour me.

Sir J. Now, vile detractor of all virtue! is your outrageous malice confounded? what he tells you is true; he has been talking to my lady by my consent, and what he said was by my orders—Good man! be not concerned; for I see through their vile design—Here, thou curse of my life, if thou art not lost to conscience and all sense of honour, repair the injury you have attempted, by confessing your rancour, and throwing yourself at his feet.

Dr. C. Oh, sir John! for my sake—I will throw myself at the colonel's feet; nay, if that will please him, he shall tread on my neck.

Sir J. What, mute, defenceless, hardened in thy malice?

Col. L. I sorn the imputation, sir; and with the same repeated honesty avow (however cunningly he may have devised this gloss), that you are deceived—what I tell you, sir, is true—these eyes, these ears, were witnesses of his audacious love, without the mention of my sister's name! directly, plainly, grossly tending to abuse the honour of your bed.

Sir J. Villain! this instant leave my sight, my house, my family, for ever.

Dr. C. Hold, good sir John; I am now recovered from my surprise; let me then be an humble mediator—on my account this must not be—I grant it possible, your son loves me not; but you must grant it too as possible, he might mistake me; to accuse me then, was but the error of his virtue; you ought to love him, thank him, for his watchful care.

Sir J. O miracle of charity!

Dr. C. Come, come; such breaches must not be betwixt so good a son and father; forget, forgive, embrace him, cherish him, and let me bless the hour I was the occasion of so sweet a reconciliation.

Sir J. Hear this, perverse and reprobate! Oh! couldst thou wrong such more than mortal virtue?

Col. L. Wrong him! the hardened impudence of this painted charity—

Sir J. Peace, graceless infidel!

Col. L. No, sir, though I would hazard life to gain you from the clutches of that wretch; could die to reconcile my duty to your favour; yet, on the terms his villany offers, it is merit to refuse it—but, sir, I'll trouble you no more; to-day is his, to-morrow may be mine. [Exit.

Sir J. Come, my friend, we'll go this instant and sign the settlement: for that wretch ought to be punished, who I now see is incorrigible, and given over to perdition.

Dr. C. And do you think I take your estate with such view?—No, sir—I receive it that I may have an opportunity to rouse his mind to virtue, by showing him an instance of the forgiveness of injuries; the return of good for evil!—

Sir J. O, my dear friend! my stay and my guide! I am impatient till the affair is concluded.

Dr. C. The will of heaven be done in all things.

Sir J. Poor, dear, man! [Exeunt.

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—A Parlour at SIR JOHN LAMBERT'S.

Enter CHARLOTTE and SEYWARD.

Char. You were a witness, then?

Sey. I saw it signed, sealed, and delivered, madam.

Char. And all passed without the least suspicion?

Sey. Sir John signed it with such earnestness, and the doctor received it with such seeming reluctance, that neither had the curiosity to examine a line of it.

Char. Well, Mr. Seyward, whether it succeeds to our ends or not, we have still the same obligations to you.—You saw with what friendly warmth my brother heard your story; and I don't in the least doubt his being able to do something for you.

Sey. What I have done, my duty bound me to; but pray, madam, give me leave, without offence, to ask you one innocent question.

Char. Freely.

Sey. Have you never suspected, that in all this affair, I have had some secret, stronger, motive than barely duty?

Char. Yes.—But have you been in no apprehensions I should discover that motive?

Sey. Pray, pardon me; I see already I have gone too far.

Char. Not at all; it loses you no merit with me; nor is it my nature to use any one ill that loves me, unless I loved that one again: then, indeed, there might be danger. Come, don't look grave; my inclinations to another shall not hinder me paying every one what's due to their merit: I shall therefore always think myself obliged to treat your misfortunes and your modesty with the utmost tenderness.

Sey. Your good opinion is all I aim at.

Char. Ay; but the more I give it you, the better you'll think of me still; and then I must think the better of you again; and then you the better of me, upon that too; and so at last I shall seriously, and you'll begin to think ill of me. But I hope, Mr. Seyward, your good sense will prevent all this.

Sey. I see my folly, madam, and blush at my presumption. Madam, I humbly take my leave. [Exit.]

Char. Well, he's a pretty young fellow after all, and the very first, sure, that ever heard reason against himself with so good an understanding.

Enter LADY LAMBERT.

Lady L. Dear Charlotte, what will become of us?—The tyranny of this subtle hypocrite is insupportable. He has so fortified himself in sir John's opinion, by this last misconduct of your brother, that I begin to lose my power with him.

Char. Pray explain, madam,

Lady L. In spite of all I could urge, he has consented that the doctor shall this minute come, and be his own advocate.

Char. I'm glad on't; for the beast must come like a bear to the stake. I'm sure, he knows I shall bait him.

Lady L. No matter for that; he presses it, to keep sir John still blind to his wicked design upon me.—Therefore I come to give you notice, that you might be prepared to receive him.

Char. I'm obliged to your ladyship. Our meeting will be a tender scene, no doubt on't.

Lady L. But I think I hear the doctor coming up stairs. My dear girl, at any rate keep your temper. I shall expect you in my dressing-room, to tell me the particulars of your conduct. [Exit.]

Char. He must have a great deal of impudence, to come in this manner to me.

Enter BETTY.

Bet. Doctor Cantwell desires to be admitted, madam.

Char. Let him come in.

Enter DOCTOR CANTWELL.

Your servant, sir—Give us chairs, Betty, and leave the room.—[exit Betty.]—Sir, there's a seat—What can the ugly cur say to me?—he seems a little puzzled.

Dr. C. Look ye, young lady, I am afraid, notwithstanding your good father's favour, I am not the man you would desire to be alone with upon this occasion.

Char. Your modesty is pleased to be in the right.

Dr. C. I'm afraid too, notwithstanding all my endeavours to the contrary, that you entertain a pretty bad opinion of me.

Char. A worse, sir, of no mortal breathing.

Dr. C. Which opinion is immovable.

Char. No rock so firm.

Dr. C. I am afraid then it will be a vain pursuit, when I solicit you, in compliance with my worthy friend's desire and my own inclinations, to become my partner in that blessed estate in which we may be a comfort and support to each other.

Char. I would die rather than consent to it,

Dr. C. In other words, you hate me.

Char. Most transcendently.

Dr. C. Well, there is sincerity at least in your confession: you are not, I see, totally deprived of all virtue, though I must say I never could perceive in you but very little.

Char. Oh, fie! you flatter me.

Dr. C. No, I speak it with sorrow, because you are the daughter of my best friend. But how are we to proceed now? are we to preserve temper?

Char. Oh! never fear me, sir, I shall not fly out, being convinced that nothing gives so sharp a point to one's aversion as good breeding; as, on the contrary, ill manners often hide a secret inclination.

Dr. C. Well then, young lady, be assured so far am I from the unchristian disposition of returning injuries, that your antipathy to me causes no hatred in my soul towards you; on the contrary, I would willingly make you happy, if it may be done according to my conscience, with the interest of heaven in view.

Char. Why, I can't see, sir, how heaven can be any way concerned in a transaction between you and me.

Dr. C. When you marry any other person, my consent is necessary.

Char. So I hear, indeed!—but pray, doctor, how could your modesty receive so insolent a power, without putting my poor father out of countenance with your blushes?

Dr. C. I sought it not; but he would crowd it among other obligations. He is good natured; and I foresaw it might serve to pious purposes.

Char. I don't understand you.

Dr. C. I take it for granted, that you would marry Mr. Darnley. Am I right?

Char. Once in your life, perhaps, you may.

Dr. C. Nay, let us be plain. Would you marry him?

Char. You're mighty nice, methinks. Well, I would.

Dr. C. Then I will not consent.

Char. You won't?

Dr. C. My conscience will not suffer me. I know you to be both luxurious and worldly minded; and you would squander upon the vanities of the world, those treasures which ought to be better laid out.

Char. Hum!—I believe I begin to conceive you.—

Dr. C. If you can think of any project to satisfy my conscience, I am tractable. You know there is a considerable moiety of your fortune which goes to my lady in case of our disagreement.

Char. That's enough, sir.—You think we should have a fellow feeling in it. At what sum do you rate your concurrence to my inclinations? that settled, I am willing to strike the bargain.

Dr. C. What do you think of half?

Char. How! two thousand pounds?

Dr. C. Why, you know you gain two thousand pounds; and really the severity of the times for the poor, and my own stinted pittance, which cramps my charities, will not suffer me to require less.

Char. But how is my father to be brought into this?

Dr. C. Leave that to my management.

Char. And what security do you expect for the money?

Dr. C. Oh! Mr. Darnley is wealthy: when I deliver my consent in writing; he shall lay it down to me in bank-bills.

Char. Pretty good security! On one proviso though.

Dr. C. Name it.

Char. That you immediately tell my father, that you are willing to give up your interest to Mr. Darnley.

Dr. C. Hum!—stay—I agree to it; but in the mean time, let me warn you child, not to expect to turn that, or what has now passed between us, to my confusion, by sinister construction, or evil representation to your father. I am satisfied of the piety of my own intentions, and care not what the wicked think of them; but force me not to take advantage of sir John's good opinion of me, in order to shield myself from the consequences of your malice.

Char. Oh! I shall not stand in my own light: I know your conscience and your power too well, dear doctor!

Dr. C. Well, let your interest sway you. Thank heaven, I am actuated by more worthy motives.

Char. No doubt on't.

Dr. C. Farewell, and think me your friend.

[Exit.

Char. What this fellow's original was, I know not; but by his conscience and cunning, he would make an admirable Jesuit.

Enter SERVANT.

Serv. Madam, Mr. Darnley.

Char. Desire him to walk in. [Exit Servant.

Enter DARNLEY.

Darn. To find you thus alone, madam, is a happiness I did not expect, from the temper of our last parting.

Char. I should have been as well pleased now, to have been thanked, as reproached, for my good nature; but you will be in the right, I find.

Darn. Indeed, you take me wrong. I literally mean that I was afraid you would not so soon think I had deserved this favour.

Char. Well, but were you not silly now?

Darn. Come, you shall not be serious: you can't be more agreeable.

Char. Oh! but I am serious.

Darn. Then I'll be so.—Do you forgive me all?

Char. What?

Darn. Are we friends, Charlotte?

Char. O Lord; but you have told me nothing of poor Seyward!

Darn. Must you needs know that, before you answer me.

Char. Lord! you are never well till you have talked one out of countenance.

Darn. Come, I won't be too particular; you shall answer nothing—Give me but your hand only.

Char. Pshaw! I won't pull off my glove, not I.

Darn. I'll take it as it is then.

Char. Lord! there, there; eat it, eat it.

Darn. And so I could, by heaven!

Char. Oh, my glove! my glove! my glove! you are in a perfect storm! Lord! if you make such a rout with one's hand, what would you do if you had one's heart?

Darn. That's impossible to tell.—But you were asking me of Seyward, madam?

Char. Oh, ay! that's true. Well, now you are very good again.—Come, tell me all the affair, and then you shall see—how I will like you.

Darn. There is not much to tell—only this: we met the attorney-general, to whom he has given a very sensible account of himself, and the doctor's proceedings.—The attorney-general seems very clear in his opinion, that, as the doctor, at the time of the death of Seyward's mother, was entrusted with her whole affairs, the Court of Equity<sup>1)</sup> will oblige him to be accountable.

Char. If Seyward does not recover his fortune, you must absolutely get him a commission, and bring him into acquaintance.

Darn. Upon my word I will.

Char. And show him to all the women of taste; and I'll have you call him my pretty fellow, too.

Darn. I will, indeed!—but hear me—

Char. You can't conceive how prettily he makes love.

1) Early in the history of the English jurisprudence, the administration of justice, by the ordinary courts, appears to have been incomplete. To supply this defect, the Courts of Equity have obtained their establishment; assuming the power of enforcing the principles upon which the ordinary courts also decide, when the powers of those courts, or their modes of proceeding, are insufficient for that purpose; of preventing those principles, as literally enforced by the ordinary courts, from producing decisions contrary to their spirit, and becoming instruments of actual injustice in particular cases; and of deciding on principles of universal justice, where the interference of a court of judicature is necessary to prevent a wrong, in matters wherein the positive law is silent. The courts of equity also administer to the ends of justice, by removing impediments to the fair decision of a question in other courts; by providing for the safety of property in dispute, pending a legislation; by restraining the assertion of doubtful rights, in a manner productive of irreparable damage: by preventing injury to a third person from the doubtful title of others; by putting a bound to vexatious and oppressive litigations, and preventing unnecessary multiplicity of suits; by compelling, without pronouncing any judgment on the subject, a discovery which may enable other courts to give their judgment; and by preserving testimony, when in danger of being lost before the matter to which it relates can be made the subject of judicial investigation.

Darn. Not so well as you make your defence, Charlotte.

Char. Lord! I had forgot, he is to teach me Greek, too.

Darn. Trifling tyrant! how long, Charlotte, do you think you can find new evasions for what I say unto you?

Char. Lord! you are horrid silly; but since 'tis love that makes you such a dunce—poor Darnley, I forgive you.

Enter COLONEL LAMBERT, unobserved.

Darn. That's kind, however.—But, to complete my joy, be kinder yet—and—

Char. Oh! I can't! I can't!—Lord! did you never ride a horse-match?

Darn. Was ever so wild a question!

Char. Because, if you have, it runs in my head you galloped a mile beyond the winning-post, to make sure on't.

Darn. Now, I understand you. But since you will have me touch every thing so very tenderly, Charlotte, how shall I find proper words to ask you the lover's last necessary question?

Char. Oh! there's a thousand points to be adjusted before that's answered.

Col. L. [advances] Name them this moment; for, positively, this is the last time of asking<sup>1</sup>).

Char. Pshaw! who sent for you?

Col. L. I only came to teach you to speak plain English, my dear.

Char. Lord! mind your own business; can't you!

Col. L. So I will; for I will make you do more of yours in two minutes, than you would have done without me in a twelvemonth. Why, how now!—do you think the man's to dangle after your ridiculous airs for ever?

Char. This is mighty pretty!

Col. L. You'll say so on Thursday se'nnight for (let affairs take what turn they will in the family), that's positively your wedding-day—Nay, you shan't stir.

Char. Was ever such assurance!

Darn. Upon my life, madam, I'm out of countenance! I don't know how to behave myself.

Char. No, no; let him go on only—this is beyond whatever was known, sure!

Col. L. Ha! ha! if I was to leave you to yourselves, what a couple of pretty out of countenanced figures you would make! humming and hawing<sup>2</sup>) upon the vulgar points of jointure and pin-money. Come, come, I know what's proper on both sides; you shall leave it to me.

Darn. I had rather Charlotte would name her own terms to me.

Col. L. Have you a mind to any thing particular, madam?

Char. Why, sure! what do you think I'm only to be filled out as you please, and sweetened and sipped up like a dish of tea?

Col. L. Why pray, madam, when your tea's ready, what have you to do but to drink it?—but you, I suppose, expect a lover's heart, like your lamp, should be always flaming at your elbow; and when it's ready to go out, you indolently supply it with the spirit of contradiction.

Char. And so you suppose, that your assurance has made an end of this matter?

Col. L. Not till you have given him your hand upon it.

Char. That then would complete it.

Col. L. Perfectly.

Char. Why then take it, Darnley. Now I presume you are in high triumph, sir.

Col. L. No, sister; now you are consistent with that good sense I always thought you mistress of.

Char. And now I beg we may separate; for our being seen together, at this critical juncture, may give that devil, the doctor, suspicion of a confederacy, and make him set some engine at work that we are not aware of.

Col. L. It's a very proper caution. Come along, Darnley; nay, you must leave her now, whatever violence you do yourself.

Char. Ay, ay, take him with you, brother—or stay, Darnley; if you please, you may come along with me. [Exeunt.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—A Parlour at Sir JOHN LAMBERT'S.

Enter DARNLEY and CHARLOTTE.

Char. But really, will you stand to the agreement though, that I have made with the doctor?

Darn. Why not? you shall not break your word upon my account, though he might be a villain you gave it to. Suppose I should talk with sir John myself?—'tis true, he has slighted me of late.

Char. No matter—here he comes—this may open another scene of action to that I believe my brother's preparing for.

Enter Sir JOHN and LADY LAMBERT.

Sir J. Mr. Darnley, I am glad I have met you here.

Darn. I have endeavoured twice to-day, sir, to pay my respects to you.

Sir J. Sir, I'll be plain with you—I went out to avoid you; but where the welfare of a child is concerned, you must not take it ill if we don't stand upon ceremony—However, since I have reason now to be more in temper than perhaps I was at that time, I shall be glad to talk with you.

Darn. I take it as a favour, sir.

Sir J. You must allow, Mr. Darnley, that conscience is the rule which every honest man ought to walk by.

Darn. 'Tis granted; sir.

Sir J. Then give me leave to tell you, sir, that giving you my daughter would be to act against that conscience I pretend to, while I think you an ill liver; and consequently the same tie obliges me to bestow her on a better man—

Darn. Well but, sir, come to the point. Suppose the doctor (whom I presume you design her for) actually consents to give me up his interest?

<sup>1</sup>) The bans of marriage, when the parties have no licenses, are given out in the following words: "I publish the bans of marriage between — of — and — of — any one knowing any just cause or impediment why these should not be joined together in holy matrimony are now to declare it; and this is the first time of asking;" and so on to the second and third, which is the last time.

Sir J. But why do you suppose, sir, he will give up his interest?

Darn. I only judge from what your daughter tells me, sir.

Sir J. My daughter!

Darn. I appeal to her.

Char. And I appeal even to yourself, sir—Has not the doctor, just now in the garden, spoke in favour of Mr. Darnley to you? Nay, pray, sir, be plain; because more depends on that than you can easily imagine or believe.

Sir J. What senseless insinuation have you got into your head now?

Char. Be so kind, sir, first to answer me, that I may be better able to inform you.

Sir J. Well, I own he has declined his interest in favour of Mr. Darnley; but I must tell you, madam, he did it in so modest, so friendly, so good natured, so conscientious a manner, that I now think myself more than ever bound in honour to espouse him.

Char. But now, sir, only for argument's sake, suppose I could prove that all this seeming virtue was artificial; that his regard for Mr. Darnley was neither founded upon modesty, friendship, good nature, nor conscience; or in short that he has, like a villain, bartered, bargained to give me to Mr. Darnley, for half the four thousand pounds you valued his consent at; I say, sir, suppose this could be proved, where would be his virtue then?

Sir J. It is impious to suppose it.

Char. Then, sir, from what principle must you suppose that I accuse him?

Sir J. From an obstinate prejudice to all that's good and virtuous.

Char. That's too hard, sir. But the worst your opinion can provoke me to, is to marry Mr. Darnley, without either his consent or yours.

Sir J. What, do you brave me, madam?

Char. No, sir; but I scorn a lie; and will so far vindicate my integrity, as to insist on your believing me; if not, as a child you abandon, I have a right to throw myself into other arms for protection.

Sir J. I am confounded. These tears cannot be counterfeit; nor can this be true.

Lady L. Indeed, my dear, I fear it is. Give me leave to ask one question. In all our mutual course of happiness, have I ever yet deceived you with a falsehood?

Sir J. Never.

Lady L. Would you then believe me, should I accuse him even of crimes which virtue blushes but to mention?

Sir J. To what extravagance would you drive me!

Lady L. I would before have undeceived you, when his late artifice turned the honest duty of your son into his own reproach and ruin; but, knowing then your temper was inaccessible, I durst not offer it. But suppose I should be able to let you see his villany, make him repeat his odious love to me in your own hearing, at once throw off the mask, and show the barefaced traitor?

Sir J. Is it possible?

Lady L. But then, sir, I must prevail on you to descend to the poor shifts we are reduced to.

Sir J. All; to any thing, to ease me of my doubts; make me but a witness of this fact, and I shall soon accuse myself, and own my folly equal to his baseness.

Lady L. Behind that screen you may easily conceal yourself.

Sir J. Be it so.

Lady L. Mr. Darnley, shall we beg your leave; and you, Charlotte, take the least suspected way to send the doctor to me directly.

Char. I have a thought will do it, madam.

Sir J. Oh, Charlotte! Oh, Mr. Darnley!

Darn. Have but resolution, sir, and fear nothing. [Exeunt Darnley and Charlotte.]

Lady L. Now, 'sir, you are to consider what a desperate disease I have undertaken to cure: therefore, be sure keep close and still; and when the proof is full, appear at your discretion.

Sir J. Fear not; I will conform myself—Yet, be not angry, my love, if, in a case like this, I have also charity enough to hope you may yet be deceived in what you charge him with, till the evidence of my own senses assure me of the contrary.

Lady L. 'Tis just.

Sir J. Hark! I think I hear him coming.

Lady L. Now, my dear, remember your promise to have patience.

Sir J. Rely upon't.

Lady L. To your post then.

[Sir John goes behind the screen.]

Enter DOCTOR CANTWELL, with a book.

Dr. C. Madam, your woman tells me, that, being here and alone, you desired to speak with me.

Lady L. I did, sir—but that we may be sure that we are alone, pray shut the outward door—another surprise might ruin us—is all safe?

Dr. C. I have taken care, madam.

Lady L. But I am afraid I interrupt your meditation.

Dr. C. No, madam, no; I was only looking over some pious exhortations here, for the use of a society of chosen brethren.

Lady L. Ah, doctor, what have you done to me? the trouble of my mind since our last unfortunate conference is not to be expressed. You indeed discovered to me what, perhaps, for my own peace, 'twere better I had never been acquainted with; but I had not sufficient time to lay my heart open to you.

Dr. C. Whither, madam, would you lead me?

Lady L. I have been uneasy too, not knowing how far you might mistake my behaviour on the last accident that happened, but I was really so shocked, so terrified, I knew not what I was doing: only, had I joined in your defence against the colonel, it would have been evident that I was his enemy, and I have uses for his friendship. Silence, therefore, was my own prudent part: and I knew your credit with sir John needed no support.

Dr. C. Let me presume then to hope, that what I did, you judge was self-defence and pure necessity.

Lady L. And perhaps, after all, the accident was lucky; for sir John, in order to obviate any ill constructions that may be put upon it, insists now that we should be more together, to let the world see his confidence in us both. This relieves us from restraint; and I now dare tell you—but no—I won't—

Dr. C. But why, madam? let me beseech you—

Lady L. No—besides—what need you ask me—

Dr. C. Ah! do not endeavour to decoy my foolish heart, too apt to flatter itself. You cannot sure think kindly of me!

Lady L. Well, well, I would have you imagine so.

Dr. C. Besides, may I not with reason suspect, that this apparent goodness is but artifice; a shadow of compliance, meant only to persuade me from your daughter.

Lady L. Methinks, this doubt of me seems rather founded on your settled resolution not to resign her.—I am convinced of it. I can assure you, sir, I should have saved you this trouble, had I known how deeply you were engaged to her.

Dr. C. Tears—then I must believe you—but indeed you wrong me. To prove my innocence, it is not an hour since I pressed sir John to give Charlotte to young Darnley.

Lady L. Mere artifice. You knew that modest resignation would make sir John warmer in your interest.

Dr. C. No, indeed, indeed. I had other motives, which you may hereafter be made acquainted with, and will convince you—

Lady L. Well, sir, now I'll give you reason to guess the reason why, at our last meeting, I pressed you so warmly to resign Charlotte.

Dr. C. Ah dear! ah dear!

Lady L. You cannot blame me for having opposed your happiness, when my own, perhaps, depended upon it.

Dr. C. Spare me, spare me; you kill me with this kindness.

Lady L. But now that I have discovered my weakness, be secret; for the least imprudence—

Dr. C. It is a vain fear.

Lady L. Call it not vain; my reputation is dearer to me than life.

Dr. C. Where can it find so sure a guard? The grave austerities of my life will dumbfound suspicion, and yours may defy detraction.

Lady L. Well, doctor, 'tis you must answer for my folly.

Dr. C. I take it all upon myself.

Lady L. But there's one thing still to be afraid of.

Dr. C. Nothing, nothing.

Lady L. My husband, sir John.

Dr. C. Alas, poor man! I will answer for him. Between ourselves, madam, your husband is weak; I can lead him by the nose any where.

Sir J. [Comes forward.] No, caitiff, I'm to be led no further.

Dr. C. Ah! woman.

Sir J. Is this your sanctity? this your doctrine? these your meditations?

Dr. C. Is then my brother in a conspiracy against me?

Sir J. Your brother! I have been your friend, indeed, to my shame; your dupe; but your spell has lost its hold: no more canting; it will not serve your turn any longer.

Lady L. Now, heaven be praised.

Dr. C. It seems you wanted an excuse to part with me.

Sir J. Ungrateful wretch! but why do I reproach you! Had I not been the weakest of mankind, you never could have proved so great a villain. Get out of my sight; leave my house:

of all my follies, which is it tells you, that if you stay much longer, I shall not be tempted to wrest you out of the hands of the law, and punish you as you deserve?

Dr. C. Well; but first let me ask you, sir, who is it you menace? consider your own condition, and where you are?

Sir J. What would the villain drive at? leave me. I forgive you: but once more I tell you, seek some other place; out of my house. This instant be gone, and see my shameful face no more.

Dr. C. Nay, then, 'tis my duty to exert myself, and let you know that I am master here. Turn you out, sir; this house is mine; and now, sir, at your peril, dare to insult me.

Sir J. O heavens! 'tis true: whither shall I fly to hide me from the world?

Lady L. Whither are you going, sir?

Sir J. I know not—but here it seems I am a trespasser—the master of the house has warned me hence—and, since the right is now in him, 'tis just I should resign it.

Lady L. You shall not stir. He dares not act with such abandoned insolence. No, sir, possession still is yours. If he pretends a right, let him by open course of law maintain it.

Dr. C. Ha! Here! Seyward! [Exit.

Enter OLD LADY LAMBERT and MAWORM.

Sir J. Who is this fellow? what do you want, man?

Maw. My lady, come up.

Old Lady L. How now!

Maw. He wants to know who I be.

Old Lady L. The gentleman is a friend of mine, son. I was carrying him in a coach to attend a controversy that's to be held this evening, at the Rev. Mr. Scruple's, about an affair of simony; and called to take up the doctor. But what strange tales are these I hear below?

Sir J. The doctor's a villain, madam; I have detected him; detected him in the horrible design of seducing my wife.

Maw. It's impossible.

Sir J. What do you say, man?

Maw. I say, it's impossible. He has been locked up with my wife for hours together, morning, noon, and night, and I never found her the worse for him.

Old Lady L. Ah, son! son!

Sir J. What is your ladyship going to say now?

Old Lady L. The doctor is not in fault.

Sir J. 'Slife,<sup>1)</sup> madam!

Old Lady L. Oh, he swears! he swears! years in growing good, we become profligate in a moment. If you swear again, I won't stay in the house.

Maw. Nor I neither; aren't you ashamed of yourself? have you no commenseration<sup>2)</sup> on your poor soul?—Ah! poor wicked sinner! I pity you.

Sir J. 'Sdeath! and the devil!

Maw. If you swear any more, I'll inform against you.

Sir J. Why would you bring this idiot, madam?

Maw. Ay, do despise me, I'm the prouder for it; I likes to be despised.

Enter CHARLOTTE.

Char. Oh dear papa, I shall faint away; there's murder doing.

Sir J. Who! when! what is it?

Char. The doctor, sir, and Seyward, were at high words just now in the garden; and, upon a sudden, there was a pistol fired between them. Oh! I'm afraid poor Seyward is killed.

Sir J. How?

Char. Oh, there he comes himself; he'll tell you more.

Enter CANTWELL, DARNLEY, SEYWARD, and Servants.

Darn. Here, bring in this ruffian; this is villany beyond example.

Sir J. What means this outrage?

Lady L. I tremble.

Sey. Don't be alarmed, madam—there is no mischief done: what was intended, the doctor here can best inform you.

Sir J. Mr. Darnley, I am ashamed to see you.

Maw. So you ought: but this good man is ashamed of nothing.

Dr. C. Alas! my enemies prevail.

Sey. In short, gentlemen, the affair is circumstantially this—The doctor called me out into the pavilion in the garden; appeared in great disorder; told me here was a sudden storm raised, which he was not sufficiently prepared to weather. He said, his dependance was upon me; and at all events, I must be ready to swear, when he called upon me, I had seen him pay sir John several large sums of money. He talked confusedly about giving value for an estate; but I boldly refused to perjure myself; and told him, on the contrary, I was satisfied he had fleeced sir John of several large sums, under pretence of charitable uses, which he secretly converted to his own.—This stung him, and he fastened at my throat. Then, indeed, all temper left me; and, disengaging myself from his hold, with a home-blow, I struck him down. At this, grown desperate, he ran with fury to some pistols that hung about the chimney: but in the instant he reached one, I seized upon his wrist; and as we grappled, the pistol, firing to the ceiling, alarmed the family.

Old Lady L. This is a lie, young man; I see the devil standing at your elbow.

Maw. So do I, with a great big pitchfork, pushing him on.

Dr. C. Well, what have you more against me?

Darn. More, sir, I hope is needless—but if sir John is yet unsatisfied.

Sir J. Oh! I have seen too much.

Dr. C. I demand my liberty.

Sir J. Let him go.

Enter COLONEL LAMBERT and Attendants.

Col. L. Hold, sir! not so fast; you can't pass.

Dr. C. Who, sir, shall dare to stop me?

Col. L. Within there!

Enter Tipstaff.

Tip. Is your name Cantwell, sir?

Dr. C. What if it be, sir?

Tip. Then, sir, I have my lord chief justice's warrant against you.

Dr. C. Against me?

Tip. Yes, sir, for a cheat and impostor.

Old Lady L. What does he say?

Sir J. Dear son, what is this?

Col. L. Only some action of the doctor's, sir, which I have affidavits in my hand here to prove, from more than one creditable witness; and I think it my duty to make the public acquainted with: if he can acquit himself of them, so; if not, he must take the consequence.

Dr. C. Well, but stay; let the accusations against me be what they will, by virtue of this conveyance I am still master here; and if I am forced to leave the house myself, I will shut up the doors—nobody shall remain behind.

Sir J. There! there! indeed, he stings me to the heart! for that rash act, reproach and endless shame will haunt me!

Char. No, sir!—be comforted.—Even there too his wicked hopes must leave him; for know, the fatal deed which you intended to sign is here, even yet unsealed and innocent!

Sir J. What mean you?

Char. I mean, sir, that this deed by accident falling into this gentleman's hands, his generous concern for our family discovered it to me; and that in concert we procured that other to be drawn exactly like it; which, in your impatience to execute, passed unsuspected for the original. Their only difference is, that wherever here you read the doctor's name, there you'll find my brother's.

Dr. C. Come, sir; lead me where you please. [Exit.]

Col. L. Secure your prisoner.

Old Lady L. I don't know what to make of all this.

Maw. They'll all go to the devil for what they are doing—Come away, my lady, and let us see after the good dear doctor. Ay, do laugh, you'll go to the devil for all that.—Come, my lady, you go first.

[Exeunt Mawworm and old Lady Lambert.]

Char. Now, Darnley, I hope I have made atonement for your jealousy.

Darn. You've banished it for ever! this was beyond yourself surprising.

Col. L. Sister—

Char. Come, no set speeches; if I deserve your thanks, return them in friendship to your first preserver.

Col. L. The business of my life shall be to merit it.

Sey. And mine, to speak my sense of obligations.

Sir J. Oh, my child! for my deliverance I can only reward you here.—For you, my son, whose filial virtue I have injured, this honest deed shall in every article be ratified.—And for the sake of that hypocritical villain, I declare, that from henceforward I renounce all pious folks; I will have an utter abhorrence for every thing that bears the appearance—

Char. Nay now, my dear sir, I must take the liberty to tell you, you go from one extreme to another.—What, because a worthless wretch has imposed upon you, under the fallacious show of austere grimace, will you needs have it every body is like him, confound the good with the bad, and conclude there are no truly religious in the world?—Leave, my dear sir, such rash consequences to fools and liber-times.—Let us be careful to distinguish between character in life, greater or more valuable than virtue and the appearance of it. Guard if possible against doing honour to hypocrisy—But, noble or more beautiful, than the fervor of a sincere piety. [Exeunt.]

SUSANNA CENTLIVRE.

This lady was daughter of one Mr. Freeman, of Holbeach, in Lincolnshire. It is not decided whether she was born in Ireland or England; but it must have been in the year 1680. Be it as it may, we find her left to the wide world, by the death of her parents, before she had completed her twelfth year. There is a romantic story told of her having been met on her journey to London on foot, whither she went to avoid the tyranny of her stepmother, by a young gentleman from the university of Cambridge, (the afterwards well-known Anthony Hammond), who was so extremely struck with her youth and beauty, and so affected with the distress which her circumstances naturally declared in her countenance, that he fell instantly in love with her; and, inquiring into the particulars of her story, soon prevailed on her inexperienced innocence to seize on the protection he offered her, and go with him to Cambridge, where, equipping her in boy's clothes, he introduced her to his intimates at college as a relation, who was come down to see the university, and pass some time with him there. If this story is true, it must have happened when she was extremely young; Whincop, as well as the other writers, acknowledging that she was married in her sixteenth year, to a nephew of Sir Stephen Fox. But that gentleman not living with her above a twelvemonth, her wit and beauty soon procured her a second husband, whose name was Carol, and who was an officer in the army; but he having the misfortune to be killed in a duel, within about a year and a half after their marriage, she became a second time a widow. Such an attachment she seems to have had to the theatre, that she even became herself a performer in 1706 and performing the part of Alexander the Great, in Lee's Rival Queens, at Windsor, where the court then was, she wounded the heart of one Mr. Joseph Centlivre, yeoman of the mouth to Her Majesty, who soon married her; and after passing several years happily together, she died at his house in Spring-Gardens, Charing Cross, on the first of December 1725. —That Mrs. Centlivre was perfectly acquainted with life, and closely read the minds and manners of mankind, no one, we think, can doubt who reads her comedies; but what appears to us the most extraordinary is, when we consider her history, the disadvantages she must have laboured under, by being so early left to bustle with the world, and that all the education she could have had, must have been owing to her own application and assiduity; when, we say, we consider her as an absolutely self-cultivated genius, it is astonishing to find the traces of so much reading and learning as we meet with in many of her pieces; since, for the drawing of the various characters she has presented us with, she must have perfectly well understood the French, Dutch, and Spanish languages, all the provincial dialects of her own, and somewhat even of the Latin, since all these she occasionally makes use of, and whenever she does so, it is constantly with the utmost propriety and the greatest accuracy.

A BOLD STROKE FOR A WIFE,

Was produced at Lincoln's-inn Fields in the year 1718. Mrs. Centlivre was indebted to Mr. Motley for two scenes of this comedy. Notwithstanding this piece has been accused by some for its numerous violations of all rule, nature, or probability, the business is so extremely active, in the course of the whole, that we are not stopped by ennui at any one scene of the play; but laughingly get on to the very end. It does not very materially tend to correct any particular vice; but seems to invite us for once to lay aside all our gravity, and open our hearts to playful gaiety and cheerfulness.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—COLONEL FEIGNWELL and FREEMAN
are discovered over a Bottle.

Free. COME, colonel, his majesty's health.—
You are as melancholy as if you were in love!
I wish some of the beauties of Bath<sup>1)</sup> -han't snapt your heart.

<sup>1)</sup> The seasons, in England, are generally managed by the great people, so as to produce their different pleasures; for instance, London is overflowing in the Spring, till the month of June; then all the families whirl off to Brighton, Weymouth, or other watering-places till the summer is passed. In autumn the gentlemen shoot away their time at their country-seats, while their ladies are employed yawning over the last novels, rusticating; Winter comes to enliven them once more and then the quiet good-natured people of Bath, are pestered with their rowing and disturbance, till the Spring sends them off to London again. This, of course, means in War-time.

Col F. Why, faith<sup>2)</sup>, Freeman, there is something in't: I have seen a lady at Bath, who has kindled such a flame in me, that all the waters there can't quench.

Free. Is she not to be had, colonel?

Col F. That's a difficult question to answer; however, I resolve to try; perhaps you may be able to serve me; you merchants know one another.—The lady told me herself she was under the charge of four persons.

Free. Odsol<sup>3)</sup> 'tis miss Ann Lovely.

Col F. The same—do you know her?

Free. Know her! ay—Faith, colonel, your condition is more desperate than you imagine: why, she is the talk and pity of the whole.

town: and it is the opinion of the learned, that she must die a maid.

Col. F. Say you so? That's somewhat odd, in this charitable city.—She's a woman, I hope?

Free. For aught I know—but it had been as well for her, had nature made her any other part of the creation. The man who keeps this house served her father; he is a very honest fellow, and may be of use to you: we'll send for him to take a glass with us: he'll give you her whole history, and 'tis worth your hearing.

Col. F. But may one trust him?

Free. With your life: I have obligations enough upon him, to make him do any thing; I serve him with wine.

Col. F. Nay, I know him very well myself. I once used to frequent a club that was kept here.

Enter DRAWER.

Draw. Gentlemen, d'ye call?

Free. Ay, send up your master.

Draw. Yes, sir.

Col. F. Do you know any of this lady's guardian's, Freeman? [Exit.

Free. I know two of them very well.

Enter SACKBUT.

Free. Here comes one will give you an account of them all.—Mr. Sackbut, we sent for you to take a glass with us. 'Tis a maxim among the friends of the bottle, that as long as the master is in company, one may be sure of good wine.

Sack. Sir, you shall be sure to have as good wine as you send in.—Colonel, your most humble servant; you are welcome to town.

Col. F. I thank you, Mr. Sackbut.

Sack. I am as glad to see you as I should a hundred tun of French claret, custom free.—My service to you, sir. [Drinks] You don't look so merry as you used to do; aren't you well, colonel?

Free. He has got a woman in his head, landlord: can you help him?

Sack. If 'tis in my power, I shan't scruple to serve my friend.

Col. F. 'Tis one perquisite of your calling.

Sack. Ay, at t'other end of the town, where you officers use, women are good forcers of trade: a well-customed house, a handsome bar-keeper, with clean obliging drawers, soon get the master an estate; but our citizens seldom do any thing but cheat within the walls.—But as to the lady, colonel, point you at particulars? or have you a good Champaign stomach? Are you in full pay, or reduced, colonel?

Col. F. Reduced, reduced, landlord!

Free. To the miserable condition of a lover!

Sack. Pish! that's perferable to half-pay: a woman's resolution may break before the peace: push her home, colonel, there's no parlying with the fair sex.

Col. F. Were the lady her own mistress, I have some reasons to believe I should soon command in chief.

Free. You know miss Lovely, Mr. Sackbut?

Sack. Know her! Ay, poor Nancy: I have carried her to school many a frosty morning. Alas! if she's the woman, I pity you, colonel: her father, my old master, was the most whimsical, out-of-the-way temper'd man, I ever heard of, as you will guess by his last will and testament.—This was his only child: and I have heard him wish her dead a thousand times. He died worth thirty thousand pounds, which he left to his daughter, provided she married with the consent of her guardians; but that she might be sure never to do so, he left her in the care of four men, as opposite to each other as the four elements: each has his quarterly rule, and three months in the year she is obliged to be subject to each of their humours, and they are pretty different, I assure you.—She is just come from Bath.

Col. F. 'Twas there I saw her.

Sack. Ay, sir, the last quarter was her beau guardian's.—She appears in all public places during his reign.

Col. F. She visited a lady who boarded in the same house with me: I liked her person, and found an opportunity to tell her so. She replied, she had no objection to mine; but if I could not reconcile contradictions I must not think of her, for that she was condemned to the caprice of four persons, who never yet agreed in any one thing, and she was obliged to please them all.

Sack. 'Tis most true, sir: I'll give you a short description of the men, and leave you to judge of the poor lady's condition. One is a kind of virtuoso, a silly half-witted fellow, but positive and surly, fond of every thing antique and foreign, and wears his clothes of the fashion of the last century, dotes upon travellers, and believes more of sir John Mandeville<sup>1)</sup> than he does of the Bible.

Col. F. That must be a rare odd fellow.

Sack. Another is a change-broker: a fellow that will out-lie the devil for the advantage of stock, and cheat his father that got him in a bargain: he is a great stickler for trade, and hates every man that wears a sword.

Free. He is a great admirer of the Dutch management, and swears they understand trade better than any nation under the sun.

Sack. The third is an old beau, that has May in his fancy and dress, but December in his face and his heels: he admires all new fashions, and those must be French; loves operas, balls, masquerades, and is always the most tawdry of the whole company on a birth-day<sup>2)</sup>.

Col. F. These are pretty opposite one to another, truly; and the fourth, what is he, landlord?

Sack. A very rigid quaker, whose quarter began this day.—I saw miss Lovely go in, not above two hours ago.—Sir Philip set her down. What think you now, colonel, is not the poor lady to be pitied?

Col. F. Ay, and rescued too, landlord.

Free. In my opinion that's impossible.

Col. F. There is nothing impossible to a lover. What would not a man attempt for a fine woman and thirty thousand pounds? Besides, my honour is at stake: I promised to deliver her, and she bid me win her and wear her.

Sack. That's fair, faith!

Free. If it depended upon knight-errantry, I should not doubt your setting free the damsel; but to have avarice, impertinence, hypocrisy, and pride, at once to deal with, requires more cunning than generally attends a man of honour.

Col. F. My fancy tells me I shall come off with glory. I resolve to try, however.—Do you know all the guardians, Mr. Sackbut?

Sack. Very well; they all use my house.

Col. F. And will you assist me, if occasion requires?

Sack. In every thing I can, colonel.

Free. I'll answer for him.

Col. F. First I'll attack my beau guardian: where lives he?

Sack. Faith, somewhere about St. James's; though to say in what street I cannot; but any chairman will tell you where sir Philip Modelove lives.

Free. Oh! you'll find him in the Park at eleven every day; at least I never pass through at that hour without seeing him there.—But what do you intend?

Col. F. To address him in his own way, and find what he designs to do with the lady.

Free. And what then?

Col. F. Nay, that I can't tell; but I shall take my measures accordingly.

Sack. Well, 'tis a mad undertaking, in my mind; but here's to your success, colonel.

[Drinks.]

Col. F. 'Tis something out of the way, I confess; but fortune may chance to smile, and I succeed.

Bold was the man who ventur'd first to sea,
But the first vent'ring lovers bolder were.

The path of love's dark and dang'rous way,
Without a landmark or one friendly star.

And he that runs the risk deserves the fair.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—An Apartment in PRIM'S House.

Enter MISS LOVELY and her maid BETTY.

Betty. Bless me, madam! why do you fret and tease yourself so? 'This is giving them the advantage, with a witness.

Miss L. Must I be condemned all my life to the preposterous humours of other people, and pointed at by every boy in town!—Oh! I could tear my flesh and curse the hour I was born.—Isn't it monstrously ridiculous that they should desire to impose their quaking dress upon me at these years? When I was a child, no matter what they made me wear; but now—

Betty. I would resolve against it, madam; I'd see 'em hanged before I'd put on the pinch'd cap again.

Miss L. Then I must never expect one moment's ease: she has rung such a peal in my ears already, that I shan't have the right use of them this month.—What can I do?

Betty. What can you not do, if you will but give your mind to it? Marry, madam.

Miss L. What! and have my fortune go to build churches and hospitals?

Betty. Why, let it go.—If the colonel loves you, as he pretends, he'll marry you without a fortune, madam; and I assure you a colonel's lady is no despicable thing.

Miss L. So you would advise me to give up my own fortune, and throw myself upon the colonel's!

Betty. I would advise you to make yourself easy, madam.

Miss L. That's not the way, I'm sure. No, no, girl, there are certain ingredients to be mingled with matrimony, without which I may as well change for the worse as the better. When the woman has fortune enough to make the man happy, if he has either honour or good manners, he'll make her easy. Love makes but a slovenly figure in a house, where poverty keeps the door.

Betty. And so you resolve to die a maid, do you, madam?

Miss L. Or have it in my power to make the man I love master of my fortune.

Betty. Then you don't like the colonel so well as I thought you did, madam, or you would not take such a resolution.

Miss L. It is because I do like him, Betty, that I do take such a resolution.

Betty. Why, do you expect, madam, the colonel can work miracles? Is it possible for him to marry you with the consent of all your guardians?

Miss L. Or he must not marry me at all; and so I told him; and he did not seem displeased with the news.—He promised to set me free; and I, on that condition, promised to make him master of that freedom.

Betty. Well! I have read of enchanted castles, ladies delivered from the chains of magic, giants killed, and monsters overcome; so that I shall be the less surprised if the colonel shall conjure you out of the power of your four guardians: if he does, I am sure he deserves your fortune.

Miss L. And shall have it, girl, if it were ten times as much.—For I'll ingenuously confess to thee, that I do love the colonel above all the men I ever saw:—There's something so jantée in a soldier, a kind of je ne sais quoi air, that makes them more agreeable than all the rest of mankind.—They command regard, as who shall say, We are your defenders; we preserve your beauties from the insults of rude and unpolished foes, and ought to be preferred before those lazy indolent mortals, who, by dropping into their father's estates, set up their coaches, and think to rattle themselves into our affections,

Betty. Nay, madam, I confess that the army has engrossed all the prettiest fellows—A laced coat and a feather have irresistible charms.

Miss L. But the colonel has all the beauties of the mind as well as the body.—O all ye powers that favour happy lovers, grant that he may be mine! Thou god of love, if thou be'st aught but name, assist my Feignwell!

Point all thy darts to aid his just design,
And make his plots as prevalent as thine.

[Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—The Park.

SIR PHILIP MODELOVE discovered upon a Bench, with a Woman masked.

Sir P. Well but, my dear, are you really constant to your keeper?

Wom. Yes, really, sir.—Hey-day! who comes yonder? He cuts a mighty figure.

Sir P. Ha! a stranger, by his equipage keeping so close at his heels.—He has the appearance of a man of quality.—Positively French, by his dancing air.

Wom. He crosses, as if he meant to sit down here.

Sir P. He has a mind to make love to thee, child.

Enter COLONEL.

Wom. It will be to no purpose if he does.

Sir P. Are you resolved to be cruel then?

Col. F. You must be very cruel indeed, if you can deny any thing to so fine a gentleman, madam. [Takes out his Watch.]

Wom. I never mind the outside of a man.

Col. F. And I'm afraid thou art no judge of the inside.

Sir P. I am positively of your mind, sir; for creatures of her function seldom penetrate beyond the pocket.

Wom. Coxcombs! [Aside, and exit.]

Sir P. Pray, what says your watch? mine is down. [Pulling out his Watch.]

Col. F. I want thirty-six minutes of twelve, sir.

[Puts up his Watch, and takes out his Snuff-box.]

Sir P. May I presume, sir.

Col. F. Sir, you honour me.

[Presenting the Box.]

Sir P. He speaks good English—though he must be a foreigner. [Aside—This snuff is extremely good—and the box prodigious fine: the work is French, I presume, sir.

Col. F. I bought it in Paris, sir.—I do think the workmanship pretty neat.

Sir P. Neat! 'tis exquisitely fine, sir. Pray, sir, if I may take the liberty of inquiring—what country is so happy to claim the birth of the finest gentleman in the universe? France, I presume.

Col. F. Then you don't think me an Englishman?

Sir P. No, upon my soul, don't I.

Col. F. I am sorry for't.

Sir P. Impossible you should wish to be an Englishman! Pardon me, sir, this island could not produce a person of such alertness.

Col. F. As this mirror shows you, sir. [Puts up a pocket-glass to Sir Philip's Face] I know not how to distinguish you, sir: but your mien and address speak you right honourable.

Sir P. Thus great souls judge of others by themselves—I am only adorned with knight-hood: that's all, I assure you, sir; my name is sir Philip Modelove.

Col. F. Of French extraction?

Sir P. My father was French.

Col. F. One may plainly perceive it—There is a certain gaiety peculiar to my nation (for I will own myself a Frenchman) which distinguishes us every where.—A person of your figure would be a vast addition to a coronet.

Sir P. I must own I had the offer of a barony about five years ago, but I abhorred the fatigue which must have attended it.—I could never yet bring myself to join with either party.

Col. F. You are perfectly in the right, sir Philip—a fine person should not embark himself in the slovenly concern of politics: dress and pleasure are objects proper for the soul of a fine gentleman.

Sir P. And love—

Col. F. Oh! that's included under the article of pleasure.

Sir P. Parbleu! c'est un homme d'esprit. May I crave your name, sir?

Col. F. My name is La Feignwell, sir, at your service.

Sir P. The La Feignwells are French, I know; though the name is become very numerous in Great Britain of late years—I was sure you was French the moment I laid my eyes upon you; I could not come into the supposition of your being an Englishman: this island produces few such ornaments.

Col. F. Are you married, sir Philip?

Sir P. No; nor do I believe I shall ever enter into that honourable state: I have an absolute tendre for the whole sex.

Col. F. That's more than they have for you, I dare swear. [Aside] I find I was very much mistaken—I imagined you had been married to that young lady whom I saw in the chariot with you this morning in Gracechurch-street.

Sir P. Who, Nancy Lovely? I am a piece of a guardian to that lady: You must know her father, I thank him, joined me with three of the most preposterous old fellows—that, upon my soul, I am in pain for the poor girl: she must certainly lead apes,<sup>1)</sup> ha, ha!

Col. F. That's a pity, sir Philip. If the lady would give me leave, I would endeavour to avert that curse.

Sir P. As to the lady, she'd gladly be rid of us at any rate, I believe; but here's the mischief: he who marries miss Lovely, must have the consent of us all four—or not a penny of her portion.—For my part, I shall never approve of any but a man of figure—and the rest are not only averse to cleanliness, but have each a peculiar taste to gratify.—For my part, I declare I would prefer you to all men I ever saw.

Col. F. And I her to all women—

Sir P. I assure you, Mr. Feignwell, I am for marrying her, for I hate the trouble of a guardian, especially among such wretches; but resolve never to agree to the choice of any one of them—and I fancy they'll be even with me, for they never came into any proposal of mine yet.

Col. F. I wish I had leave to try them, sir Philip.

Sir P. With all my soul, sir; I can refuse a person of your appearance nothing.

Col. F. Sir, I am infinitely obliged to you.

Sir P. But do you really like matrimony?

Col. F. I believe I could with that lady.

Sir P. The only point in which we differ.—But you are master of so many qualifications, that I can excuse one fault: for I must think it a fault in a fine gentleman; and that you are such, I'll give it under my hand.

<sup>1)</sup> The inevitable fate of all young ladies dying old maids, according to the English proverb, is, that they shall lead apes in hell.

Col. F. I wish you'd give me your consent to marry miss Lovely under your hand, sir Philip.

Sir P. I'll do't, if you'll step into St. James's Coffee-house, where we may have pen and ink—though I can't foresee what advantage my consent will be to you, without you can find a way to get the rest of the guardians.—But I'll introduce you, however. She is now at a quaker's, where I carried her this morning, when you saw us in Gracechurch-street.—I assure you she has an odd ragoût of guardians, as you will find when you hear the characters, which I'll endeavour to give you as we go along.—Hey! Pierre, Jacque, Renno.—Where are you all, scoundrels?—Order the chariot to St. James's Coffee-house.

Col. F. Le Noir, Le Brun, Le Blanc—Morbleu, où sont ces coquins là? Allons, monsieur le Chevalier.

Sir P. Ah! Pardonnez moi, monsieur.

Col. F. Not one step upon my soul, sir Philip.

Sir P. The best bred man in Europe, positively. [Exeunt.

SCENE II.—OBADIAH PRIM'S House.

Enter MISS LOVELY and MRS. PRIM.

Mrs. P. Then thou wilt not obey me: and thou dost really think those fallals become thee?

Miss L. I do, indeed.

Mrs. P. Now will I be judged by all sober people, if I don't look more like a modest woman than thou dost, Anne.

Miss L. More like a hypocrite you mean, Mrs. Prim.

Mrs. P. Ah! Anne, Anne, that wicked Philip Modelove will undo thee.—Satan so fills thy heart with pride, during the three months of his guardianship, that thou becomest a stumbling-block to the upright.

Miss L. Pray who are they? Are the pinched cap and formal hood the emblems of sanctity? Does your virtue consist in your dress, Mrs. Prim?

Mrs. P. It doth not consist in cut hair, spotted face,<sup>1)</sup> and a bare neck.—Oh the wickedness of the generation! the primitive women knew not the abomination of hooped petticoats.

Miss L. No; nor the abomination of cant neither. Don't tell me, Mrs. Prim, don't.—I know you have as much pride, vanity, self-conceit, and ambition among you, couched under that formal habit and sanctified countenance, as the proudest of us all; but the world begins to see your prudery.

Mrs. P. Prudery! What! do they invent new words as well as new fashions? Ah! poor fantastic age, I pity thee.—Poor deluded Anne, which dost thou think most resembleth the saint, and which the sinner, thy dress or mine? Thy naked bosom allureth the eye of the bystander—encourageth the frailty of human nature—and corrupteth the soul with evil longings.

Miss L. And pray who corrupted your son Tobias with evil longings? Your maid Tabitha wore a handkerchief, and yet he made the saint a sinner.

Mrs. P. Well, well, spit thy malice. I confess satan did buffet my son Tobias, and my servant Tabitha: the evil spirit was at that time too strong, and they both became subject to its workings—not from any outward provocation—but from an inward call: he was not tainted with the rottenness of the fashions, nor did his eyes take in the drunkenness of beauty.

Miss L. No! that's plainly to be seen.

Mrs. P. Tabitha is one of the faithful: he fell not with a stranger.

Miss L. So! then you hold wenching no crime, provided it be within the pale of your own tribe.—You are an excellent casuist, truly!

Enter OBADIAH PRIM.

Obad. Not stripped of thy vanity yet, Anne! Why dost thou not make her put it off, Sarah?

Mrs. P. She will not do it.

Obad. Verily thy naked bosom troubleth my outward man: I pray thee hide it, Anne: put on a handkerchief, Anne Lovely.

Miss L. I hate handkerchiefs when 'tis not cold weather, Mr. Prim.

Mrs. P. I have seen thee wear a handkerchief, nay, and a mask to boot,<sup>1)</sup> in the middle of July.

Miss L. Ay, to keep the sun from scorching me.

Obad. If thou couldst not hear the sunbeams, how dost thou think man can bear thy beams? Those breasts inflame desire: let them be hid, I say.

Miss L. Let me be quiet, I say.—Must I be tormented thus for ever?—Sure no woman's condition ever equalled mine! Foppery, folly, avarice, and hypocrisy are, by turns; my constant companions—I cannot think my father meant this tyranny! No, you usurp an authority which he never intended you should take.

Obad. Hark thee, dost thou call good counsel tyranny? Do I or my wife tyrannise, when we desire thee in all love to put off thy tempting attire?

Miss L. I wish I were in my grave! Kill me rather than treat me thus.

Obad. Kill thee! ha, ha! thou thinkest thou art acting some lewd play sure:—Kill thee! Art thou prepared for death, Anne Lovely? No, no, thou wouldst rather have a husband, Anne:—Thou wantest a gilt coach, with six lazy fellows behind, to flant it in the ring of vanity, among the princes and rulers of the land—who pamper themselves with the fatness thereof; but I will take care that none shall squander away thy father's estate; thou shalt marry none such, Anne.

Miss L. Would you marry me to one of your own canting sect?

Obad. Yea, verily, no one else shall ever get my consent, I do assure thee, Anne.

Miss L. And I do assure thee, Obadiah, that I will as soon turn Papist, and die in a convent.

Mrs. P. O wickedness!

Miss L. O stupidity!

Obad. O blindness of heart!

Miss L. Thou blinder of the world, don't provoke me—lest I betray your sanctity, and leave your wife to judge of your purity?—What were the emotions of your spirit—when you squeez'd Mary by the hand last night in the pantry.—When she told you, you bussed so filthily? Ah! you had no aversion to naked bosoms, when you begged her to show you a little, little, little bit of her delicious bosom—

<sup>1)</sup> The fashions of the times in which that piece was written. Addison, in his Spectator No. 81, gives a very witty account of the ladies showing the political party to which they belonged, by the manner in which they wore these patches.

Don't you remember those words, Mr. Prim?

Mrs. P. What does she say, Obadiah?

Obad. She talketh unintelligibly, Sarah.— Which way did she hear this? This should not have reach'd the ears of the wicked ones:
—Verily it troubleth me. [Aside.]

Enter Servant.

Serv. Philip Modelove, whom they call sir Philip, is below, and such another with him:
shall I send them up?

Obad. Yea.

[Exit Servant.]

Enter SIR PHILIP MODELOVE and COLONEL FEIGNWELL.

Sir P. How dost thou do, friend Prim?
Odso! my she friend here too! What, are you documenting miss Nancy? Reading her a lecture upon the pinch'd coif, I warrant ye!

Mrs. P. I am sure thou didst never read her any lecture that was good.—My flesh so riseth at these wicked ones, that prudence ad-viseth me to withdraw from their sight. [Exit.]

Col. F. Oh, that I could find means to speak with her! How charming she appears! I wish I could get this letter into her hand. [Aside.]

Sir P. Well, miss, I hope thou hast got the better of them.

Miss L. The difficulties of my life are not to be surmounted, sir Philip.—I hate the impertinence of him as much as the stupidity of the other. [Aside.]

Obad. Verily, Philip, thou wilt spoil this maiden.

Sir P. I find we still differ in opinion; but that we may none of us spoil her, pr'ythee, Prim, let us consent to marry her.—I have sent for our brother guardians to meet me here about this very thing.—Madam, will you give me leave to recommend a husband to you?
—Here's a gentleman, whom, in my mind,
you can have no objection to.

[Presents the Colonel to her; she looks another Way.]

Miss L. Heaven deliver me from the formal and the fantastic fool!

Col. F. A fine woman—a fine horse, and fine equipage, are the finest things in the universe: and if I am so happy to possess you, madam, I shall become the envy of mankind,
as much as you outshine your whole sex.

[As he takes her Hand to kiss it, he endeavours to put a Letter into it; she lets it drop—Prim takes it up.]

Miss L. I have no ambition to appear conspicuously ridiculous, sir. [Turning from him.]

Col. F. So fail the hopes of Feignwell.

Miss L. Ha! Feignwell! 'tis he! What have I done? Prim has the letter, and it will be discover'd. [Aside.]

Obad. Friend, I know not thy name, so cannot call thee by it; but thou seest thy letter is unwelcome to the maiden; she will not read it.

Miss L. Nor shall you; [Snatches the Letter]
I'll tear it in a thousand pieces, and scatter it, as I will the hopes of all those that any of you shall recommend to me. [Tears the Letter.]

Sir P. Ha! Right woman, 'faith!

Col. F. Excellent woman! [Aside.]

Obad. Friend, thy garb savoureth too much of the vanity of the age for my approbation;

nothing that resembleth Philip Modelove shall I love; mark that—therefore, friend Philip, bring no more of thy own apes under my roof.

Sir P. I am so entirely a stranger to the monsters of thy breed, that I shall bring none of them I am sure.

Col. F. I am likely to have a pretty task by the time I have gone through them all;
but she's a city worth taking, and 'egad I'll carry on the siege: if I can but blow up the out-works, I fancy I am pretty secure of the town. [Aside.]

Enter Servant.

Serv. Toby Periwinkle and Thomas Trade-love demand to see thee. [To Sir Philip.]

Sir P. Bid them come up. [Exit Servant.]

Miss L. Deliver me from such an inundation of noise and nonsense. Oh, Feignwell! whatever thy contrivance be, prosper it, heaven. [Exit.]

Sir P. Sic transit gloria mundi!

Enter PERIWINKLE and TRADELOVE.

These are my brother guardians, Mr. Feign-
well.—

Pr'ythee observe the creatures.

[Aside to Colonel Feignwell.]

Trade. Well, sir Philip, I obey your summons.

Per. Pray what have you to offer for the good of miss Lovely, sir Philip?

Sir P. First I desire to know what you intend to do with that lady? Must she be sent to the Indies for a venture—or live an old maid, and then be entered amongst your curiosities,
and shown for a monster, Mr. Periwinkle?

Col. F. Humph, curiosities; that must be the virtuoso. [Aside.]

Per. Why what would you do with her?

Sir P. I would recommend this gentleman to her for a husband, sir—a person whom I have pick'd out from the whole race of mankind.

Obad. I would advise thee to shuffle him again with the rest of mankind; for I like him not.

Col. F. Pray, sir, without offence to your formality, what may be your objections?

Obad. Thy person, thy manners, thy dress,
thy acquaintance,—thy every thing, friend.

Sir P. You are most particularly obliging, friend. Ha, ha.

Trade. What business do you follow,
pray, sir?

Col. F. Humph, by that question he must be the broker. [Aside] Business, sir! the business of a gentleman.

Trade. That is as much as to say, you dress fine, feed high, lie with every woman you like, and pay your surgeon's bills better than your tailor's or your butcher's.

Col. F. The court is much obliged to you, sir, for your character of a gentleman.

Trade. The court, sir! What would the court do without us citizens?

Sir P. Without your wives and daughters,
you mean, Mr. Tradelove.

Per. Have you ever travelled, sir?

Col. F. That question must not be answer'd
now. [Aside] In books I have, sir.

Per. In books! That's fine travelling indeed!
—Sir Philip, when you present a person I like, he shall have my consent to marry miss Lovely; till when, your servant. [Exit.]

Col. F. I'll make you like me before I have done with you, or I am mistaken. [Aside.]

Trade. And when you can convince me that a beau is more useful to my country than a merchant, you shall have mine; till then you must excuse me. [Exit.]

Col. F. So much for trade—I'll fit you too. [Aside.]

Sir P. In my opinion this is very inhuman treatment, as to the lady, Mr. Prim.

Obad. Thy opinion and mine happen to differ as much as our occupations, friend: business requireth my presence, and folly thine; and so I must bid thee farewell. [Exit.]

Sir P. Here's breeding for you, Mr. Feignwell!—Gad take me.

Half my estate I'd give to see 'em bit.

Col. F. I hope to bite you all, if my plot hit. [Exeunt.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—A Tavern.

COLONEL FEIGNWELL is discovered in an Egyptian Dress, with SACKBUT.

Sack. A lucky beginning, colonel—you have got the old beau's consent.

Col. F. Ay, he's a reasonable creature; but the other three will require some pains. Shall I pass upon him, think you? 'Egad, in my mind, I look as antique as if I had been preserv'd in the ark.

Sack. Pass upon him! ay, ay, if you have assurance enough.

Col. F. I have no apprehension from that quarter; assurance is the cockade of a soldier.

Sack. Ay, but the assurance of a soldier differs much from that of a traveller—Can you lie with a good grace?

Col. F. As heartily, when my mistress is the prize, as I would meet the foe when my country call'd and king commanded: so don't you fear that part: if he don't know me again, I am safe.—I hope he'll come.

Sack. I wish all my debts would come as sure: I told him you had been a great traveller, had many valuable curiosities, and was a person of most singular taste: he seem'd transported, and begg'd me to keep you, till he came.

Col. F. Ay, ay, he need not fear my running away.—Let's have a bottle of sack, landlord; our ancestors drank sack.

Sack. You shall have it.

Col. F. And whereabouts is the trap-door you mentioned?

Sack. There's the conveyance, sir. [Exit.]

Col. F. Now, if I should cheat all these roguish guardians, and carry off my mistress in triumph, it would be what the French call a grand coup d'éclat.—Odso! here comes Periwinkle.—Ah! deuce take this beard; pray Jupiter it does not give me the slip and spoil all.

Enter SACKBUT with Wine, and PERIWINKLE following.

Sack. Sir, this gentleman hearing you have been a great traveller, and a person of fine speculation, begs leave to take a glass with you: he is a man of a curious taste himself.

Col. F. The gentleman has it in his face and garb; sir, you are welcome.

Per. Sir, I honour a traveller and men of your inquiring disposition; the oddness of your habit pleases me extremely: 'tis very antique, and for that I like it.

Col. F. 'Tis very antique, sir:—this habit once belonged to the famous Claudius Ptolemaeus, who lived in the year one hundred and thirty-five.

Sack. If he keeps up to the sample, he shall lie with the devil for a bean-stack, and win it every straw. [Aside.]

Per. A hundred and thirty-five! why, that's prodigious now!—Well, certainly 'tis the finest thing in the world to be a traveller.

Col. F. For my part I value none of the modern fashions a fig-leaf.

Per. No more don't I, sir: I had rather be the jest of a fool than his favourite—I am laughed at here for my singularity.—This coat, you must know, sir, was formerly wore by that ingenious and very learned person, Mr. John Tradescant of Lambeth.

Col. F. John Tradescant! Let me embrace you, sir—John Tradescant was my uncle, by my mother's side; and I thank you for the honour you do his memory: he was a very curious man indeed.

Per. Your uncle, sir—Nay, then 'tis no wonder that your taste is so refined; why you have it in your blood.—My humble service to you, sir; to the immortal memory of John Tradescant, your never-to-be-forgotten uncle. [Drinks.]

Col. F. Give me a glass, landlord.

Per. I find you are primitive; even in your wine: Canary was the drink of our wise forefathers; 'tis balsamic, and saves the charge of 'pothecaries cordials—Oh! that I had lived in your uncle's days! or rather, that he were now alive!—Oh! how proud he'd be of such a nephew!

Sack. Oh pox! that would have spoil'd the jest. [Aside.]

Per. A person of your curiosity must have collected many rarities.

Col. F. I have some, sir, which are not yet come ashore; as an Egyptian idol.

Per. Pray what may that be?

Col. F. It is, sir, a kind of an ape, which they formerly worshipp'd in that country: I took it from the breast of a female mummy.

Per. Ha, ha! our women retain part of their idolatry to this day; for many an ape lies on a lady's breast, ha, ha!—

Sack. A smart old thief. [Aside.]

Col. F. Two tusks of an hippopotamus, two pair of Chinese nut-crackers, and one Egyptian mummy.

Per. Pray, sir, have you never a crocodile?

Col. F. Humph! the boatswain brought one with a design to show it, but touching at Rotterdam, and hearing it was no rarity in England, he sold it to a Dutch poet.—Look ye, sir, do you see this little vial?

Per. Pray you what is it?

Col. F. This is call'd poluslosboio.

Per. Poluslosboio!—It has a rumbling sound.

Col. F. Right, sir; it proceeds from a rumbling nature—This water was part of those waves which bore Cleopatra's vessel when she sail'd to meet Anthony.

Per. Well, of all that travelled, none had a taste like you.

Col. F. But here's the wonder of the world.

—This, sir, is called zona, or moros musphonon; the virtues of this are inestimable.

Per. Moros musphonon! What in the name of wisdom can that be?—to me it seems a plain belt.

Col. F. This girdle has carried me all the world over.

Per. You have carried it, you mean.

Col. F. I mean as I say, sir.—Whenever I am girded with this I am invisible; and by turning this little screw, can be in the court of the great mogul, the grand signior, and king George, in as little time as your cook can poach an egg.

Per. You must pardon me, sir, I can't believe it.

Col. F. If my landlord pleases, he shall try the experiment immediately.

Sack. I thank you kindly, sir; but I have no inclination to ride post to the devil.

Col. F. No, no, you shan't stir a foot; I'll only make you invisible.

Sack. But if you could not make me visible again.

Per. Come, try it upon me, sir; I am not afraid of the devil nor all his tricks.—'Sbud,<sup>1)</sup> I'll stand 'em all.

Col. F. There, sir, put it on.—Come, landlord, you and I must face the east. [They turn about] Is it on, sir?

Per. 'Tis on. [They turn about again.]

Sack. Heaven protect me! where is he?

Per. Why here, just where I was.

Sack. Where, where, in the name of virtue? Ah, poor Mr. Periwinkle!—'Egad, look to't, you had best, sir; and let him be seen again, or I shall have you burnt for a wizard.

Col. F. Have patience, good landlord.

Per. But really don't you see me now?

Sack. No more than I see my grandmother, that died forty years ago.

Per. Are you sure you don't lie? Methinks I stand just where I did, and see you as plain as I did before.

Sack. Ah! I wish I could see you once again.

Col. F. Take off the girdle, sir.

[He takes it off.]

Sack. Ah, sir, I am glad to see you with all my heart. [Embraces him.]

Per. This is very odd; certainly there must be some trick in't.—Pray, sir, will you do me the favour to put it on yourself?

Col. F. With all my heart.

Per. But first I'll secure the door.

Col. F. You know how to turn the screw, Mr. Sackbut.

Sack. Yes, yes—Come, Mr. Periwinkle, we must turn full east. [They turn; the Colonel sinks through the Trap-door.]

Col. F. 'Tis done; now turn. [They turn.]

Per. Ha! mercy upon me; my flesh creeps upon my bones.—This must be a conjurer, Mr. Sackbut.

Sack. He's the devil, I think.

Per. Oh, Mr. Sackbut, why do you name the devil, when perhaps he may be at your elbow?

Sack. At my elbow! Marry, heaven forbid!

Col. F. Are you satisfied?

[From under the Stage.]

Per. Yes, sir, yes—How hollow his voice sounds!

Sack. Your's seem'd just the same—'Faith, I wish this girdle were mine, I'd sell wine no more. Harkye, Mr. Periwinkle, [Takes him aside till the Colonel rises again] if he would sell this girdle, you might travel with great expedition.

Col. F. But it is not to be parted with for money.

Per. I am sorry for't, sir, because I think it the greatest curiosity I ever heard of.

Col. F. By the advice of a learned physiognomist in Grand Cairo, who consulted the lines in my face, I returned to England, where he told me I should find a rarity in the keeping of four men, which I was born to possess for the benefit of mankind: and the first of the four that gave me his consent, I should present him with this girdle—Till I have found this jewel, I shall not part with the girdle.

Per. What can this rarity be? Didn't he name it to you?

Col. F. Yes, sir; he call'd it a chaste, beautiful, unaffected woman.

Per. Pish! women are no rarities; women are the very gewgaws of the creation; playthings for boys, who when they write man they ought to throw aside.

Sack. A fine lecture to be read to a circle of ladies! [Aside.]

Per. What woman is there, dress'd in all the pride and foppery of the times, can boast of such a foretop as the cockatoo?

Col. F. I must humour him. [Aside] Such a skin as the lizard? [bird?]

Per. Such a shining breast as the humming-

Col. F. Such a shape as the antelope?

Per. Or, in all the artful mixture of their various dresses, have they half the beauty of one box of butterflies?

Col. F. No; that must be allow'd—For my part, if it were not for the benefit of mankind, I'd have nothing to do with them; for they are as indifferent to me as a sparrow or a flesh-fly.

Per. Pray, sir, what benefit is the world to reap from this lady?

Col. F. Why, sir, she is to bear me a son, who shall revive the art of embalming, and the old Roman manner of burying the dead; and for the benefit of posterity, he is to discover the longitude, so long sought for in vain.

Per. Od! these are valuable things, Mr. Sackbut!

Sack. He hits it off admirably; and t'other swallows it like sack and sugar. [Aside] Certainly this lady must be your ward, Mr. Periwinkle, by her being under the care of four persons.

Per. By the description it should—'Egad, if I could get that girdle, I'd ride with the sun, and make the tour of the world in four-and-twenty hours. [Aside] And you are to give that girdle to the first of the four guardians that shall give his consent to marry that lady, say you, sir?

Col. F. I am so order'd, when I can find him.

Per. I fancy I know the very woman—her name is Anne Lovely.

Col. F. Excellent!—He said, indeed, that the first letter of her name was L.

Per. Did he really?—Well, that's prodigiously amazing, that a person in Grand Cairo should know any thing of my ward.

Col. F. Your ward?

Per. To be plain with you, sir, I am one of those four guardians.

Col. F. Are you indeed, sir? I am transported to find that the man who is to possess this moros musphonon is a person of so curious a taste—Here is a writing drawn up by that famous Egyptian, which if you will please to sign, you must turn your face full north, and the girdle is yours.

Per. If I live till the boy is born, I'll be embalm'd, and sent to the Royal Society when I die.

Col. F. That you shall most certainly.

Enter Drawer.

Draw. Here's Mr. Staytape, the tailor, inquires for you, colonel.

Col. F. Who do you speak to, you son of a whore?

Per. Ha! colonel.

Col. F. Confound the blundering dog! [Aside.]

Draw. Why to colonel—

Sack. Get you out, you rascal.

[Kicks him out, and goes after him.]

Draw. What the devil is the matter?

Col. F. This dog has ruin'd all my schemes, I see by Periwinkle's looks. [Aside.]

Per. How finely I should have been choused—Colonel, you'll pardon me that I did not give you your title before—it was pure ignorance, 'faith it was—Pray—hem—hem! Pray, colonel, what post had this learned Egyptian in your regiment?

Col. F. A pox of your sneer. [Aside.] I don't understand you, sir.

Per. No, that's strange! I understand you, colonel—An Egyptian of Grand Cairo! ha, ha, ha!—I am sorry such a well-invented tale should do you no more service—We old fellows can see as far into a millstone as them that pick it<sup>1)</sup>—I am not to be trick'd out of my trust—mark that.

Col. F. The devil! I must carry it off; I wish I were fairly out. [Aside.] Lookye, sir, you may make what jest you please—but the stars will be obey'd, sir; and depend upon't I shall have the lady, and you none of the girdle.—Now for Mr. Freeman's part of the plot. [Aside. Exit.]

Per. The stars! ha, ha!—No star has favour'd you, it seems—The girdle! ha, ha, ha! none of your legerdmain tricks can pass upon me—Why what a pack of trumpery has this rogue picked up—His pagod, poluffosboio, his sonos, moros musphonons, and the devil knows what—But I'll take care—Ha, gone!—Ay, 'twas time to sneak off. Soho! the house!

Enter SACKBUT.

Where is this trickster? Send for a constable; I'll have this rascal before the lord mayor; I'll Grand Cairo him, with a pox to him—I believe you had a hand in putting this imposture upon me, Sackbut.

Sack. Who, I, Mr. Periwinkle? I scorn it. I perceiv'd he was a cheat, and left the room on purpose to send for a constable to apprehend him, and endeavoured to stop him when he went out—But the rogue made but one step from the stairs to the door, call'd a coach, leap'd into it, and drove away like the devil, as Mr. Freeman can witness, who is at the bar, and desires to speak with you; he is this minute come to town.

Per. Send him in! [Exit Sackbut.] What a scheme this rogue has laid! How I should have been laugh'd at, had it succeeded!

Enter FREEMAN, booted and spurred.

Mr. Freeman, I had like to have been imposed on by the meriest rascal—

Free. I am sorry to hear it—The dog flew for't: he had not 'scap'd me, had I been aware of him; Sackbut struck at him, but miss'd his blow, or he had done his business for him.

Per. I believe you never heard of such a contrivance, Mr. Freeman, as this fellow had found out.

Free. Mr. Sackbut has told me the whole story, Mr. Periwinkle; but now I have something to tell you of much more importance to yourself—I happen'd to lie one night at Coventry, and knowing your uncle, sir Toby Periwinkle, I paid him a visit, and, to my great surprise, found him dying.

Per. Dying!

Free. Dying, in all appearance; the servants weeping, the room in darkness; the 'pothecary, shaking his head, told me the doctors had given him over; and then there are small hopes, you know.

Per. I hope he has made his will—he always told me he would make me his heir.

Free. I have heard you say as much, and therefore resolved to give you notice. I should think it would not be amiss if you went down to-morrow morning.

Per. It is a long journey, and the roads very bad.

Free. But he has a great estate, and the land very good—Think upon that.

Per. Why that's true, as you say; I'll think upon it. In the mean time, I give you many thanks for your civility, Mr. Freeman, and should be glad of your company to dine with me.

Free. I am obliged to be at Jonathan's Coffee-house at two, and now it is half an hour after one; if I dispatch my business, I'll wait on you; I know your hour.

Per. You shall be very welcome, Mr. Freeman, and so your humble servant. [Exit]

Re-enter COLONEL FRIGNWELL and SACKBUT.

Free. Ha, ha, ha! I have done your business, colonel; he has swallow'd the bait.

Col. F. I overheard all, though I am a little in the dark. I am to personate a highwayman, I suppose—that's a project I am not fond of; for though I may fright him out of his consent, he may fright me out of my life when he discovers me, as he certainly must in the end.

Free. No, no; I have a plot for you without danger; but first we must manage Trade-love—Has the tailor brought your clothes?

Sack. Yes, pox take the thief.

Free. Well, well, no matter; I warrant we have him yet—But now you must put on the Dutch merchant.

Col. F. The deuce of this trading plot—I wish he had been an old soldier, that I might have attack'd him in my own way, heard him fight over all the battles of the late war—But for trade, by Jupiter, I shall never do it.

Sack. Never fear, colonel: Mr. Freeman will instruct you.

Free. You'll see what others do: the coffee-house will instruct you.

Col. F. I must venture however—But I have a further plot in my head upon Tradelove, which you must assist me in, Freeman; you are in credit with him, I heard you say.

Free. I am, and will scruple nothing to serve you, colonel.

Col. F. Come along then.—Now for the Dutchman—Honest Ptolemy, by your leave.

Now must bob-wig and business come in play;
A thirty thousand pound girl leads the way.

[Exeunt]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—JONATHAN'S COFFEE-HOUSE [in Change Alley. A Crowd of People, with Rolls of Paper and Parchment in their Hands; a Bar, Waiters, etc.]

Enter TRADELOVE and Stock-jobbers, with Rolls of Paper and Parchment.

1 Stock. South-sea at seven-eighths; who buys?

Trade. Harkye, Gabriel, you'll pay the difference of that stock we transacted for yother day?

Gab. Ay, Mr. Tradelove, here's a note for the money.

Trade. I would fain bite the spark in the brown coat: he comes very often into the alley, but never employs a broker.

Re-enter COLONEL FEIGNWELL and FREEMAN.

Trade. Mr. Freeman, your servant! Who is that gentleman?

Free. A Dutch merchant just come to England; but, harkye, Mr. Tradelove—I have a piece of news will get you as much as the French king's death did, if you are expeditious. [Showing him a Letter] Read there: I received it just now from one that belongs to the emperor's minister.

Trade. [Reads] Sir,—As I have many obligations to you, I cannot miss any opportunity to show my gratitude: this moment my lord has receiv'd a private express, that the Spaniards have rais'd their siege from before Cagliari. If this proves of any advantage to you, it will answer both the ends and wishes of, sir, your most obliged humble servant, HENRICUS DUSSELDORP.

P. S. In two or three hours the news will be public.

May one depend upon this, Mr. Freeman?

[Aside to Freeman.]

Free. You may—I never knew this person send me a false piece of news in my life.

Trade. Sir, I am much obliged to you: 'egad, 'tis rare news.—Who sells South-sea for next week?

Stock. [All together] I sell; I, I, I, I, I sell.

1 Stock. I'll sell five thousand for next week, at five-eighths.

2 Stock. I'll sell ten thousand, at five-eighths, for the same time.

Trade. Nay, nay; hold, hold; not all together, gentlemen: I'll be no bull<sup>1</sup>); I'll buy no more than I can take: will you sell ten thousand pounds at a half, for any day next week, except Saturday?

1 Stock. I'll sell it you, Mr. Tradelove.

[Freeman whispers to one of the Gentlemen.]

1 Gent. The Spaniards rais'd the siege of Cagliari! I don't believe one word of it. [Aside.]

2 Gent. Rais'd the siege! as much as you have rais'd the Monument.<sup>2</sup>)

Free. 'Tis rais'd, I assure you, sir.

2 Gent. What will you lay on't?

Free. What you please.

1 Gent. Why I have a brother upon the spot, in the emperor's service: I am certain if there were any such thing, I should have had a letter.

2 Gent. I'll hold you fifty pounds 'tis false.

Free. 'Tis done.<sup>3</sup>)

2 Gent. I'll lay you a brace of hundreds upon the same.

Free. I'll take you.

Trade. I'll lay any man a brace of thousands the siege is rais'd.

Free. The Dutch merchant is your man to take in. [Aside to Tradelove.]

Trade. Does he not know the news?

Free. Not a syllable; if he did he would bet a hundred thousand pounds as soon as one penny—he's plaguy rich, and a mighty man at wagers. [To Tradelove.]

Trade. Say you so?—'Egad, I'll bite him, if possible—Are you from Holland, sir?

Col. F. Ya, mynheer.

Trade. Had you the news before you came away?

Col. F. What believe you, mynheer?

Trade. What do I believe? Why I believe that the Spaniards have actually rais'd the siege of Cagliari.

Col. F. What duyvel's news is dat? 'Tis niet waer, mynheer—'tis no true, sir.

Trade. 'Tis so true, mynheer, that I'll lay you two thousand pounds on it.

Col. F. Two duysend pound, mynheer, 'tis gadaen—dis gentleman sal hold de gelt.

[Gives Freeman Money.]

Trade. With all my heart—this binds the wager.

Free. You have certainly lost, mynheer; the siege is rais'd indeed.

Col. F. Ik gelay't niet, mynheer Freeman, Ik sal ye dubbled honden, if you please.

Free. I am let into the secret, therefore won't win your money.

Trade. Ha, ha, ha! I have snapp'd the Dutchman, 'faith, ha, ha! this is no ill day's work.—Pray may I crave your name, mynheer?

forming nominal business in the stocks; a sort of gambling which seems to be very much in vogue at the present day in France.

Trade. Zounds, 'tis a damn'd long name; I shall never remember it—Myn Heer Van, Tim, Tim, Tim—What the devil is it?

Free. Oh! never heed: I know the gentleman, and will pass my word for twice the sum.

Trade. That's enough.

Col. F. You'll hear of me sooner than you wish, old gentleman, I fancy. [Aside] You'll come to Sackbut's, Freeman?

[Aside to Freeman.

Free. Immediately [Aside to the Colonel.

Trade. Mr. Freeman, I give you many thanks for your kindness—

Free. I fear you'll repent when you know all. [Aside.

Trade. Will you dine with me?

Free. I am engag'd at Sackbut's: adieu. [Exit.

Trade. Sir, your humble servant. Now I'll see what I can do upon 'Change with my news. [Exeunt.

SCENE II.—The Tavern.

Enter FREEMAN and COLONEL FEIGNWELL.

Free. Ha, ha, ha! The old fellow swallowed the bait as greedily as a gudgeon.

Col. F. I have him, 'faith, ha, ha, ha! His two thousand pounds secure—If he would keep his money, he must part with the lady, ha ha!

Enter SACKBUT.

Sack. Joy, joy, colonel! the luckiest accident in the world.

Col. F. What say'st thou?

Sack. This letter does your business.

Col. F. [Reads] To Obadiah Prim, hosier, near the building call'd the Monument, in London.

Free. A letter to Prim! How came you by it?

Sack. Looking over the letters our post-woman brought, as I always do, to see what letters are directed to my house (for she can't read, you must know), I spy'd this, directed to Prim, so paid for it among the rest. I have given the old jade a pint of wine, on purpose to delay time, till you see if the letter be of any service; then I'll seal it up again, and tell her I took it by mistake.—I have read it, and fancy you'll like the project.—Read, read, colonel.

Col. F. [Reads] Friend Prim, there is arrived from Pennsylvania one Simon Pure, a leader of the faithful, who hath sojourned with us eleven days, and hath been of great comfort to the brethren.—He intendeth for the quarterly meeting in London; I have recommended him to thy house. I pray thee treat him kindly, and let thy wife cherish him, for he's of a weakly constitution—he will depart from us the third day; which is all from thy friend in the faith,

AMINADAB HOLDFAST.

Ha, ha! excellent! I understand you, landlord: I am to personate this Simon Pure, am I not?

Sack. Don't you like the hint?

Col. F. Admirably well!

Free. 'Tis the best contrivance in the world, if the right Simon gets not there before you—

Col. F. No, no, the quakers never ride post: and suppose, Freeman, you should wait at the Bristol coach, that if you see any such person, you might contrive to give me notice—

Free. I will.

[Bell rings.

Sack. Coming, coming!

[Exit.

Free. Thou must dispatch Periwinkle first—Remember his uncle, sir Toby Periwinkle, is an old bachelor of seventy-five—that he has seven hundred a year, most in abbey-land—that he was once in love with your mother; shrewdly suspected by some to be your father.—That you have been thirty years his steward—and ten years his gentleman—remember to improve these hints.

Col. F. Never fear; let me alone for that—but what's the steward's name?

Free. His name is Pillage.

Col. F. Enough—Now for the country put

Enter SACKBUT.

Sack. Zounds! Mr. Freeman, yonder is Trade-love in the damned'st passion in the world.—He swears you are in the house—he says you told him you were to dine here.

Free. I did so, ha, ha, ha! he has found himself bit already.

Col. F. The devil! he must not see me in this dress now.

Sack. I told him I expected you here, but you were not come yet.

Free. Very well—make you haste out, colonel, and let me alone to deal with him: where is he?

Sack. In the King's-head.

Free. Ay, ay, very well. Landlord, let him know I am come in—and now, Mr. Pillage, success attend you. [Exit Sackbut.

Col. F. Mr. Proteus rather—

From changing shape, and imitating Jove, I draw the happy omens of my love.

I'm not the first young brother of the blade, Who made his fortune in a masquerade.

[Exit.

Enter TRADELOVE.

Free. Zounds! Mr. Tradelove, we're bit it seems.

Trade. Bit, do you call it, Mr. Freeman! I'm ruin'd.—Pox on your news.

Free. Pox on the rascal that sent it me.—

Trade. Sent it you! Why Gabriel Skint has been at the minister's, and spoke with him; and he has assured him 'tis every syllable false; he received no such express.

Free. I know it: I this minute parted with my friend, who protested he never sent me any such letter.—Some roguish stock-jobber has done it on purpose to make me lose my money, that's certain: I wish I knew who he was; I'd make him repent it—I have lost three hundred pounds by it.

Trade. What signifies your three hundred pounds to what I have lost? There's two thousand pounds to that Dutchman with a cursed long name, besides the stock I bought: the devil! I could tear my flesh—I must never show my face upon 'Change more;—for, by my soul, I can't pay it.

Free. I am heartily sorry for it! What can I serve you in? Shall I speak to the Dutch merchant, and try to get you time for the payment?

Trade. Time! Ads'heart! I shall never be able to look up again.

Free. I am very much concerned that I was the occasion, and wish I could be an instrument of retrieving your misfortune; for my own, I value it not. Adso, a thought comes into my head, that well improv'd, may be of service.

Trade. Ah! there's no thought can be of any service to me, without paying the money or running away.

Free. How do ye know? What do you think of my proposing miss Lovely to him? He is a single man—and I heard him say he had a mind to marry an English woman—nay, more than that, he said somebody told him you had a pretty ward—he wished you had betted her instead of your money.

Trade. Ay, but he'd be hanged before he'd take her instead of the money: the Dutch are too covetous for that; besides, he did not know that there were three more of us, I suppose.

Free. So much the better; you may venture to give him your consent, if he'll forgive you the wager: It is not your business to tell him that your consent will signify nothing.

Trade. That's right, as you say; but will he do it, think you?

Free. I can't tell that; but I'll try what I can do with him.—He has promised to meet me here an hour hence; I'll feel his pulse, and let you know: If I find it feasible, I'll send for you; if not, you are at liberty to take what measures you please.

Trade. You must extol her beauty, double her portion, and tell him I have the entire disposal of her, and that she can't marry without my consent—and that I am a covetous rogue, and will never part with her without a valuable consideration.

Free. Ay, ay, let me alone for a lie at a pinch.

Trade. Egad, if you can bring this to bear, Mr. Freeman, I'll make you whole again. I'll pay the three hundred pounds you lost with all my soul.

Free. Well, I'll use my best endeavours.—Where will you be?

Trade. At home: pray heaven you prosper!—If I were but the sole trustee now, I should not fear it.

Free. Ha, ha, ha!—he has it.

[Exit.]

SCENE III.—PERIWINKLE'S House.

Enter PERIWINKLE on one side, and a Footman on the other.

Foot. A gentleman from Coventry inquires for you, sir.

Per. From my uncle, I warrant you: bring him up.—This will save me the trouble, as well as the expense of a journey.

Enter COLONEL.

Col. F. Is your name Periwinkle, sir?

Per. It is, sir.

Col. F. I am sorry for the message I bring.—My old master, whom I served these forty years, claims the sorrow due from a faithful servant to an indulgent master. [Weeps.]

Per. By this I understand, sir, my uncle, sir Toby Periwinkle, is dead.

Col. F. He is, sir, and has left you heir to seven hundred a year, in as good abbey-land as ever paid Peter-pence to Rome.—I wish you long to enjoy it<sup>1</sup>), but my tears will flow when I think of my benefactor.—[Weeps] Ah! he was a good man—he has not left many of his fellows, the poor lament him sorely.

Per. I pray, sir, what office bore you?

Col. F. I was his steward, sir.

Per. I have heard him mention you with much respect: your name is—

Col. F. Pillage, sir.

Per. Ay, Pillage, I do remember he called you Pillage.—Pray, Mr. Pillage, when did my uncle die.

Col. F. Monday last, at four in the morning. About two he signed his will, and gave it into my hands, and strictly charg'd me to leave Coventry the moment he expired; and deliver it to you with what speed I could: I have obeyed him, sir, and there is the will.

[Gives it to Periwinkle.]

Per. 'Tis very well, I'll lodge it in the commons.<sup>2</sup>)

Col. F. There are two things which he forgot to insert, but charged me to tell you, that he desired you'd perform them as readily as if you had found them written in the will, which is to remove his corpse, and bury him by his father at St. Pauls, Covent-garden, and to give all his servants mourning.

Per. That will be a considerable charge; a pox of all modern fashions. [Aside] Well! it shall be done, Mr. Pillage, I will agree with one of death's fashion-monger's, called an undertaker, to go down, and bring up the body.

Col. F. I hope, sir, I shall have the honour to serve you in the same station I did your worthy uncle: I have not many years to stay behind him, and would gladly spend them in the family, where I was brought up.—[Weeps]—He was a kind and tender master to me.

Per. Pray don't grieve, Mr. Pillage, you shall hold your place, and every thing else which you held under my uncle.—You make me weep to see you so concern'd. [Weeps] He lived to a good old age, and we are all mortal.

Col. F. We are so, sir, and therefore I must beg you to sign this lease: You'll find, sir Toby has taken particular notice of it in his will—I could not get it time enough from the lawyer, or he had signed it before he died.

[Gives him a Paper.]

Per. A lease! for what?

Col. F. I rented a hundred a year farm of sir Toby upon lease, which lease expires at Lady-day next. I desire to renew for twenty years—that's all, sir.

Per. Let me see [Looks over the Lease] Very well—Let me see what he says in his will about it. [Lays the Lease upon the Table, and looks on the Will] Ho, here it is—The farm lying—now in possession of Sa—his father's property, was called, with two of his brothers, to his father's bedside, just as the old gentleman was at the point of death. The father addressing himself to the eldest, told him he had left him 10,000 pounds in his will; his answer was; "God bless you, my dear father, and send you health and strength to enjoy it yourself." The second brother, 10,000, and the same answer. Then the father told the youngest, that since he had been such a spendthrift, he would never come to any good; and so he had left him a shilling to buy a halter, for him to be hanged with; to which the son answered like his brothers, "God bless you, my dear father, and send you health and strength to enjoy it yourself."

muel Pillage—suffer him to renew his lease—at the same rent.—Very well, Mr. Pillage, I see my uncle does mention it, and I'll perform his will.—Give me the lease.—[Colonel gives it him, he looks upon it, and lays it upon the Table] Pray you step to the door, and call for pen and ink, Mr. Pillage.

Col. F. I have a pen and ink in my pocket, sir, [Pulls out an Ink-horn] I never go without that.

Per. I think it belongs to your profession.—[He looks upon the Pen while the Colonel changes the Lease and lays down the Contract] I doubt this is but a sorry pen, though it may serve to write my name. [Writes.]

Col. F. Little does he think what he signs. [Aside.]

Per. There is your lease, Mr. Pillage. [Gives him the Paper] Now I must desire you to make what haste you can down to Coventry, and take care of every thing, and I'll send down the undertaker for the body; do you attend it up, and whatever charge you are at, I'll repay you.

Col. F. You have paid me already, I thank you, sir. [Aside.]

Per. Will you dine with me?

Col. F. I would rather not: there are some of my neighbours which I met as I came along, who leave the town this afternoon, they told me, and I should be glad of their company down.

Per. Well, well, I won't detain you. I will give orders about mourning. [Exit Colonel] Seven hundred a year! I wish he had died seventeen years ago:—What a valuable collection of rarities might I have had by this time?—I might have travelled over all the known parts of the globe, and made my own closet rival the Vatican at Rome—Odso, I have a good mind to begin my travels now—let me see—I am but sixty? My father, grandfather, and great grandfather reached ninety odd;—I have almost forty years good:—Let me consider! what will seven hundred a year amount to in—ay; in thirty years, I say but thirty—thirty times seven, is seven times thirty—that is—just twenty-one thousand pounds—'tis a great deal of money—I may very well reserve sixteen hundred of it for a collection of such rarities as will make my name famous to posterity—I would not die like other mortals, forgotten in a year or two, as my uncle will be—No,

With nature's curious works I'll raise my fame,
That men till doomsday may repeat my name.

[Exit.]

SCENE IV.—A Tavern.

FREEMAN and TRADELOVE discovered over a Bottle.

Trade. Come, Mr. Freeman, here's Mynheer Jan, Van, Tim, Tam, Tam,—I shall never think of that Dutchman's name—

Free. Mynheer Jan Van Timtamtirelereletta Heer Van Feignwell.

Trade. Ay, Heer Van Feignwell: I never heard such a confounded name in my life—here's his health, I say.

Free. With all my heart.

Trade. Faith I never expected to have found so generous a thing in a Dutchman.

Free. As soon as I told him your circumstances, he replied, he would not be the ruin of any man for the world—and immediately made this proposal himself.—Let him take what time he will for the payment, said he; or if he'll give me his word, I'll forgive him the debt.

Trade. Well, Mr. Freeman, I can but thank you. 'Egad you have made a man of me again! and if ever I lay a wager more, may I rot in gaol.

Free. I assure you, Mr. Tradelove, I was very much concerned, because I was the occasion, though very innocently, I protest.

Trade. I dare swear you was, Mr. Freeman.

Enter COLONEL FEIGNWELL, dressed as a Dutch Merchant.

Col. F. Ha, mynheer Tradelove, Ik been sorry voor your troubles—maer Ik sal you easie maken, Ik will de gelt nie hebben—

Trade. I shall for ever acknowledge the obligation, sir.

Free. But you understand upon what condition, Mr. Tradelove; miss Lovely.

Col. F. Ya, de frow sal al te regt setten, mynheer.

Trade. With all my heart, mynheer; you shall have my consent to marry her freely—

Free. Well then, as I am a party concerned between you, mynheer Jan Van Timtamtirelereletta Heer Van Feignwell shall give you a discharge of your wager under his own hand, —and you shall give him your consent to marry miss Lovely under yours,—that is the way to avoid all manner of disputes hereafter.

Col. F. Ya, weeragtig.

Trade. Ay, ay, so it is, Mr. Freeman: I'll give it under mine this minute.

[Sits down to write.]

Col. F. And so Ik sal. [Does the same.]

Free. So ho, the house!

Enter Drawer.

Bid your master come up—I'll see there be witnesses enough to the bargain. [Aside.]

Enter SACKBUT.

Sack. Do you call, gentlemen?

Free. Ay, Mr. Sackbut, we shall want your hand here.—

Trade. There, mynheer, there's my consent as amply as you can desire; but you must insert your own name, for I know not how to spell it: I have left a blank for it.

[Gives the Colonel a Paper.]

Col. F. Ya Ik sal dat well doen—

Free. Now, Mr. Sackbut, you and I will witness it. [They write.]

Col. F. Daer, mynheer Tradelove, is your discharge. [Gives him a Paper.]

Trade. Be pleased to witness this receipt too, gentlemen.

[Freeman and Sackbut put their Hands.]

Free. Ay, ay, that we will.

Col. F. Well, mynheer, ye most meer doen, ye most myn voorsprach to de frow syn.

Free. He means you must recommend him to the lady.—

Trade. That I will, and to the rest of my brother guardians.

Col. F. Wat voor de duyvel heb you meer guardians.

Trade. Only three, mynheer.

Col. F. VVhat donder heb ye myn betrocken, mynheer?—Had Ik dat gewoeten, Ik soude eaven met you geweest syn.

Sack. But Mr. Tradelove is the principal, and he can do a great deal with the rest, sir.

Free. And he shall use his interest, I promise you, mynheer.

Trade. I will say all that ever I can think on to recommend you, mynheer; and if you please, I'll introduce you to the lady.

Col. F. VVell, dat is waer—Maer ye must first spreken of myn tq de frow, and to oudere gentlemen.

Free. Ay, that's the best way—and then I and the Heer Feignwell will meet you there.

Trade. I will go this moment, upon honour—Your most obedient humble servant.—My speaking will do you little good, mynheer: ha, ha! we have bit you, faith: ha, ha!

VVell—my debts discharged, and as for Nan,

He has my consent—to get her if he can. [Exit.

Col. F. Ha, ha, ha! this was a master-piece of contrivance, Freeman.

Free. He hugs himself with his supposed good fortune, and little thinks the luck's on our side!—But come, pursue the fickle goddess, while she's in the mood—Now for the quaker.

Col. F. That's the hardest task.

Of all the counterfeits perform'd by man,
A soldier makes the simplest puritan.

[Exeunt.

ACT V.

SCENE I.—An Apartment in PRIM's House.

Enter MRS. PRIM and MISS LOVELY, in Quaker's Dresses, meeting.

Mrs. P. So, now I like thee, Anne: art thou not better without thy monstrous hoop-coat and patches?—If heaven should make thee so many black spots upon thy face, would it not fright thee, Anne?

Miss L. If it should turn you inside outward, and show all the spots of your hypocrisy, 'twould fright me worse!

Mrs. P. My hypocrisy! I scorn thy words, Anne: I lay no baits.

Miss L. If you did, you'd catch no fish.

Mrs. P. VVell, well, make thy jests—but I'd have thee to know, Anne, that I could have caught as many fish (as thou call'st them) in my time, as ever thou didst with all thy fool-traps about thee.

Miss L. Is that the reason of your formality, Mrs. Prim? Truth will out: I ever thought, indeed, there was more design than godliness in the pinched cap.

Mrs. P. Go, thou art corrupted with reading lewd plays, and filthy romances—Ah! I wish thou art not already too familiar with the wicked ones.

Miss L. Too familiar with the wicked ones! Pray, no more of those freedoms, madam—I am familiar with none so wicked as yourself—How dare you thus talk to me! you, you, you, unworthy woman you. [Bursts into tears.

Enter TRADELOVE.

Trade. VVhat in tears, Nancy? VVhat have you done to her, Mrs. Prim, to make her weep?

Miss L. Done to me! I admire I keep my senses among you;—but I will rid myself of your tyranny, if there be either law or justice to be had:—I'll force you to give me up my liberty.

Mrs. P. Thou hast more need to weep for thy sins; Anne—Yea, for thy manifold sins.

Miss L. Don't think that I'll be still the fool, which you have made me—No, I'll wear what I please—go when and where I please—and keep what company I think fit, and not what you shall direct—I will.

Trade. For my part, I do think all this very reasonable, miss Lovely—'tis fit you should have your liberty, and for that very purpose I am come.

Enter PERIWINKLE and OBADIAH PRIM, with a Letter in his Hand.

Per. I have bought some black stockings of your husband, Mrs. Prim, but he tells me the glover's trade belongs to you? therefore I pray you look me out five or six dozen of mourning gloves, such as are given at funerals, and send them to my house.

Obad. My friend Periwinkle has got a good windfall to-day—seven hundred a year.

Mrs. P. I wish thee joy of it, neighbour.

Trade. VVhat, is Sir Toby dead then?

Per. He is! You'll take care, Mrs. Prim.

Mrs. P. Yea, I will, neighbour.

Obad. This letter recommendeth a speaker; 'tis from Aminadab Holdfast of Bristol: peradventure he will be here this night; therefore, Sarah, do thou take care for his reception—

[Gives her the Letter.

Mrs. P. I will obey thee. [Exit.

Trade. VVe must marry her, Mr. Prim.

Obad. VVhy truly, if we could find a husband worth having, I should be as glad to see her married as thou wouldst, neighbour.

Per. VVell said, there are but few worth having.

Trade. I can recommend you a man now, that I think you can none of you have an objection to!

Enter SIR PHILIP MODELOVE.

Per. You recommend? Nay, whenever she marries, I'll recommend the husband—

Sir P. VVhat must it be a whale, or a rhinoceros, Mr. Periwinkle? ha, ha, ha!

Per. He shall be none of the fops at your end of the town, with full perukes and empty skulls,—nor yet any of our trading gentry, who puzzle the heralds to find arms for their coaches.—No, he shall be a man famous for travels, solidity, and curiosity—one who has searched into the profundity of nature! VVhen heaven shall direct such a one, he shall have my consent, because it may turn to the benefit of mankind.

Miss L. The benefit of mankind! VVhat would you anatomize me?

Sir P. Ay, ay, madam, he would dissect you.

Trade. Or, pore over you through a microscope, to see how your blood circulates from the crown of your head to the sole of your foot—ha, ha! but I have a husband for you, a man that knows how to improve your fortune; one that trades to the four corners of the globe.

<sup>1)</sup> To be in a bad humour.

Miss L. And would send me for a venture perhaps.

Trade. One that will dress you in all the pride of Europe, Asia, Africa, and America—a Dutch merchant, my girl.

Sir P. A Dutchman! ha, ha! there's a husband for a fine lady.—Ya frow, will you meet myn slapen—ha, ha! he'll learn you to talk the language of the hogs, madam, ha, ha!

Trade. He'll teach you that one merchant is of more service to a nation than fifty coxcombs. 'Tis the merchant makes the belle.—How would the ladies sparkle in the box, without the merchant? The Indian diamond! The French brocade! The Italian fan! The Flanders lace! The fine Dutch holland! How would they vent their scandal over their tea-tables? And where would your beaux have Champagne to toast their mistresses, were it not for the merchant.

Obad. Verily, neighbour Tradelove, thou dost waste thy breath about nothing—All that thou hast said tendeth only to debauch youth, and fill their heads with the pride and luxury of this world.—The merchant is a very great friend to satan, and sendeth as many to his dominions as the pope.

Per. Right; I say knowledge makes the man.

Obad. Yea, but not thy kind of knowledge—it is the knowledge of truth—Search thou for the light within, and not for baubles, friend.

Miss L. Ah, study your country's good, Mr. Periwinkle, and not her insects.—Rid you of your homebred monsters, before you fetch any from abroad.—I dare swear you have maggots enough in your own brain to stock all the virtuosos in Europe with butterflies.

Sir P. By my soul, miss Nancy's a wit.

Obad. That is more than she can say of thee, friend.—Lookye, 'tis in vain to talk, when I meet a man worthy of her, she shall have my leave to marry him.

Miss L. Provided he be of the faithful—Was there ever such a swarm of caterpillars to blast the hopes of a woman! [Aside] Know this, that you contend in vain: I'll have no husband of your choosing, nor shall you lord it over me long.—I'll try the power of an English senate—Orphans have been redressed and wills set aside—and none did ever deserve their pity more.—O Feignwell! where are thy promises to free me from those vermin? Alas! the task was more difficult than be imagined!

A harder task than what the poets tell
Of yore, the fair Andromeda befell;
She but one monster fear'd, I've four to fear,
And see no Perseus, no deliv'rer near.

[Exit.]

Enter Servant.

Serv. [Whispers to Obad.] The woman is mad.

Sir P. So are you all, in my opinion. [Exit.]

Serv. One Simon Pure inquireth for thee.

[Exit.]

Obad. Friend Tradelove, business requireth my presence.

Trade. Oh, I shan't trouble you—Pox take him for an unmannerly dog—However, I have kept my word with my Dutchman, and I'll introduce him too for all you.

Enter COLONEL in a Quaker's Habit.

Obad. Friend Pure thou art welcome: how is it with friend Holdfast, and all friends in Bristol? Timothy Littleworth, John Slenderbrain, and Christopher Keepfaith?

Col. F. A goodly company! [Aside] They are all in health, I thank thee for them.

Obad. Friend Holdfast writes me word, that thou camest lately from Pennsylvania: how do all friends there?

Col. F. What the devil shall I say? I know just as much of Pennsylvania as I do of Bristol. [Aside.]

Obad. Do they thrive?

Col. F. Yea, friend, the blessing of their good works fall upon them.

Enter MRS. PRIM and MISS LOVELY.

Obad. Sarah, know our friend Pure.

Mrs. P. Thou art welcome. [He salutes her.]

Col. F. Here comes the sum of all my wishes.—How charming she appears even in that disguise! [Aside.]

Obad. Why dost thou consider the maiden so attentively, friend.

Col. F. I will tell thee: About four days ago I saw a vision—This very maiden, but in vain attire, standing on a precipice, and heard a voice which called me by my name—and bid me put forth my hand and save her from the pit.—I did so, and methought the damsel grew unto my side.

Mrs. P. What can that portend?

Obad. The damsel's conversion—I am persuaded.

Miss L. That's false, I'm sure— [Aside.]

Obad. Wilt thou use the means, friend Pure?

Col. F. Means! What means? Is she not thy daughter, already one of the faithful?

Mrs. P. No, alas! she's one of the ungodly.

Obad. Pray thee mind what this good man will say unto thee: he will teach thee the way thou shouldst walk, Anne.

Miss L. I know my way without his instruction: I hop'd to have been quiet when once I had put on your odious formality here.

Col. F. Then thou wearest it out of compulsion, not choice, friend?

Miss L. Thou art in the right of it, friend—

Mrs. P. Art thou not ashamed to mimic the good man? Ah! thou stubborn girl.

Col. F. Mind her not; she hurteth not me—If thou wilt leave her alone with me, I will discuss some few points with her, that may perchance soften her stubbornness, and melt her into compliance.

Obad. Content: I pray thee put it home to her.—Come, Sarah, let us leave the good man with her.

Miss L. [Catching hold of Prim; he breaks loose; exeunt Obad. and Mrs. P.] What, do you mean to leave me with this old enthusiastical canter? Don't think because I complied with your formality, to impose your ridiculous doctrine upon me.

Col. F. I pray thee, young woman, moderate thy passion.

Miss L. I pray thee walk after thy leader, you will but lose your labour upon me.—These wretches will certainly make me mad!

Col. F. I am of another opinion! the spirit telleth me 'I shall convert thee, Anne.

Miss L. 'Tis a lying spirit, don't believe it.

Col. F. Say'st thou so? Why then thou shalt convert me, my angel.

[Catching her in his arms.

Miss L. [Shrieks] Ah! monster, hold off, or I'll tear thy eyes out.

Col. F. Hush! for heaven's sake—dost thou not know me? I am Feignwell.

Miss L. Feignwell.

Re-enter OBADIAH PRIM.

Oh, I'm undone! Prim here—I wish with all my soul I had been dumb.

Obad. What is the matter? Why didst thou shriek out, Anne?

Miss L. Shriek out! I'll shriek and shriek again, cry murder, thieves, or any thing, to drown the noise of that eternal babbler, if you leave me with him any longer.

Obad. Was that all? Fie, fie, Anne.

Col. F. No matter, I'll bring down her stomach, I'll warrant thee!—Leave us, I pray thee?

Obad. Fare thee well. Verily, I was afraid the flesh had got the better of the spirit. [Exit.

Col. F. My charming lovely woman! [Embraces her.

Miss L. What meanest thou by this disguise, Feignwell?

Col. F. To set thee free, if thou wilt perform thy promise.

Miss L. Make me mistress of my fortune, and make thy own conditions.

Col. F. This night shall answer all my wishes.—See here I have the consent of three of thy guardians already, and doubt not but Prim will make the fourth. [Obadiah listening.

Obad. I would gladly hear what arguments the good man useth to bend her. [Aside.

Miss L. Thy words give me new life, methinks.

Obad. What do I hear?

Miss L. Thou best of men, heaven meant to bless me sure, when I first saw thee.

Obad. He hath mollified her—O wonderful conversion!

Col. F. [Softly] Ha! Prim listening.—No more, my love, we are observed: seem to be edified, and give 'em hopes that thou wilt turn quaker, and leave the rest to me. [Aloud. I am glad to find that thou art touched with what I said unto thee, Anne; another time I will explain the other article unto thee: in the mean while be thou dutiful to our friend Prim.

Miss L. I shall obey thee in every thing. [Obadiah comes forward.

Obad. Oh, what a prodigious change is here! Thou hast wrought a miracle, friend! Anne, how dost thou like the doctrine he hath preached?

Miss L. So well, that I could talk to him for ever, methinks—I am ashamed of my former folly, and ask your pardon.

Col. F. Enough, enough, that thou art sorry: he is no pope, Anne.

Obad. True, I am no pope, Anne. Verily, thou dost rejoice me exceedingly, friend: will it please thee to walk into the next room, and refresh thyself?—Come, take the maiden by the hand.

Col. F. We will follow thee.

Enter SERVANT.

Serv. There is another Simon Pure, inquireth for thee, master.

Col. F. The devil there is, [Aside.

Obad. Another Simon Pure! I do not know him, is he any relation of thine?

Col. F. No, friend, I know him not.—Pox take him: I wish he were, in Pennsylvania again, with all my soul. [Aside.

Miss L. What shall I do?

Obad. Bring him up.

Col. F. Humph! then one of us must go down, that's certain—Now impudence assist me.

Enter SIMON PURE.

Obad. What is thy will with me, friend?

Simon. Didst thou not receive a letter from Aminadab Holdfast of Bristol, concerning one Simon Pure?

Obad. Yea, and Simon Pure is already here, friend.

Col. F. And Simon Pure will stay here, friend, if it be possible. [Aside.

Simon. That's an untruth, for I am he.

Col. F. Take thou heed, friend, what thou dost say: I do affirm that I am Simon Pure.

Simon. Thy name may be Pure, friend, but not that Pure.

Col. F. Yea, that Pure which my good friend, Aminadab Holdfast, wrote to my friend Prim about: the same Simon Pure that came from Pennsylvania, and sojourned in Bristol eleven days: thou wouldst not take my name from me, wouldst thou?—till I have done with it. [Aside.

Simon. Thy name! I am astonished!

Col. F. At what? at thy own assurance?

[Going up to him, Simon Pure starts back.

Simon. Avaunt, satan, approach me not: I defy thee, and all thy works.

Miss L. Oh, he'll out-cant him.—Undone, undone for ever. [Aside.

Col. F. Hark thee, friend, thy sham will not take—Don't exert thy voice, thou art too well acquainted with satan to start at him, thou wicked reprobate—What can thy design be here?

Enter a SERVANT who gives PRIM a Letter.

Obad. One of these must be a counterfeit, but which I cannot say.

Col. F. What can that letter be? [Aside.

Simon. Thou must be the devil, friend, that's certain; for no human power can speak so great a falsehood.

Obad. This letter sayeth that thou art better acquainted with that prince of darkness, than any here—Read that, I pray thee, Simon.

[Gives it to the Colonel.

Col. F. 'Tis Freeman's hand.—[Reads] There is a design formed to rob your house this night, and cut your throat; and for that purpose there is a man disguised like a quaker, who is to pass for one Simon Pure: the gang, whereof I am one, though now resolved to rob no more, has been at Bristol: one of them came in the coach with the quaker, whose name he hath taken; and from what he hath gathered from him, formed that design, and did not doubt but he should impose so far upon you as to make you turn out the real Si—mon Pure, and keep him with you. Make the right use of this. Adieu.—Excellent well!

[Aside.

Obad. Dost thou hear this?

[To Simon Pure.

Simon. Yea, but it moveth me not: that doubtless is the impostor.

[Pointing at the Colonel.

Col. F. Ah! thou wicked one—now I consider thy face, I remember thou didst come up in the leathern conveniency with me—thou hadst a black bob-wig on, and a brown camblet coat with brass buttons—Canst thou deny it, ha?

Simon. Yes, I can, and with a safe conscience too, friend.

Obad. Verily, friend, thou art the most impudent villain I ever saw.

Miss L. Nay, then, I'll have a fling at him. [Aside] I remember the face of this fellow at Bath—Ay, this is he that pick'd my lady Raffle's pocket in the grove—Don't you remember that the mob pump'd<sup>1)</sup> you, friend?—This is the most notorious rogue—

Simon. What does provoke thee to seek my life? Thou wilt not hang me, wilt thou, wrongfully?

Obad. She will do thee no hurt, nor thou shalt do me none; therefore get thee about thy business, friend, and leave thy wicked course of life, or thou mayst not come off so favourably every where. Simon, I pray thee, put him forth.

Col. F. Go, friend, I would advise thee, and tempt thy fate no more.

Simon. Yes, I will go; but it shall be to thy confusion; I shall clear myself; I will return with some proofs that shall convince thee, Obadiah, that thou art highly imposed on.

[Exit.

Col. F. Then there will be no staying for me, that's certain—what the devil shall I do?

[Aside.

Obad. What monstrous works of iniquity are there in this world, Simon?

Col. F. Yea, the age is full of vice—'Sdeath, I am so confounded I know not what to say.

[Aside.

Obad. Thou art disorder'd, friend,—art thou not well?

Col. F. My spirit is greatly troubled, and something telleth me, that though I have wrought a good work in converting this maiden, this tender maiden, yet my labour will be in vain: for the evil spirit fighteth against her: and I see, yea I see with the eye of my inward man, that satan will re-buffet her again, whenever I withdraw myself from her; and she will, yea, this very damsel will return again to that abomination from whence I have retriev'd her, as it were, yea, as if it were out of the jaws of the fiend.—

Miss L. I must second him. [Aside] What

<sup>1)</sup> Any gentleman or other found with his hand in his neighbour's pocket, or with any thing that he has taken from the said neighbour's pocket, with an intent to steal, is forthwith taken to the nearest pump, and held with his head below the cold stream, which is pumped upon him, without intermission, till he, the said pick-pocket is half drowned. Then all the boys of the parish assemble together and hunt the poor wretch all through the streets, till he can find some hole to hide himself. The English, as in the time of Richard L. seem to like to take the law into their own hands, witness the frequent boxing-matches in the street.

meaneth this struggling within me? I feel the spirit resisteth the vanities of this world, but the flesh is rebellious, yea, the flesh—I greatly fear the flesh and the weakness thereof—hum—<sup>1)</sup>

Obad. The maid is inspir'd. [Aside] Prodigious! The damsel is filled with the spirit—Sarah.

Enter MRS. PRIM.

Mrs. P. I am greatly rejoiced to see such a change in our beloved Anne. I came to tell thee that supper stayeth for thee.

Col. F. I am not disposed for thy food; my spirit longeth for more delicious meat!—fain would I redeem this maiden from the tribe of sinners, and break those cords asunder wherewith she is bound—hum—

Miss L. Something whispers in my ears, methinks—that I must be subject to the will of this good man, and from him only must hope for consolation—hum—It also telleth me that I am a chosen vessel to raise up seed to the faithful, and that thou must consent that we two be one flesh according to the word—hum—

Obad. What a revelation is here! This is certainly part of thy vision, friend; this is the maiden's growing unto thy side: ah! with what willingness should I give thee my consent, could I give thee her fortune too—but thou wilt never get the consent of the wicked ones.

Col. F. I wish I was sure of yours. [Aside.

Obad. Thy soul rejoiceth, yea, rejoiceth, I say, to find the spirit within thee; for lo, it moveth thee with natural agitation—yea, with natural agitation towards this good man—yea, it stirreth, as one may say—yea, verily I say, it stirreth up thy inclination—yea, as one would stir a pudding.

All. Hum!

Miss L. I see, I see! the spirit guiding of thy hand, good Obadiah Prim, and now behold thou art signing thy consent—and now I see myself within thy arms, my friend and brother, yea, I am become bone of thy bone, and flesh of thy flesh. [Embracing him] Hum—

Mrs. P. The spirit hath greatly moved them both—friend Prim, thou must consent; there's no resisting of the spirit!

Obad. Fetch me the pen and ink, Sarah—and my hand shall confess its obedience to the spirit.

[Exit Mrs. Prim.

Col. F. I wish it were over.

Re-enter MRS. PRIM, with Pen and Ink.

Miss L. I tremble lest this quaking rogue should return, and spoil all. [Aside.

Obad. Here, friend, do thou write what the spirit prompteth, and I will sign it.

[Col. L. sits down.

Col. F. [Reads] This is to certify all whom it may concern, that I do freely give all my right and title in Anne Lovely, to Simon Pure, and my full consent that she shall become his wife according to the form of marriage. Witness my hand.

Obad. That's enough—give me the pen.

[Signs it.]

Enter BETTY, running to Miss LOVELY.

Betty. Oh! madam, madam, here's the quaking man again: he has brought a coachman, and two or three more.

Miss L. Ruin'd past redemption!

[Aside to the Colonel.]

Col. F. No, no; one minute sooner had spoil'd all; but now—here's company coming, friend, give me the paper.

[Going to Prim hastily.]

Obad. Here it is, Simon; and I wish thee happy with the maiden.

Miss L. 'Tis done; and now, devil, do thy worst.

Enter SIMON PURE, Coachman, and others.

Simon. Look thee, friend, I have brought these people to satisfy thee that I am not that impostor which thou didst take me for: this is the man that did drive the leathern conveniency, and brought me from Bristol—and this is—

Col. F. Lookye, friend, to save the court the trouble of examining witnesses—I plead guilty, ha, ha!

Obad. How's this? Is not thy name Pure then?

Col. F. No, really, sir; I only made bold with this gentleman's name—but here I give it up safe and sound: it has done the business I had occasion for, and now I intend to wear my own, which shall be at his service upon the same occasion at any time.—Ha, ha, ha!

Simon. Oh! the wickedness of the age!

[Exit Coachman, etc.]

Obad. I am struck dumb with thy impudence, Anne; thou hast deceiv'd me—and perchance undone thyself.

Mrs. P. Thou art a dissembling baggage, and shame will overtake thee.

[Exit.]

Simon. I am grieved to see thy wife so much troubled: I will follow and console her. [Exit.]

Enter Servant.

Sero. Thy brother guardians inquire for thee: here is another man with them.

Miss L. Who can that other man be?

[To Col. F.]

Col. F. 'Tis Freeman, a friend of mine, whom I ordered to bring the rest of the guardians here.

Enter SIR PHILIP MODELOVE, TRADELOVE, PERIWINKLE, and FREEMAN.

Free. Is all safe? Did my letter do you service?

[Aside to the Colonel.]

Col. F. All, all's safe! ample service. [Aside.]

Sir P. Miss Nancy, how dost do, child?

Miss L. Don't call me miss, friend Philip; my name is Anne, thou knowest.—

Sir P. What, is the girl metamorphos'd?

Miss L. I wish thou wert so metamorphos'd. Ah! Philip, throw off that gaudy attire, and wear the clothes becoming thy age.

Obad. I am ashamed to see these men. [Aside.]

Sir P. My age! the woman is possess'd.

Col. F. No, thou art possess'd rather, friend.

Trade. Harkye, miss Lovely, one word with you.

[Takes hold of her Hand.]

Col. F. This maiden is my wife, thanks to my friend Prim, and thou hast no business with her.

[Takes her from him.]

Trade. His wife! harkye, Mr. Freeman.

Per. Why you have made a very fine piece of work of it, Mr. Prim.

Sir P. Married to a quaker! thou art a fine fellow to be left guardian to an orphan truly—there's a husband for a young lady!

Col. F. When I have put on my beau clothes, sir Philip, you'll like me better—

Sir P. Thou wilt make a very scurvy beau—friend—

Col. F. I believe I can prove it under your hand that you thought me a very fine gentleman in the Park t'other day, about thirty-six minutes after eleven; will you take a pinch, sir Philip?—One of the finest snuff-boxes you ever saw.

[Offers him snuff.]

Sir P. Ha, ha, ha! I am overjoyed, 'faith I am, if thou be'st the gentleman—I own I did give my consent to the gentleman I brought here to-day—but whether this is he I can't be positive.

Obad. Canst thou not!—Now I think thou art a fine fellow to be left guardian to an orphan.—Thou shallow-brain'd shuttlecock, he may be a pickpocket for aught thou dost know.

Per. You would have been two rare fellows to have been entrusted with the sole management of her fortune, would ye not, think ye? But Mr. Tradelove and myself shall take care of her portion.—

Trade. Ay, ay, so we will—Didn't you tell me the Dutch merchant desired me to meet him here, Mr. Freeman?

Free. I did so, and I am sure he will be here, if you'll have a little patience.

Col. F. What, is Mr. Tradelove impatient? Nay, then, ib ben gereet voor your, he he, Jan Van Timtamirelereletta Heer Van Feignwell, vergeeten!

Trade. Oh! pox of the name! what have you trick'd me too, Mr. Freeman?

Col. F. Trick'd, Mr. Tradelove! did not I give you two thousand pounds for your consent fairly? And now do you tell a gentleman he has trick'd you?

Per. So, so, you are a pretty guardian, 'faith, to sell your charge: what, did you look upon her as part of your stock?

Obad. Ha, ha, ha! I am glad thy knavery is found out, however—I confess the maiden over-reached me, and I had no sinister end at all.

Per. Ay, ay, one thing or other over-reached you all,—but I'll take care he shall never finger a penny of her money, I warrant you—over-reach'd, quotha! Why I might have been over-reach'd too, if I had no more wit: I don't know but this very fellow may be him that was directed to me from Grand Cairo t'other day. Ha, ha, ha!

Col. F. The very same.

Per. Are you so, sir? but your trick would not pass upon me.

Col. F. No, as you say, at that time it did not, that was not my lucky hour—but, harkye, sir, I must let you into one secret—you may keep honest John Tradescant's coat on, for your uncle, sir Toby Periwinkle, is not dead —so the charge of mourning will be saved, ha, ha, ha!—Don't you remember Mr. Pillage, your uncle's steward? Ha, ha, ha!

Per. Not dead! I begin to fear I am trick'd too.

Col. F. Don't you remember the signing of a lease, Mr. Periwinkle?

Per. Well, and what signifies that lease, if my uncle is not dead?—Ha! I am sure it was a lease I signed.—

Col. F. Ay, but it was a lease for life, sir, and of this beautiful tenement, I thank you.

[Taking hold of Miss Lovely.

Omnes. Ha, ha, ha! Neighbour's fare.

Free. So then, I find, you are all trick'd, ha, ha!

Per. I am certain I read as plain a lease as ever I read in my life.

Col. F. You read a lease I grant you; but you sign'd this contract. [Showing a Paper.

Per. How durst you put this trick upon me, Mr. Freeman? Didn't you tell me my uncle was dying?

Free. And would tell you twice as much to serve my friend, ha, ha!—

Sir. P. What, the learned and famous Mr. Periwinkle chous'd too!—Ha, ha, ha!—I shall die with laughing, ha, ha, ha!

Trade. Well, since you have out-witted us all, pray you what and who are you, sir?

Sir P. Sir, the gentleman is a fine gentleman.—I am glad you have got a person, madam, who understands dress and good breeding.—I was resolved she should have one of my choosing.

Trade. A beau! nay, then, she is finely help'd up.

Miss L. Why beaus are great encouragers of trade, sir, ha, ha, ha!

Col. F. Lookye, gentlemen—I am the person who can give the best account of myself; and I must beg sir Philip's pardon, when I tell him, that I have as much aversion to what he calls dress and breeding, as I have to the enemies of my religion. I have had the honour to serve his majesty, and headed a regiment of the bravest fellows that ever push'd bayonet in the throat of a Frenchman; and notwithstanding the fortune this lady brings me, whenever my country wants my aid, this sword and arm are at her service.

And now, my fair, if thou'lt but deign to smile, I meet a recompense for all my toil:

Love and religion ne'er admit restraint,

And force makes many sinners, not one saint;

Still free as air the active mind does rove,

And searches proper objects for its love;

But that once fix'd, 'tis past the power of art

To chase the dear idea from the heart:

'Tis liberty of choice that sweetens life,

Makes the glad husband, and the happy wife.

[Exeunt.

THE BUSY BODY,

ACTED at the Theatre Royal in Drurylane 1709. At the rehearsal of it, Mr. Wilks had so mean an opinion of his part (Sir George Airy) that one morning in a passion he threw it off the stage into the pit, and swore that nobody would sit to hear such stuff. The poor frighted poetess (Mrs. Centlivre) begged him with tears to take it up again, which he did matteringly: and about the latter end of April the play was acted for the first time. There had been scarcely any thing mentioned of it in the town before it came out; but those who had heard of it, were told it was a silly thing written by a woman; that the players had no opinion of it, etc: and on the first day there was a very poor house, scarcely charged. Under these circumstances it cannot be supposed that the play appeared to much advantage; the audience only came there for want of another place to go to; but without any expectation of being much diverted. They were yawning at the beginning of it, but were agreeably surprised, more and more every act, till at last the house rung with as much applause as was possible to be given by so thin an audience. The next day there was a better house, and the third crowded for the benefit of the author, and so it continued till the thirteenth. To do justice to the author, it must be confessed, that although the language of it is very indifferent, and the plot mingled with some improbabilities, yet the amusing sprightliness of business, and the natural impertinence in the character of Marplot, make considerable amends for the above-mentioned deficiencies, and render it even to this hour an entertaining performance. The dumb scene of Sir George with Miranda, and the history of the garden gate, are both borrowed from Ben Jonson's comedy of The Devil's an Ass. This play was dedicated to Lord Somers. Sir Richard Steele, speaking of it, says, "The plot and the incidents are laid with that subtilty of spirit which is peculiar to females of wit, and is very seldom well performed by those of the other sex, in whom craft in love is an act of intention, and not, as with women, the effect of nature and instinct."

ACT I.

SCENE I.—The Park.

Enter SIR GEORGE AIRY, meeting CHARLES

Charles. HA! sir George Airy a birding thus early! What forbidden game rous'd you so soon? for no lawful occasion could invite a person of your figure abroad at such unfashionable hours<sup>1</sup>).

Sir G. There are some men, Charles, whom fortune has left free from inquietudes, who are diligently studious to find out ways and means to make themselves uneasy.

Charles. Is it possible that any thing in nature can ruffle the temper of a man whom the four seasons of the year compliment with as many thousand pounds; nay, and a father at rest with his ancestors?

<sup>1</sup>) The people of fashion in London, in order to avoid their aversion, mixing with persons of any other rank than their own, turn the night into day, and the day

into night; so that noon with them is generally early in the morning, and in their calculation of time, the words afternoon and night are entirely left out

Sir G. Why, there it is now! a man that wants money thinks none can be unhappy that has it; but my affairs are in such a whimsical posture that it will require a calculation of my nativity to find if my gold will relieve me or not.

Charles. Ha, ha, ha! never consult the stars about that; gold has a power beyond them. Then what can thy business be that gold won't serve thee in?

Sir G. Why I'm in love.

Charles. In love!—Ha, ha, ha, ha! in love!—Ha, ha, ha, ha! with what, pr'ythee? a cherub?

Sir G. No; with a woman.

Charles. A woman! good. Ha, ha, ha, ha! and gold not help thee?

Sir G. But suppose I'm in love with two—

Charles. Ay, if thou'rt in love with two hundred, gold will fetch 'em, I warrant thee, boy. But who are they? who are they? come.

Sir G. One is a lady whose face I never saw, but witty to a miracle; the other beautiful as Venus—

Charles. And a fool—

Sir G. For aught I know, for I never spoke to her; but you can inform me. I am charm'd by the wit of the one, and die for the beauty of the other.

Charles. And pray which are you in quest of now?

Sir G. I prefer the sensual pleasure; I'm for her I've seen, who is thy father's ward, Miranda.

Charles. Nay, then I pity you; for the Jew, my father, will no more part with her and thirty thousand pounds than he would with a guinea to keep me from starving.

Sir G. Now you see gold can't do every thing, Charles.

Charles. Yes; for 'tis her gold that bars my father's gate against you.

Sir G. Why, if he be this avaricious wretch, how cam'st thou by such a liberal education?

Charles. Not a souse out of his pocket, I assure you: I had an uncle who defray'd that charge; but for some little wildness of youth, though he made me his heir, left dad my guardian till I came to years of discretion, which I presume the old gentleman will never think I am; and now he has got the estate into his clutches, it does me no more good than if it lay in Prester John's<sup>1)</sup> dominions.

Sir G. What, canst thou find no stratagem to redeem it?

Charles. I have made many essays to no purpose; though want, the mistress of invention, still tempts me on, yet still the old fox is too cunning for me.—I am upon my last project, which if it fails, then for my last refuge, a brown musket.<sup>2)</sup>

Sir G. What is't? can I assist thee?

Charles. Not yet; when you can, I have confidence enough in you to ask it.

Sir G. I am always ready. But what does he intend to do with Miranda? Is she to be sold in private, or will he put her up by way of auction, at who bids most? If so, 'egad I'm for him; my gold, as you say, shall be subservient to my pleasure.

Charles. To deal ingenuously with you, sir George, I know very little of her or home; for since my uncle's death, and my return from travel, I have never been well with my father; he thinks my expenses too great, and I his allowance too little; he never sees me but he quarrels, and to avoid that I shun his house as much as possible. The report is he intends to marry her himself.

Sir G. Can she consent to it?

Charles. Yes, faith, so they say: but I tell you I am wholly ignorant of the matter. I fancy she plays the mother-in-law already, and sets the old gentleman on to do mischief.

Sir G. Then I have your free consent to get her?

Charles. Ay, and my helping hand, if occasion be.

Sir G. Poh! yonder's a fool coming this way; let's avoid him.

Charles. What, Marplot? No, no, he's my instrument; there's a thousand conveniences in him; he'll lend me his money when he has any, run of my errands, and be proud on it; in short, he'll pimp for me, lie for me, drink for me, do any thing but fight for me; and that I trust to my own arm for.

Sir G. Nay, then he's to be endured; I never knew his qualifications before.

Enter MARPLOT, with a Patch across his Face.

Mar. Dear Charles, yours—Ha! sir George Airy! the man in the world I have an ambition to be known to! [Aside] Give me thy hand, dear boy.

Charles. A good assurance! But harkye, how came your beautiful countenance clouded in the wrong place?

Mar. I must confess 'tis a little mal-a-propos; but no matter for that. A word with you, Charles. Pr'ythee introduce me to sir George—he is a man of wit, and I'd give ten guineas to—

Charles. When you have 'em, you mean.

Mar. Ay, when I have 'em; pugh, pox, you cut the thread of my discourse—I would give ten guineas, I say, to be rank'd in his acquaintance. But, pr'ythee, introduce me.

Charles. Well, on condition you'll give us a true account how you came by that mourning nose, I will.

Mar. I'll do it.

Charles. Sir George, here's a gentleman has a passionate desire to kiss your hand.

Sir G. Oh! I honour men of the sword! and I presume this gentleman is lately come from Spain or Portugal—by his scars.

Mar. No really, sir George, mine sprung from civil fury. Happening last night into the groom porter's—I had a strong inclination to go ten guineas with a sort of a, sort of a—kind of a milksop, as I thought. A pox of the dice! he flung out, and my pockets being empty, as Charles knows they often are, he proved a surly North Briton, and broke my face for my deficiency.

<sup>1)</sup> A certain priest of the name of John, is said to have travelled into the mountains of Thibet, and there to have founded the religion of Dalai Lama, sometime in the 11th century. A farther account is to be seen in the History of the Church.

Sir G. Ha, ha! and did not you draw?

Mar. Draw, sir! why I did but lay my hand upon my sword to make a swift retreat, and he roar'd out. Now the deed a ma sal, sir, gin ye touch yer steel I se whip mine through yer wem.<sup>1)</sup>

Sir G. Ha, ha, ha!

Charles. Ha, ha, ha, ha! Safe was the word. So you walk'd off, I suppose.

Mar. Yes, for I avoid fighting, purely to be serviceable to my friends, you know—

Sir G. Your friends are much obliged to you, sir: I hope you'll rank me in that number.

Mar. Sir George, a bow from the side-box,<sup>2)</sup> or to be seen in your chariot, binds me ever yours.

Sir G. Trifles; you may command 'em when you please.

Charles. Provided he may command you.

Mar. Me! why I live for no other purpose—Sir George, I have the honour to be caressed by most of the reigning toasts<sup>3)</sup> of the town: I'll tell 'em you are the finest gentleman—

Sir G. No, no, pr'ythee let me alone to tell the ladies—my parts—Can you convey a letter upon occasion, or deliver a message with an air of business, ha?

Mar. With the assurance of a page and the gravity of a statesman.

Sir G. You know Miranda?

Mar. What! my sister ward? why, her guardian is mine; we are fellow sufferers. Ah, he is a covetous, cheating, sanctified curmudgeon: that sir Francis Gripe is a damn'd old—hypocritical—

Charles. Hold, hold; I suppose, friend, you forget that he is my father.

Mar. I ask your pardon, Charles, but it is for your sake I hate him. Well, I say, the world is mistaken in him; his outside piety makes him every man's executor, and his inside cunning makes him every heir's gaoler. Egad, Charles, I'm half persuaded that thou'rt some ward too, and never of his getting—for never were two things so unlike as you and your father; he scrapes up every thing, and thou spend'st every thing; every body is indebted to him, and thou art indebted to every body.

Charles. You are very free, Mr. Marplot.

Mar. Ay, I give and take, Charles—you may be as free with me, you know.

Sir G. A pleasant fellow.

Charles. The dog is diverting sometimes, or there would be no enduring his impertinence. He is pressing to be employed, and willing to execute; but some ill fate generally attends all he undertakes, and he oftener spoils an intrigue than helps it.

Mar. I have always your good word, but if I miscarry 'tis none of my fault; I follow my instructions.

Charles. Yes, witness the merchant's wife.

Mar. Pish, pox! that was an accident.

1) Now the devil have my soul, sir, if ye touch your steel (sword) I will whip (thrust) mine through your wem (belly).

2) The side-box at the Theatre, where the English belles and beaux sport their best looks, and dresses.

3) Ladies who on account of their beauty (sometimes on account of their philanthropy) used to be toasted (to have their healths drunk), in all fashionable societies of gentlemen after dinner.

Sir G. What was it, pr'ythee?

Mar. Nay, Charles, now don't expose your friend.

Charles. Why, you must know I had lent a certain merchant my hunting horses, and was to have met his wife in his absence. Sending him along with my groom to make the compliment, and to deliver a letter to the lady at the same time, what does he do but gives the husband the letter and offers her the horses!

Mar. Why to be sure I did offer her the horses, and I remember you was even with me, for you denied the letter to be yours, and swore I had a design upon her, which my bones paid for.

Charles. Come, sir George, let's walk round if you are not engaged, for I have sent my man upon a little earnest business, and I have ordered him to bring me the answer into the Park.

Mar. Business! and I not know it! 'Egad I'll watch him. [Aside.]

Sir G. I must beg your pardon, Charles, I am to meet your father.

Charles. My father!

Sir G. Ay, and about the oddest bargain perhaps you ever heard of; but I'll not impart till I know the success.

Mar. What can his business be with sir Francis? Now would I give all the world to know it. Why the devil should not one know every man's concerns! [Aside.]

Charles. Prosperity to't, whate'er it be: I have private affairs too: over a bottle we'll compare notes.

Mar. Charles knows I love a glass as well as any man; I'll make one; shall it be to-night? I long to know their secrets. [Aside.]

Enter WHISPER.

Whis. Sir, sir, Mrs. Patch says Isabinda's Spanish father has quite spoiled the plot, and she can't meet you in the Park, but he infallibly will go out this afternoon, she says: but I must step again to know the hour.

Mar. What did Whisper say now? I shall go stark mad if I'm not let into the secret. [Aside.]

Charles. Curst misfortune!

Mar. Curst! what's curst, Charles?

Charles. Come along with me, my heart feels pleasure at her name. Sir George, yours; we'll meet at the old place, the usual hour.

Sir G. Agreed. I think I see sir Francis yonder. [Exit.]

Charles. Marplot, you must excuse me; I am engag'd. [Exit.]

Mar. Engag'd! 'Egad, I'll engage my life I'll know what your engagement is. [Exit.]

Mir. Let the chair wait. My servant that dogg'd sir George said he was in the Park.

Enter PATCH.

Ha! miss Patch alone! did not you tell me you had contrived a way to bring Isabinda to the Park?

Patch. Oh, madam, your ladyship can't imagine what wretched disappointment we have met with! Just as I had fetch'd a suit of my clothes for a disguise, comes my old master into his closet, which is right against her chamber door: this struck us into a terrible fright—at length I put on a grave face, and asked him if he was at leisure for his chocolate? in hopes to draw him out of his hole; but he snapp'd my nose off: "No, I shall be busy here these two hours." At which my poor mistress, seeing no way of escape, ordered me to wait on your ladyship with the sad relation.

Mir. Unhappy Isabinda! was ever any thing so unaccountable as the humour of sir Jealous Traffick?

Patch. Oh, madam, it's his living so long in Spain; he vows he'll spend half his estate but he'll be a parliament man, on purpose to bring in a bill for women to wear veils, and other odious Spanish customs—He swears it is the height of impudence to have a woman seen barefaced even at church, and scarce believes there's a true begotten child in the city.

Mir. Ha, ha, ha! how the old fool torments himself! Suppose he could introduce his rigid rules—does he think we could not match them in contrivance? No, no; let the tyrant man make what laws he will, if there's a woman under the government, I warrant she finds a way to break 'em. Is his mind set upon the Spaniard for his son-in-law still?

Patch. Ay, and he expects him by the next fleet, which drives his daughter to melancholy and despair. But, madam, I find you retain the same gay cheerful spirit you had when I waited on your ladyship.—My lady is mighty good-humoured too, and I have found a way to make sir Jealous believe I am wholly in his interest, when my real design is to serve her: he makes me her gaoler, and I set her at liberty.

Mir. I knew thy prolific brain would be of singular service to her, or I had not parted with thee to her father.

Patch. But, madam, the report is that you are going to marry your guardian.

Mir. It is necessary such a report should be, Patch.

Patch. But is it true, madam?

Mir. That's not absolutely necessary.

Patch. I thought it was only the old strain, coaxing him still for your own, and railing at all the young fellows about town: in my mind now you are as ill plagu'd with your guardian, madam, as my lady is with her father.

Mir. No, I have liberty, wench; that she wants: what would she give now to be in this dishabille in the open air, nay, more, in pursuit of the young fellow she likes? for that's my case, I assure you.

Patch. As for that, madam, she's even with you; for though she can't come abroad, we have a way to bring him home in spite of old Argus.

Mir. Now, Patch, your opinion of my choice, for here he comes—Ha! my guardian with him! what can be the meaning of this? I'm sure sir Francis can't know me in this dress.—Let's observe 'em. [They withdraw.]

Enter SIR FRANCIS GRIPE and SIR GEORGE AIRY.

Sir F. Verily, sir George, thou wilt repent throwing away thy money so, for I tell thee sincerely, Miranda, my charge, does not like a young fellow; they are all vicious, and seldom make good husbands: in sober sadness she cannot abide 'em.

Mir. [Peeping] In sober sadness you are mistaken.—What can this mean?

Sir G. Lookye, sir Francis, whether she can or cannot abide young fellows is not the business: will you take the fifty guineas?

Sir F. In good truth I will not—for I knew thy father, he was a hearty wary man, and I cannot consent that his son should squander away what he saved to no purpose.

Mir. [Peeping] Now, in the name of wonder, what bargain can he be driving about me for fifty guineas?

Sir G. Well, sir Francis, since you are so conscientious for my father's sake, then permit me the favour gratis.

Sir F. No verily; if thou dost not buy thy experience thou wilt never be wise; therefore give me a hundred and try thy fortune.

Sir G. The scruples arose, I find, from the scanty sum—Let me see—a hundred guineas—[Takes the Money out of a Purse, and chinks it] Ha! they have a very pretty sound, and a very pleasing look—But then, Miranda—but if she should be cruel—

Sir F. Ay, do consider on't. He, he, he!

Sir G. No, I'll do't. Come, to the point; here's the gold; sum up the conditions.—

[Sir Francis pulls out a Paper.]

Mir. [Peeping] Ay, for heaven's sake do, for my expectation is on the rack.

Sir F. Well, at your peril be it.

Sir G. Ay, ay, go on.

Sir F. Imprimis, you are to be admitted into my house in order to move your suit to Miranda, for the space of ten minutes, without let or molestation, provided I remain in the same room.

Sir G. But out of ear-shot.

Sir F. Well, well, I don't desire to hear what you say; ha, ha, ha! in consideration I am to have that purse and a hundred guineas.

Sir G. Take it. [Gives him the Purse] And this agreement is to be performed to-day.

Sir F. Ay, ay; the sooner the better. Poor fool! how Miranda and I shall laugh at him!

[Aside]—Well, sir George, ha, ha, ha! take the last sound of your guineas, ha, ha, ha!

[Chinks them. Exit.]

Mir. [Peeping] Sure he does not know I am Miranda.

Sir G. A very extraordinary bargain I have made, truly; if she should be really in love with this old cuff now—Pshaw! that's morally impossible.—But then, what hopes have I to succeed? I never spoke to her—

Mir. [Peeping] Say you so? then I am safe.

Sir G. What though my tongue never spoke, my eyes said a thousand things, and my hopes flattered me her's answer'd 'em. If I'm lucky—if not, it is but a hundred guineas thrown away. [Mir. comes forward.]

Mir. Upon what, sir George?

Sir G. Ha! my incognita—upon a woman, madam.

Mir. They are the worst things you can deal in, and damage the soonest; your very breath destroys 'em, and I fear you'll never see your return, sir George, ha, ha!

Sir G. Were they more brittle than china, and dropped to pieces with a touch, every atom of her I have ventur'd at, if she is but mistress of thy wit, balances ten times the sum.—Pr'ythee, let me see thy face.

Mir. By no means; that may spoil your opinion of my sense—

Sir G. Rather confirm it, madam.

Patch. So rob the lady of your gallantry, sir.

Sir G. No child, a dish of chocolate in the morning never spoils my dinner: the other lady I design for a set meal; so there's no danger.—

Mir. Matrimony! ha, ha, ha! what crimes have you committed against the god of love, that he should revenge 'em so severely, as to stamp husband on your forehead?

Sir G. For my folly, in having so often met you here without pursuing the laws of nature and exercising her command—But I resolve ere we part now to know who you are, where you live, what kind of flesh and blood your face is; therefore unmask, and don't put me to the trouble of doing it for you.

Mir. My face is the same flesh and blood with my hand, sir George; which if you'll be so rude to provoke—

Sir G. You'll apply it to my cheek—the ladies' favours are always welcome, but I must have that cloud withdrawn. [Taking hold of her] Remember you are in the Park, child; and what a terrible thing would it be to lose this pretty white hand!<sup>1)</sup>

Mir. And how will it sound in a chocolate-house, that sir George Airy rudely pulled off a lady's mask, when he had given her his honour that he never would, directly or indirectly, endeavour to know her till she gave him leave?

Sir G. But if that lady thinks fit to pursue and meet me at every turn, like some troubled spirit, shall I be blamed if I inquire into the reality? I would have nothing dissatisfied in a female shape.

Mir. What shall I do? [Pauses.]

Sir G. Ay, pr'ythee, consider, for thou shalt find me very much at thy service.

Patch. Suppose, sir, the lady should be in love with you.

Sir G. Oh! I'll return the obligation in a moment.

Patch. And marry her?

Sir G. Ha, ha, ha! that's not the way to love her, child.

Mir. If he discovers me I shall die—Which way shall I escape? let me see. [Pauses.]

Sir G. Well, madam—

Mir. I have it—Sir George, 'tis fit you should allow something; if you'll excuse my face, and turn your back (if you look upon me I shall sink, even masked as I am), I will confess why I have engaged you so often, who I am, and where I live.

Sir G. Well, to show you I am a man of honour, I accept the conditions: let me but once know those, and the face won't be long a secret to me.

Patch. What mean you, madam?

Mir. To get off.

Sir G. 'Tis something indecent to turn one's back upon a lady; but you command, and I obey. [Turns his back] Come, madam, begin—

Mir. First, then, it was my unhappy lot to see you at Paris [Draws back a little way, and speaks] at a ball upon a birth-day; your shape and air charm'd my eyes, your wit and complaisance my soul, and from that fatal night I lov'd you. [Drawing back.]

And when you left the place grief seiz'd me so, Nor rest my heart nor sleep my eyes could know;

Last I resolv'd a hazardous point to try, And quit the place in search of liberty.

[Exit, followed by Patch.]

Sir G. Excellent—I hope she's handsome—Well now, madam, to the two other things, your name, and where you live—I am a gentleman, and this confession will not be lost upon me—Nay, pr'ythee, don't weep, but go on, for I find my heart melts in thy behalf—Speak quickly, or I shall turn about—Not yet—Poor lady! she expects I should comfort her, and to do her justice, she has said enough to encourage me. [Turns about] Ha! gone! the devil! jilted! Why, what a tale she has invented—of Paris, balls, and birth-days!—Egad, I'd give ten guineas to know who the gipsy is—A curse of my folly—I deserve to lose her. What woman can forgive a man that turns his back!

The bold and resolute in love and war
To conquer take the right and swiftest way:
The boldest lover soonest gains the fair,
As courage makes the rudest force obey:
Take no denial, and the dames adore ye;
Closely pursue them, and they fall before ye.
[Exit.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—A Room in SIR FRANCIS GRIPE'S House.

Enter SIR FRANCIS GRIPE and MIRANDA.

Sir F. Ha, ha, ha, ha!

Mir. Ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha! Oh! I shall die with laughing—the most romantic adventure—Ha, ha, ha! What does the odious young fop mean? A hundred pieces to talk ten minutes with me! ha, ha, ha, ha!

Sir F. And I am to be by too, there's the jest; adad,<sup>1)</sup> if it had been in private I should not have car'd to trust the young dog.

Mir. Indeed and indeed but you might, Gardy—Now methinks there's nobody handsomer than you: so neat, so clean, so good-humoured, and so loving—

Sir F. Pretty rogue, pretty rogue! and so thou shalt find me, if thou dost prefer thy Gardy before these caperers of the age: thou shalt outshine the queen's box on an opera night; thou shalt be the envy of the ring<sup>2)</sup> (for I will carry thee to Hyde-park), and thy equipage shall surpass the—what d'ye call 'em ambassador's.

Mir. Nay, I am sure the discreet part of my sex will envy me more for the inside furniture, when you are in it, than my outside equipage.

Sir F. A cunning baggage, i'faith thou art, and a wise one too! and to show thee that

1) For "egad," softened from "by God."

2) The ring in Hyde-park, where the fashionables sport their fine carriages, horses, and liveries, in the spring; something like the Longchamps in Paris.

1) Alluding to a law which condemns a person to lose his hand, if he draw his sword in the park, it being within the precincts of the court. Sir George could easily stretch the meaning to using violence against any one.

thou hast not chose amiss, I'll this moment disinheret my son, and settle my whole estate upon thee.

Mir. There's an old rogue now. [Aside] No, Gardy, I would not have your name be so black in the world—You know my father's will runs that I am not to possess my estate, without your consent, till I am five-and-twenty; you shall only abate the odd seven years, and make me mistress of my estate to-day, and I'll make you master of my person to-morrow.

Sir F. Humph! that may not be safe—No, Chargy, I'll settle it upon thee for pin-money, and that will be every bit as well, thou know'st.

Mir. Unconscionable old wretch! bribe me with my own money!—Which way shall I get out of his hands? [Aside.

Sir F. Well, what art thou thinking on, my girl, ha? how to banter sir George?

Mir. I must not pretend to banter; he knows my tongue too well. [Aside] No, Gardy, I have thought of a way will confound him more than all I could say, if I should talk to him seven years.

Sir F. How's that? oh! I'm transported, I'm ravish'd, I'm mad—

Mir. It would make you mad if you knew all. [Aside] I'll not answer him a word, but be dumb to all he says.

Sir F. Dumb! good; ha, ha, ha! Excellent! ha, ha, ha, ha! I think I have you now, sir George. Dumb! he'll go distracted—well, she's the wittiest rogue.—Ha, ha, dumb! I can't but laugh, ha, ha! to think how damn'd mad he'll be when he finds he has given his money away for a dumb show! ha, ha, ha!

Mir. Nay, Gardy, if he did but know my thoughts of him it would make him ten times madder; ha, ha, ha, ha!

Sir F. Ay, so it would, Chargy, to hold him in such derision, to scorn to answer him, to be dumb; ha, ha, ha!

Enter CHARLES.

Sir F. How now, sirrah! who let you in?

Charles. My necessities, sir.

Sir F. Your necessities are very impertinent, and ought to have sent before they enter'd.

Charles. Sir, I knew 'twas a word would gain admittance no where.

Sir F. Then, sirrah, how durst you rudely thrust that upon your father, which nobody else would admit?

Charles. Sure the name of a son is a sufficient plea. I ask this lady's pardon, if I have intruded.

Sir F. Ay, ay, ask her pardon and her blessing too, if you expect any thing from me.

Mir. I believe yours, sir Francis, in a purse of guineas, would be more material. Your son may have business with you; I'll retire.

Sir F. I guess his business, but I'll dispatch him; I expect the knight every minute: you'll be in readiness?

Mir. Certainly. My expectation is more upon the wing than yours, old gentleman.

[Aside, and exit.

Sir F. Well, sir.

Charles. Nay, it is very ill, sir, my circumstances are, I'm sure.

Sir F. And what's that to me, sir? your management should have made 'em better.

Charles. If you please to intrust me with the management of my estate I shall endeavour it, sir.

Sir F. What, to set upon a card, and buy a lady's favour at the price of a thousand pieces, to rig out an equipage for a wench, or by your carelessness to enrich your steward, to fine for sheriff,<sup>1)</sup> or put up for a parliament man?

Charles. I hope I should not spend it this way: however I ask only for what my uncle left me; yours you may dispose of as you please, sir.

Sir F. That I shall, out of your reach, I assure you, sir. Adad, these young fellows think old men get estates for nothing but them to squander away in dicing, wenching, drinking, dressing, and so forth.

Charles. I think I was born a gentleman, sir; I'm sure my uncle bred me like one.

Sir F. From which you would infer, sir, that gaming and wenching are requisites for a gentleman.

Charles. Monstrous! when I would ask him only for a support he falls into these unmannerly reproaches. I must, though against my will, employ invention, and by stratagem relieve myself. [Aside.

Sir F. Sirrah, what is it you mutter, sirrah, ha? [Holds up his Cane] I say you shan't have a groat out of my hands till I please—and may be I'll never please; and what's that to you?

Charles. Nay, to be robb'd or have one's throat cut is not much—

Sir F. What's that, sirrah? would you rob me or cut my throat, you rogue?

Charles. Heaven forbid, sir!—I said no such thing.

Sir F. Mercy on me! what a plague it is to have a son of one-and-twenty, who wants to elbow one out of one's life to edge himself into the estate!

Enter MARPLOT.

Mar. 'Egad, he's here—I was afraid I had lost him: his secret could not be with his father; his wants are public there.—Guardian, your servant—O Charles, are you there? I know by that sorrowful countenance of thine, the old man's fist is as close as his strong box—But I'll help thee. [Aside.

Sir F. So! here's another extravagant coxcomb that will spend his fortune before he comes to't, but he shall pay swinging interest,<sup>2)</sup> and so let the fool go on.—Well, what does necessity bring you too, sir?

Mar. You have hit it, Guardian—I want a hundred pounds.

Sir F. For what?

Mar. Pugh! for a hundred things; I can't for my life tell you for what.

Charles. Sir, I suppose I have received all the answer I am like to have?

Mar. Oh, the devil! if he gets out before me I shall lose him again. [Aside.

1) All good substantial citizens are subject to be chosen as sheriff; but by paying a sum of money as fine, they are exempt from the fatigues of business, which would be too great now a days, besides it is very vulgar to have any sort of occupation.

2) Swinging sometimes means, great.

Sir F. Ay, sir, and you may be marching as soon as you please—I must see a change in your temper, ere you find one in mine.

Mar. Pray, sir, dispatch me; the money, sir; I'm in mighty haste.

Sir F. Fool, take this and go to the cashier. I shan't be long plagu'd with thee.

[Gives him a Note.]

Mar. Devil take the cashier! I shall certainly have Charles gone before I come back.

[Exit, running.]

Charles. Well, sir, I take my leave—but remember you expose an only son to all the miseries of wretched poverty, which too often lays the plan for scenes of mischief.

Sir F. Stay, Charles! I have a sudden thought come into my head, which may prove to thy advantage.

Charles. Ha! does he relent?

Sir F. My lady VVrinkle, worth forty thousand pounds, sets up for a handsome young husband; she prais'd thee t'other day; though the match-makers can get twenty guineas for a sight of her, I can introduce thee for nothing.

Charles. My lady VVrinkle, sir! why, she has but one eye.

[vagance, sir.]

Sir F. Then she'll see but half your extra-

Charles. Condemn me to such a piece of deformity! a toothless, dirty, wry-neck'd, hunch-back'd hag!

Sir F. Hunch-back'd! so much the better! then she has a rest for her misfortunes, for thou wilt load her swingingly. Now, I warrant, you think this is no offer of a father; forty thousand pounds is nothing with you.

Charles. Yes, sir, I think it is too much; a young beautiful woman with half the money would be more agreeable.—I thank you, sir; but you choose better for yourself, I find.

Sir F. Out of my doors, you dog! you pretend to meddle with my marriage, sirrah!

Charles. Sir, I obey you, but—

Sir F. But me no buts—be gone, sir! dare to ask me for money again—refuse forty thousand pounds! Out of my doors, I say, without reply.

[Exit Charles.]

Enter MARPLOT, running.

Mar. Ha! gone! is Charles gone, Gardy?

Sir F. Yes, and I desire your wise worship to walk after him.

Mar. Nay, 'egad I shall run, I tell you that. A pox of the cashier for detaining me so long! Where the devil shall I find him now? I shall certainly lose this secret, and I had rather by half lose my money—Where shall I find him now—D'ye know where Charles is gone, Gardy?

Sir F. Gone to the devil, and you may go after him.

Mar. Ay, that I will as fast as I can. [Going, returns] Have you any commands there, Gardy?

[Exit.]

Sir F. VVhat, is the fellow distracted?

Enter Servant.

Serv. Sir George Airy inquires for you, sir.

Sir F. Desire sir George to walk up.—

[Exit Servant].—Now for a trial of skill that will make me happy and him a fool. Ha, ha, ha! In my mind he looks like an ass already.

Enter SIR GEORGE AIRY.

Well, sir George, do you hold in the same mind, or would you capitulate? ha, ha, ha! Look, here are the guineas; [Chinks them] ha, ha, ha!

Sir G. Not if they were twice the sum, sir Francis; therefore be brief, call in the lady, and take your post.

Sir F. Agreed. Miranda! [Exit.]

Sir G. If she's a woman, and not seduc'd by witchcraft, to this old rogue, I'll make his heart ache; for if she has but one grain of inclination about her, I'll vary a thousand shapes but find it.

Re-enter SIR FRANCIS GRIPE and MIRANDA.

Sir G. So from the eastern chambers breaks the sun, dispels the clouds, and gilds the vales below.

[Salutes her.]

Sir F. Hold, sir; kissing was not in our agreement.

Sir G. Oh! that's by way of prologue, Pr'y-thee, old mammon, to thy post.

Sir F. [Takes out his Watch] Well, young Timon, 'tis now four exactly; ten minutes, remember, is your utmost limit; not a minute more.

[Retires to the Bottom of the Stage.]

Sir G. Madam, whether you'll excuse or blame my love, the author of this rash proceeding depends upon your pleasure, as also the life of your admirer; your sparkling eyes speak a heart susceptible of love; your vivacity a soul too delicate to admit the embraces of decayed mortality. Shake off this tyrant guardian's yoke; assume yourself, and dash his bold, aspiring hopes. The deity of his desires is avarice, a heretic in love, and ought to be banished by the queen of beauty. See, madam, a faithful servant kneels, and begs to be admitted in the number of your slaves.

[Miranda gives him her Hand to raise him.]

Sir F. [Running up] Hold, hold, hold! no palming; that's contrary to articles—

Sir G. 'Sdeath, sir, keep your distance, or I'll write another article in your guts.

[Lays his Hand to his Sword.]

Sir F. [Going back] A bloody-minded fellow!

Sir G. Not answer me! perhaps she thinks my address too grave: I'll be more free. [Aside] Can you be so unconscionable, madam, to let me say all these fine things to you without one single compliment in return?

Sir F. [Running up with his Watch in his Hand] There's five of the ten minutes gone, sir George—Adad, I don't like those close conferences—

Sir G. More interruptions—you will have it, sir!

[Lays his Hand to his Sword.]

Sir F. [Going back] No, no; you shan't have her neither.

[Aside.]

Sir G. Dumb still—sure this old dog has enjoin'd her silence. I'll try another way. [Aside] Madam, these few minutes cost me an hundred pounds—and would you answer me, I could purchase the whole day so. However, madam, you must give me leave to make the best interpretation I can for my money, and take the indication of your silence for the secret liking of my person; therefore, madam, I will instruct you how to keep your word inviolate to sir Francis, and yet answer me to every question: as for example, when

I ask any thing to which you would reply in the affirmative, gently nod your head thus, [Nods] and when in the negative, thus, [Shakes his Head] and in the doubtful, a tender sigh thus. [Sighs.

Mir. How every action charms me—but I'll fit him for signs, I warrant him. [Aside.

Sir G. Was it by his desire that you are dumb, madam, to all I can say? [Miranda nods] Very well, she's tractable, I find! [Aside] And is it possible that you can love him? [Miranda nods] Miraculous! Pardon the bluntness of my questions, for my time is short. May I not hope to supplant him in your esteem? [Miranda sighs] Good! she answers me as I could wish. [Aside] You'll not consent to marry him then? [Miranda sighs] How! doubtful in that?—Undone again—humph! but that may proceed from his power to keep her out of her estate 'till twenty-five: I'll try that. [Aside] Come, madam, I cannot think you hesitate in this affair out of any motive but your fortune—let him keep it till those few years are expired; make me happy with your person, let him enjoy your wealth. [Miranda holds up her Hands] Why, what sign is that now? Nay, nay, madam, except you observe my lesson I can't understand your meaning.

Sir F. What a vengeance! are they talking by signs? 'Ad, I may be fool'd here. [Aside] What do you mean, sir George?

Sir G. To cut your throat, if you dare mutter another syllable.

Sir F. 'Od, I wish he were fairly out of my house. [Aside.

Sir G. Pray, madam, will you answer me to the purpose? [Miranda shakes her Head, and points to Sir Francis] What does she mean? She won't answer me to the purpose, or is she afraid you' old cuff should understand her signs?—ay, it must be that. [Aside] I perceive, madam, you are too apprehensive of the promise you have made to follow my rules, therefore I'll suppose your mind, and answer for you. —First for myself, madam; "that I am in love with you is an infallible truth." Now for you. [Turns on her Side] "Indeed, sir! and may I believe it?"—"As certainly, madam, as that 'tis daylight, or that I die if you persist in silence."—"Bless me with the music of your voice, and raise my spirits to their proper heaven. Thus low let me entreat ere I'm obliged to quit this place; grant me some token of a favourable reception to keep my hopes alive." [Arises hastily, and turns on her Side] "Rise, sir, and since my guardian's presence will not allow me privilege of tongue, read that, and rest assur'd you are not indifferent to me." [Offers her a Letter, she strikes it down] Ha, right woman! but no matter; I'll go on.

Sir F. Ha! what's that? a letter! — Ha, ha, ha! thou art balk'd.

Sir G. Ha! a letter! oh! let me kiss it with the same raptures that I would do the dear hand that touch'd it. [Opens it] Now for a quick fancy, and a long extempore.

Sir F. [Coming up hastily] The time is expired, sir, and you must take your leave. There, my girl, there's the hundred pounds which thou hast won. Go; I'll be with you presently; ha, ha, ha, ha! [Exit Miranda.

Sir G. Adsheart, madam, you won't leave me just in the nick, <sup>1)</sup> will you?

Sir F. Ha, ha, ha! she has nick'd you, sir George, I think! ha, ha, ha! Have you any more hundred pounds to throw away upon courtship? ha, ha, ha!

Sir G. He, he, he, he! A curse of your fleeing jests!—Yet, however ill I succeeded, I'll venture the same wager she does not value thee a spoonful of snuff—nay more, though you enjoin'd her silence to me, you'll never make her speak to the purpose with yourself.

Sir F. Ha, ha, ha! Did I not tell thee thou wouldst repent thy money? Did I not say she hated young fellows? ha, ha, ha!

Sir G. And I'm positive she's not in love with age.

Sir F. Ha, ha, ha! no matter for that, ha, ha! She's not taken with your youth, nor your rhetoric to boot; ha, ha!

Sir G. Whate'er her reasons are for disliking of me, I am certain she can be taken with nothing about thee.

Sir F. Ha, ha, ha! how he swells with envy—Poor man! poor man! ha, ha, ha! I must beg your pardon, sir George; Miranda will be impatient to have her share of mirth. Verily we shall laugh at thee most egregiously; ha, ha, ha!

Sir G. With all my heart, faith—I shall laugh in my turn too—for if you dare marry her, old Belzebub, you will be cuckolded most egregiously; remember that, and tremble.

[Exeunt.

SCENE II.—SIR JEALOUS TRAFFICK'S House.

Enter SIR JEALOUS TRAFFICK, ISABINDA, and PATCH, following.

Sir J. What, in the balcony again, notwithstanding my positive commands to the contrary?—Why don't you write a bill on your forehead to show passengers there's something to be let?

Isa. What harm can there be in a little fresh air, sir?

Sir J. Is your constitution so hot, mistress, that it wants cooling, ha? Apply the virtuous Spanish rules; banish your taste and thoughts of flesh, feed upon roots, and quench your thirst with water.

Isa. That, and a close room, would certainly make me die of the vapours.

Sir J. No, mistress, 'tis your high-fed, lusty, rambling, rampant ladies—that are troubled with the vapours: 'tis your ratafia, persico, cinnamon, citron, and spirit of clara, cause such swimming in the brain, that carries many a guinea full tide to the doctor: but you are not to be bred this way: no galloping abroad, no receiving visits at home, for in our loose country the women are as dangerous as the men.

Patch. So I told her, sir, and that it was not decent to be seen in a balcony—but she threatened to slap my chops, and told me I was her servant, not her governess.

Sir J. Did she so? but I'll make her to know that you are her duenna. Oh, that incomparable custom of Spain! Why, here's no depending upon old women in my country —for they are as wanton at eighty as a girl of eighteen; and a man may as safely trust to Asgil's translation, as to his great grandmother's not marrying again.

Isa. Or to the Spanish ladies' veils and duennas for the safeguard of their honour.

Sir J. Dare to ridicule the cautious conduct of that wise nation, and I'll have you lock'd up this fortnight, without a peep-hole.

Isa. If we had but the ghostly helps in England which they have in Spain, I might deceive you if you did—let me tell you, sir, confinement sharpens the invention, as want of sight strengthens the other senses, and is often more pernicious than the recreation that innocent liberty allows.

Sir J. Say you so, mistress! who the devil taught you the art of reasoning? I assure you they must have a greater faith than I pretend to, that can think any woman innocent who requires liberty; therefore, Patch, to your charge I give her; lock her up till I come back from 'Change. I shall have some sauntering coxcomb, with nothing but a red coat and a feather, think by leaping into her arms to leap into my estate—but I'll prevent them; she shall be only signior Babinetto's.

Patch. Really, sir, I wish you would employ any body else in this affair; I lead a life like a dog in obeying your commands. Come, madam, will you be locked up?

Isa. Ay, to enjoy more freedom than he is aware of.

[Aside. Exit with Patch.]

Sir J. I believe this wench is very true to my interest: I am happy I met with her, if I can but keep my daughter from being blown upon till signior Babinetto arrives, who shall marry her as soon as he comes, and carry her to Spain as soon as he has married her. She has a pregnant wit, and I'd no more have her an English wife than the grand signior's mistress.

[Exit.]

SCENE III.—Outside of SIR JEALOUS TRAFFICK'S House.

Enter WHISPER.

Whis. So, there goes sir Jealous: where shall I find Mrs. Patch, now?

Enter PATCH.

Patch. Oh, Mr. Whisper! my lady saw you out of the window, and order'd me to bid you fly and let your master know she's now alone.

Whis. Hush! speak softly! I go, I go! But harkye, Mrs. Patch, shall not you and I have a little confabulation, when my master and your lady are engag'd?

Patch. Ay, ay; farewell.

[Goes in and shuts the Door. Whisper peeps after her through the Key-hole.]

Re-enter SIR JEALOUS TRAFFICK, meeting WHISPER.

Sir J. Sure, whilst I was talking with Mr. Tradewell, I heard my door clap. [Seeing Whisper] Ha! a man lurking about my house! Who do you want there, sir?

Whis. Want—want—a pox! Sir Jealous! What must I say now?

[Aside.]

Sir J. Ay, want! Have you a letter or message for any body there?—O'my conscience this is some he baw'd—

Whis. Letter or message, sir?

Sir J. Ay, letter or message, sir?

Whis. No, not I, sir.

Sir J. Sirrah, sirrah! I'll have you set in the stocks<sup>1</sup>) if you don't tell your business immediately.

Whis. Nay, sir, my business—is no great matter of business neither, and yet 'tis business of consequence too.

Sir J. Sirrah, don't trifle with me.

Whis. Trifle, sir! have you found him, sir?

Sir J. Found what, you rascal?

Whis. Why, Trifle is the very lapdog my lady lost, sir; I fancied I saw him run into this house. I'm glad you have him—Sir, my lady will be overjoy'd that I have found him.

Sir J. Who is your lady, friend?

Whis. My lady Lovepuppy, sir.

Sir J. My lady Lovepuppy, sir! then pr'ythee carry thyself to her, for I know of no other whelp that belongs to her; and let me catch you no more puppy-hunting about my doors, lest I have you press'd into the service, sirrah.

Whis. By no means, sir—Your humble servant.—I must watch whether he goes or no before I can tell my master. [Aside. Exit.]

Sir J. This fellow has the officious leer of a pimp, and I half suspect a design; but I'll be upon them before they think on me, I warrant 'em.

[Exit.]

SCENE IV.—CHARLES'S Lodgings.

Enter CHARLES and MARPLOT.

Charles. Honest Marplot, I thank thee for this supply. I expect my lawyer with a thousand pounds I have ordered him to take up, and then you shall be repaid.

Mar. Pho, pho! no more of that. Here comes sir George Airy, cursedly out of humour at his disappointment. See how he looks! ha, ha, ha!

Enter SIR GEORGE AIRY.

Sir G. Ah, Charles! I am so humbled in my pretensions to plots upon women, that I believe I shall never have courage enough to attempt a chambermaid again—I'll tell thee—

Charles. Ha, ha! I'll spare you the relation by telling you—Impatient to know your business with my father, when I saw you enter I slipp'd back into the next room, where I overheard every syllable.

Mar. Did you, Charles? I wish I had been with you.

Sir G. That I said—but I'll be hang'd if you heard her answer—But pr'ythee tell me, Charles, is she a fool?

Charles. I never suspected her for one; but Marplot can inform you better, if you'll allow him a judge.

Mar. A fool! I'll justify she has more wit than all the rest of her sex put together. Why, she'll rally me till I han't a word to say for myself.

1) The stocks are now the punishment of the poor country-fellows for getting tipsy, swearing etc. towns and cities are too refined for these things, and now the tread-mill generally employs the wicked. It would seem as if these inventions came from China, if we are to believe Goldsmith's geography.

Charles. A mighty proof of her wit, truly—

Mar. There must be some trick in't, sir George; 'egad, I'll find it out, if it cost me the sum you paid for't.

Sir G. Do, and command me—

Mar. Enough; let me alone to trace a secret—

Enter WHISPER, and speaks aside to his Master.

The devil! he here again! damn that fellow, he never speaks out. Is this the same, or a new secret? [Aside] You may speak out, here are none but friends.

Charles. Pardon me, Marplot, 'tis a secret.

Mar. A secret! ay, or ecod<sup>1)</sup> I would not give a farthing for it. Sir George, won't you ask Charles what news Whisper brings?

Sir G. Not I, sir; I suppose it does not relate to me.

Mar. Lord, Lord! how little curiosity some people have! Now my chief pleasure is in knowing every body's business.

Sir G. I fancy, Charles, thou hast some engagement upon thy hands?

Mar. Have you, Charles?

Sir G. I have a little business too.

Mar. Have you, sir George?

Sir G. Marplot, if it falls in your way to bring me any intelligence from Miranda, you'll find me at the Thatch'd-house at six—

Mar. You do me much honour.

Charles. You guess right, sir George; wish me success.

Sir G. Better than attended me. Adieu. [Exit]

Charles. Marplot, you must excuse me—

Mar. Nay, nay; what need of any excuse amongst friends? I'll go with you.

Charles. Indeed you must not.

Mar. No! then I suppose 'tis a duel; and I will go to secure you.

Charles. Well, but 'tis no duel, consequently no danger; therefore pr'ythee be answer'd.

Mar. What, is't a mistress then?—Mum—you know I can be silent upon occasion.

Charles. I wish you could be civil too: I tell you, you neither must nor shall go with me. Farewell. [Exit]

Mar. Why then—I must and will follow you. [Exit]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—A Street.

Enter CHARLES.

Charles. Well, here's the house which holds the lovely prize, quiet and serene: here no noisy footmen throng to tell the world that beauty dwells within, no ceremonious visit makes the lover wait, no rival to give my heart a pang. Who would not scale the window at midnight without fear of the jealous father's pistol, rather than fill up the train of a coquette, where every minute he is jostled out of place? [Knocks softly] Mrs. Patch! Mrs. Patch!

Enter PATCH.

Patch. Oh, are you come, sir? All's safe.

Charles. So in, in then. [They go in.]

Enter MARPLOT.

Mar. There he goes! Who the devil lives

here? Except I find out that, I am as far from knowing his business as ever. 'Gad, I'll watch; it may be a bawdy-house, and he may have his throat cut. If there should be any mischief, I can make oath he went in. Well, Charles, in spite of your endeavours to keep me out of the secret, I may save your life for aught I know. At that corner I'll plant myself; there I shall see whoever goes in or comes out. 'Gad, I love discoveries. [Exit]

SCENE II.—A Chamber in the House of SIR JEALOUS TRAFFICK.

CHARLES, ISABINDA, and PATCH discovered.

Isa. Patch, look out sharp; have a care of dad<sup>1)</sup>.

Patch. I warrant you.

Isa. Well, sir, if I may judge your love by your courage, I ought to believe you sincere; for you venture into the lion's den when you come to see me.

Charles. If you'll consent whilst the furious beast is abroad, I'd free you from the reach of his paws.

Isa. That would be but to avoid one danger by running into another, like poor wretches who fly the burning ship, and meet their fate in the water. Come, come, Charles, I fear, if I consult my reason, confinement and plenty is better than liberty and starving. I know you would make the frolic pleasing for a little time, by saying and doing a world of tender things; but when our small substance is exhausted, and a thousand requisites for life are wanting, love, who rarely dwells with poverty, would also fail us.

Charles. Faith, I fancy not; methinks my heart has laid up a stock will last for life, to back which I have taken a thousand pounds upon my uncle's estate; that surely will support us till one of our fathers relent.

Isa. There's no trusting to that, my friend; I doubt your father will carry his humour to the grave, and mine till he sees me settled in Spain.

Charles. And can you then cruelly resolve to stay till that curs'd don arrives, and suffer that youth, beauty, fire, and wit to be sacrific'd to the arms of a dull Spaniard, to be immured, and forbid the sight of any thing that's human?

Isa. No; when it comes to that extremity, and no stratagem can relieve us, thou shalt list for a soldier, and I'll carry thy knapsack after thee.

Charles. Bravely resolv'd! the world cannot be more savage than our parents, and fortune generally assists the bold, therefore consent now: why should she put it to a future hazard? who knows when we shall have another opportunity?

Isa. Oh, you have your ladder of ropes, I suppose, and the closet window stands just where it did; and if you han't forgot to write in characters, Patch will find a way for our assignments. Thus much of the Spanish contrivance my father's severity has taught me; I thank him: though I hate the nation, I admire their management in these affairs.

Enter PATCH.

Patch. Oh, madam! I see my master coming up the street.

Charles. Oh, the devil! 'would I had my ladder now! I thought you had not expected him till night. Why, why, why, why, what shall I do, madam?

Isa. Oh! for heaven's sake, don't go that way; you'll meet him full in the teeth. Oh, unlucky moment!

Charles. 'Adasheart! can you shut me into no cupboard, nor ram me into a chest, ha?

Patch. Impossible, sir; he searches every hole in the house.

Isa. Undone for ever! If he sees you I shall never see you more.

Patch. I have thought on it; run you to your chamber, madam; and, sir, come you along with me; I'm certain you may easily get down from the balcony.

Charles. My life! adieu—Lead on, guide, [Exeunt Patch and Charles.]

Isa. Heavens preserve him. [Exit.]

SCENE III.—The Street.

Enter SIR JEALOUS TRAFFICK, followed by MARPLOT.

Sir J. I don't know what's the matter, but I have a strong suspicion all is not right within; that fellow's sauntering about my door, and his tale of a puppy, had the face of a lie, methought. By St. Jago, If I should find a man in the house I'd make mince-meat of him—

Mar. Mince-meat! Ah, poor Charles! how I sweat for thee! 'Egad, he's old—I fancy I might bully him, and make Charles have an opinion of my courage. 'Egad, I'll pluck up, and have a touch with him.

Sir J. My own key shall let me in; I'll give them no warning. [Feeling for his Key.]

Mar. What's that you say, sir?

[Going up to Sir Jealous.]

Sir J. What's that to you, sir?

[Turns quick upon him.]

Mar. Yes, 'tis to me, sir; for the gentleman you threaten is a very honest gentleman. Look to't; for if he comes not as safe out of your house as he went in—

Sir J. What, is he in then?

Mar. Yes, sir, he is in then; and I say if he does not come out, I have half a dozen myrmidons hard by shall beat your house about your ears.

Sir J. Ah! a combination to undo me—I'll myrmidon you, ye dog, you—Thieves! thieves!

[Beats Marplot.]

Mar. Murder, murder! I was not in your house, sir.

Enter Servant.

Serv. What's the matter, sir?

Sir J. The matter, rascal! you have let a man into my house; but I'll slay him alive. Follow me; I'll not leave a mouse-hole unsearch'd. If I find him, by St. Jago, I'll equip him for the opera<sup>1)</sup>.

Mar. A deuce of his cane! there's no trusting to age—What shall I do to relieve Charles? 'Egad, I'll raise the neighbourhood. —Murder! murder!—[Charles drops down upon him from the Balcony] Charles! faith, I'm glad to see thee safe out, with all my heart!

Charles. A pox of your bawling! how the devil came you here?

Mar. 'Egad, it's very well for you that I was here; I have done you a piece of service: I told the old thunderbolt that the gentleman that was gone in was—

Charles. Was it you that told him, sir? [Laying hold of him] 'Sdeath! I could crush thee into atoms. [Exit.]

Mar. What! will you choke me for my kindness?—Will my inquiring soul never leave searching into other people's affairs till it gets squeez'd out of my body? I dare not follow him now for my blood, he's in such a passion.—I'll go to Miranda; if I can discover aught that may oblige sir George, it may be a means to reconcile me again to Charles.

Sir J. [Within] Look about! search, find him out!

Mar. Oh, the devil! there's old Crabstick again. [Exit.]

SCENE IV.—A Hall in the House of SIR JEALOUS TRAFFICK.

Enter SIR JEALOUS TRAFFICK and his Servants.

Sir J. Are you sure you have search'd every where?

Serv. Yes, from the top of the house to the bottom.

Sir J. Under the beds and over the beds?

Serv. Yes, and in them too, but found nobody, sir.

Sir J. Why, what could this rogue mean?

Enter ISABINDA and PATCH.

Patch. Take courage, madam; I saw him safe out. [Aside to Isabinda.]

Isa. Bless me! what's the matter, sir?

Sir J. You know best—Pray where's the man that was here just now?

Isa. What man, sir? I saw none.

Patch. Nor I, by the trust you repose in me. Do you think I would let a man come within these doors when you are absent?

Sir J. Ah, Patch! she may be too cunning for thy honesty: the very scout that he had set to give warning discovered it to me—and threatened me with half a dozen myrmidons—but I think I maul'd the villain. These afflictions you draw upon me, mistress.

Isa. Pardon me, sir, 'tis your own ridiculous humour draws you into these vexations, and gives every fool pretence to banter you.

Sir J. No, 'tis your idle conduct, your coquettish flirting into the balcony—Oh! with what joy shall I resign thee into the arms of don Diego Babinetto!

Isa. And with what industry shall I avoid him. [Aside.]

Sir J. Certainly that rogue had a message from somebody or other, but being balk'd by my coming popp'd that sham<sup>1)</sup> upon me.

<sup>1)</sup> This is one of those elegant expressions which comes under the denomination of slang, or flash; the language of the fashionables in London, the gentlemen boxers, pick-pockets, and murderers, as also of the lowest vulgar. This language is rendered immortal by Mr. Egan in his "Life in London," and description of fights in the Observer news-paper. This slang has been so much

Come along, ye sots, let's see if we can find the dog again. Patch, lock her up, d'ye hear?

[Exeunt Sir Jealous and Servants.]

Patch. Yes, sir—Ay, walk till your heels ache, you'll find nobody, I promise you.

Isa. Who could that scout be he talks of?

Patch. Nay, I can't imagine, without it was Whisper.

Isa. Well, dear Patch! let's employ all our thoughts how to escape this horrid don Diego; my very heart sinks at his terrible name.

Patch. Fear not, madam; don Carlo shall be the man, or I'll lose the reputation of contriving; and then what's a chambermaid good for?

[Exeunt.]

SCENE V.—SIR FRANCIS GRIPE'S House.

Enter SIR FRANCIS GRIPE and MIRANDA.

Mir. Well, Gardy, how did I perform the dumb scene.

Sir F. To admiration—Thou dear little rogue! let me buss thee for it: nay, adad I will, Chargy, so muzzle, and tuzzle, and hug thee; I will, i'faith, I will.

[Hugging and kissing her.]

Mir. Nay, Gardy, don't be so lavish. Who would ride post when the journey lasts for life?

Sir F. Oh, I'm transported! When, when, my dear! wilt thou convince the world of the happy day? when shall we marry, ha?

Mir. There's nothing wanting but your consent, sir Francis.

Sir F. My consent! what does my charmer mean?

Mir. Nay, 'tis only a whim; but I'll have every thing according to form—therefore when you sign an authentic paper, drawn up by an able lawyer, that I have your leave to marry, the next day makes me yours, Gardy.

Sir F. Ha, ha, ha! a whim indeed! why, is it not demonstration I give my leave when I marry thee?

Mir. Not for your reputation, Gardy; the malicious world will be apt to say you trick me into marriage, and so take the merit from my choice: now I will have the act my own, to let the idle fops see how much I prefer a man loaded with years and wisdom.

Sir F. Humph! Pr'ythee leave out years, Chargy! I'm not so old, as thou shalt find. Adad, I'm young: there's a caper for ye! [Jumps.]

Mir. Oh, never excuse it; why I like you the better for being old—but I shall suspect you don't love me if you refuse me this formality.

Sir F. Not love thee, Chargy! Adad, I do love thee better than, than, than, better than—what shall I say? 'egad, better than money; i'faith I do—

Mir. That's false, I'm sure. [Aside] To prove it do this then.

Sir F. Well, I will do it, Chargy, provided I bring a licence at the same time.

used of late in London, that it is very difficult to understand the conversation of gentlemen without some knowledge of it; and thus the country gentleman is often at a loss in London. Mixed with a number of expressions the most vile and abominable that ever could be used, there are some highly poetical ones. The language itself is famous for Onomatopoeia, such as, flimsy for a bank-note; and it is derived from all the known languages in the world, enriched with sea-terms, and expressions from Botany-bay, etc. To pop a sham, means, to deceive by false pretences

Mir. Ay, and a parson too, if you please. Ha, ha, ha! I can't help laughing to think how all the young coxcombs about town will be mortified when they hear of our marriage.

Sir F. So they will, so they will! ha, ha, ha!

Mir. Well, I fancy I shall be so happy with my Gardy—

Sir F. If wearing pearls and jewels, or eating gold, as the old saying is, can make thee happy, thou shalt be so, my sweetest, my lovely, my charming, my—verily I know not what to call thee.

Mir. You must know, Gardy, that I am so eager to have this business concluded, that I have employed my woman's brother, who is a lawyer in the Temple, to settle matters just to your liking; you are to give your consent to my marriage, which is to yourself you know: but, mum, you must take no notice of that. So then I will, that is, with your leave, put my writings into his hands; then to-morrow we come slap<sup>1)</sup> upon them with a wedding that nobody thought on, by which you seize me and my estate, and I suppose make a bonfire of your own act and deed.

Sir F. Nay but, Chargy, if—

Mir. Nay, Gardy, no ifs.—Have I refus'd three northern lords, two British peers, and half a score knights, to have put in your ifs?

Sir F. So thou hast indeed, and I will trust to thy management. 'Od, I'm all of a fire.

Mir. 'Tis a wonder the dry stubble does not blaze.

[Aside.]

Enter MARPLOT.

Sir F. How now, who sent for you, sir? What is the hundred pounds gone already?

Mar. No, sir; I don't want money now, Gardy.

Sir F. No, that's a miracle! but there's one thing you want, I'm sure.

Mar. Ay, what's that?

Sir F. Manners! What, had I no servants without?

Mar. None that could do my business, guardian, which is at present with this lady.

Mir. With me, Mr. Marplot? what is it, I beseech you?

Sir F. Ay, sir, what is it? any thing that relates to her, may be delivered to me.

Mar. I deny that.

Mir. That's more than I do, sir.

Mar. Indeed, madam! Why then to proceed: Fame says, you know best whether she tells truth or not, that you and my most conscientious guardian here design'd, contriv'd, plotted, and agreed to chouse a very civil, honest, honourable gentleman out of a hundred pounds: guilty or not?

Mir. That I contriv'd it!

Mar. Ay, you—you said never a word against it; so far you are guilty.

Sir F. Pray tell that civil, honest, honourable gentleman, that if he has any more such sums to fool away, they shall be received like the last; ha, ha, ha! Chous'd, quotha! But, harkye, let him know at the same time, that if he dare to report I trick'd him of it, I shall recommend a lawyer to him, who shall show him a trick for twice as much<sup>2)</sup>. D'ye hear? tell him that.

<sup>2)</sup> Slang; to show a trick for twice as much, or a trick worth two, which is the most general expression, means to be an over-match for a person.

Mar. So, and this is the way you use a gentleman, and my friend!

Mir. Is the wretch thy friend?

Mar. The wretch! lookye, madam, don't call names; 'egad, I won't take it.

Mir. Why, you won't beat me, will you? Ha, ha!

Mar. I don't know whether I will or no.

Sir F. Sir, I shall make a servant show you out at the window if you are saucy.

Mar. I am your most humble servant, guardian; I design to go out the same way I came in. I would only ask this lady one question. Don't you think he's a fine gentleman?

Sir F. Who's a fine gentleman?

Mar. Not you, Gardy, not you! Don't you think, in your soul, that sir George Airy is a very fine gentleman?

Mir. He dresses well.

Sir F. Which is chiefly owing to his tailor and valet de chambre.

Mar. Well! and who is your dress owing to, ha? There's a beau, ma'am—do but look at him!

Sir F. Sirrah!

Mir. And if being a beau be a proof of his being a fine gentleman, he may be so.

Mar. He may be so! Why, ma'am, the judicious part of the world allow him wit, courage, gallantry, ay, and economy too, though I think he forfeited that character when he flung away a hundred pounds upon your dumb ladyship.

Sir F. Does that gall him? Ha, ha, ha!

Mir. So, sir George, remaining in deep discontent, has sent you, his trusty squire, to utter his complaint. Ha, ha, ha!

Mar. Yes, madam! and you, like a cruel hard-hearted Jew, value it no more—than I would your ladyship, were I sir George; you you, you—

Mir. Oh, don't call names: I know you love to be employed, and I'll oblige you, and you shall carry him a message from me.

Mar. According as I like it. What is it?

Mir. Nay, a kind one, you may be sure—First, tell him I have chose this gentleman, to have and to hold<sup>1)</sup> and so forth.

[Taking the Hand of Sir F.

Mar. Much good may he do you!

Sir F. Oh, the dear rogue! how I dote on her! [Aside.

Mir. And advise his impertinence to trouble me no more, for I prefer sir Francis for a husband before all the fops in the universe.

Mar. Oh Lord, oh Lord! she's bewitched, that's certain. Here's a husband for eighteen—here's a tit-bit for a young lady—here's a shape, an air, and a grace—here's bones rattling in a leathern bag—[Turning Sir Francis about] here's buckram and canvass to scrub you to repentance.

Sir F. Sirrah, my cane shall teach you repentance presently.

Mar. No, faith, I have felt its twin brother from just such a wither'd hand too lately.

Mir. One thing more; advise him to keep from the garden-gate on the left hand, for if he dare to saunter there, about the hour of eight, as he us'd to do, he shall be saluted with a pistol or a blunderbuss.

Sir F. Oh, monstrous! Why, Chargy, did he use to come to the garden-gate?

Mir. The gardener describ'd just such another man that always watch'd his coming out, and fain would have brib'd him for his entrance—Tell him he shall find a warm reception if he comes this night.

Mar. Pistols and blunderbusses! 'Egad, a warm reception indeed! I shall take care to inform him of your kindness, and advise him to keep further off.

Mir. I hope he will understand my meaning better than to follow your advice. [Aside.

Sir F. Thou hast sign'd, seal'd and taken possession of my heart for ever, Chargy, ha, ha, ha! and for you, Mr. Saucebox, let me have no more of your messages, if ever you design to inherit your estate, gentleman.

Mar. Why, there 'tis now. Sure I shall be out of your clutches one day—Well, guardian, I say no more: but if you be not as arant a cuckold as e'er drove bargain upon the Exchange, or paid attendance to a court, I am the son of a whetstone; and so your humble servant.

Mir. Mr. Marplot, don't forget the message: ha, ha, ha, ha!

Mar. Nang, nang, nang! [Exit.

Sir F. I am so provok'd—'tis well he's gone.

Mir. Oh, mind him not, Gardy, but let's sign articles, and then—

Sir F. And then—Adad, I believe I am metamorphos'd, my pulse beats high, and my blood boils, methinks— [Kissing and hugging her.

Mir. Oh, fie, Gardy! be not so violent: consider the market lasts all the year.—Well, I'll in, and see if the lawyer be come: you'll follow. [Exit.

Sir F. Ay, to the world's end, my dear! Well, Frank, thou art a lucky fellow in thy old age to have such a delicate morsel, and thirty thousand pounds, in love with thee. I shall be the envy of bachelors, the glory of married men, and the wonder of the town. Some guardians would be glad to compound for part of the estate at dispatching an heiress, but I engross the whole. O! mihi praeteritos referet si Jupiter annos. [Exit.

SCENE VI.—A Tavern.

SIR GEORGE AIRY and CHARLES discovered, with Wine, Pens, Ink, and Paper on the Table. WHISPER waiting.

Sir G. Nay, pr'ythee, don't be grave, Charles: misfortunes will happen. Ha, ha, ha! 'tis some comfort to have a companion in our sufferings.

Charles. I am only apprehensive for Isabinda; her father's humour is implacable; and how far his jealousy may transport him to her undoing, shocks my soul to think.

Sir G. But since you escap'd undiscover'd by him, his rage will quickly lash into a calm, never fear it.

Charles. But who knows what that unlucky dog, Marplot, told him; nor can I imagine what brought him thither: that fellow is ever doing mischief; and yet, to give him his due, he never designs it. This is some blundering adventure wherein he thought to show his friendship, as he calls it! a curse on him!

Sir G. Then you must forgive him. What said he?

Charles. Said! nay, I had more mind to cut his throat, than to hear his excuses.

Sir G. Where is he?

Whis. Sir, I saw him go into sir Francis Gripe's, just now.

Charles. Oh! then he's upon your business, sir George: a thousand to one but he makes some mistake there too.

Sir G. Impossible, without he huffs the lady, and makes love to sir Francis.

Enter Drawer.

Draw. Mr. Marplot is below, gentlemen, and desires to know if he may have leave to wait upon ye.

Charles. How civil the rogue is when he has done a fault!

Sir G. Ho! desire him to walk up. [Exit Drawer] Pr'ythee, Charles, throw off this chagrin, and be good company.

Charles. Nay, hang him, I'm not angry with him.

Enter MARPLOT.

Do but mark his sheepish look, sir George.

Mar. Dear Charles! don't overwhelm a man already under insupportable affliction. I'm sure I always intend to serve my friends; but if my malicious stars deny the happiness, is the fault mine?

Sir G. Never mind him, Mr. Marplot; he's eat up with spleen. But tell me what says Miranda?

Mar. Says!—nay, we are all undone there too.

Charles. I told you so; nothing prospers that he undertakes.

Mar. Why, can I help her having chose your father for better for worse?

Charles. So; there's another of fortune's strokes. I suppose I shall be edged out of my estate with twins every year, let who will get 'em.

Sir G. What! is the woman really possess'd?

Mar. Yes, with the spirit of contradiction: she railed at you most prodigiously.

Sir G. That's no ill sign.

Mar. You'd say it was no good sign if you knew all.

Sir G. Why, pr'ythee?

Mar. Hark'e, sir George, let me warn you; pursue your old haunt no more; it may be dangerous. [Charles sits down to write.]

Sir G. My old haunt! what do you mean?

Mar. Why, in short then, since you will have it, Miranda vows if you dare approach the garden-gate at eight o'clock, as you us'd, you shall meet with a warm reception.

Sir G. A warm reception!

Mar. Ay, a very warm reception—you shall be saluted with a blunderbuss, sir. These were her very words: nay, she bid me tell you so too.

Sir G. Ha! the garden-gate at eight, as I us'd to do! There must be meaning in this. Is there such a gate, Charles?

Mar. Is there such a gate, Charles?

Charles. Yes, yes, it opens into the Park: I suppose her ladyship has made many a scamper through it.

Sir G. It must be an assignation then. Ha! my heart springs for joy; 'tis a propitious omen. My dear Marplot! let me embrace thee; thou art my friend, my better angel.

Mar. What do you mean, sir George?

Sir G. No matter what I mean. Here, take a bumper to the garden-gate, you dear rogue, you!

Mar. You have reason to be transported, sir George; I have sav'd your life.

Sir G. My life! thou hast sav'd my soul, man. Charles, if thou dost not pledge this health, may'st thou never taste the joys of love.

Charles. Whisper, be sure you take care how you deliver this. [Gives him a Letter] Bring me the answer to my lodgings.

Whis. I warrant you, sir.

Mar. Whither does that letter go? Now dare I not ask for my blood—That fellow knows more secrets than I do.—Aside. Following Whisper as he is going—Whisper! Whisper!

Whis. Sir.

Mar. Whisper, here's half a crown for you.

Whis. Thank ye, sir.

Mar. Now where is that letter going?

Whis. Into my pocket, sir. [Exit.]

Charles. Now I'm for you.

Sir G. To the garden-gate at the hour of eight, Charles: allons; huzza!

Charles. I begin to conceive you.

Mar. That's more than I do, 'egad—To the garden-gate, huzza! [Drinks] But I hope you design to keep far enough off on't, sir George.

Sir G. Ay, ay, never fear that; she shall see I despise her frowns; let her use the blunderbuss against the next fool; she shan't reach me with the smoke, I warrant her; ha, ha, ha!

Mar. Ah, Charles! if you could receive a disappointment thus en cavalier, one should have some comfort in being beat for you.

Charles. The fool comprehends nothing.

Sir G. Nor would I have him. Pr'ythee, take him along with thee.

Charles. Enough.

Sir G. I kiss both your hands—And now for the garden-gate.

It's beauty gives the assignation there,

And love too powerful grows t'admit of fear. [Exit.]

Charles. Come, you shall go home with me.

Mar. Shall I! and are we friends, Charles?—I am glad of it.

Charles. Come along. [Exit.]

Mar. 'Egad, Charles's asking me to go home with him gives me a shrewd suspicion there's more in the garden-gate than I comprehend. Faith, I'll give him the drop<sup>1</sup>), and away to Gardy's and find it out. [Exit.]

ACT. IV.

SCENE I.—The outside of SIR JEALOUS TRAFFICK'S House; PATCH peeping out of the Door.

Enter WHISPER.

Whis. Ha! Mrs. Patch, this is a lucky minute, to find you so readily; my master dies with impatience.

Patch. My lady imagin'd so, and by her orders I have been scouting this hour in search of you, to inform you that sir Jealous has invited some friends to supper with him to-night, which gives an opportunity to your master to make use of his ladder of ropes. The closet window shall be open, and Isabinda ready to receive him. Bid him come immediately.

Whis. Excellent! he'll not disappoint, I warrant him.—But hold, I have a letter here which I'm to carry an answer to. I cannot think what language the direction is.

Patch. Pho! 'tis no language, but a character which the lovers invented to avert discovery—Ha! I hear my old master coming down stairs; it is impossible you should have an answer: away, and bid him come himself for that. Be gone, we're ruin'd if you're seen, for he has doubled his care since the last accident.

Whis. I go, I go.

Patch. There, go! into my pocket. [Puts it aside, and it falls down] Now I'll up the back stairs lest I meet him—Well, a dextrous chambermaid is the ladies' best utensil, I say.

[Exit.

Enter SIR JEALOUS TRAFFICK, with a Letter in his Hand.

Sir J. So, this is some comfort; this tells me that signior don Diego Babinetto is safely arriv'd. He shall marry my daughter the minute he comes—Ha, ha! what's here? [Takes up the Letter Patch dropped] A letter! I don't know what to make of the superscription. I'll see what's withinside. [Opens it]—Humph—'tis Hebrew, I think. What can this mean?—There must be some trick in it. This was certainly design'd for my daughter; but I don't know that she can speak any language but her mother tongue.—No matter for that; this may be one of love's hieroglyphics; and I fancy I saw Patch's tail sweep by: that wench may be a slut, and instead of guarding my honour betray it. I'll find it out, I'm resolv'd—Who's there?

Enter Servant.

What answer did you bring from the gentlemen I sent you to invite?

Serv. That they'd all wait on you, sir, as I told you before; but I suppose you forgot, sir.

Sir J. Did I so, sir? but I shan't forget to break your head if any of them come, sir.

Serv. Come, sir! why, did not you send me to desire their company, sir?

Sir J. But I send you now to desire their absence. Say I have something extraordinary fallen out, which calls me abroad contrary to expectation, and ask their pardon; and, d'ye hear, send the butler to me.

Serv. Yea, sir.

[Exit.

Enter Butler.

Sir J. If this paper has a meaning I'll find it—Lay the cloth in my daughter's chamber, and bid the cook send supper thither presently.

But. Yea, sir.—Hey-day! what's the matter now?

[Exit.

Sir J. He wants the eyes of Argus that has a young handsome daughter in this town; but my comfort is I shall not be troubled long with her. He that pretends to rule a girl once in her teens had better be at sea in a storm, and would be in less danger.

[Exit.

SCENE II.—ISABINDA'S Chamber.

ISABINDA and PATCH discovered.

Isa. Are you sure nobody saw you speak to Whispy?

Patch. Yes, very sure, madam; but I heard sir Jealous coming down stairs, so clapped his letter into my pocket. [Feels for the Letter.

Isa. A letter! give it me quickly.

Patch. Bless me! what's become on't—I'm sure I put it—

[Searching still.

Isa. Is it possible thou couldst be so careless?—Oh, I'm undone for ever if it be lost.

Patch. I must have dropp'd it upon the stairs. But why are you so much alarm'd? if the worst happens nobody can read it, madam, nor find out whom it was design'd for.

Isa. If it falls into my father's hands the very figure of a letter will produce ill consequences. Run and look for it upon the stairs this moment.

Patch. Nay, I'm sure it can be no where else—

[Going.

Enter Butler.

How now, what do you want?

But. My master ordered me to lay the cloth here for supper.

Isa. Ruin'd past redemption—

[Aside.

Patch. You mistake, sure. What shall we do?

Isa. I thought he expected company to-night. Oh, poor Charles! oh, unfortunate Isabinda!

But. I thought so too, madam; but I suppose he has altered his mind.

[Lays the Cloth, and exit.

Isa. The letter is the cause. This heedless action has undone me. Fly and fasten the closet window, which will give Charles notice to retire. Ha! my father! oh, confusion!

Enter SIR JEALOUS TRAFFICK.

Sir J. Hold, hold, Patch; whither are you going? I'll have nobody stir out of the room till after supper.

Patch. Sir, I was going to reach your easy chair—oh, wretched accident!

[Aside.

Sir J. I'll have nobody stir out of the room. I don't want my easy chair.

Isa. What will be the event of this?

[Aside.

Sir J. Harkye, daughter, do you know this hand?

Isa. As I suspected [Aside]—Hand, do you call it, sir? 'tis some schoolboy's scrawl.

Patch. Oh, invention! thou chambermaid's best friend, assist me!

[Aside.

Sir J. Are you sure you don't understand it?

[Patch feels in her Bosom, and shakes her Coats.

Isa. Do you understand it, sir?

Sir J. I wish I did.

Isa. Thank heav'n you do not [Aside] Then I know no more of it than you do, indeed, sir!

Patch. O Lord, O Lord! what have you done, sir? why, the paper is mine; I dropp'd it out of my bosom. [Snatching it from him.

Sir J. Ha! yours, mistress?

Patch. Yes, sir, it is.

Sir J. What is it? speak.

Patch. Yes, sir, it is a charm for the tooth-ache—I have worn it these seven years; 'twas given me by an angel for aught I know, when I was raving with the pain, for nobody knew from whence he came nor whither he went.

He charged me never to open it, lest some dire vengeance befall me, and heaven knows what will be the event. Oh, cruel misfortune! that I should drop it and you should open it—If you had not open'd it—

Sir J. Pox of your charms and whims for me! if that be all 'tis well enough: there, there, burn it, and I warrant you no vengeance will follow.

Patch. So all's right again thus far. [Aside.

Isa. I would not lose Patch for the world—I'll take courage a little. [Aside] Is this usage for your daughter, sir? must my virtue and conduct be suspected for every trifle? You immure me like some dire offender here, and deny me all the recreations which my sex enjoy, and the custom of the country and modesty allow; yet not content with that, you make my confinement more intolerable by your mistrusts and jealousies. Would I were dead, so I were free from this.

Sir J. To-morrow rids you of this tiresome load: Don Diego Babinetto will be here, and then my care ends and his begins.

Isa. Is he come then?—Oh, how shall I avoid this hated marriage! [Aside.

Enter Servants, with Supper.

Sir J. Come, will you sit down?

Isa. I can't eat, sir.

Patch. No, I dare swear he has given her supper enough. I wish I could get into the closet. [Aside.

Sir J. Well, if you can't eat, then give me a song, whilst I do.

Isa. I have such a cold I can scarce speak, sir, much less sing.—How shall I prevent Charles's coming in? [Aside.

Sir J. I hope you have the use of your fingers, madam. Play a tune upon your spinnet whilst your woman sings me a song.

Patch. I'm as much out of tune as my lady, if he knew all. [Aside.

Isa. I shall make excellent music.

[Sits down to play.

Patch. Really, sir, I am so frighten'd about your opening this charm that I can't remember one song.

Sir J. Pish! hang your charm! come, come, sing any thing.

Patch. Yes, I'm likely to sing, truly. [Aside] Humph, humph; bless, me! I can't raise my voice, my heart pants so.

Sir J. Why, what does your heart pant so that you can't play neither? Pray what key are you in, ha?

Patch. Ah, would the key<sup>1)</sup> was turn'd on you once. [Aside.

Sir J. Why don't you sing, I say?

Patch. When madam has put her spinnet in tune, sir: humph, humph—

Isa. I cannot play, sir, whatever ails me.

[Rising.

Sir J. Zounds! sit down and play me a tune, or I'll break the spinnet about your ears.

Isa. What will become of me?

[Sits down and plays.

Sir J. Come, mistress.

[To Patch.

Patch. Yes, sir.

[Sings, but horridly out of tune.

<sup>1)</sup> The pun consists in the word Key's being employed in music as well as for the door.

Sir J. Hey, hey! why, you are a-top of the house, and you are down in the cellar. What is the meaning of this? is it on purpose to cross me, ha?

Patch. Pray, madam, take it a little lower; I cannot reach that note, I fear.

Isa. Well, begin—Oh, Patch, we shall be discover'd. [Aside.

Patch. I sink with apprehension, madam. [Aside]—Humph, humph.

[Sings. Charles opens the Closet door.

Charles. Music and singing! Death! her father there! [The Women shriek]—Then I must fly—[Exit into the Closet. Sir Jealous rises up hastily, seeing Charles slip back into the Closet.

Sir J. Hell and furies! a man in the closet!—

Patch. Ah! a ghost! a ghost!—He must not enter the closet.

[Isabinda throws herself down before the Closet door as in a swoon.

Sir J. The devil! I'll make a ghost of him, I warrant you. [Strives to get by.

Patch. Oh, hold, sir, have a care; you'll tread upon my lady—Who waits there? bring some water. Oh, this comes of your opening the charm. Oh, oh, oh, oh! [Weeps aloud.

Sir J. I'll charm you, housewife. Here lies the charm that conjur'd this fellow in, I'm sure on't. Come out, you rascal, do so. Zounds! take her from the door or I'll spurn her from it, and break your neck down stairs. Where are you, sirrah? Villain! robber of my honour! I'll pull you out of your nest.

[Goes into the Closet.

Patch. You'll be mistaken, old gentleman; the bird is flown.

Isa. I'm glad I have 'scap'd so well; I was almost dead in earnest with the fright.

Re-enter SIR JEALOUS out of the Closet.

Sir J. Whoever the dog were he has escap'd out of the window, for the sash is up: but though he is got out of my reach, you are not. And first, Mrs. Pander, with your charms for the tooth-ache, get out of my house, go, troop; yet hold, stay, I'll see you out of doors myself; but I'll secure your charge ere I go.

Isa. What do you mean, sir? was she not a creature of your own providing?

Sir J. She was of the devil's providing, for aught I know.

Patch. What have I done, sir, to merit your displeasure?

Sir J. I don't know which of you have done it, but you shall both suffer for it, till I can discover whose guilt it is. Go, get in there; I'll move you from this side of the house.

[Pushes Isabinda in at the Door and locks it, puts the Key in his Pocket] I'll keep the key myself; I'll try what ghost will get into that room: and now forsooth I'll wait on you down stairs.

Patch. Ah, my poor lady!—Down stairs, sir! but I won't go out, sir, till I have lock'd up my clothes, and that's flat.

Sir J. If thou wert as naked as thou wert born, thou shouldst not stay to put on a smock, and that's flat. [Exeunt.

SCENE III.—The Street.

Sir J. [Putting Patch out at the Door]

There, go and come no more within sight of my habitation these three days, I charge you.

[Slaps the Door after her.]

Patch. Did ever any body see such an old monster!

Enter CHARLES.

Oh, Mr. Charles! your affairs and mine are in an ill posture.

Charles. I am inur'd to the frowns of fortune; but what has befall'n thee?

Patch. Sir Jealous, whose suspicious nature is always on the watch, nay, even while one eye sleeps the other keeps sentinel, upon sight of you flew into such a violent passion, that I could find no stratagem to appease him, but in spite of all arguments he lock'd his daughter into his own apartment, and turn'd me out of doors.

Charles. Ha! oh, Isabinda!

Patch. And swears she shall see neither sun nor moon till she is don Diego Babinetto's wife, who arrived last night, and is expected with impatience.

Charles. He dies; yes, by all the wrongs of love he shall: here will I plant myself, and through my breast he shall make his passage, if he enters.

Patch. A most heroic resolution! there might be ways found out more to your advantage: policy is often preferr'd to open force.

Charles. I apprehend you not.

Patch. What think you of personating this Spaniard, imposing upon the father, and marrying your mistress by his own consent?

Charles. Say'st thou so, my angel! Oh, could that be done, my life to come would be too short to recompense thee: but how can I do that when I neither know what ship he came in, nor from what part of Spain; who recommends him, or how attended,

Patch. I can solve all this, He is from Madrid, his father's name don Pedro Questo Portento Babinetto. Here's a letter of his to sir Jealous, which he dropp'd one day. You understand Spanish, and the hand may be counterfeited. You conceive me, sir?

Charles. My better genius! thou hast reviv'd my drooping soul. I'll about it instantly. Come to my lodgings, and we'll concert matters.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE IV.—A Garden-gate open; SCENTWELL waiting within.

Enter SIR GEORGE AIRY.

Sir G. So, this is the gate, and most invitingly open. If there should be a blunderbuss here now, what a dreadful ditty would my fall make for fools, and what a jest for the wits; how my name would be roar'd about the streets! Well, I'll venture all.

Scent. Hist, hist! sir George Airy—

[Comes forward.]

Sir G. A female voice! thus far I'm safe—My dear.

Scent. No, I'm not your dear, but I'll conduct you to her. Give me your hand; you must go through many a dark passage and dirty step before you arrive—

Sir G. I know I must before I arrive at Paradise; therefore be quick, my charming guide.

Scent. For aught you know. Come, come, your hand, and away.

Sir G. Here, here, child; you can't be half so swift as my desires.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE V.—The House.

Enter MIRANDA.

Mir. Well, let me reason a little with my mad self. Now, don't I transgress all rules to venture upon a man without the advice of the grave and wise! But then a rigid, knavish guardian who would have marry'd me—to whom? even to his nauseous self, or nobody. Sir George is what I have try'd in conversation, inquir'd into his character, and am satisfied in both. Then his love! who would have given a hundred pounds only to have seen a woman he had not infinitely lov'd? So I find my liking him has furnish'd me with arguments enough of his side: and now the only doubt remains whether he will come or no.

Enter SCENTWELL and SIR GEORGE AIRY.

Scent. That's resolv'd, madam, for here's the knight.

[Exit.]

Sir G. And do I once more behold that lovely object whose idea fills my mind, and forms my pleasing dreams?

Mir. What, beginning again in heroics?—Sir George, don't you remember how little fruit your last prodigal oration produc'd? Not one bare, single word in answer.

Sir G. Ha! the voice of my incognita!—Why did you take then thousand ways to captivate a heart your eyes alone had vanquish'd?

Mir. No more of these flights. Do you think we can agree on that same terrible bugbear, matrimony, without heartily repenting on both sides?

Sir G. It has been my wish since first my longing eyes beheld you.

Mir. And your happy ears drank in the pleasing news I had thirty thousand pounds.

Sir G. Unkind! Did I not offer you, in those purchas'd minutes, to run the risk of your fortune, so you would but secure that lovely person to my arms?

Mir. Well, if you have such love and tenderness, since our wooing has been short, pray reserve it for our future days, to let the world see we are lovers after wedlock; 'twill be a novelty.

Sir G. Haste then, and let us tie the knot, and prove the envied pair—

Mir. Hold, not so fast; I have provided better than to venture on dangerous experiments headlong—My guardian, trusting to my dissembled love, has given up my fortune to my own disposal, but with this proviso, that he to-morrow morning weds me. He is now gone to Doctor's Commons for a licence.

Sir G. Ha! a licence!

Mir. But I have planted emissaries that infallibly take him down to Epsom, under a pretence that a brother usurer of his is to make him his executor, the thing on earth he covets.

Sir G. 'Tis his known character.

Mir. Now my instruments confirm him this man is dying, and he sends me word he goes this minute. It must be to-morrow ere he can be undeceiv'd: that time is ours.

Sir G. Let us improve it then, and settle on our coming years, endless happiness.

Mir. I dare not stir till I hear he's on the road—then I and my writings, the most material point, are soon remov'd.

Sir G. I have one favour to ask: if it lies in your power you would be a friend to poor Charles; though the son of this tenacious man, he is as free from all his vices as nature and a good education can make him; and, what now I have vanity enough to hope will induce you, he is the man on earth I love.

Mir. I never was his enemy, and only put it on as it help'd my designs on his father. If his uncle's estate ought to be in his possession, which I shrewdly suspect, I may do him a singular piece of service.

Sir G. You are all goodness.

Enter SCENTWELL.

Scent. Oh, madam! my master and Mr. Marplot are just coming into the house.

Mir. Undone, undone! if he finds you here in this crisis, all my plots are unravell'd.

Sir G. What shall I do? Can't I get back into the garden?

Scent. Oh no! he comes up those stairs.

Mir. Here, here, here! Can you condescend to stand behind this chimney-board, sir George?

Sir G. Any where, any where, dear madam! without ceremony.

Scent. Come, come, sir, lie close.

[They put him behind the Chimney-board.]

Enter SIR FRANCIS GRIPE and MARPLOT; SIR FRANCIS peeling an Orange.

Sir F. I could not go, though 'tis upon life and death, without taking leave of dear Chargy. Besides, this fellow buzz'd into my ears that thou might'st be so desperate as to shoot that wild rake which haunts the garden-gate, and that would bring us into trouble, dear—

Mir. So Marplot brought you back then?

Mar. Yes, I brought him back.

Mir. I'm oblig'd to him for that, I'm sure.

[Frowning at Marplot aside.]

Mar. By her looks she means she's not oblig'd to me. I have done some mischief now, but what I can't imagine; [Aside.]

Sir F. Well, Chargy, I have had three messengers to come to Epsom to my neighbour Squeezum's, who, for all his vast riches, is departing. [Sighs.]

Mar. Ay, see what all you usurers must come to.

Sir F. Peace, you young knave! Some forty years hence I may think on't—But, Chargy, I'll be with thee to-morrow before those pretty eyes are open; I will, I will, Chargy, I'll rouse you, i'faith—Here, Mrs. Scentwell, lift up your lady's chimney-board, that I may throw my peel<sup>1)</sup> in, and not litter her chamber.

Mir. Oh, my stars! what will become of us now? [Aside]

Scent. Oh, pray, sir, give it me; I love it above all things in nature, indeed I do.

Sir F. No, no, hussy; you have the green pip already; I'll have no apothecary's bills.

[Goes towards the Chimney.]

Mir. Hold, hold, hold, dear Gardy! I have

1) Orange peel.

a, a, a, a, a monkey shut up there; and if you open it before the man comes that is to tame it, 'tis so wild 'twill break all my china or get away, and that would break my heart; for I'm fond on't to distraction, next thee, dear Gardy? [In a flattering Tone.]

Sir F. Well, well, Chargy, I won't open it; she shall have her monkey, poor rogue! Here, throw this peel out of the window.

[Exit Scentwell.]

Mar. A monkey! Dear madam, let me see it; I can tame a monkey as well as the best of them all: Oh, how I love the little miniatures of man!

Mir. Be quiet, mischief! and stand further from the chimney—You shall not see my monkey—why sure— [Striving with him.]

Mar. For heaven's sake, dear madam! let me but peep, to see if it be as pretty as lady Fiddle faddle's. Has it got a chain?

Mir. Not yet, but I design it one shall last its lifetime. Nay, you shall not see it.—Look, Gardy, how he teazes me!

Sir F. [Getting between him and the Chimney.] Sirrah, sirrah, let my Chargy's monkey alone, or bamboo shall fly about your ears. What, is there no dealing with you?

Mar. Pugh, pox of the monkey! here's a rout! I wish he may rival you

Enter Servant.

Serv. Sir, they have put two more horses to the coach, as you order'd, and 'tis ready at the door.

Sir F. Well, I am going to be executor; better for thee, jewel. Bye, Chargy; one buss!—I'm glad thou hast got a monkey to divert thee a little.

Mir. Thank'e, dear Gardy!—Nay, I'll see you to the coach.

Sir F. That's kind, adad.

Mir. Come along, impertinence. [To Marplot.]

Mar. [Stepping back] 'Egad, I will see the monkey now. [Lifts up the Board, and discovers Sir George] O Lord! O Lord! Thieves! thieves! murder!

Sir G. Damn ye, you unlucky dog! 'tis I. Which way shall I get out? Show me instantly, or I'll cut your throat.

Mar. Undone, undone! At that door there. But hold, hold; break that china, and I'll bring you off. [He runs off at the Corner, and throws down some China.]

Re-enter SIR FRANCIS GRIPE, MIRANDA, and SCENTWELL.

Sir F. Mercy on me! what's the matter?

Mir. O, you toad! what have you done?

Mar. No great harm; I beg of you to forgive me. Longing to see the monkey, I did but just raise up the board, and it flew over my shoulders, scratch'd all my face, broke your china, and whisk'd out of the window.

Sir F. Where, where is it, sirrah?

Mar. There, there, sir Francis, upon your neighbour Parmazan's pantiles.

Sir F. Was ever such an unlucky rogue! Sirrah, I forbid you my house. Call the servants to get the monkey again. Pug, pug, pug! I would stay myself to look for it, but you know my earnest business.

Scent. Oh, my lady will be best to lure it back: all them creatures love my lady extremely.

Mir. Go, go, dear Gardy! I hope I shall recover it.

Sir F. B'ye, b'ye, deerce! Ah, mischief! how you look now! B'ye, b'ye. [Exit.]

Mir. Scentwell, see him in the coach, and bring me word.

Scent. Yes, madam. [Exit.]

Mir. So, sir, you have done your friend a signal piece of service, I suppose.

Mar. VVhy, look you, madam, if I have committed a fault, thank yourself; no man is more serviceable when I am let into a secret, and none more unlucky at finding it out. VVho could divine your meaning; when you talk'd of a blunderbuss, who thought of a rendezvous? and when you talk'd of a monkey, who the devil dreamt of sir George?

Mir. A sign you converse but little with our sex, when you can't reconcile contradictions.

Enter SCENTWELL.

Scent. He's gone, madam, as fast as the coach and six can carry him—

Re-enter SIR GEORGE AIRY.

Sir G. Then I may appear.

Mar. Here's pug, ma'am—Dear sir George! make my peace, on my soul I never took you for a monkey before.

Sir G. I dare swear thou didst not. Madam, I beg you to forgive him.

Mir. VVell, sir George, if he can be secret.

Mar. 'Odsheart, madam! I'm as secret as a priest when trusted.

Sir G. VVhy 'tis with a priest our business is at present.

Scent. Madam, here's Mrs. Isabinda's woman to wait on you.

Mir. Bring her up.

Enter PATCH.

How do ye, Mrs. Patch? VVhat news from your lady?

Patch. That's for your private ear, madam. Sir George, there's a friend of yours has an urgent occasion for your assistance.

Sir G. His name.

Patch. Charles.

Mar. Ha! then there's something a-foot that I know nothing of. [Aside] I'll wait on you, sir George.

Sir G. A third person may not be proper, perhaps. As soon as I have dispatched my own affairs I am at his service. I'll send my servant to tell him I'll wait on him in half an hour.

Mir. How came you employed in this message, Mrs. Patch?

Patch. VVant of business, madam; I am discharg'd by my master, but hope to serve my lady still.

Mir. How! discharg'd! you must tell me the whole story within.

Patch. VVith all my heart, madam.

Mar. Tell it here, Mrs. Patch.—Pish! pox! I wish I were fairly out of the house. I find marriage is the end of this secret; and now I'm half mad to know what Charles wants him for. [Aside.]

Sir G. Madam, I'm doubly press'd by love and friendship. This exigence admits of no delay. Shall we make Marplot of the party?

Mir. If you'll run the hazard, sir George; I believe he means well.

Mar. Nay, nay, for my part I desire to be let into nothing; I'll be gone, therefore pray don't mistrust me. [Going.]

Sir G. So now he has a mind to be gone to Charles: but not knowing what affairs he may have upon his hands at present, I'm resolv'd he shan't stir. [Aside] No, Mr. Marplot, you must not leave us; we want a third person. [Takes hold of him.]

Mar. I never had more mind to be gone in my life.

Mir. Come along then; if we fail in the voyage, thank yourself for taking this ill-starr'd gentleman on board.

Sir G. That vessel ne'er can unsuccessful prove,
VVhose freight is beauty, and whose pilot's love.

[Exeunt Sir George and Miranda.]

Mar. Tyty ti, tyty ti.

[Steals off the other Way.]

Re-enter SIR GEORGE AIRY.

Sir G. Marplot! Marplot!

Mar. [Entering] Here! I was coming, sir George. [Exeunt.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—A Room in SIR FRANCIS GRIPE'S House.

Enter MIRANDA, PATCH, and SCENTWELL.

Mir. VVell, Patch, I have done a strange bold thing; my fate is determin'd, and expectation is no more. Now to avoid the impertinence and roguery of an old man, I have thrown myself into the extravagance of a young one; if he should despise, slight, or use me ill, there's no remedy from a husband but the grave, and that's a terrible sanctuary to one of my age and constitution.

Patch. O! fear not, madam; you'll find your account in sir George Airy; it is impossible a man of sense should use a woman ill, endued with beauty, wit, and fortune. It must be the lady's fault if she does not wear the unfashionable name of wife easy, when nothing but complaisance and good humour is requisite on either side to make them happy.

Mir. I long till I am out of this house, lest any accident should bring my guardian back. Scentwell, put my best jewels into the little casket, slip them into thy pocket, and let us march off to sir Jealous's.

Scent. It shall be done, madam. [Exit.]

Patch. Sir George will be impatient, madam. If their plot succeeds, we shall be well receiv'd; if not, he will be able to protect us. Besides, I long to know how my young lady fares.

Mir. Farewell, old Mammon, and thy detested walls! Twill be no more sweet sir Francis! I shall be compell'd the odious task of dissembling no longer to get my own, and coax him with the wheedling names of my precious, my dear, dear Gardy! O heavens!

Enter SIR FRANCIS GRIPE, behind.

Sir F. Ah, my sweet Chargy! don't be frighted: [She starts] but thy poor Gardy has been abus'd, cheated, fool'd, betray'd; but nobody knows by whom.

Mir. Undone, past redemption! [Aside.

Sir F. What, won't you speak to me, Chargy?

Mir. I am so surpris'd with joy to see you, I know not what to say.

Sir F. Poor, dear girl! But do you know that my son, or some such rogue, to rob or murder me, or both, contriv'd this journey? for upon the road I met my neighbour Squeezum well, and coming to town.

Mir. Good lack! good lack! what tricks are there in this world!

Re-enter SCENTWELL, with a diamond Necklace in her Hand, not seeing SIR FRANCIS.

Scent. Madam, be pleas'd to tie this necklace on, for I can't get into the—[Seeing Sir Francis.

Mir. The wench is a fool, I think! Could you not have carried it to be mended without putting it in the box?

Sir F. What's the matter?

Mir. Only, dearee! I bid her, I bid her—Your ill-usage has put every thing out of my head. But won't you go, Gardy, and find out these fellows, and have them punished, and, and—

Sir F. Where should I look for them, child? no, I'll sit me down contented with my safety, nor stir out of my own doors till I go with thee to a parson.

Mir. If he goes into his closet I am ruin'd. [Aside] Oh, bless me! In this fright I had forgot Mrs. Patch.

Patch. Ay, madam, and I stay for your speedy answer.

Mir. I must get him out of the house. Now assist me, fortune! [Aside.

Sir F. Mrs. Patch! I profess I did not see you: how dost thou do, Mrs. Patch? Well, don't you repent leaving my Chargy?

Patch. Yes, every body must love her—but I come now—Madam, what did I come for? my invention is at the last ebb.

[Aside to Miranda.

Sir F. Nay, never whisper, tell me.

Mir. She came, dear Gardy! to invite me to her lady's wedding, and you shall go with me, Gardy; 'tis to be done this moment, to a Spanish merchant. Old sir Jealous keeps on his humour: the first minute he sees her, the next he marries her.

Sir F. Ha, ha, ha, ha! I'd go if I thought the sight of matrimony would tempt Chargy to perform her promise. There was a smile, there was a consenting look, with those pretty twinklers, worth a million! 'Ods-precious! I am happier than the great mogul, the emperor of China, or all the potentates that are not in the wars. Speak, confirm it, make me leap out of my skin.

Mir. When one has resolved, 'tis in vain to stand shilly-shally. If ever I marry, positively this is my wedding-day.

Sir F. Oh! happy, happy man—Verily, I will beget a son the first night shall disinherit that dog Charles. I have estate enough to purchase a barony, and be the immortalizing the whole family of the Gripes.

Mir. Come then, Gardy, give me thy hand; let's to this house of Hymen.

My choice is fix'd, let good or ill betide.

Sir F. The joyful bridegroom I,

Mir. And I the happy bride. [Exeunt.

SCENE II.—An Apartment in the House of SIR JEALOUS TRAFFICK.

Enter SIR JEALOUS TRAFFICK, meeting a Servant.

Serv. Sir, here's a couple of gentlemen inquire for you; one of them calls himself signior Diego Babinetto.

Sir J. Ha! Signior Babinetto! admit 'em instantly—joyful minute; I'll have my daughter married to-night.

Enter CHARLES in a Spanish habit, with SIR GEORGE AIRY, dressed like a Merchant,

Senhor, beso las manos: vuestra merced es muy bien venido en esta tierra.

Charles. Senhor, soy muy humilde, y muy obligado cryado de vuestra merced: mi padre embia a vuestra merced, los mas profundos de sus respetos; y a commissionado este mercadel Ingles, de concluyr un negocio, que me haze el mas dichoss hombre del mundo, haciendo me su yerno.

Sir J. I am glad on't, for I find I have lost much of my Spanish. Sir, I am your most humble servant. Signior don Diego Babinetto has informed me that you are commissioned by signior don Pedro, etc. his worthy father—

Sir G. To see an affair of marriage consummated between a daughter of yours and signior Diego Babinetto his son here. True, sir, such a trust is repos'd in me, as that letter will inform you.—I hope 'twill pass upon him. [Aside. Gives him a Letter.

Sir J. Ay, 'tis his hand. [Seems to read.

Sir G. Good, you have counterfeited to a nicety, Charles. [Aside to Charles.

Sir J. Sir, I find by this that you are a man of honour and probity; I think, sir, he calls you Meanwell.

Sir G. Meanwell is my name, sir.

Sir J. A very good name, and very significant. For to mean well is to be honest, and to be honest is the virtue of a friend, and a friend is the delight and support of human society.

Sir G. You shall find that I'll discharge the part of a friend in what I have undertaken, sir Jealous. Therefore, sir, I must entreat the presence of your fair daughter, and the assistance of your chaplain; for signior don Pedro strictly enjoined me to see the marriage rites performed as soon as we should arrive, to avoid the accidental overtures of Venus.

Sir J. Overtures of Venus!

Sir G. Ay, sir; that is, those little hawking females that traverse the park and the play-house to put off their damag'd ware—they fasten upon foreigners like leeches, and watch their arrival as carefully as the Kentish men do a shipwreck: I warrant you they have heard of him already.

Sir J. Nay, I know this town swarms with them.

Sir G. Ay, and then you know the Spaniards are naturally amorous, but very constant; the first face fixes 'em; and it may be very dangerous to let him ramble ere he is tied.

Sir J. Pat to my purpose<sup>1)</sup>—Well, sir, there is but one thing more, and they shall be married instantly.

Charles. Pray heaven that one thing more don't spoil all.

Sir J. Don Pedro wrote me word, in his last but one, that he designed the sum of five thousand crowns by way of jointure for my daughter, and that it should be paid into my hand upon the day of marriage—

Charles. Oh, the devil! [Aside.

Sir J. In order to lodge it in some of our funds in case she should become a widow, and return to England—

Sir G. Pox on't! this is an unlucky turn. What shall I say? [Aside.

Sir J. And he does not mention one word of it in this letter.

Sir G. Humph! True, sir Jealous, he told me such a thing, but, but, but, but—he, he, he, he—he did not imagine that you would insist upon the very day; for, for, for, for money, you know, is dangerous returning by sea, an, an, an—

Charles. Zounds! say we have brought it in commodities. [Aside to Sir George.

Sir G. And so, sir, he has sent it in merchandize, tobacco, sugars, spices, lemons, and so forth, which shall be turned into money with all expedition: in the mean time, sir, if you please to accept of my bond for performance—

Sir J. It is enough, sir; I am so pleas'd with the countenance of signior Diego, and the harmony of your name, that I'll take your word, and will fetch my daughter this moment. Within there.

Enter Servant.

Desire Mr. Tackum, my neighbour's chaplain, to walk hither.

Serv. Yes, sir. [Exit.

Sir J. Gentlemen, I'll return in an instant. [Exit.

Sir G. 'Egad, that five thousand crowns had like to have ruined the plot.

Charles. But that's over; and if fortune throws no more rubs in our way—

Sir G. Thou'lt carry the prize—But hist! here he comes.

Re-enter SIR JEALOUS TRAFFICK, dragging in ISABINDA.

Sir J. Come along, you stubborn baggage, you! come along.

Isa. Oh! hear me, sir, hear me but speak one word;

Do not destroy my everlasting peace;
My soul abhors this Spaniard you have chose.

Sir J. How's that?

Isa. Let this posture move your tender nature. [Kneels.

For ever will I hang upon these knees,
Nor loose my hands till you cut off my hold,
If you refuse to hear me, sir.

Sir J. Did you ever see such a perverse slut? Off, I say. Mr. Meanwell, pray help me a little.

Sir G. Rise, madam, and do not disoblige your father, who has provided a husband worthy of you, one that will love you equal with his soul, and one that you will love, when once you know him.

<sup>1)</sup> Pat means, exactly.

Isa. Oh! never, never!

Could I suspect that falsehood in my heart,
I would this moment tear it from my breast,
And straight present him with the treach'rous part.

Sir J. Falsehood! why, who the devil are you in love with? Don't provoke me, for by St. Iago I shall beat you, housewife.

Sir G. Sir Jealous, you are too passionate. Give me leave, I'll try by gentle words to work her to your purpose.

Sir J. I pray do, Mr. Meanwell, I pray do; she'll break my heart. [Weeps] There is in that casket jewels of the value of three thousand pounds, which were her mother's, and a paper wherein I have settled one-half of my estate upon her now, and the whole when I die, but provided she marries this gentleman, else by St. Iago, I'll turn her out of doors to beg or starve. Tell her this, Mr. Meanwell, pray do. [Walks toward Charles.

Sir G. Ha! this is beyond expectation. Trust to me, sir, I'll lay the dangerous consequence of disobeying you at this juncture before her, I warrant you. Come, madam, do not blindly cast your life away just in the moment you would wish to save it.

Isa. Pray cease your trouble, sir: I have no wish but sudden death to free me from this hated Spaniard. If you are his friend, inform him what I say.

Sir G. Suppose this Spaniard, which you strive to shun, should be the very man to whom you'd fly?

Isa. Ha!

Sir G. Would you not blame your rash resolve, and curse your eyes that would not look on Charles?

Isa. On Charles! Where is he? [Rises.

Sir G. Hold, hold, hold. 'Sdeath! madam, you'll ruin all. Your father believes him to be signior Babinetto. Compose yourself a little, pray madam. [He runs to Sir Jealous] She begins to hear reason, sir; the fear of being turned out of doors has done it. Speak gently to her, sir; I'm sure she'll yield; I see it in her face.

Sir J. Well, Isabinda, can you refuse to bless a father whose only care is to make you happy.

Isa. Oh, sir! do with me what you please; I am all obedience.

Sir J. And wilt thou love him?

Isa. I will endeavour it, sir.

Enter Servant.

Serv. Sir, here is Mr. Tackum.

Sir J. Show him into the parlour. [Exit Servant]—Senhor tome vind sueipora: cette momento les junta les manos.

[Gives her to Charles.

Charles. Senhor, yo la recibo como se deve un tesora tan grande. [Embraces her.

Sir J. Now, Mr. Meanwell, let's to the parson, Who, by his art, will join this pair for life, Make me the happiest father, her the happiest wife. [Exeunt.

SCENE III.—The Street before SIR JEALOUS TRAFFICK'S House.

Enter MARPLOT.

Mar. I have hunted all over the town for Charles, but can't find him, and by VWhisper's scouting at the end of the street, I suspect he must be in the house again. I am informed too that he has borrowed a Spanish habit out of the playhouse: what can it mean?

Enter a Servant of SIR JEALOUS TRAFFICK's to him out of the House.

Hark'e, sir, do you belong to this house?

Serv. Yes, sir.

Mar. Isn't your name Richard?

Serv. No, sir; Thomas.

Mar. Oh, ay, Thomas—Well, Thomas, there's a shilling for you.

Serv. Thank you, sir.

Mar. Pray, Thomas, can you tell if there be a gentleman in it in a Spanish habit?

Serv. There's a Spanish gentleman within that is just a-going to marry my young lady, sir.

Mar. Are you sure he is a Spanish gentleman?

Serv. I'm sure he speaks no English that I hear of.

Mar. Then that can't be him I want, for 'tis an English gentleman that I inquire after; he may be dressed like a Spaniard, for aught I know.

Serv. Ha! who knows but this may be an impostor? I'll inform my master, for if he should be impos'd upon, he'll beat us all round. [Aside] Pray come in, sir, and see if this be the person you inquire for.

Mar. Ay, I'll follow you—Now for it.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE IV.—The Inside of the House.

Enter MARPLOT and Servant.

Serv. Sir, please to stay here; I'll send my master to you. [Exit.]

Mar. So, this was a good contrivance. If this be Charles now, he will wonder how I found him out.

Re-enter Servant and SIR JEALOUS TRAFFICK.

Sir J. What is your earnest business, blockhead! that you must speak with me before the ceremony's past? Ha! who's this?

Serv. Why this gentleman, sir, wants another gentleman in a Spanish habit, he says.

Sir J. In a Spanish habit! 'tis some friend of signior don Diego's, I warrant. Sir, your servant.

Mar. Your servant, sir.

Sir J. I suppose you would speak with signior Babinetto.

Mar. Sir!

Sir J. I say, I suppose you would speak with signior Babinetto?

Mar. Hey-day! what the devil does he say now? [Aside] Sir, I don't understand you.

Sir J. Don't you understand Spanish, sir?

Mar. Not I indeed, sir.

Sir J. I thought you had known signior Babinetto.

Mar. Not I, upon my word, sir.

Sir J. What then, you'd speak with his friend, the English merchant, Mr. Meanwell?

Mar. Neither, sir, not I; I don't mean any such thing.

Sir J. Why, who are you then, sir? and what do you want? [In an angry Tone.]

Mar. Nay, nothing at all, not I, sir.—Pox on him! I wish I were out; he begins to exalt his voice; I shall be beaten again. [Aside.]

Sir J. Nothing at all, sir! Why then what business have you in my house, ha?

Serv. You said you wanted a gentleman in a Spanish habit.

Mar. Why ay, but his name is neither Babinetto nor Meanwell.

Sir J. What is his name then, sirrah? Ha! now I look at you again, I believe you are the rogue that threatened me with half a dozen myrmidons—

Mar. Me, sir! I never saw your face in all my life before.

Sir J. Speak, sir; who is it you look for? or, or—

Mar. A terrible old dog! [Aside] Why, sir, only an honest young fellow of my acquaintance—I thought that here might be a ball, and that he might have been here in a masquerade.—'Tis Charles, sir Francis Gripe's son,—because I knew he us'd to come hither sometimes.

Sir J. Did he so?—Not that I know of, I'm sure. Pray heaven that this be don Diego—If I should be trick'd now—Ha! my heart mis-gives me plaguily—Within there! stop the marriage—Run, sirrah, call all my servants! I'll be satisfied that this is signior Pedro's son ere he has my daughter.

Mar. Ha! sir George! what have I done now?

Enter SIR GEORGE AIRY, with a drawn Sword, between the Scenes.

Sir G. Ha! Marplot here—oh, the unlucky dog—What's the matter, sir Jealous?

Sir J. Nay, I don't know the matter, Mr. Meanwell.

Mar. Upon my soul, sir George—

[Going up to Sir George.]

Sir J. Nay then, I'm betray'd, ruin'd, undone.—Thieves, traitors, rogues! [Offers to go in] Stop the marriage, I say—

Sir G. I say go on, Mr. Tackum.—Nay, no entering here; I guard this passage, old gentleman: the act and deed were both your own, and I'll see 'em sign'd, or die for't.

Enter Servant.

Sir J. A pox on the act and deed!—Fall on, knock him down.

Sir G. Ay, come on, scoundrels! I'll prick your jackets for you.

Sir J. Zounds! sirrah, I'll be reveng'd on you. [Beats Marplot.]

Sir G. Ay, there your vengeance is due. Ha, ha!

Mar. Why, what do you beat me for? I han't married your daughter.

Sir J. Rascals! why don't you knock him down?

Serv. We are afraid of his sword, sir; if you'll take that from him, we'll knock him down presently.

Enter CHARLES and ISABINDA.

Sir J. Seize her then.

Charles. Rascals, retire; she's my wife; touch her if you dare; I'll make dogs'-meat of you.

Mar. Ay, I'll make dogs'-meat of you, rascals.

Sir J. Ah! downright English—Oh, oh, oh, oh!

Enter SIR FRANCIS GRIPE and MIRANDA.

Sir F. Into the house of joy we enter without knocking—Ha! I think 'tis the house of sorrow, sir Jealous.

Sir J. Oh, sir Francis, are you come? What! was this your contrivance, to abuse, trick, and chouse me out of my child?

Sir F. My contrivance! what do you mean?

Sir J. No, you don't know your son there in a Spanish habit?

Sir F. How! my son in a Spanish habit! Sirrah, you'll come to be hang'd. Get out of my sight, ye dog! get out of my sight.

Sir J. Get out of your sight, sir! get out with your bags. Let's see what you'll give him now to maintain my daughter on.

Sir F. Give him! he shall never be the better for a penny of mine—and you might have look'd after your daughter better, sir Jealous. Trick'd, quotha! 'Egad, I think you design'd to trick me: but lookye, gentlemen, I believe I shall trick you both. This lady is my wife, do you see, and my estate shall descend only to her children.

Sir G. I shall be extremely obliged to you, sir Francis.

Sir F. Ha, ha, ha, ha! poor sir George! does not your hundred pounds stick in your stomach? ha, ha, ha!

Sir G. No, faith, sir Francis, this lady has given me a cordial for that.

[Takes her by the Hand.]

Sir F. Hold, sir, you have nothing to say to this lady.

Sir G. Nor you nothing to do with my wife, sir.

Sir F. Wife, sir!

Mir. Ay, really, guardian, 'tis even so. I hope you'll forgive my first offence.

Sir F. What, have you chous'd me out of my consent and your writings then, mistress, ha?

Mir. Out of nothing but my own, guardian.

Sir J. Ha, ha, ha! 'tis some comfort at least to see you are over-reach'd as well as myself. Will you settle your estate upon your son now?

Sir F. He shall starve first.

Mir. That I have taken care to prevent. There, sir, are the writings of your uncle's estate, which have been your due these three years.

[Gives Charles Papers.]

Charles. I shall study to deserve this favour.

Mar. Now how the devil could she get those writings, and I know nothing of it?

Sir F. What, have you robb'd me too, mistress? 'Egad, I'll make you restore 'em—hussy, I will so.

Sir J. Take care I don't make you pay the arrears, sir. 'Tis well 'tis no worse, since 'tis no better. Come, young man, seeing thou hast outwitted me, take her, and bless you both!

Charles. I hope, sir, you'll bestow your blessing too; 'tis all I ask.

[Kneels.]

Mar. Do, Gardy, do.

Sir F. Confound you all! [Exit.

Mar. Mercy upon us, how he looks!

Sir G. Ha, ha, ha! ne'er mind his curses, Charles; thou'lt thrive not one jot the worse for 'em. Since this gentleman is reconcil'd we are all made happy.

Sir J. I always lov'd precaution, and took care to avoid dangers; but when a thing was past, I ever had philosophy to be easy.

Charles. Which is the true sign of a great soul. I lov'd your daughter, and she me, and you shall have no reason to repent her choice.

Isa. You will not blame me, sir, for loving my own country best.

Mar. So here's every body happy, I find, but poor Pilgarlick. I wonder what satisfaction I shall have for being cuff'd, kick'd, and beaten in your service!

Sir J. I have been a little too familiar with you as things are fallen out; but since there's no help for't, you must forgive me.

Mar. 'Egad, I think so—but provided that you be not so familiar for the future.

Sir G. Thou hast been an unlucky rogue.

Mar. But very honest.

Charles. That I'll vouch for, and freely forgive thee.

Sir G. And I'll do you one piece of service more, Marplot; I'll take care that sir Francis makes you master of your estate.

Mar. That will make me as happy as any of you.

Sir J. Now let us in, and refresh ourselves with a cheerful glass, in which we'll bury all animosities; and

By my example let all parents move,
And never strive to cross their children's love;
But still submit that care to Providence above.

[Exeunt.]

COLLEY CIBBER.

CIBBER was born on the 6th of November, O. S. 1671. His father, Cajus Gabriel Cibber, was a native of Holstein, and came into England, to follow his profession of a statuary, some time before the restoration of King Charles II. His mother was the daughter of William Colley, Esq. of Glaiston in Rutlandshire. In 1682 he was sent to the free-school of Grantham in Lincolnshire, where he stayed till he got through it, from the lowest form to the uppermost; and such learning as that school could give him is, as he himself acknowledges, the most he could pretend to. On leaving the school, our author came to Nottingham, and found his father in arms there among the forces which the Earl of Devonshire had raised to aid the Prince of Orange, afterwards King William III. who had landed in the west. The old man, considering this a very proper season for a young fellow to distinguish himself in, entreated the Earl of Devonshire to accept of his son in his room, which his Lordship not only consented to, but even promised, that, when affairs were settled, he would further provide for him. During his period of attendance on this nobleman, however, a frequent application to the amusements of the theatre awakened in him his passion for the stage, which he seemed now determined on pursuing as his summum bonum, and, in spite of father, mother, or friends, to fix on as his ne plus ultra. From 1689 to 1711 we find him working through the difficulties of a poor salary at the theatre and the supporting by the help of his pen a numerous family of children. In 1711 he became united, as joint-patentee with Collier, Wilks, and Dogget, in the management of Drury Lane theatre; and afterwards in a like partnership with Booth, Wilks, and Sir Richard Steele. During this latter period, which did not entirely end till 1731, the English stage was perhaps in the most flourishing state it ever enjoyed. After a number of years, passed in the utmost ease, gaiety, and good-humour, he departed this life, at Islington, on the 12th of December 1757; his man-servant (whom he had talked to by his bedside at six in the morning, in seeming good health) finding him dead at nine, lying on his pillow, just as he left him. He had recently completed his 86th year. "I was vain enough to think," says he, "that I had more ways than one to come at applause and that, in the variety of characters I acted, the chances to win it were the strongest on my side. That, if the multitude were not in a roar to see me in Cardinal Wolsey, I could be sure of them in Alderman Fondlewife. If they hated me in Jago, in Sir Fopling they took me for a fine gentleman. If they were silent at Syphax, no Italian cunuch was more applauded than I when I sung in Sir Courtly. If the morals of Aesop were too grave for them, Justice Shallow was as simple and as merry an old rake as the wisest of our young ones could wish me. And though the terror and detestation raised by King Richard might be too severe a delight for them, yet the more gentle and modern vanities of a Poet Bayes, or the well-bred vices of a Lord Foppington, were not at all more than their merry hearts, or nicer morals, could bear." In answer to Pope's attack upon him for plagiarism, Mr. Cibber candidly declares, that whenever he took upon him to make some dormant play of an old author fit for the stage, it was honestly not to be idle that set him to work, as a good housewife will mend old linen when she has no better employment; but that, when he was more warmly engaged by a subject entirely new he only thought it a good subject, when it seemed worthy of an abler pen than his own, and might prove as useful to the hearer as profitable to himself. And, indeed, this essential piece of merit must be granted to his own original plays, that they always tend to the improvement of the mind as well as the entertainment of the eye; and that vice and folly, however pleasingly habited, are constantly lashed, ridiculed, or reclaimed in them, and virtue as constantly rewarded. There is an argument, indeed, which might be pleaded in favour of this author, were his plays possessed of a much smaller share of merit than is to be found in them; which is, that he wrote, at least in the early part of his life, through necessity, for the support of his increasing family; his precarious income as an actor being then too scanty to supply it with even the necessaries of life: and with great pleasantness he acquaints us, that his muse and his spouse were equally prolific; that the one was seldom mother of a child, but in the same year the other made him the father of a play; and that they had had a dozen of each sort between them, of both which kinds some died in their infancy, and near an equal number of each were alive when he quitted the theatre. No wonder then, when the Muse is only called upon by family duty, that she should not always rejoice in the fruit of her labour. This excuse, we say, might be pleaded in Mr. Cibber's favour: but we must confess ourselves of the opinion, that there is no occasion for the plea; and that his plays have merit enough to speak in their own cause, without the necessity of begging indulgence. His plots, whether original or borrowed, are lively and full of business; yet not confused in the action, nor bungled in the catastrophe. His characters are well drawn, and his dialogue easy, genteel, and natural. And if he has not the intrinsic wit of a Congreve or a Vanburgh, yet there is a luxuriance of fancy in his thoughts, which gives an almost equal pleasure, and a purity in his sentiments and morals, the want of which, in the above named authors, has so frequently and so justly been censured. In a word, we think the English stage as much obliged to Mr. Cibber, for a fund of rational entertainment, as to any dramatic writer this nation has produced, Shakspeare only excepted; and one unanswerable evidence has been borne to the satisfaction the public have received from his plays, and such a one as no author besides himself can boast, viz. that although the number of his dramatic pieces is very extensive, a considerable part are now, and seem likely to continue on the list of acting and favourite plays.

THE PROVOKED HUSBAND;

Or, a Journey to London. Acted at Drury Lane 1728. This comedy was begun by Sir John Vanburgh, but left by him imperfect at his death; when Mr. Cibber took it in hand, and finished it. It met with very great success, being acted twenty-eight nights without interruption; yet such is the power of prejudice and personal pique in biasing the judgment, that Mr. Cibber's enemies, ignorant of what share he had in the writing of the piece, bestowed the highest applause on the part which related to Lord Townly's provocations from his wife, which was mostly Cibber's, at the same time that they condemned and opposed the Journey to London part, which was almost entirely Vanburgh's, for no other apparent reason but because they imagined it to be Mr. Cibber's. He soon, however, convinced them of their mistake, by publishing all the scenes which Sir John had left behind him, exactly from his own MS. under the single title of The Journey to London.

DRAMATIS PERSONAE.

LORD TOWNLY.	POUNDAGE.	LADY TOWNLY.
SIR F. WRONGHEAD.	JOHN MOODY.	LADY GRACE.
MANLY.	JAMES.	LADY WRONGHEAD.	MYRTILLA.
SQUIRE RICHARD.	CONSTABLE.	MISS JENNY.	TRUSTY.
COUNT BASSET.	WILLIAMS.	MRS. MOTHERLY.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—LORD TOWNLY'S Apartment.

Enter LORD TOWNLY.

Lord T. WHY did I marry?—Was it not evident, my plain, rational scheme of life was impracticable with a woman of so different a way of thinking?—Is there one article of it that she has not broke in upon?—Yes—let me do her justice—her reputation—That—I have no reason to believe, is in question—But then, how long her profligate course of pleasures may make her able to keep it—is a shocking consideration! and her presumption, while she keeps it, insupportable! for, on the pride of that single virtue, she seems to lay it down as a fundamental point, that the free indulgence of every other vice this fertile town affords, is the birthright prerogative of a woman of quality.—Amazing! that a creature, so warm in the pursuit of her pleasures, should never cast one thought towards her happiness—Thus, while she admits of no lover, she thinks it a greater merit still, in her chastity, not to care for her husband; and, while she herself is solacing in one continual round of cards and good company, he, poor wretch, is left at large, to take care of his own contentment—'Tis time, indeed, some care were taken, and speedily there shall be—Yet, let me not be rash—Perhaps this disappointment of my heart may make me too impatient; and some tempers, when reproached, grow more untractable—Here she comes—Let me be calm awhile.

Enter LADY TOWNLY.

Going out so soon after dinner, madam?

Lady T. Lord, my lord! what can I possibly do at home?

Lord T. What does my sister, lady Grace, do at home?

Lady T. Why, that is to me amazing! Have you ever any pleasure at home?

Lord T. It might be in your power, madam, I confess, to make it a little more comfortable to me.

Lady T. Comfortable! And so, my good lord, you would really have a woman of my rank and spirit stay at home to comfort her husband!—Lord, what notions of life some men have!

Lord T. Don't you think, madam, some ladies' notions are full as extravagant?

Lady T. Yes, my lord, when the tame doves live cooped within the pen of your precepts, I do think them prodigious indeed!

Lord T. And when they fly wild about this town, madam, pray what must the world think of them then?

Lady T. Oh, this world is not so ill bred, as to quarrel with any woman for liking it.

Lord T. Nor am I, madam, a husband so well bred, as to bear my wife's being so fond of it; in short, the life you lead, madam—

Lady T. Is to me the pleasantest life in the world.

Lord T. I should not dispute your taste, madam, if a woman had a right to please nobody but herself.

Lady T. Why, whom would you have her please?

Lord T. Sometimes her husband.

Lady T. And don't you think a husband under the same obligation?

Lord T. Certainly.

Lady T. Why then we are agreed, my lord—For if I never go abroad till I am weary of being at home—(which you know is the case)—is it not equally reasonable, not to come home till one is weary of being abroad?

Lord T. If this be your rule of life, madam, 'tis time to ask you one serious question.

Lady T. Don't let it be long a coming then, for I am in haste.

Lord T. Madam, when I am serious, I expect a serious answer.

Lady T. Before I know the question?

Lord T. Pshaw!—Have I power, madam, to make you serious by entreaty?

Lady T. You have.

Lord T. And you promise to answer me sincerely?

Lady T. Sincerely.

Lord T. Now then, recollect your thoughts, and tell me seriously why you married me.

Lady T. You insist upon truth, you say?

Lord T. I think I have a right to it.

Lady T. Why then, my lord, to give you at once a proof of my obedience and sincerity—I think—I married—to take off that restraint that lay upon my pleasures while I was a single woman.

Lord T. How, madam! is any woman under less restraint after marriage than before it?

Lady T. Oh, my lord, my lord! they are quite different creatures! Wives have infinite liberties in life, that would be terrible in an unmarried woman to take.

Lord T. Name one.

Lady T. Fifty, if you please—To begin, then—in the morning—A married woman may have men at her toilet—invite them to dinner—appoint them a party in the stage-box at the play—engross the conversation there—call them by their christian names—talk louder than the players: from thence, clatter again to this end of the town—break, with the morning, into an assembly—crowd to the batard-table—throw a familiar levant upon some sharp, lurching man of quality, and if he demands his money, turn it off with a loud laugh, and cry you'll owe it him, to vex him, ha, ha!

Lord T. Prodigious!

[Aside.

Lady T. These now, my lord, are some few of the many modish amusements that distinguish the privilege of a wife from that of a single woman.

Lord T. Death, madam! what law has made these liberties less scandalous in a wife than in an unmarried woman?

Lady T. Why, the strongest law in the world, custom—custom, time out of mind, my lord.

Lord T. Custom, madam, is the law of fools; but it shall never govern me.

Lady T. Nay then, my lord, 'tis time for me to observe the laws of prudence.

Lord T. I wish I could see an instance of it.

Lady T. You shall have one this moment, my lord; for I think when a man begins to lose his temper at home, if a woman has any prudence, why she'll go abroad till he comes to himself again.

[Going.

Lord T. Hold, madam; I am amazed you are not more uneasy at the life we lead. You don't want sense, and yet seem void of all humanity; for, with a blush I say it, I think I have not wanted love.

Lady T. Oh, don't say that, my lord, if you suppose I have my senses.

Lord T. What is it I have done to you? What can you complain of?

Lady T. Oh, nothing, in the least! 'Tis true you have heard me say I have owed my lord Lurcher a hundred pounds these three weeks; but what then? a husband is not liable to his wife's debts of honour, you know; and if a silly woman will be uneasy about money she can't be sued for, what's that to him? As long as he loves her, to be sure, she can have nothing to complain of.

Lord T. By heaven, if my whole fortune, thrown into your lap, could make you delight in the cheerful duties of a wife, I should think myself a gainer by the purchase.

Lady T. That is, my lord, I might receive your whole estate, provided you were sure I would not spend a shilling of it.

Lord T. No, madam; were I master of your heart, your pleasures would be mine; but, different as they are, I'll feed even your follies to deserve it—Perhaps you may have some other trifling debts of honour abroad, that keep you out of humour at home—at least it shall not be my fault if I have not more of your company—There, there's a bill of five hundred—and now, madam—

Lady T. And now, my lord, down to the ground, I thank you.

Lord T. If it be no offence, madam—

Lady T. Say what you please, my lord; I am in that harmony of spirits, it is impossible to put me out of humour.

Lord T. How long, in reason then, do you think that sum ought to last you?

Lady T. Oh, my dear, dear lord, now you have spoiled all again! how is it possible I should answer for an event that so utterly depends upon fortune? But to show you that I am more inclined to get money than to throw it away, I have a strong prepossession that with this five hundred I shall win five thousand.

Lord T. Madam, if you were to win ten thousand, it would be no satisfaction to me.

Lady T. Oh, the churl! ten thousand: what! not so much as wish I might win ten thousand!—Ten thousand! Oh, the charming sum! what infinite pretty things might a woman of spirit do with ten thousand guineas! O my conscience, if she were a woman of true spirit—she—she might lose them all again.

Lord T. And I had rather it should be so, madam, provided I could be sure that were the last you would lose.

Lady T. Well, my lord, to let you see I design to play all the good housewife I can, I am now going to a party at quadrille, only to trifle with a little of it, at poor two guineas a fist with the duchess of Quiteright. [Exit.]

Lora T. Insensible creature! neither reproaches nor indulgence, kindness nor severity, can wake her to the least reflection! Continual licence has lulld her into such a lethargy of care, that she speaks of her excesses with the same easy confidence as if they were so many virtues. What a turn has her head taken!—But how to cure it—take my friend's opinion—Manly will speak freely—my sister with tenderness to both sides. They know my case—I'll talk with them.

Enter WILLIAMS.

Wil. Mr. Manly, my lord, has sent to know if your lordship was at home.

Lord T. They did not deny me?

Wil. No, my lord.

Lord T. Very well; step up to my sister, and say I desire to speak with her.

Wil. Lady Grace is here, my lord. [Exit.]

Enter LADY GRACE.

Lord T. So, lady fair, what pretty weapon have you been killing your time with?

Lady G. A huge folio, that has almost killed me—I think I have half read my eyes out.

Lord T. Oh! you should not pore so much just after dinner, child.

Lady G. That's true; but any body's thoughts are better than always one's own, you know.

Lord T. Who's there?

Re-enter WILLIAMS.

Leave word at the door I am at home to nobody but Mr. Manly. [Exit Williams.]

Lady G. And why is he excepted, pray, my lord?

Lord T. I hope, madam, you have no objection to his company?

Lady G. Your particular orders, upon my being here, look indeed as if you thought I had not.

Lord T. And your ladyship's inquiry into the reason of those orders shows, at least, it was not a matter indifferent to you.

Lady G. Lord, you make the oddest constructions, brother!

Lord T. Look you, my grave lady Grace—in one serious word—I wish you had him.

Lady G. I can't help that.

Lord T. Ha! you can't help it, ha, ha! The flat simplicity of that reply was admirable.

Lady G. Pooh, you tease one, brother!

Lord T. Come, I beg pardon, child—this is not a point, I grant you, to trifle upon; therefore I hope you'll give me leave to be serious.

Lady G. If you desire it, brother; though, upon my word, as to Mr. Manly's having any serious thoughts of me—I know nothing of it.

Lord T. Well—there's nothing wrong in your making a doubt of it—But, in short, I find by his conversation of late, he has been looking round the world for a wife; and if you were to look round the world for a husband, he is the first man I would give to you.

Lady G. Then whenever he makes me any offer, brother, I will certainly tell you of it.

Lord T. Oh, that's the last thing he'll do! he'll never make you an offer till he's pretty sure it won't be refused.

Lady G. Now you make me curious. Pray did he ever make any offer of that kind to you?

Lord T. Not directly—but that imports nothing; he is a man too well acquainted with the female world to be brought into a high opinion of any one woman, without some well-examined proof of her merit; yet I have reason to believe that your good sense, your turn of mind, and your way of life, have brought him to so favourable a one of you, that a few days will reduce him to talk plainly to me; which, as yet, notwithstanding our friendship, I have neither declined nor encouraged him to do.

Lady G. I am mighty glad we are so near in our way of thinking; for, to tell you the truth, he is much upon the same terms with me: you know he has a satirical turn; but never lashes any folly, without giving due encomiums to its opposite virtue; and, upon such occasions, he is sometimes particular in turning his compliments upon me, which I don't receive with any reserve, lest he should imagine I take them to myself.

Lord T. You are right, child; when a man of merit makes his addresses, good sense may give him an answer without scorn or coquetry.

Lady G. Hush! he's here—

Enter MANLY.

Man. My lord, your most obedient.

Lord T. Dear Manly, yours—I was thinking to send to you.

Man. Then I am glad I am here, my lord—Lady Grace, I kiss your hands—What, only you two?—How many visits may a man make before he falls into such unfashionable company! A brother and sister, soberly sitting at home, when the whole town is a gadding; I question if there is so particular a tête-à-tête again in the whole parish of St. James's.

Lady G. Fie, fie, Mr. Manly, how censorious you are!

Man. I had not made the reflection, madam, but that I saw you an exception to it—Where's my lady?

Lord T. That, I believe, is impossible to guess.

Man. Then I won't try, my lord.

Lord T. But 'tis probable I may hear of her by that time I have been four or five hours in bed.

Man. Now if that were my case—I believe I—But I beg pardon, my lord.

Lord T. Indeed, sir, you shall not: you will oblige me if you speak out; for it was upon this head I wanted to see you.

Man. Why then, my lord, since you oblige me to proceed—I have often thought that the misconduct of my lady has, in a great measure, been owing to your lordship's treatment of her.

Lady G. Bless me!

Lord T. My treatment?

Man. Ay, my lord; you so idolized her before marriage, that you even indulged her like a mistress after it: in short, you continued the lover when you should have taken up the husband; and so, by giving her more power than was needful, she has none where she wants it; having such entire possession of you, she is not mistress of herself.—And, mercy on us! how many fine women's heads have been turned upon the same occasion!

Lord T. Oh, Manly, 'tis too true! there's the source of my disquiet; she knows, and has abused her power.

Man. However, since you have had so much patience, my lord, even go on with it a day or two more; and, upon her ladyship's next sally, be a little rounder in your expostulations: if that don't work—drop her some cool hints of a determined reformation, and leave her—to breakfast upon them.

Lord T. You are perfectly right. How valuable is a friend in our anxiety!

Man. Therefore, to divert that, my lord, I beg, for the present, we may call another cause.

Lady G. Ay, for goodness' sake, let us have done with this

Lord T. With all my heart.

Lady G. Have you no news abroad, Mr. Manly?

Man. Apropos—I have some, madam; and I believe, my lord, as extraordinary in its kind—

Lord T. Pray let us have it.

Man. Do you know that your country neighbour, and my wise kinsman, sir Francis Wronghead, is coming to town with his whole family?

Lord T. The fool! what can be his business here?

Man. Oh! of the last importance, I'll assure you—No less than the business of the nation.

Lord T. Explain.

Man. He has carried his election—against sir John Worthland.

Lord T. The deuce! What! for—for—

Man. The famous borough of Guzzledown.

Lord T. A proper representative indeed!

Lady G. Pray, Mr. Manly, don't I know him?

Man. You have dined with him, madam, when I was last down with my lord at Bellmont.

Lady G. Was not that he that got a little merry before dinner, and upset the tea-table in making his compliments to my lady?

Man. The same.

Lady G. Pray what are his circumstances? I know but very little of him.

Man. Then he is worth your knowing, I can tell you, madam. His estate, if clear, I believe, might be a good two thousand pounds a year; though, as it was left him saddled with two jointures and two weighty mortgages upon it, there is no saying what it is—But that he might be sure never to mend it, he married a profuse young hussy for love, without a penny of money. Thus having, like his brave ancestors, provided heirs for the family, he now finds children and interest-money make such a bawling about his ears, that at last he has taken the friendly advice of his kinsman, the good lord Danglecourt, to run his estate two thousand pounds more in debt, to put the whole management of what is left into Paul Pillage's hands, that he may be at leisure himself to retrieve his affairs, by being a parliament man.

Lord T. A most admirable scheme indeed!

Man. And with this politic prospect he is now upon his journey to London—

Lord T. What can it end in?

Man. Pooh! a journey into the country again.

Lord T. Do you think he'll stir till his money is gone, or at least till the session is over?

Man. If my intelligence is right, my lord, he won't sit long enough to give his vote for a turnpike.

Lord T. How so?

Man. Oh, a bitter business; he had scarce a vote in the whole town besides the returning officer. Sir John will certainly have it heard at the bar of the house, and send him about his business again.

Lord T. Then he has made a fine business of it indeed.

Man. Which, as far as my little interest will go, shall be done in as few days as possible.

Lady G. But why would you ruin the poor gentleman's fortune, Mr. Manly?

Man. No, madam, I would only spoil his project to save his fortune.

Lady G. How are you concerned enough to do either?

Man. Why—I have some obligations to the family, madam: I enjoy at this time a pretty estate which sir Francis was heir at law to; but—by his being a booby, the last will of an obstinate old uncle gave it to me.

Re-enter WILLIAMS.

Wil. [To Manly] Sir, here is one of your servants, from your house, desires to speak with you.

Man. Will you give him leave to come in, my lord?

Lord T. Sir—the ceremony's of your own making. [Exit Williams.]

Enter JAMES.

Man. Well, James, what's the matter?

James. Sir, here is John Moody just come to town: he says sir Francis and all the family will be here to-night, and is in a great hurry to speak with you.

Man. Where is he?

James. At our house, sir: he has been gaping and stumping about the streets, in his dirty boots, and asking every one he meets if they can tell him where he may have a good lodging for a parliament man, till he can hire a handsome whole house, fit for all his family, for the winter.

Man. I am afraid, my lord, I must wait upon Mr. Moody.

Lord T. Prythee let us have him here; he will divert us.

Man. Oh, my lord, he's such a cub! Not but he's so near common sense, that he passes for a wit in the family.

Lady G. I beg of all things we may have him; I am in love with nature, let her dress be never so homely.

Man. Then desire him to come hither, James. [Exit James.]

Lady G. Pray what may be Mr. Moody's post?

Man. Oh! his maître-d'hôtel, his butler, his bailiff, his hind, his huntsman, and sometimes—his companion.

Lord T. It runs in my head that the moment this knight has set him down in the house, he will get up to give them the earliest proof of what importance he is to the public in his own county.

Man. Yes, and when they have heard him, he will find that his utmost importance stands valued at—sometimes being invited to dinner.

Lady G. And her ladyship, I suppose, will make as considerable a figure in her sphere too?

Man. That you may depend upon; for (if I don't mistake) she has ten times more of the jade in her than she yet knows of: and she will so improve in this rich soil in a month, that she will visit all the ladies that will let her into their houses, and run in debt to all the shopkeepers that will let her into their books: in short, before her important spouse has made five pounds by his eloquence at Westminster, she will have lost five hundred at dice and quadrille in the parish of St. James's.

Lord T. So that, by that time he is declared unduly elected,<sup>1)</sup> a swarm of duns will be ready for their money, and his worship—will be ready for a gaol.

Man. Yes, yes, that I reckon will close the account of this hopeful journey to London—But see, here comes the fore horse of the team!

Enter JOHN MOODY.

Oh, honest John!

Moody. Ad's waunds<sup>2)</sup> and heart, measter Manly! I'm glad I ha' fun<sup>3)</sup> ye. Lawd, lawd, give me your hand! Why that's friendly naw. Flesh! I thought we would never ha' got hither. Well, and how do you do, measter?—Good lack! I beg pardon for my hawldness—I did not see 'at his honour was here.

Lord T. Mr. Moody, your servant: I am glad to see you in London: I hope all the good family are well?

Moody. Thanks be praised, your honour, they are all in pretty good heart, tho' we have had a power of crosses upo' the road.

Lady G. I hope my lady has had no hurt, Mr. Moody?

Moody. Noa, and please your ladyship, she was never in better humour: there's money enough stirring now.

Man. What has been the matter, John?

1) A sad proof of the want of purity in the election of the members of Parliament.

2) This is a specimen of the dialect of the people in the north of England, where they pronounce almost as broad as the Scotch, so that, if we compare the change of orthography with the difference of pronunciation, we shall easily be able to understand: for instance, waunds for wounds, lawd for lord, naw for now, etc.

3) Found.

Moody. Why, we came up in such a hurry, you mun<sup>1)</sup> think that our tackle was not so tight as it should be.

Man. Come, tell us all.

Lord T. Come, let us sit down.

[They take Chairs.]

Man. Pray how do they travel?

Moody. Why, i'the awld coach, measter; and 'cause my lady loves to do things handsome, to be sure, she would have a couple of cart-horses clapped to the four old geldings, that neighbours might see she went up to London in her coach and six; and so Giles Joulter, the ploughman, rides postillion.

Man. Very well! The journey sets out as it should do. [Aside] What, do they bring all the children with them too?

Moody. Noa, noa, only the younk squoire and miss Jenny. The other foive<sup>2)</sup> are all out at board, at half-a-crown a head a week, with John Growse, at Smokedunghill farm.

Man. Good again! a right English academy for younger children!

Moody. Anon, sir. [Not understanding him.]

Lord T. And when do you expect them here, John?

Moody. Nay, nay, for that matter, madam, they're i'very good hands; Joan loves 'em as tho' they were all her own; for she was wet nurse to every mother's babe o'um—Ay, ay, they'll ne'er want a bellyful there. Why we were in hopes to ha' come yesterday, an it had no' been that th' awld weazlebelly horse tired: and then we were so cruelly loaden that the two fore wheels came crash down at once in Vwaggon-rut-lane, and there we lost four hours 'fore we could set things to rights again.

Man. So they bring all the baggage with the coach, then?

Moody. Ay, ay, and good store on it there is—Why my lady's geer alone were as much as filled four portmantel trunks, beside the great deal box that heavy Ralph<sup>3)</sup> and the monkey sit upon behind.

Lord T.

Lady G. } Ha, ha, ha!

Man.

Lady G. Well, Mr. Moody, and pray how many are they within the coach?

Moody. Why there's my lady, and his worship, and the younk squoire, and miss Jenny, and the fat lapdog, and my lady's maid, Mrs. Handy, and Doll Tripe the cook, that's all—Only Doll puked a little with riding backward; so they hoisted her into the coach-box, and then her stomach was easy.

Lady G. Oh, I see them! I see them go by me. Ha, ha! [Laughing.]

Moody. Then you mun think, measter, there was some stowage for the belly as well as the back too; children are apt to be famished upon the road; so we had such cargoes of plum-cake, and baskets of tongues, and biscuits, and cheese, and cold boiled beef—And then, in case of sickness, bottles of cherry brandy, plague water, sack, tent, and strong beer so plenty as made th' awld coach crack again. Mercy upon them! and send them all well to town, I say.

Man. Ay, and well out on't again, John.

Moody. Odds bud, measter! you're a wise

1) Must. 2) Five. 3) The name of a dog.

man; and for that matter, so am I—VWhoam's<sup>1)</sup> whoam, I say: I am sure we ha' got but little good e'er sin we turned our backs on't. Nothing but mischief! Some devil's trick or other plagued us aw<sup>2)</sup> the day lung. Crack goes one thing! bawnee goes another! VVoa!<sup>3)</sup> says Roger—Then sowse! we are all set fast in a slough. VVhaw, cries miss! Scream go the maids! and bawl just as tho'f they were stuck. And so, mercy on us! this was the trade from morning to night. But my lady was in such a murrain haste to be here, that set out she 'would, tho'f I told her it was Childermas day.<sup>4)</sup>

Man. These ladies, these ladies, John—

Moody. Ay, measter! I ha' seen a little of them: and I find that the best—when she's mended, won't ha' much goodness to spare.

Lord T. VVell said, John—Ha, ha!

Man. I hope, at least, you and your good woman agree still.

Moody. Ay, ay, much of a muchness. Bridget sticks to me; though as for her goodness—why, she was willing to come to London too—But hault a bit! Noa, noa, says I, there may be mischief enough done without you.

Man. VVhy that was bravely spoken, John, and like a man.

Moody. Ah, weast heart! were measter but hawf the mon that I am—Odds wookers! tho'f he'll speak stautly too sometimes—But then he canno' hawld it—no, he canno' hawld it.

Lord T.

Lady G. } Ha, ha, ha!

Man.

Moody. Odds flesh! but I mun hie me whoam; the coach will be coming every hour naw—but measter charged me to find your worship out; for he has hugey business with you, and will certainly wait upon you by that time he can put on a clean neckcloth.

Man. Oh, John, I'll wait upon him.

Moody. VVhy you wonno' be so kind, wull ye?

Man. If you'll tell me where you lodge.

Moody. Just i'the street next to where your worship dwells, at the sign of the Golden-ball—its gold all over, where they sell ribbons and flappits, and other sort of geer for gentlewomen.

Man. A milliner's?

Moody. Ay, ay, one Mrs. Motherly. VVaunds, she has a couple of clever girls there stitching i'th' forerroom.

Man. Yes, yes, she's a woman of good business, no doubt on't—VWho recommended that house to you, John?

Moody. The greatest good fortune in the world, sure; for as I was gaping about the streets, who should look out of the window there but the fine gentleman that was always riding by our coach side at York races—Count Basset; ay, that's he.

Man. Basset! Oh, I remember; I know him by sight.

Moody. VVell, to be sure, as civil a gentleman to see to—

Man. As any sharper in town. [Aside.

Lord T. My service to sir Francis and my lady, John.

Lady G. And mine pray, Mr. Moody.

Moody. Ay, your honours; they'll be proud on't, I dare say.

Man. I'll bring my compliments myself: so, honest John—

Moody. Dear measter Manly! the goodness of goodness bless and preserve you! [Exit.

Lord T. VVhat a natural creature 'tis!

Lady G. VVell, I can't but think, John, in a wet afternoon, in the country, must be very good company.

Lord T. Oh, the tramontane! If this were known at half the quadrille tables in town, they would lay down their cards to laugh at you.

Lady G. And the minute they took them up again they would do the same at the losers—But to let you see that I think good company may sometimes want cards to keep them together, what think you, if we three sat soberly down to kill an hour at ombre?

Man. I shall be too hard for you, madam.

Lady G. No matter, I shall have as much advantage of my lord as you have of me.

Lord T. Say you so, madam? have at you then. Here! get the ombre table and cards.

[Exit.

Lady G. Come, Mr. Manly—I know you don't forgive me now.

Man. I don't know whether I ought to forgive your thinking so, madam. VVhere do you imagine I could pass my time so agreeably?

Lady G. I'm sorry my lord is not here to take his share of the compliment—But he'll wonder what's become of us. [Exit.

Man. It must be so—She sees I love her—yet with what unoffending decency she avoids an explanation! How amiable is every hour of her conduct! VVhat a vile opinion have I had of the whole sex for these ten years past, which this sensible creature has recovered in less than one! Such a companion, sure, might compensate all the irksome disappointment that folly and falsehood ever gave me!

Could women regulate, like her, their lives,
VVhat halcyon days were in the gift of wives;
Vain rovers then might envy what they hate,
And only fools would mock the married state.

[Exit.

ACT II.

SCENE I.—MRS. MOTHERLY'S House.

Enter COUNT BASSET and MYRTILLA.

Count B. Myrtilla, how dost thou do, child?

Myr. As well as a losing gamester can.

Count B. Pshaw! hang these melancholy thoughts! Suppose I should help thee to a good husband?

Myr. I suppose you'll think any one good enough, that will take me off o'your hands.

Count B. VVhat do you think of the young country squire, the heir of the family that's coming to lodge here?

Myr. How should I know what to think of him?

Count B. Nay, I only give you the hint, child; it may be worth your while at least to look about you.

Enter MRS. MOTHERLY, in haste.

Mrs. M. Sir! sir! the gentleman's coach is at the door; they are all come.

Count B. What, already?

Mrs. M. They are just getting out!—Won't you step and lead in my lady? Do you be in the way, niece; I must run and receive them.

Count B. And think of what I told you. [Exit.]

Myr. A faithless fellow! I am sure I have been true to him; and, for that only reason, he wants to be rid of me. But while women are weak, men will be rogues.

Enter MRS. MOTHERLY, showing in LADY VVRONGHEAD, led by COUNT BASSET.

Mrs. M. If your ladyship pleases to walk into this parlour, madam, only for the present, till your servants have got all your things in.

Lady W. Well, dear sir, this is so infinitely obliging—I protest it gives me pain, though, to turn you out of your lodging thus.

Count B. No trouble in the least, madam: we single fellows are soon moved; besides, Mrs. Motherly's my old acquaintance, and I could not be her hinderance.

Mrs. M. The count is so well-bred, madam, I dare say he would do a great deal more to accommodate your ladyship.

Lady W. Oh, dear madam!—A good, well-bred sort of a woman. [Apart to the Count.]

Count B. Oh, madam! she is very much among people of quality; she is seldom without them in her house.

Lady W. Are there a good many people of quality in this street, Mrs. Motherly?

Mrs. M. Now your ladyship is here, madam, I don't believe there is a house without them.

Lady W. I am mighty glad of that; for, really, I think people of quality should always live among one another.

Count B. 'Twas what one would choose, indeed, madam.

Lady W. Bless me! but where are the children all this while?

Sir F. [Without] John Moody! stay you by the coach, and see all our things out—Come, children.

Enter SIR FRANCIS VVRONGHEAD, SQUIRE RICHARD, and MISS JENNY.

Sir F. Well, count, I mun say it, this was koynd<sup>1</sup>), indeed.

Count B. Sir Francis, give me leave to bid you welcome to London.

Sir F. Pshaw! how dost do, mon?—Vvaunds, I'm glad to see thee! A good sort of a house this.

Count B. Is not that master Richard?

Sir F. Ey, ey, that's young hopeful—Why dost not baw, Dick?

Squire R. So I do, feyther.

Count B. Sir, I'm glad to see you—I protest, Mrs. Jane is grown so, I should not have known her.

Sir F. Come forward, Jenny.

Jenny. Sure, papa! do you think I don't know how to behave myself?

Count B. If I have permission to approach her, sir Francis.

Jenny. Lord, sir, I'm in such a frightful pickle!— [Salute.]

Count B. Every dress that's proper must become you, madam—you have been a long journey.

<sup>1</sup>) Kind.

Jenny. I hope you will see me in a better to-morrow, sir.

[Lady W. whispers Mrs. M. pointing to Myr.]
Mrs. M. Only a niece of mine, madam, that lives with me: she will be proud to give your ladyship any assistance in her power.

Lady W. A pretty sort of a young woman—Jenny, you two must be acquainted.

Jenny. Oh, mamma, I am never strange in a strange place. [Salutes Myrtilla.]

Myr. You do me a great deal of honour, madam—Madam, your ladyship's welcome to London.

Jenny. Mamma, I like her prodigiously; she called me my ladyship.

Squire R. Pray, mother, mayn't I be acquainted with her too?

Lady W. You, you clown! stay till you learn a little more breeding first.

Sir F. Odds heart, my lady VWronghead! why do you baulk the lad? how should he ever learn breeding, if he does not put himself forward?

Squire R. Why, ay, feyther, does mother think that I'd be uncivil to her?

Myr. Master has so much good humour, madam, he would soon gain upon any body. [He kisses Myrtilla.]

Squire R. Lo' you there, mother! and you would but be quiet, she and I should do well enough.

Lady W. Why, how now, sirrah! boys must not be so familiar.

Squire R. Why, an I know nobody, how the murrain mun I pass my time here, in a strange place? Naw you and I, and sister, forsooth, sometimes, in an afternoon, may play at one and thirty bone-ace, purely.

Jenny. Speak for yourself, sir: d'ye think I play at such clownish games?

Squire R. Why, and you woant yo' ma' let it aloane; then she and I, mayhap, will have a bawt<sup>1</sup>) at all-fours<sup>2</sup>), without you.

Sir F. Noa, noa, Dick, that won't do neither; you mun learn to make one at ombre, here, child.

Myr. If master pleases, I'll show it him.

Squire R. What, the Humber! Hoy-day! why, does our river run to this tawn, feyther?

Sir F. Pooh! you silly tony! ombre is a geam at cards, that the better sort of people play three together at.

Squire R. Nay, the moare the merrier, I say; but sister is always so cross-grained—

Jenny. Lord! this boy is enough to deaf people—and one has really been stuffed up in a coach so long that—Pray, madam—could not I get a little powder<sup>3</sup>) for my hair?

Myr. If you please to come along with me, madam. [Exeunt Myrtilla and Jenny.]

Squire R. What, has sister taken her away naw! mess, I'll go and have a little game with them. [Exit.]

Lady W. Well, count, I hope you wont so far change your lodgings, but you will come and be at home here sometimes.

Sir F. Ay, ay, pr'ythee, come and take a bit of mutton with us, naw and tan<sup>4</sup>), when thou'st nought to do.

Count B. Well, sir Francis, you shall find I'll make but very little ceremony.

Sir F. Why, ay now, that's hearty!

Mrs. M. Will your ladyship please to refresh yourself with a dish of tea, after your fatigue?

Lady W. If you please, Mrs. Motherly; but I believe we had best have it above stairs.

[Exit Mrs. Motherly] Won't you walk up sir?

Sir F. Moody!

Count B. 'Shan't we stay for sir Francis, madam?

Lady W. Lard, don't mind him! he will come if he likes it.

Sir F. Ay, ay, ne'er heed me—I have things to look after.

[Exit Lady Wronghead and Count Basset.]

Enter JOHN MOODY.

Moody. Did your worship want, muh? <sup>1)</sup>

Sir F. Ay, is the coach cleared, and all our things in?

Moody. Aw but a few band-boxes and the nook that's left o'the goose poy <sup>2)</sup>—But, a plague on him, the monkey has gin us the slip, I think—I suppose he's goon to see his relations; for here looks to be a power of um in this tawn—but heavy Ralph has skawered <sup>3)</sup> after him.

Sir F. Why, let him go to the devil! no matter and the hawnds had had him a month agoe.—But I wish the coach and horses were got safe to the inn! This is a sharp tawn, we mun look about us here, John; therefore I would have you go along with Roger, and see that nobody runs away with them before they get to the stable.

Moody. Alas a day, sir, I believe our auld cattle won't yeasly <sup>4)</sup> be run away with to night—but howsomdever, we'st ta' <sup>5)</sup> the best care we can of um, poor sawls.

Sir F. Well, well, make haste then—

Moody goes out and returns.

Moody. Odds flesh! here's master Monly come to wait upo' your worship!

Sir F. Where is he?

Moody. Just coming in at threshold.

Sir F. Then goa about your business.

[Exit Moody.]

Enter MANLY.

Cousin Manly! sir, I am your very humble servant.

Man. I heard you were come, sir Francis—and—

Sir F. Odds heart! this was so kindly done of you, naw!

Man. I wish you may think it so, cousin! for, I confess, I should have been better pleased to have seen you in any other place.

Sir F. How soa, sir?

Man. Nay, 'tis for your own sake; I'm not concerned.

Sir F. Look you, cousin; tho' I know you wish me well, yet I don't question I shall give you such weighty reasons for what I have done, that you will say, sir, this is the wisest journey that ever I made in my life.

Man. I think it ought to be, cousin; for I believe you will find it the most expensive one—your election did not cost you a trifle, I suppose.

Sir F. Why, ay! it's true! That—that did lick in a little; but if a man's wise (and I han't fawnd yet that I'm a fool), there are ways, cousin, to lick one's self whole again.

Man. Nay, if you have that secret—

Sir F. Don't you be fearful, cousin—you'll find that I know something.

Man. If it be any thing for your good, I should be glad to know it too.

Sir F. In short then, I have a friend in a corner, that has let me a little into what's what, at Westminster—that's one thing.

Man. Very well! but what good is that to do you?

Sir F. Why not me, as much as it does other folks?

Man. Other people, I doubt, have the advantage of different qualifications.

Sir F. Why, ay! there's it naw! you'll say that I have lived all my days i'the country—what then?—I'm o'the quorum—I have been at sessions, and I have made speeches there! ay, and at vestry too—and, mayhap, they may find here—that I have brought my tongue up to town with me! D'ye take me naw?

Man. If I take your case right, cousin, I am afraid the first occasion you will have for your eloquence here, will be, to show whether you have any right to make use of it at all.

Sir F. How d'ye mean?

Man. That sir John Worthland has lodged a petition against you.

Sir F. Petition! why, ay! there let it lie—we'll find a way to deal with that, I warrant you!—Why you forget, cousin, sir John's o'the wrung side <sup>1)</sup>, mon!

Man. I doubt, sir Francis, that will do you but little service; for, in cases very notorious, which I take yours to be, there is such a thing as a short day, and dispatching them immediately.

Sir F. With all my heart! the sooner I send him home again the better.

Man. And this is the scheme you have laid down to repair your fortune?

Sir F. In one word cousin, I think it my duty. The Wrongheads have been a considerable family ever since England was England: and since the world knows I have talents wherewithal, they shan't say it's my fault, if I don't make as good a figure as any that ever were at the head on't.

Man. Nay, this project, as you have laid it, will come up to any thing your ancestors have done these five hundred years.

Sir F. And let me alone to work it: mayhap I hav'n't told you all, neither—

Man. You astonish me! what, and is it full as practicable as what you have told me?

Sir F. Ay, tho' I say it—every whit, cousin. You'll find that I have more irons i'the fire than one; I doan't come of a fool's errand!

Man. Very well.

Sir F. In a word, my wife has got a friend at court as well as myself, and her dowghter Jenny is naw pretty well grown up—

Man. And what, in the devil's name, would he do with the dowdy? [Aside.]

1) Mo. 2) Goose pie. 3) Scowered, runs
4) Emil 5) Take.

1) Not to be of the king's party in the house.—Shall we never have a neutral party, patriotic enough, to side with neither king nor opposition?

Sir F. Naw, if I doan't lay in for a husband for her, mayhap, i'this tawn, she may be looking out for herself—

Man. Not unlikely.

Sir F. Therefore I have some thoughts of getting her to be maid of honour.

Man. Oh, he has taken my breath away! but I must hear him out. [Aside] Pray, sir Francis, do you think her education has yet qualified her for a court.

Sir F. VVhy, the girl is a little too mettlesome, it's true; but she has tongue enough: she woan't be dash'd! Then she shall learn to dance forthwith, and that will soon teach her how to stond still, you know.

Man. Very well, but when she is thus accomplished, you must still wait for a vacancy.

Sir F. VVhy I hope one has a good chance for that every day, cousin; for if I take it right, that's a post that folks are not more willing to get into than they are to get out of—It's like an orange-tree upon that accawnt—it will bear blossoms, and fruit that's ready to drop, at the same time.

Man. VVell, sir, you best know how to make good your pretensions. But pray where is my lady and my young cousin? I should be glad to see them too.

Sir F. She is but just taking a dish of tea with the count and my landlady—I'll call her dawn.

Man. No, no; if she's engaged, I shall call again.

Sir F. Odds heart! but you mun see her naw, cousin: what! the best friend I have in the world!—Here, sweetheart! [To a Servant without] pr'ythee desire the lady and the gentleman to come down a bit; tell her here's cousin Manly come to wait upon her.

Man. Pray, sir, who may the gentleman be?

Sir F. You mun know him to be sure; why, it's count Basset.

Man. Oh, is it he!—Your family will be infinitely happy in his acquaintance.

Sir F. Troth, I think so too: he's the civilest man that ever I knew in my life—VVhy, here he would go out of his own lodgings, at an hour's warning, purely to oblige my family. VVasn't that kind naw?

Man. Extremely civil—The family is in admirable hands already [Aside].

Sir F. Then my lady likes him hugely—all the time of York races she would never be without him.

Man. That was happy indeed! and a prudent man, you know, should always take care that his wife may have innocent company.

Sir F. VVhy, ay! that's it! and I think there could not be such another!

Man. VVhy truly, for her purpose, I think not.

Sir F. Oply naw and tan, he—he stonds a little too much upon ceremony; that's his fault.

Man. Oh, never fear! he'll mend that every day—Mercy on us! what a head he has! [Aside].

Sir F. So here they come.

Enter LADY VVRONGHEAD and COUNT BASSET.

Lady W. Cousin Manly, this is infinitely obliging; I am extremely glad to see you.

Man. Your most obedient servant, madam; I am glad to see your ladyship look so well after your journey.

Lady W. VVhy really coming to London is apt to put a little more life into one's looks.

Man. Yet the way of living here is very apt to deaden the complexion—and give me leave to tell you, as a friend, madam, you are come to the worst place in the world for a good woman to grow better in.

Lady W. Lord, cousin, how should people ever make any figure in life, that are always moped up in the country?

Count B. Your ladyship certainly takes the thing in a quite right light, madam. Mr. Manly, your humble servant—a hem.

Man. Familiar puppy! [Aside] Sir, your most obedient—I must be civil to the rascal, to cover my suspicion of him. [Aside].

Count B. VVas you at White's<sup>1)</sup> this morning, sir?

Man. Yes, sir, I just called in.

Count B. Pray—what—was there any thing done there?

Man. Much as usual, sir; the same daily carcasses, and the same crows about them.

Count B. The Demoivre baronet had a bloody tumble yesterday.

Man. I hope, sir, you had your share of him.

Count B. No, faith; I came in when it was all over—I think I just made a couple of bets with him, took up a cool hundred, and so went to the King's arms.

Lady W. VVhat a genteel easy manner he has! [Aside].

Man. A very hopeful acquaintance I have made here. [Aside].

Enter SQUIRE RICHARD, with a wet brown Paper on his Face.

Sir F. How naw, Dick; what's the matter with thy forehead, lad?

Squire R. I ha' gotten a knock upon't.

Lady W. And how did you come by it, you heedless creature?

Squire R. VVhy, I was but running after sister, and t'other young woman, into a little room just naw; and so with that they slapped the door full in my face, and gave me such a whurr here—I thought they had beaten my brains out; so I got a dab of whet brown paper here to swage it awhile.

Lady W. They served you right enough: will you never have done with your horse play?

Sir F. Pooh, never heed it, lad; it will be well by to-morrow—the boy has a strong head.

Man. Yes, truly, his skull seems to be of a comfortable thickness! [Aside].

Sir F. Come, Dick, here's cousin Manly—Sir, this is your godson.

Squire R. Honoured godfeyther! I crave leave to ask your blessing.

Man. Thou hast it, child—and if it will do thee any good, may it be to make thee, at least, as wise a man as thy father!

Enter Miss JENNY and Mrs. MOTHERLY.

Lady W. Oh, here's my daughter too! Miss Jenny, don't you see your cousin, child?

Man. And as for thee, my pretty dear—[Salutes her—may'st thou be, at least, as good a woman as thy mother!

Jenny. I wish I may ever be so handsome, sir.

Man. Hah, miss Pert! now that's a thought

<sup>1)</sup> A famous Hell in St. James's Street.

that seems to have been hatched in the girl on this side Highbate! [Aside.]

Sir F. Her tongue is a little nimble, sir.

Lady W. That's only from her country education, sir Francis. You know she has been kept too long there; so I brought her to London, sir, to learn a little more reserve and modesty.

Man. Oh, the best place in the world for it!—every woman she meets will teach her something of it. There's the good gentlewoman in the house looks like a knowing person; even she, perhaps, will be so good as to show her a little London behaviour.

Mrs. M. Alas, sir, miss won't stand long in need of my instruction!

Man. That, I dare say—What thou canst teach her, she will soon be mistress of. [Aside.]

Mrs. M. If she does, sir, they shall always be at her service.

Lady W. Very obliging, indeed, Mrs. Motherly!

Sir F. Very kind and civil, truly!—I think we are got into a mighty good hawse here.

Man. Oh, yes! and very friendly company.

Count B. Humph! I gad, I don't like his looks—he seems a little smoky<sup>1)</sup>—I believe I had as good brush<sup>2)</sup> off—If I stay, I don't know but he may ask me some odd questions. [Aside.]

Man. Well, sir, I believe you and I do but hinder the family.

Count B. It's very true, sir—I was just thinking of going—He don't care to leave me, I see; but it's no matter, we have time enough—[Aside.] And so, ladies, without ceremony, your humble servant.

[Exit, and drops a Letter.]

Lady W. Ha! what paper's this? Some billet-doux, I'll lay my life, but this is no place to examine it, [Puts it in her Pocket.]

Sir F. Why in such haste, cousin?

Man. Oh, my lady must have a great many affairs upon her hands after such a journey!

Lady W. I believe, sir, I shall not have much less every day, while I stay in this town, of one sort or other.

Man. Why, truly, ladies seldom want employment here, madam.

Jenny. And mamma did not come to it to be idle, sir.

Man. Nor you neither, I dare swear, my young mistress?

Jenny. I hope not, sir.

Man. Ha, miss Mettle!—Where are you going, sir?

Sir F. Only to see you to the door, sir.

Man. Oh, sir Francis, I love to come and go without ceremony!

Sir F. Nay, sir, I must do as you will have me—your humble servant. [Exit Manly.]

Jenny. This cousin Manly, papa, seems to be but of an odd sort of a crusty humour—I don't like him half so well as the count.

Sir F. Pooh! that's another thing, child—Cousin is a little proud, indeed! but, however, you must always be civil to him, for he has a deal of money; and nobody know who he may give it to.

Lady W. Pshaw! a fig for his money! you have so many projects of late, about money, since you are a parliament man! What, we must make ourselves slaves to his impertinent humours, eight or ten years, perhaps, in hopes to be his heirs! and then he will be just old enough to marry his maid.

Mrs. M. Nay, for that matter, madam, the town says he is going to be married already.

Sir F. Who! cousin Manly?

Lady W. To whom, pray?

Mrs. M. Why, is it possible your ladyship should know nothing of it?—to my lord Townly's sister, lady Grace.

Lady W. Lady Grace!

Mrs. M. Dear madam, it has been in the newspapers.

Lady W. I don't like that, neither.

Sir F. Naw I do; for then it's likely it mayn't be true.

Lady W. If it is not too far gone: at least, it may be worth one's while to throw a rub in his way. [Aside]

Squire R. Pray, feyther, haw lung will it be to supper?

Sir F. Odso, that's true! step to the cook, lad, and ask what she can get us.

Mrs. M. If you please, sir, I'll order one of my maids to show her where she may have any thing you have a mind to. [Exit.]

Sir F. Thank you kindly, Mrs. Motherly.

Squire R. Odds flesh! what, is not it i'the hawse yet?—I shall be famished—but hawld! I'll go and ask 'Doll an' there's none o'the goose poy left.

Sir F. Do so—and dost hear, Dick?—see if there's e'er a bottle o'the strong beer, that came i'th' coach with us—if there be, clap a toast in it, and bring it up.

Squire R. With a little nutmeg and sugar, shawn'a I, feyther?

Sir F. Ay, ay, as thee and I always drink it for breakfast—Go thy ways.

[Exit Squire Richard.]

Lady W. This boy is always thinking of his belly.

Sir F. Why, my dear, you may allow him to be a little hungry, after his journey.

Lady W. Nay, e'en breed him your own way—He has been cramming, in or out of the coach, all this day, I am sure—I wish my poor girl could eat a quarter as much.

Jenny. Oh, as for that, I could eat a great deal more, mamma! but then, mayhap, I should grow coarse, like him, and spoil my shape.

Enter SQUIRE RICHARD, with a full Tankard.

Squire R. Here feyther, I ha' brought it—it's well I went as I did; for our Doll had just baked a toast, and was going to drink it herself.

Sir F. Why, then, here's to thee, Dick!

[Drinks.]

Squire R. Thank you, feyther.

Lady W. Lord, sir Francis, I wonder you can encourage the boy to swill so much of that lubberly liquor! it's enough to make him quite stupid!

Squire R. Why, it never hurts me, mother; and I sleep like a hawnd after it. [Drinks.]

Sir F. I am sure I ha' drunk it these thirty

2) Slang for, to go away.

years; and, by your leave, madam, I don't know that I want wit, ha, ha!

Jenny. But you might have had a great deal more, papa, if you would have been governed by my mother.

Sir F. Daughter, he that is governed by his wife has no wit at all.

Jenny. Then I hope I shall marry a fool, sir; for I love to govern, dearly.

Sir F. You are too pert, child; it don't do well in a young woman.

Lady W. Pray, sir Francis, don't snub her; she has a fine growing spirit, and if you check her so, you will make her as dull as her brother there.

Squire R. [After a long draught] Indeed, mother, I think my sister is too forward.

Jenny. You! you think I'm too forward! sure, brother mud! your head's too heavy to think of any thing but your belly.

Lady W. Well said, miss! he's none of your master, though he is your elder brother.

Squire R. No, nor she shawn't be my mistress, while she's younger sister.

Sir F. Well said, Dick! show them that stawt liquor makes a stawt heart, lad!

Squire R. So I will! and I'll drink agen, for all her. [Drinks.]

Enter JOHN MOODY.

Sir F. So, John, how are the horses?

Moody. Troth, sir, I ha' noa good opinion o'this tawn; it's made up o'mischief, I think.

Sir F. What's the matter naw?

Moody. Why, I'll tell your worship—before we were gotten to the street end, with the coach, bere, a great luggerheaded cart, with wheels as thick as a brick wall, laid hawld on't, and has poo'd it aw to bits—crack went the perch! down goes the coach! and whang says the glasses, all to shivers! Marcy upon us!—and this be London, 'would we were aw weel in the country agen!

Jenny. What have you to do, to wish us all in the country again, Mr. Lubber? I hope we shall not go into the country again these seven years, mamma; let twenty coaches be pulled to pieces.

Sir F. Hold your tongue, Jenny!—Was Roger in no fault in all this?

Moody. Noa, sir, nor I noither. "Are not yow ashamed," says Roger to the carter, "to do such an unkind thing by strangers?"—"Noa," says he, "you humkin."—Sir, he did the thing on very purpose! and so the folks said that stood by.—"Very well," says Roger, "yow shall see what our meyster will say to ye!"—"Your meyster," says he; "your meyster may kiss my—"; and so he clapped his hand just there, and like your worship. Flesh! I thought they had better breeding in this town.

Sir F. I'll teach this rascal some, I'll warrant him! Odsbud, if I take him in hand, I'll play the devil with him!

Squire R. Ay do, seyther; have him before the parliament.

Sir F. Odsbud, and so I will!—I will make him know who I am—Where does he live?

Moody. I believe, in London, sir.

Sir F. What's the rascal's name?

Moody. I think I heard somebody call him Dick.

Squire R. What! my name?

Sir F. Where did he go?

Moody. Sir, he went home.

Sir F. Where's that?

Moody. By my troth, sir, I doan't know! I heard him say he would cross the same street again to-morrow; and if we had a mind to stand in his way, he would pool us over and over again.

Sir F. Will he so? Odzooks, get me a constable!

Lady W. Pooh, get you a good supper!—Come, sir Francis, don't put yourself in a heat, for what can't be helped, Accidents will happen to people that travel abroad to see the world—For my part, I think it's a mercy it was not overturned before we were all out on't.

Sir F. Why, ay, that's true again, my dear.

Lady W. Therefore, see to-morrow if we can buy one at second hand, for present use; so bespeak a new one, and then all's easy.

Moody. Why, troth, sir, I don't think this could have held you above a day longer.

Sir F. D'ye think so, John?

Moody. Why, you ha' had it, ever since your worship were high sheriff.

Sir F. Why, then, go and see what Doll has got us for supper—and come, and get off my boots. [Exeunt.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—LORD TOWNLY'S House.

Enter LORD TOWNLY and WILLIAMS.

Lord T. Who's there?

Wil. My lord!

Lord T. Bid them get dinner—

[Exit Williams.]

Enter LADY GRACE.

Lady Grace, your servant!

Lady G. What, is the house up already?—My lady is not dressed yet.

Lord T. No matter—it's five o'clock—she may break my rest, but she shall not alter my hours.

Lady G. Nay, you need not fear that now, for she dines abroad.

Lord T. That, I suppose, is only an excuse for her not being ready yet.

Lady G. No, upon my word, she is engaged in company.

Lord T. But, pr'ythee, sister, what humour is she in to-day?

Lady G. Oh, in tip-top spirits, I can assure you!—she won a good deal last night.

Lord T. I know no difference between her winning or losing, while she continues her course of life.

Lady G. However she is better in good humour than bad.

Lord T. Much alike: when she is in good humour, other people only are the better for it—when in a very ill humour, then indeed I seldom fail to have a share of her.

Lady G. Well, we won't talk of that now—Does any body dine here?

Lord T. Manly promised me—By the way, madam, what do you think of his last conversation?

Lady G. I am a little at a stand about it.

Lord T. How so?

Lady G. Why—I have received a letter

this morning, that shows him a very different man from what I thought him.

Lord T. A letter! from whom?

Lady G. That I don't know; but there it is.

[Gives a Letter.]

Lord T. Pray let's see—

[Reads.]

The enclosed, madam, fell accidentally into my hands: if it no way concerns you, you will only have the trouble of reading this, from your sincere friend, and humble servant unknown, etc.

Lady G. And this was the enclosed.

[Gives another.]

Lord T. [Reads]

To Charles Manly esq.

Your manner of living with me of late, convinces me that I now grow as painful to you as to myself; but, however, though you can love me no longer, I hope you will not let me live worse than I did before I left an honest income for the vain hopes of being ever yours,

MYRTILLA DUPE.

P. S. 'Tis above four months since I received a shilling from you.

Lady G. What think you now?

Lord T. I am considering—

Lady G. You see it's directed to him?

Lord T. That's true; but the postscript seems to be a reproach that I think he is not capable of deserving.

Lady G. But who could have concern enough to send it to me?

Lord T. I have observed that these sort of letters from unknown friends, generally come from secret enemies.

Lady G. What would you have me do in it?

Lord T. What I think you ought to do—fairly show it him, and say I advised you to it.

Lady G. Will not that have a very odd look from me?

Lord T. Not at all, if you use my name in it; if he is innocent, his impatience to appear so will discover his regard to you; if he is guilty, it will be the best way of preventing his addresses.

Lady G. But what pretence have I to put him out of countenance?

Lord T. I can't think there's any fear of that.

Lady G. Pray what is it you do think then?

Lord T. Why certainly that it's much more probable this letter may be all an artifice, than that he is in the least concerned in it.

Enter WILLIAMS.

Wil. Mr. Manly, my lord.

[Exit.]

Lord T. Do you receive him, while I step a minute to my lady.

[Exit.]

Enter MANLY.

Man. Madam, your most obedient—they told me my lord was here.

Lady G. He will be here presently; he is but just gone in to my sister.

Man. So then my lady dines with us?

Lady G. No, she is engaged.

Man. I hope you are not of her party, madam?

Lady G. Not till after dinner.

Man. And pray how may she have disposed of the rest of the day?

Lady G. Much as usual; she has visits till about eight; after that, till court time, she is to be at quadrille, at Mrs. Idle's; after the drawing-room, she takes a short supper with my lady Moonlight; and from thence they go together to my lord Noble's assembly.

Man. And are you to do all this with her, madam?

Lady G. Only a few of the visits.

Man. But how can you forbear all the rest of it?

Lady G. There's no great merit in forbearing what one is not charmed with.

Man. And yet I have found that very difficult in my time.

Lady G. How do you mean?

Man. Why I have passed a great deal of my life in the hurry of the ladies, though I was generally better pleased when I was at quiet without them.

Lady G. What induced you then to be with them?

Man. Idleness and the fashion.

Lady G. No mistresses in the case?

Man. To speak honestly—yes—Being often in the toy-shop, there was no forbearing the baubles.

Lady G. And of course, I suppose, sometimes you were tempted to pay for them twice as much as they were worth.

Man. Madam!

Lady G. I'll be free with you, Mr. Manly—I don't know a man in the world, that in appearance might better pretend to a woman of the first merit than yourself; and yet I have a reason in my hand here to think you have your failings.

Man. I have infinite, madam; but I am sure the want of an implicit respect for you is not among the number.—Pray what is in your hand, madam?

Lady G. Nay, sir, I have no title to it, for the direction is to you. [Gives him a Letter.]

Man. To me! I don't remember the hand.

[Reads to himself.]

Lady G. Give me leave to tell you one thing, by the way, Mr. Manly, that I should never have shown you this but that my brother enjoined me to it.

Man. I take that to proceed from my lord's good opinion of me, madam.

Lady G. I hope at least it will stand as an excuse for my taking this liberty.

Man. I never yet saw you do any thing, madam, that wanted an excuse; and I hope you will not give me an instance to the contrary, by refusing the favour I am going to ask you.

Lady G. I don't believe I shall refuse any that you think proper to ask.

Man. Only this, madam, to indulge me so far as to let me know how this letter came into your hands.

Lady G. Enclosed to me in this, without a name.

Man. If there be no secret in the contents, madam—

Lady G. Why—there is an impertinent insinuation in it; but, as I know your good sense will think it so too, I will venture to trust you.

Man. You'll oblige me, madam.

[Takes the other Letter, and reads.]

Lady G. Now am I in the oddest situation! methinks our conversation grows terribly critical—This must produce something—Oh lud, would it were over!

[Aside.]

Man. Now, madam, I begin to have some light into the poor project that is at the bottom of all this.

Lady G. I have no notion of what could be proposed by it.

Man. A little patience, madam—First, as to the insinuation you mention—

Lady G. Oh! what is he going to say now?

[Aside.

Man. Though my intimacy with my lord may have allowed my visits to have been very frequent here of late, yet, in such a talking town as this, you must not wonder if a great many of those visits are placed to your account; and this taken for granted, I suppose, has been told to my lady Wronghead, as a piece of news, since her arrival, not improbably with many more imaginary circumstances.

Lady G. My lady Wronghead!

Man. Ay, madam; for I am positive this is her hand.

Lady G. What view could she have in writing it?

Man. To interrupt any treaty of marriage she may have heard I am engaged in, because, if I die without heirs, her family expects that some part of my estate may return to them again. But I hope she is so far mistaken, that if this letter has given you the least uneasiness—I shall think that the happiest moment of my life.

Lady G. That does not carry your usual complaisance, Mr. Manly.

Man. Yes, madam, because I am sure I can convince you of my innocence.

Lady G. I am sure I have no right to inquire into it.

Man. Suppose you may not, madam; yet you may very innocently have so much curiosity.

Lady G. Well, sir, I won't pretend to have so little of the woman in me, as to want curiosity—But pray do you suppose then this Myrtilla is a real or a fictitious name?

Man. Now I recollect, madam, there is a young woman in the house where my lady Wronghead lodges, that I heard somebody call Myrtilla—this letter may have been written by her—But how it came directed to me I confess is a mystery, that before I ever presume to see your ladyship again, I think myself obliged in honour to find out. [Going.

Lady G. Mr. Manly—you are not going?

Man. 'Tis but to the next street, madam; I shall be back in ten minutes.

Lady G. Nay, but dinner's just coming up.

Man. Madam, I can neither eat nor rest till I see an end of this affair.

Lady G. But this is so odd! why should any silly curiosity of mine drive you away?

Man. Since you won't suffer it to be yours, madam—then it shall be only to satisfy my own curiosity. [Exit.

Lady G. Well—and now what am I to think of all this? Or suppose an indifferent person had heard every word we have said to one another, what would they have thought on't? Would it have been very absurd to conclude he is seriously inclined to pass the rest of his life with me?—I hope not—for I am sure the case is terribly clear on my side.

Enter Mrs. Trusty.

Well, Mrs. Trusty, is my sister dressed yet?

Mrs. T. Yes, madam; but my lord has been courting her so, I think, till they are both out of humour.

Lady G. How so?

Mrs. T. Why it began, madam, with his lordship's desiring her ladyship to dine at home to-day—upon which my lady said she could not be ready; upon that my lord ordered them to stay the dinner—and then my lady ordered the coach—then my lord took her short, and said he had ordered the coachman to set up—then my lady made him a great courtesy, and said she would wait till his lordship's horses had dined, and was mighty pleasant; but, for fear of the worst, madam, she whispered me—to get her chair ready. [Exit.

Lady G. Oh, here they come! and, by their looks, seem a little unfit for company. [Exit.

Enter LADY TOWNLY, LORD TOWNLY following.

Lady T. Well, look you, my lord, I can bear it no longer; nothing still but about my faults—my faults! an agreeable subject, truly!

Lord T. Why, madam, if you won't hear of them, how can I ever hope to see you mend them?

Lady T. Why I don't intend to mend them—I can't mend them—you know I have tried to do it a hundred times—and—it hurts me so—I can't bear it.

Lord T. And I, madam, can't bear this daily licentious abuse of your time and character.

Lady T. Abuse! astonishing! when the universe knows I am never better company than when I am doing what I have a mind to. But to see this world! that men can never get over that silly spirit of contradiction!—Why, but last Thursday now!—there you wisely amended one of my faults, as you call them—you insisted upon my not going to the masquerade—and pray what was the consequence? Was not I as cross as the devil all the night after? Was not I forced to get company at home? And was it not almost three o'clock this morning before I was able to come to myself again? And then the fault is not mended neither—for next time I shall only have twice the inclination to go: so that all this mending, and mending, you see, is but darning old lace, to make it worse than it was before.

Lord T. Well, the manner of women's living, of late, is insupportable! and one way or other—

Lady T. It's to be mended, I suppose—why so it may! but then, my dear lord, you must give one time—and when things are at the worst, you know, they may mend themselves, ha, ha!

Lord T. Madam, I am not in a humour now to trifle.

Lady T. Why then, my lord, one word of fair argument—to talk with you in your own way now—You complain of my late hours, and I of your early ones—so far we are even, you'll allow—but pray which gives us the best figure in the eye of the polite world—my active, spirited three in the morning, or your dull, drowsy eleven at night? Now I think one has the air of a woman of quality, and t'other of a plodding mechanic, that goes to bed sometimes, that he may rise early to open his shop—Paugh!

Lord T. Fie, fie, madam! is this your way of reasoning? 'tis time to wake you—then—'Tis not your ill hours alone that disturb me, but as often the ill company that occasion those ill hours.

Lady T. Sure I don't understand you now, my lord; what ill company do I keep?

Lord T. Why, at best, women that lose their money, and men that win it; or perhaps men that are voluntary bubbles at one game, in hopes a lady will give him fair play at another. Then that unavoidable mixture with known rakes, concealed thieves, and sharpers in embroidery—or, what to me is still more shocking, that herd of familiar, chattering, crop-eared coxcombs!

Lady T. And a husband must give eminent proof of his sense, that thinks their follies dangerous.

Lord T. Their being fools, madam, is not always the husband's security; or, if it were, fortune sometimes gives them advantages that might make a thinking woman tremble.

Lady T. What do you mean?

Lord T. That women sometimes lose more than they are able to pay; and if a creditor be a little pressing, the lady may be reduced to try if, instead of gold, the gentleman will accept of a trinket.

Lady T. My lord, you grow scurrilous; you'll make me hate you! I'll have you to know, I keep company with the politest people in town, and the assemblies I frequent are full of such.

Lord T. So are the churches—now and then.

Lady T. My friends frequent them too, as well as the assemblies.

Lord T. Yes, and would do it oftener, if a groom of the chambers were allowed to furnish cards to the company.

Lady T. I see what you drive at all this while;—you would lay an imputation on my fame, to cover your own avarice. I might take any pleasures, I find, that were not expensive.

Lord T. Have a care, madam; don't let me think you value your chastity only, to make me reproachable for not indulging you in every thing else that's vicious—I, madam, have a reputation too to guard, that's dear to me as yours—The follies of an ungoverned wife may make the wisest man uneasy; but 'tis his own fault if ever they render him contemptible.

Lady T. My lord, my lord—you would make a woman mad!

Lord T. Madam, madam, you would make a man a fool!

Lady T. If heaven has made you otherwise, that won't be in my power.

Lord T. Whatever may be in your inclination, madam, I'll prevent you making me a beggar at least.

Lady T. A beggar! Croesus! I am out of patience!—I won't come home till four tomorrow morning.

Lord T. That may be, madam; but I'll order the doors to be locked at twelve.

Lady T. Then I won't come home till tomorrow night.

Lord T. Then, madam, you shall never come home again.

Lady T. What does he mean? I never heard such a word from him in my life before! The man always used to have manners, in his worst humours.—There's something that I don't see, at the bottom of all this—But his head's always upon some impracticable scheme or other; so I won't trouble mine any longer about him.

Enter MANLY.

Mr. Manly, your servant!

Man. I ask pardon for intrusion, madam; but I hope my business with my lord will excuse it.

Lady T. I believe you'll find him in the next room, sir.

Man. Will you give me leave, madam?

Lady T. Sir, you have my leave, though you were a lady.

Man. What a well-bred age do we live in!

[Aside. Exit.]

Enter LADY GRACE.

Lady T. Oh, my dear lady Grace! how could you leave me so unmercifully alone, all this while?

Lady G. I thought my lord had been with you.

Lady T. Why yes; and therefore I wanted your relief; for he has been in such a fluster here—

Lady G. Bless me! for what?

Lady T. Only our usual breakfast! we have each of us had our dish of matrimonial comfort this morning—We have been charming company!

Lady G. I am mighty glad of it! sure it must be a vast happiness when a man and wife can give themselves the same turn of conversation!

Lady T. Oh, the prettiest thing in the world!

Lady G. Now I should be afraid, that where two people are every day together so, they must often be in want of something to talk upon.

Lady T. Oh, my dear, you are the most mistaken in the world! married people have things to talk of, child, that never enter into the imagination of others.—Why, here's my lord and I, now; we have not been married above two short years, you know, and we have already eight or ten things constantly in bank, that whenever we want company, we can take up any one of them for two hours together, and the subject never the flatter; nay, if we have occasion for it, it will be as fresh next day too as it was the first hour it entertained us.

Lady G. Certainly, that must be vastly pretty!

Lady T. Oh, there's no life like it! Why, t'other day, for example, when you dined abroad, my lord and I, after a pretty, cheerful, tête-à-tête meal, sat us down by the fire-side, in an easy, indolent, pick-tooth way, for about a quarter of an hour, as if we had not thought of any other's being in the room—At last, stretching himself and yawning—"My dear"—says he—"aw—you came home very late last night"—"Twas but just turned of two," says I—"I was in bed—aw—by eleven," says he—"So you are every night," says I—"Well," says he, "I am amazed you can sit up so late"—"How can you be amazed," says I, "at a thing that happens so often?"—Upon which we entered into a conversation—and though this is a point has entertained us above fifty times already, we always find so many, pretty, new things to say upon it, that I believe in my soul it will last as long as we live.

Lady G. But pray, in such sort of family dialogues (though extremely well for passing the time), don't there now and then enter some little witty sort of bitterness?

Lady T. Oh, yes! which does not do amiss at all—A smart repartee, with a zest of recrimination at the head of it, makes the prettiest sherbet! Ay, ay, if we did not mix a little of the acid with it, a matrimonial society would be so luscious that nothing but an old liquorish brute would be able to bear it.

Lady G. Well, certainly you have the most elegant taste—

Lady T. Though, to tell you the truth, my dear, I rather think we squeezed a little too much lemon into it this bout; for it grew so sour at last, that—I think—I almost told him he was a fool—and he again—talked something oddly of—turning me out of doors.

Lady G. O, have a care of that!

Lady T. Nay, if he should, I may thank my own wise father for it.—But to be serious, my dear, what would you really have a woman do in my case?

Lady G. Why—if I had a sober husband, as you have, I would make myself the happiest wife in the world, by being as sober as he.

Lady T. Oh, you wicked thing! how can you tease one at this rate, when you know he is so very sober, that, except giving me money, there is not one thing in the world he can do to please me. And I, at the same time, partly by nature, and partly perhaps by keeping the best company, do with my soul love almost every thing he hates. I dote upon assemblies—my heart bounds at a ball—and at an opera—I expire.—Then I love play to distraction!—cards enchant me—and dice—put me out of my little wits—Dear, dear hazard!—Oh, what a flow of spirits it gives one!—Do you never play at bazard, child?

Lady G. Oh, never! I don't think it sits well upon women—there's something so masculine, so much the air of a rake in it! You see how it makes the men swear and curse! and when a woman is thrown into the same passion—why—

Lady T. That's very true; one is a little put to it, sometimes, not to make use of the same words to express it.

Lady G. Well, and upon ill luck, pray what words are you really forced to make use of?

Lady T. Why, upon a very hard case indeed, when a sad wrong word is rising just to one's tongue's end, I give a great gulp—and swallow it.

Lady G. Well, and is not that enough to make you forswear play as long as you live?

Lady T. Oh, yes—I have forsworn it.

Lady G. Seriously?

Lady T. Solemnly!—a thousand times; but then one is constantly forsworn.

Lady G. And how can you answer that?

Lady T. My dear, what we say when we are losers, we look upon to be no more binding than a lover's oath or a great man's promise. But I beg pardon, child, I should not lead you so far into the world; you are a prude, and design to live soberly.

Lady G. Why, I confess, my nature and my education do, in a good degree, incline me that way.

Lady T. Well, how a woman of spirit (for you don't want that, child) can dream of living soberly, is to me inconceivable! for you will marry, I suppose?

Lady G. I can't tell but I may.

Lady T. And won't you live in town?

Lady G. Half the year I should like it very well.

Lady T. My stars! and you would really live in London half the year, to be sober in it?

Lady G. Why not?

Lady T. Why, can't you as well go and be sober in the country?

Lady G. So I would—t'other half year.

Lady T. And pray what comfortable scheme of life would you form, now, for your summer and winter sober entertainments?

Lady G. A scheme that, I think, might very well content us.

Lady T. Oh, of all things, let's hear it.

Lady G. Why, in summer I could pass my leisure hours in reading, walking by a canal, or sitting at the end of it under a great tree; in dressing, dining, chatting with an agreeable friend; perhaps hearing a little music, taking a dish of tea, or a game at cards, soberly; managing my family, looking into its accounts, playing with my children, if I had any, or in a thousand other innocent amusements—soberly; and possibly, by these means, I might induce my husband to be as sober as myself.

Lady T. Well, my dear, thou art an astonishing creature! for sure such primitive, antediluvian notions of life have not been in any head these thousand years—Under a great tree! Oh, my soul!—But I beg we may have the sober town scheme too—for I am charmed with the country one!

Lady G. You shall; and I'll try to stick to my sobriety there too.

Lady T. Well, though I'm sure it will give me the vapours, I must bear it, however.

Lady G. Why then, for fear of your fainting, madam, I will first so far come into the fashion, that I would never be dressed out of it—but still it should be soberly; for I can't think it any disgrace to a woman of my private fortune, not to wear her lace as fine as the wedding-suit of a first duchess. Though there is one extravagance I would venture to come up to.

Lady T. Ay, now for it!—

Lady G. I would every day be as neat as a bride.

Lady T. Why the men say that's a great step to be made one—Well, now you are dressed, pray let's see to what purpose.

Lady G. I would visit—that is, my real friends; but as little for form as possible.—I would go to court; sometimes to an assembly; nay, play at quadrille—soberly: I would see all the good plays, and, because 'tis the fashion now and then an opera—but I would not expire there, for fear I should never go again; and lastly, I can't say, but for curiosity, if I liked my company, I might be drawn in once to a masquerade; and this, I think, is as far as any woman can go—soberly.

Lady T. Well, if it had not been for this last piece of sobriety, I was just going to call for some surfeit-water.

Lady G. Why, don't you think, with the further aid of breakfasting, dining, and taking the air, supping, sleeping, not to say a word of devotion, the four-and-twenty hours might roll over in a tolerable manner?

Lady T. Tolerable! deplorable! Why, child, all you propose is but to endure life; now I want to enjoy it.

Enter MRS. TRUSTY.

Mrs. T. Ma'am, your ladyship's chair is ready.

Lady T. Have the footmen their white flambeaux yet? for last night I was poisoned.

Mrs. T. Yes, ma'am, there were some came in this morning. [Exit.]

Lady T. My dear, you will excuse me; but, you know, my time is so precious—

Lady G. That I beg I may not hinder your least enjoyment of it.

Lady T. You will call on me at lady Revel's?

Lady G. Certainly.

Lady T. But I am so afraid it will break into your scheme, my dear!

Lady G. When it does, I will—soberly break from you.

Lady T. Why then, till we meet again, dear sister, I wish you all tolerable happiness. [Exit.]

Enter LORD TOWNLY and MANLY.

Lord T. I did not think my lady Wronghead had such a notable brain; though I can't say she was so very wise, in trusting this silly girl, you call Myrtilla, with the secret.

Man. No, my lord, you mistake me; had the girl been in the secret, perhaps I had never come at it myself.

Lord T. Why, I thought you said the girl writ this letter to you, and that my lady Wronghead sent it enclosed to my sister.

Man. If you please to give me leave, my lord—the fact is thus—This enclosed letter to lady Grace was a real, original one, written by this girl to the count we have been talking of; the count drops it, and my lady Wronghead finds it—then, only changing the cover, she seals it up, as a letter of business, just written by herself to me; and pretending to be in a hurry, gets this innocent girl to write the direction for her.

Lord T. Oh, then the girl did not know she was superscribing a billet-doux of her own, to you?

Man. No, my lord; for when I first questioned her about the direction, she owned it immediately; but when I showed her that her letter to the count was within it, and told her how it came into my hands, the poor creature was amazed, and thought herself betrayed, both by the count and my lady—in short, upon this discovery, the girl and I grew so gracious, that she has let me into some transactions in my lady Wronghead's family, which, with my having a careful eye over them, may prevent the ruin of it.

Lord T. You are very generous, to be so solicitous for a lady that has given you so much uneasiness.

Man. But I will be most unmercifully revenge of her; for I will do her the greatest friendship in the world—against her will.

Lord T. What an uncommon philosophy art thou master of, to make even thy malice a virtue!

Man. Yet, my lord, I assure you there is no one action of my life gives me more pleasure than your approbation of it.

Lord T. Dear Charles! my heart's impatient till thou art nearer to me; and, as a proof that I have long wished thee so, while your daily conduct has chosen rather to deserve, than to ask, my sister's favour, I have been as secretly industrious to make her sensible of your merit; and since, on this occasion, you have opened your whole heart to me, 'tis now with equal pleasure I assure you we have both succeeded—she is as firmly yours—

Man. Impossible! you flatter me!

Lord T. I'm glad you think it flattery, but she herself shall prove it none; she dines with us alone:—when the servants are withdrawn, I'll open a conversation that shall excuse my leaving you together—Oh, Charles! had I, like thee, been cautious in my choice, what melancholy hours had this heart avoided!

Man. No more of that, I beg, my lord.

Lord T. But 'twill, at least, be some relief to my anxiety, however barren of content the state has been to me, to see so near a friend and sister happy in it. Your harmony of life will be an instance, how much the choice of temper is preferable to beauty.

While your soft hours in mutual kindness move,

You'll reach by virtue, what I lost by love. [Exit.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—MRS. MOTHERLY'S House.

Enter MANLY, meeting SIR FRANCIS WRONGHEAD.

Man. Sir Francis, your servant.

Sir F. Cousin Manly!

Man. I am come to see how the family goes on here.

Sir F. Troth, all as busy as bees! I have been upon the wing even since eight o'clock this morning.

Man. By your early hour, then, I suppose you have been making your court to some of the great men.

Sir F. Why, faith, you have hit it, sir!—I was advised to loose no time: so I e'en went straight forward to one great man I had never seen in my life before.

Man. Right! that was doing business: but who had you got to introduce you?

Sir F. Why, nobody—I remember I had heard a wise man say—My son, be bold—so, troth, I introduced myself.

Man. As how, pray?

Sir F. Why, thus—Lookye—"Please your lordship," says I, "I am sir Francis Wronghead, of Bumper-hall, and member of parliament for the borough of Guzzledown."—"Sir, your humble servant," says my lord; "tho' I have not the honour to know your person, I have heard you are a very honest gentleman, and I am glad your borough has made choice of so worthy a representative; and so," says he, "sir Francis, have you any service to command me?" Naw, cousin, those last words, you may be sure, gave me no small encouragement. And tho' I know, sir, you have no extraordinary opinion of my parts, yet, I believe, you won't say I mist it naw.

Man. Well, I hope I shall have no cause.

Sir F. So, when I found him so courteous—"My lord," says I, "I did not think to ha' troubled your lordship with business upon my first visit: but, since your lordship is pleased not to stand upon ceremony,—why, truly," says I, "I think naw is as good as another time."

Man. Right! there you pushed him home.

Sir F. Ay, ay, I had a mind to let him see that I was none of your mealy-mouthed ones.

Man. Very good.

Sir F. "So, in short, my lord," says I, "I have a good estate—but—a—it's a little awl at elbows:<sup>1)</sup> and, as I desire to serve my king as well as my country, I shall be very willing to accept of a place at court."

Man. So, this was making short on't.

Sir F. Icod, I shot him flying, cousin! some of you hawf-witted ones, naw, would ha' hummed and hawed, and dangled a month or two after him, before they durst open their mouths about a place, and mayhap not ha' got it at last neither.

Man. Oh, I'm glad you're so sure on't—

Sir F. You shall hear, cousin—"Sir Francis," says my lord, "pray what sort of a place may you ha' turned your thoughts upon?"—"My lord," says I, "beggars must not be choosers; but any place," says I, "about a thousand a year, will be well enough to be doing with till something better falls in"—for I thought it would not look well to stond haggling with him at first.

Man. No, no, your business was to get footing any way.

Sir F. Right! there's it! ay, cousin, I see you know the world.

Man. Yes, yes, one sees more of it every day—VWell, but what said my lord to all this?

Sir F. "Sir Francis," says he, "I shall be glad to serve you any way that lies in my power;" so he gave me a squeeze by the hand, as much as to say, give yourself no trouble—I'll do your business; with that he turned him abawt to somebody with a coloured ribbon across here, that looked in my thoughts, as if he came for a place too.

Man. Ha! so upon these hopes you are to make your fortune?

Sir F. VVhy, do you think there's any doubt of it, sir?

Man. Oh, no, I have not the least doubt about it—for, just as you have done, I made my fortune ten years ago.

Sir F. VVhy, I never knew you had a place, cousin.

Man. Nor I neither, upon my faith, cousin. But you perhaps may have better fortune; for I suppose my lord has heard of what importance you were in the debate to-day—You have been since down at the house, I presume?

Sir F. Oh, yes; I would not neglect the house for ever so much.

Man. VVell; and pray what have they done there?

Sir F. VVhy, troth, I cant well tell you what they have done; but I can tell you what I did: and, I think, pretty well in the main; only I happened to make a little mistake at last, indeed.

Man. How was that?

Sir F. VVhy, they were all got thefe into a sort of a puzzling debate, about the good of the nation—and I were always for that, you know—but; in short, the arguments were so long winded o'both sides, that, waunds! I did not well understand 'um: hawsomever, I was convinced, and so resolved to vote right, according to my conscience—so, when they came to put the question, as they call it—I don't know how it 'twas—but I doubt I cried, ay! when I should ha' cried, no!

Man. How came that about?

Sir F. VVhy, by a mistake, as I tell you—for there was a good-humoured sort of a gentleman, one Mr. Totherside, I think they call him, that sat next me, as soon as I had cried, ay! gives me a hearty shake by the hand—"Sir," says he, "you are a man of honour and a true Englishman! and I should be proud to be better acquainted with you"—and so with that he takes me by the sleeve, along with the crowd, into the lobby—so I knew nowght—but, odds flesh! I was got o'the wrong side the post—for I were told, afterwards, I should have staid where I was.

Man. And so, if you had not quite made your fortune before, you have clinched it now!—Ah, thou head of the VVrongheads! [Aside.

Lady W. [Without] Very well, very well.

Sir F. Odso! here's my lady come home at last!

Enter LADY VVRONGHEAD, COUNT BASSET, and MISS JENNY.

Lady W. Cousin, your servant: I hope you will pardon my rudeness; but we have really been in such a continual hurry here, that we have not had a leisure moment to return your last visit.

Man. Oh, madam, I am a man of no ceremony; you see that has not hindered my coming again.

Lady W. You are infinitely obliging; but I'll redeem my credit with you.

Man. At your own time, madam.

Count B. I must say that for Mr. Manly, madam—if making people easy is the rule of good breeding, he is certainly the best bred man in the world.

Man. Soh! I am not to drop my acquaintance, I find. [Aside]—I am afraid, sir, I shall grow vain upon your good opinion.

Count B. I don't know that, sir; but I am sure what you are pleased to say makes me so.

Man. The most impudent modesty that ever I met with! [Aside.

Lady W. Lard, how ready his wit is!

[Aside.

Sir F. Don't you think, sir, the count's a very fine gentleman?

Man. Oh, among the ladies, certainly. [Apart.

Sir F. And yet he's as stout as a lion. VVaunds, he'll storm any thing! [Apart.

Man. VVill he so? VVhy then, sir, take care of your citadel. [Apart.

Sir F. Ah, you are a wag, cousin! [Apart.

<sup>1)</sup> A coat out at elbows wants mending—an estate—

Man. I hope, ladies, the town air continues to agree with you?

Jenny. Oh, perfectly well, sir! We have been abroad, in our new coach, all day long—and we have bought an ocean of fine things. And to-morrow we go to the masquerade; and on Friday to the play; and on Saturday to the opera; and on Sunday we are to be at the what d'ye call it—assembly, and see the ladies play at quadrille, and piquet; and ombre, and hazard, and hasset; and on Monday we are to see the king; and so on Tuesday—

Lady W. Hold, hold, miss! you must not let your tongue run so fast, child—you forget; you know I brought you hither to learn modesty.

Man. Yes, yes, and she is improved with a vengeance! [Aside.]

Jenny. Lawrd, mamma! I am sure I did not say any harm: and, if one must not speak in one's turn, one may be kept under as long as one lives, for aught I see.

Lady W. O'my conscience, this girl grows so headstrong—

Sir F. Ay, ay, there's your fine growing spirit for you! Now tack it down, an' you can.

Jenny. All I said, papa, was only to entertain my cousin Manly.

Man. My pretty dear, I am mightily obliged to you.

Jenny. Look you there now, madam.

Lady W. Hold your tongue, I say.

Jenny. [Turning away, and pouting] I declare I won't bear it: she is always snubbing me before you, sir!—I know why she does it, well enough— [Aside to the Count.]

Count B. Hush, hush, my dear! don't be uneasy at that; she'll suspect us. [Aside.]

Jenny. Let her suspect! what do I care?—I don't know but I have as much reason to suspect as she—though perhaps I am not so afraid of her.

Count B. 'Egad, if I don't keep a tight hand on my tit, here, she'll run away with my project, before I can bring it to bear! [Aside.]

Lady W. The young harlot is certainly in love with him; but I must not let them see I think so—and yet I can't bear it—[Aside]—Upon my life, count, you'll spoil that forward girl—you should not encourage her so.

Count B. Pardon me, madam, I was only advising her to observe what your ladyship said to her.—In one word, madam, she has a jealousy of your ladyship, and I am forced to encourage her, to blind it: 'twill be better to take no notice of her behaviour to me. [Apart.]

Lady W. You are right; I will be more cautious. [Apart.]

Count B. To-morrow at the masquerade we may lose her. [Aside.]

Lady W. We shall be observed; I'll send you a note, and settle that affair—go on with the girl, and don't mind me. [Apart.]

Count B. I have been taking your part, my little angel.

Lady W. Jenny! come hither, child—you must not be so hasty, my dear—I only advise you for your good.

Jenny. Yes, mamma; but when I am told of a thing before company, it always make me worse, you know.

Man. If I have any skill in the fair sex, miss and her mamma have only quarrelled because they are both of a mind. This facetious count seems to have made a very genteel step into the family! [Aside.]

Enter MYRTILLA. MANLY talks apart with her.

Lady W. Well, sir Francis, and what news have you brought us from, Westminster to-day?

Sir F. News, madam! 'Ecod, I have some—and such as does not come every day, I can tell you. A word in your ear—I have got a promise of a place at court of a thousand pound a year already.

Lady W. Have you so, sir? And, pray, who may you thank for't? Now, who is in the right? Is not this better than throwing so much away after a stinking pack of foxhounds in the country? Now your family may be the better for it.

Sir F. Nay, that's what persuaded me to come up, my dove.

Lady W. Mighty well! Come—let me have another hundred pound then.

Sir F. Another, child! 'Vaunds! you have had one hundred this morning; pray, what's become of that, my dear?

Lady W. What's become of it! 'Why, I'll show you, my love. Jenny, have you the bills about you?

Jenny. Yes, mamma.

Lady W. What's become of it? 'Why, laid out, my dear, with fifty more to it, that I was forced to borrow of the count here.

Jenny. Yes, indeed, papa, and that would hardly do neither—There's the account.

Sir F. [Turning over the Bills] Let's see! let's see! what the devil have we got here?

Man. Then you have sounded your aunt, you say, and she readily comes in to all I proposed to you? [Apart.]

Myr. Sir, I'll answer with my life, she is most thankfully yours in every article. She mightily desires to see you, sir. [Apart.]

Man. I am going home directly; bring her to my house in half an hour; and if she makes good what you tell me, you shall both find your account in it. [Apart.]

Myr. Sir, she shall not fail you. [Apart. Exit.]

Sir F. Odds life, madam! here's nothing but toys and trinkets, and fans and clock stockings, by wholesale.

Lady W. There's nothing but what's proper, and for your credit, sir Francis—Nay, you see I am so good a housewife, that, in necessaries for myself, I have scarce laid out a shilling.

Sir F. No, by my troth, so it seems; for the devil o'one thing's here that I can see you have any occasion for.

Lady W. My dear, do you think I came hither to live out of the fashion? why, the greatest distinction of a fine lady, in this town, is in the variety of pretty things that she has no occasion for.

Jenny. Sure, papa, could you imagine, that women of quality wanted nothing but stays and petticoats?

Lady W. Now, that is so like him!

Man. So, the family comes on finely! [Aside.

Sir F. An hundred pound in the morning, and want another afore night! VVaunds and fire! the lord mayor of London could not hold it at this rate.

Man. Oh, do you feel it, sir? [Aside.

Lady W. My dear, you seem uneasy; let me have the hundred pound, and compose yourself.

Sir F. Compose the devil, madam! why, do you consider what a hundred pound a day comes to in a year?

Lady W. My life, if I account with you from one day to another, that's really all my head is able to bear at a time—But I'll tell you what I consider—I consider that my advice has got you a thousand pound a year this morning—That now, methinks, you might consider, sir.

Sir F. A thousand pound! Yes; but mayhap I mayn't receive the first quarter on't this half year.

Enter SQUIRE RICHARD.

Squire R. Feyther, an you doan't come quickly, the meat will be coaled: and I'd fain pick a bit with you.

Lady W. Bless me, sir Francis! you are not going to sup by yourself?

Sir F. No, but I'm going to dine by myself, and that's pretty near the matter, madam.

Lady W. Had not you as good stay a little, my dear? VVe shall all eat in half an hour; and I was thinking to ask my cousin Manly to take a family morsel with us.

Sir F. Nay, for my cousin's good company, I don't care if I ride a day's journey without bailing.

Man. By no means, sir Francis. I am going upon a little business.

Sir F. Well, sir, I know you don't love compliments.

Man. You'll excuse me, madam—

Lady W. Since you have business, sir—
[Exit Manly.]

Enter MRS. MOTHERLY.

Oh, Mrs. Motherly! you were saying this morning, you had some very fine lace to show me—can't I see it now? [Sir Francis stares.

Mrs. M. VVhy really, madam, I had made a sort of a promise to let the countess of Nicely have the first sight of it, for the birth-day; but your ladyship—

Lady W. Oh, I die if I don't see it before her.

Squire R. VVoant you goa, feyther?

Sir F. VVaunds, lad, I shall ha' no stomach at this rate!

Mrs. M. VVell, madam, though I say it, 'tis the sweetest pattern that ever came over—and, for fineness—no cobweb comes up to it.

Sir F. Odds guts and gizzard, madam! Lace as fine as a cobweb! why, what the devil's that to cost, now?

Mrs. M. Nay, if sir Francis does not like it, madam—

Lady W. He like it! Dear Mrs. Motherly, he is not to wear it.

Sir F. Flesh, madam! but I suppose I am to pay for it!

Lady W. No doubt on't! Think of your thousand a year, and who got it you; go, eat your dinner, and be thankful, go! [Drawing him to the Door] Come, Mrs. Motherly.

[Exit Lady Wronghead and Mrs. Motherly.]

Sir F. Very fine! so here I mun fast, till I am almost famished, for the good of my country, while madam is laying me out an hundred pound a day, in lace as fine as a cobweb, for the honour of my family! Odds flesh! things had need go well at this rate!

Squire R. Nay, nay—come, feyther.

[Exeunt Sir Francis and Squire Richard.]

Re-enter MYRTILLA.

Myr. Madam, my lady desires you and the count will please to come, and assist her fancy in some of the new laces.

Count B. VVe'll wait upon her—

Jenny. So, I told you how it was; you see she can't bear to leave us together.

Count B. No matter, my dear: you know she has asked me to stay supper: so, when your papa and she are a-bed, Mrs. Myrtilla will let me into the house again; then you may steal into her chamber, and we'll have a pretty sneaker of punch together.

Myr. Ay, ay, madam, you may command me in any thing.

Jenny. VVell, that will be pure!

Count B. But you had best go to her alone, my life; it will look better if I come after you.

Jenny. Ay, so it will: and to-morrow you know at the masquerade: O dear, dear! I wish the time were come. [Exit.]

Myr. So, sir, am not I very commode to you?

Count B. VVell, child; and don't you find your account in it? Did I not tell you we might still be of use to one another?

Myr. VVell, but how stands your affair with miss in the main?

Count B. Oh, she's mad for the masquerade! It drives like a nail; we want nothing now but a parson to clinch it. Did not your aunt say she could get one at a short warning?

Myr. Yes, yes; my lord Townly's chaplain is her cousin, you know; he'll do your business and mine at the same time.

Count B. Oh, it's true! but where shall we appoint him?

Myr. VVhy you know my lady Townly's house is always open to the masks upon a ball night, before they go to the Haymarket.

Count B. Good.

Myr. Now the doctor proposes we should all come thither in our habits, and when the rooms are full, we may steal up into his chamber, he says, and there—crack—he'll give us all canonical commission to go to bed together.

Count B. Admirable! VVell, the devil fetch me, if I shall not be heartily glad to see thee well settled, child.

Myr. And may he tuck me under his arm at the same time, if I shall not think myself obliged to you as long as I live—But I must run to my squire.

Count B. And I to the ladies—so, your humble servant, sweet Mrs. VVronghead!

Myr. Yours, as in duty bound, most noble count Basset! [Exit.]

Count B. VVhy, ay! Count! That title has been of some use to me, indeed: not that I have any more pretence to it, than I have to a blue riband. Yet I have made a pretty considerable figure in life with it. I have lolled in my own chariot, dealt at assemblies, dined with ambassadors, and made one at quadrille with the first women of quality—But—tempora mutantur—since that damned squadron at White's have left me out of their last secret, I am reduced to trade upon my own stock of industry, and make my last push upon a wife. If I can snap up miss Jenny and her eight thousand pounds, I shall once more cut a figure, and cock my hat in the face of the best of them: for, since our modern men of fortune are grown wise enough to be sharpers, I think sharpers are fools that don't take up the airs of men of quality. [Exit.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—LORD TOWNLY'S House.

Enter WILLIAMS and MR. MANLY.

Will. Sir Francis VVronghead, sir, desires to see you.

Man. Desire sir Francis to walk in. [Exit Williams]—I suppose by this time his wise worship begins to find that the balance of his journey to London is on the wrong side.

Enter SIR FRANCIS VVRONGHEAD.

Sir Francis, your servant. How came I by the favour of this extraordinary visit?

Sir F. Ah, cousin!

Man. VVhy that sorrowful face, man?

Sir F. I have no friend alive but you—

Man. I am sorry for that—But what's the matter?

Sir F. I have played the fool by this journey, I see now—for my bitter wife—

Man. VVhat of her?

Sir F. Is playing the devil.

Man. VVhy, truly, that's a part that most of your fine ladies begin with, as soon as they get to London.

Sir F. If I'm a living man, cousin, she has made away with above two hundred and fifty pounds since yesterday morning. But there's one hundred on't goes more to my heart than all the rest.

Man. And how might that be disposed of?

Sir F. Troth, I am almost ashamed to tell you.

Man. Out with it.

Sir F. VVhy, she has been at an assembly.

Man. VVhat, since I saw you? I thought you had all supped at home last night.

Sir F. VVhy, so we did—and all as merry as grigs. I cod, my heart was so open, that I tossed another hundred into her apron, to go out early this morning with—But the cloth was no sooner taken away, than in comes my lady Townly here, with another rantipole dame of quality, and out they must have her, they said, to introduce her at my lady Noble's assembly, forsooth—A few words, you may be sure, made the bargain—so, bawnce! and away they drive, as if the devil had got into the coach-box—so, about four or five in the morning—home comes madam, with her eyes a foot deep in her head—and my poor hundred pounds left behind her at the hazard-table.

Man. All lost at dice!

Sir F. Every shilling—among a parcel of pigtail puppies, and pale-faced women of quality.

Man. If you remember I gave you a hint of this.

Sir F. VVhy, ay, it's true, you did so: but the devil himself could not have believed she would have rid post to him.

Man. Sir, if you stay but a fortnight in this town, you will every day see hundreds as fast upon the gallop as she is.

Sir F. Ah, this London is a base place indeed!—VVaunds, if things should happen to go wrong with me at VWestminster, at this rate, how the devil shall I keep out of a gaol?

Man. VVhy, truly, there seems to me but one way to avoid it.

Sir F. Ah, would you could tell me that, cousin!

Man. The way lies plain before you, sir; the same road that brought you hither, will carry you safe home again.

Sir F. Odds flesh, cousin! what! and leave a thousand pounds a year behind me?

Man. Pooh, pooh! leave any thing behind you, but your family and you are a saver by it.

Sir F. Ay, but consider, cousin, what a scurvy figure I shall make in the country, if I come down withawt it.

Man. You will make a much more lamentable figure in a gaol without it.

Sir F. Mayhap, 'at you have no great opinion of my journey to London then, cousin?

Man. Sir Francis, to do you the service of a real friend, I must speak very plainly to you; you don't yet see half the ruin that's before you.

Sir F. Good lack! how may you mean, cousin?

Man. In one word, your whole affairs stand thus—In a week you'll lose your seat at VWestminster; in a fortnight my lady will run you into gaol, by keeping the best company; in four-and-twenty hours your daughter will run away with a sharper, because she han't been used to better company; and your son will steal into marriage with a cast mistress, because he has not been used to any company at all.

Sir F. P'the name o'goodness, why should you think all this?

Man. Because I have proof of it; in short, I know so much of their secrets, that if all this is not prevented to-night, it will be out of your power to do it to-morrow morning.

Sir F. VVaunds! if what you tell me be true, I'll stuff my whole family into a stage-coach, and trundle them into the country again on Monday morning.

Man. Stick to that, sir, and we may yet find a way to redeem all. I hear company entering—You know they see masks here to-day—conceal yourself in this room, and for the truth of what I have told you, take the evidence of your own senses: but be sure you keep close till I give you the signal.

Sir F. Sir, I'll warrant you—Ah, my lady! my lady VVronghead! what a bitter business have you drawn me into!

Man. Hush! to your post; here comes one couple already. [Sir F. and Man. retire through the centre Door.]

Enter SQUIRE RICHARD and MYRTILLA, in Masquerade Dresses.

Squire R. VVhat, is this the doctor's chamber?

Myr. Yes, yes; speak softly.

Squire R. VVell, but where is he?

Myr. He'll be ready for us presently, but he says he can't do us the good turn without witnesses: so, when the count and your sister come, you know he and you may be fathers for one another.

Squire R. VVell, well, tit for tat! ay, ay, that will be friendly.

Myr. And see, here they come!

Enter COUNT BASSET and Miss JENNY, in Masquerade Dresses.

Count B. So, so, here's your brother and his bride before us, my dear.

Jenny. VVell, I vow, my heart's at my mouth still! I thought I should never have got rid of mamma; but while she stood gaping upon the dance, I gave her the slip! Lawd, do but feel how it beats here!

Count B. Oh, the pretty flutterer! I protest, my dear, you have put mine into the same palpitation!

Jenny. Ay, you say so—but let's see now—Oh, lud! I vow it thumps purely—well, well, I see it will do; and so where's the parson?

Count B. Mrs. Myrtilla, will you be so good as to see if the doctor's ready for us?

Myr. He only staid for you, sir; I'll fetch him immediately. [Exit.]

Jenny. Pray, sir, am not I to take place of mamma, when I'm a countess?

Count B. No doubt on't, my dear.

Jenny. Oh, lud! how her back will be up then,<sup>1)</sup> when she meets me at an assembly; or you and I in our coach and six at Hyde-park together!

Count B. Ay, or when she hears the box-keepers at an opera, call out—"The countess of Basset's servants!"

Jenny. VVell, I say it, that will be delicious! And then mayhap to have a fine gentleman, with a star and a what-d'ye-call-um riband, lead me to my chair, with his hat under his arm all the way! "Hold up," says the chairman; "and so," says I, "my lord, your humble servant."—"I suppose, madam," says he, "we shall see you at my lady Quadrille's?"—"Ay, ay, to be sure, my lord," says I.—So in swops me, with my hoop stuffed up to my forehead; and away they trot, swing! swang! with my tassels dangling and my flambeaux blazing! and—Oh, it's a charming thing to be a woman of quality!

Count B. VVell! I see that plainly, my dear, there's ne'er a duchess of them all will become an equipage like you.

Jenny. VVell, well, do you find equipage, and I'll find airs, I warrant you.

Squire R. Troth! I think this masquerading's the merriest game that ever I saw in my life! Tho'f in my mind, and there were but a little wrestling, or cudgel-playing now, it would help it hugely. But what a-rope makes the parson stay so?

Count B. Oh, here he comes, I believe.

Enter MYRTILLA, with a Constable.

Const. VVell, madam, pray which is the party that wants a spice of my office here?

Myr. That's the gentleman.

[Pointing to the Count.]

Count B. Hey-day! what, in masquerade, doctor?

Const. Doctor! sir, I believe you have mistaken your man: but if you are called count Basset, I have a billet-doux in my hand for you, that will set you right presently.

Count B. VVhat the devil's the meaning of all this?

Const. Only my lord chief justice's warrant against you, for forgery, sir.

Count B. Blood and thunder!

Const. And so, sir, if you please to pull off your fool's frock there, I'll wait upon you to the next justice of peace immediately.

[Sir Francis and Manly advance.]

Jenny. Oh, dear me, what's the matter?

[Trembling.]

Count B. Oh, nothing, only a masquerading frolic, my dear.

Squire R. Oh, ho, is that all!

Sir F. No, sirrah! that is not all.

[Sir Francis Wronghead coming softly behind the Squire, knocks him down with his Cane.]

Squire R. Oh, lawd! Oh, lawd! he has beaten my brains out.

Man. Hold, hold, sir Francis; have a little mercy upon my poor godson, pray, sir.

Sir F. VVounds, cousin, I ha'n't patience.

Count B. Manly! nay then I'm blown to the devil! [Aside.]

Squire R. Oh, my head! my head!

Enter LADY VVRONGHEAD, dressed as a Shepherdess.

Lady W. VVhat's the matter here, gentlemen? For heaven's sake! VVhat, are you murdering my children?

Const. No, no, madam; no murder; only a little suspicion of felony, that's all.

Sir F. [To Jenny] And for you, Mrs. Hot-upon't; I could find in my heart to make you wear that habit as long as you live, you jade you. Do you know, hussy, that you were within two minutes of marrying a pickpocket?

Count B. So, so, all's out I find! [Aside.]

Jenny. Oh, the mercy! why pray, papa, is not the count a man of quality then?

Sir F. Oh, yes, one of the unchanged ones, it seems.

Lady W. Married! Oh, the confident thing! There was his urgent business then—slighted for her! I ha'n't patience!—and, for aught I know, I have been all this while making a friendship with a highwayman. [Aside.]

Man. Mr. Constable, secure there.

Sir F. Ah, my lady! my lady! this comes of your journey to London: but now I'll have a frolic of my own, madam; therefore pack up your trumpery this very night; for the moment my horses are able to crawl, you and your brats shall make a journey into the country again.

Lady W. Indeed, you are mistaken, sir

<sup>1)</sup> An allusion to the manner in which the cats draw up their backs, when they are attacked by a dog, etc.

Francis—I shall not stir out of town yet, I promise you.

Sir F. Not stir? Wounds, madam—

Man. Hold, sir!—if you'll give me leave a little—I fancy I shall prevail with my lady to think better on't.

Sir F. Ah, cousin, you are a friend indeed!

Man. [Apart to Lady Wronghead] Look you, madam, as to the favour you designed me, in sending this spurious letter enclosed to my lady Grace, all the revenge I have taken, is to have saved your son and daughter from ruin.—Now if you will take them fairly and quietly into the country again, I will save your ladyship from ruin.

Lady W. What do you mean, sir?

Man. Why, sir Francis—shall never know what is in this letter; look upon it. How it came into my hands you shall know at leisure.

Lady W. Ha! my billet-doux to the count! and an appointment in it! I shall sink with confusion!

Man. What shall I say to sir Francis, madam?

Lady W. Dear sir, I am in such a trembling! preserve my honour, and I am all obedience.

[Apart to Man.]

Man. Sir Francis—my lady is ready to receive your commands for her journey, whenever you please to appoint it.

Sir F. Ah, cousin, I doubt I am obliged to you for it.

Man. Come, come, sir Francis, take it as you find it. Obedience in a wife is a good thing, though it were never so wonderful!—And now, sir, we have nothing to do but to dispose of this gentleman.

Count B. Mr. Manly; sir, I hope you won't ruin me!

Man. Did not you forge this note for five hundred pounds, sir?

Count B. Sir—I see you know the world, and therefore I shall not pretend to prevaricate—But it has hurt nobody yet, sir; I beg you will not stigmatize me; since you have spoiled my fortune in one family, I hope you won't be so cruel to a young fellow, as to put it out of my power, sir, to make it in another, sir.

Man. Look you, sir, I have not much time to waste with you: but if you expect mercy yourself, you must show it to one you have been cruel to.

Count B. Cruel, sir?

Man. Have you not ruined this young woman?

Count B. I, sir?

Man. I know you have—therefore you can't blame her, if, in the fact you are charged with, she is a principal witness against you. However, you have one, and only one chance to get off with. Marry her this instant—and you take off her evidence.

Count B. Dear sir!

Man. No words, sir; a wife or a mittimus.

Count B. Lord, sir! this is the most unmerciful mercy!

Man. A private penance or a public one—Constable!

Count B. Hold, sir, since you are pleased to give me my choice, I will not make so ill a compliment to the lady, as not to give her the preference.

Man. It must be done this minute, sir; the chaplain you expected is still within call.

Myr. Come, sir, don't repine: marriage is at worst but playing upon the square.

Count B. Ay, but the worst of the match too, is the devil.

Man. Well, sir, to let you see it is not so bad as you think it; as a reward for her honesty, in detecting your practices, instead of the forged bill you would have put upon her, there's a real one of five hundred pounds, to begin a new honeymoon with.

[Gives it to Myrtilla.]

Count B. Sir, this is so generous an act—

Man. No compliments, dear sir—I am not at leisure now to receive them. Mr. Constable, will you be so good as to wait upon this gentleman into the next room, and give this lady in marriage to him?

[Exit.]

Const. Sir, I'll do it faithfully.

Count B. Well, five hundred will serve to make a handsome push with, however. And I am not the first of the fraternity who has run his head into one noose, to keep it out of another—Come, spouse.

Myr. Yes, my life.

[Exeunt Myrtilla, Count Basset, and Constable.]

Sir F. And that I may be sure my family's rid of him for ever—come, my lady, let's even take our children along with us, and be all witness of the ceremony.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—A dressing Room.

LADY TOWNLY discovered as just up; Mrs. TRUSTY waiting.

Mrs. T. Dear madam, what should make your ladyship so ill?

Lady T. How is it possible to be well, where one is killed for want of sleep?

Mrs. T. Dear me! it was so long before you rung, madam, I was in hopes your ladyship had been finely composed.

Lady T. Composed! why I have lain in an inn here; this house is worse than an inn with ten stage coaches: what between my lord's impertinent people of business in a morning, and the intolerable thick shoes of footmen at noon, one has not a wink all night.

Mrs. T. Indeed, madam, it's a great pity my lord can't be persuaded into the hours of people of quality—though I must say that, madam, your ladyship is certainly the best matrimonial manager in town.

Lady T. Oh, you are quite mistaken, Trusty! I manage very ill; for, notwithstanding all the power I have, by never being over fond of my lord—yet I want money infinitely oftener than he is willing to give it me.

Mrs. T. Ah! if his lordship could but be brought to play himself, madam, then he might feel what it is to want money.

Lady T. Oh, don't talk of it! Do you know that I am undone, Trusty?

Mrs. T. Mercy forbid, madam!

Lady T. Broke, ruined, plundered!—stripped, even to a confiscation of my last guinea!

Mrs. T. You don't tell me so, madam!

Lady T. And where to raise ten pound in the world—What is to be done, Trusty?

Mrs. T. Truly, I wish I were wise enough to tell you, madam: but may be your ladyship may have a run of better fortune upon some of the good company that comes here to-night.

Lady T. But I have not a single guinea to try my fortune.

Mrs. T. Ha! that's a bad business indeed, madam—Adad, I have a thought in my head, madam, if it is not too late—

Lady T. Out with it quickly then, I beseech thee.

Mrs. T. Has not the steward something of fifty pounds, madam, that you left in his hands to pay somebody about this time?

Lady T. Oh, ay; I had forgot—'twas to a—what's his filthy name?

Mrs. T. Now I remember, madam, 'twas to Mr. Lutestring, your old mercer, that your ladyship turned off about a year ago, because he would trust you no longer.

Lady T. The very wretch! If he has not paid it, run quickly, dear Trusty, and bid him bring it hither immediately. [Exit Trusty] Well, sure mortal woman never had such fortune! five, five and nine, against poor seven, for ever!—No, after that horrid bar of my chance—that lady Wronghead's fatal red fist upon the table, I saw it was impossible ever to win another stake—Sit up all night—lose all one's money—dream of winning thousands—wake without a shilling! and then—How like a hag I look!—In short—the pleasures of life are not worth this disorder. If it were not for shame now, I could almost think lady Grace's sober scheme not quite so ridiculous—If my wise lord could but hold his tongue for a week, 'tis odds but I should hate the town in a fortnight—But I will not be driven out of it, that's positive.

Enter Mrs. TRUSTY.

Mrs. T. Oh, madam, there's no bearing of it! Mr. Lutestring was just let in at the door, as I came to the stair foot; and the steward is now actually paying him the money in the hall.

Lady T. Run to the staircase head again—and scream to him that I must speak with him this instant.

[Mrs. Trusty runs out, and speaks.]

Mrs. T. [Within] Mr. Poundage!—a hem! Mr. Poundage, a word with you quickly!

Pound. [Within] I'll come to you presently.

Mrs. T. [Within] Presently won't do, man; you must come this minute.

Pound. [Within] I am but just paying a little money here.

Mrs. T. [Within] Odds my life, paying money! Is the man distracted? Come here, I tell you, to my lady, this moment—quick!

Re-enter Mrs. TRUSTY.

Lady T. Will the monster come, or no?

Mrs. T. Yes, I hear him now, madam; he is hobbling up as fast as he can.

Lady T. Don't let him come in—for he will keep such a babbling about his accounts—my brain is not able to bear him.

[Poundage comes to the Door, with a Money-bag in his Hand.]

Mrs. T. Oh, it's well you are come, sir! where's the fifty pounds.

Pound. Why here it is: if you had not been in such haste, I should have paid it by this time—the man's now writing a receipt below for it.

Mrs. T. No matter; my lady says you must not pay him with that money; there's not enough, it seems—there's a pistole and a guinea that is not good in it—besides, there is a mistake in the account too—[Twitching the Bag from him] But she is not at leisure to examine it now: so you must bid Mr. What-d'ye-callum call another time.

Lady T. What is all that noise there?

Pound. Why, and it please your ladyship—

Lady T. Pr'ythee don't plague me now; but do as you were ordered.

Pound. Nay, what your ladyship pleases, madam. [Exit.]

Mrs. T. There they are, madam—[Pours the money out of the Bag] The pretty things—were so near falling into a nasty tradesman's hands, I protest it made me tremble for them!—I fancy your ladyship had as good give me that bad guinea, for luck's sake—thank you, ma'am [Takes a Guinea.]

Lady T. Why, I did not bid you take it.

Mrs. T. No; but your ladyship looked as if you were just going to bid me; and so I was willing to save you the trouble of speaking, madam.

Lady T. Well, thou hast deserved it; and so, for once—[Noise without] But hark! don't I hear the man making a noise yonder?

Mrs. T. I'll listen.

Lady T. Pr'ythee do.

Mrs. T. [Goes to the Door] Ay, they are at it, madam—he's in a bitter passion with poor Poundage—Bless me! I believe he'll beat him.

[A Man's Voice without] I won't swear, but damn me if I don't have my money.

Mrs. T. Mercy on us, how the wretch swears!

Lady T. And a sober citizen too! that's a shame.

Mrs. T. Ha! I think all's silent, of a sudden—may be the porter has knocked him down—I'll step and see. [Exit.]

Lady T. These tradespeople are the troublesomest creatures! No words will satisfy them!

Re-enter Mrs. TRUSTY.

Mrs. T. Oh, madam! undone! undone! My lord has just bolted out upon<sup>1</sup> the man, and is bearing all his pitiful story over—If your ladyship pleases to come hither, you may hear him yourself.

Lady T. No matter; it will come round presently; I shall have it from my lord, without losing a word by the way, I'll warrant you.

Mrs. T. Oh lud, madam! here's my lord just coming in!

Lady T. Do you get out of the way, then. [Exit Mrs. Trusty] I am afraid I want spirits; but he will soon give them me.

Enter Lord TOWNLY.

Lord T. How comes it, madam, that a tradesman dares be clamorous in my house, for money due to him from you?

Lady T. You don't expect, my lord, that I should answer for other people's impertinence!

Lord T. I expect, madam, you should answer for your own extravagancies, that are the occasion of it; I thought I had given you money, three months ago, to satisfy all these sort of people.

Lady T. Yes; but you see they never are to be satisfied.

Lord T. Nor am I, madam, longer to be abused thus—what's become of the last five hundred I gave you?

Lady T. Gone.

Lord T. Gone! what way, madam?

Lady T. Half the town over, I believe, by this time.

Lord T. 'Tis well; I see ruin will make no impression, till it falls upon you.

Lady T. In short, my lord, if money is always the subject of our conversation, I shall make you no answer.

Lord T. Madam, madam, I will be heard, and make you answer.

Lady T. Make me! Then I must tell you, my lord, this is a language I have not been used to, and I won't bear it.

Lord T. Come, come, madam, you shall bear a great deal more, before I part with you.

Lady T. My lord, if you insult me, you will have as much to bear on your side, I can assure you.

Lord T. Pooh! your spirit grows ridiculous!—you have neither honour, worth, or innocence to support it.

Lady T. You'll find at least I have resentment; and do you look well to the provocation.

Lord T. After those you have given me, madam, 'tis almost infamous to talk with you.

Lady T. I scorn your imputation and your menaces. The narrowness of your heart is your monitor—'tis there, there, my lord, you are wounded; you have less to complain of than many husbands of an equal rank to you.

Lord T. Death, madam! do you presume upon your corporeal merit, that your person's less tainted than your mind? Is it there, there alone, an honest husband can be injured? Have you not every other vice that can debase your birth or stain the heart of woman? Is not your health, your beauty, husband, fortune, family disclaimed—for nights consumed in riot and extravagance? The wanton does no more—if she conceals her shame, does less; and sure the dissolute avowed, as sorely wrongs my honour and my quiet.

Lady T. I see, my lord, what sort of wife might please you.

Lord T. Ungrateful woman! could you have seen yourself, you in yourself had seen her—I am amazed our legislature has left no precedent of a divorce, for this more visible injury, this adultery of the mind, as well as that of the person! When a woman's whole heart is alienated to pleasures I have no share in, what is it to me, whether a black ace, or a powdered coxcomb, has possession of it?

Lady T. If you have not found it yet, my lord, this is not the way to get possession of mine, depend upon it.

Lord T. That, madam, I have long despaired of; and, since our happiness cannot be mutual, 'tis fit that, with our hearts, our persons too should separate.—This house you sleep no more in; though your content might grossly feed upon the dishonour of a husband, yet my desires would starve upon the features of a wife.

Lady T. Your style, my lord, is much of the same delicacy with your sentiments of honour!

Lord T. Madam, madam, this is no time for compliments—I have done with you.

Lady T. Done with me! If we had never met, my lord, I had not broke my heart for it—but have a care; I may not, perhaps, be so easily recalled as you may imagine.

Lord T. Recalled! Who's there?

Enter WILLIAMS.

Desire my sister and Mr. Manly to walk up.

[Exit Williams.]

Lady T. My lord, you may proceed as you please; but pray what indiscretions have I committed, that are not daily practised by a hundred other women of quality?

Lord T. 'Tis not the number of ill wives, madam, that makes the patience of a husband less contemptible; and though a bad one may be the best man's lot, yet he'll make a better figure in the world, that keeps his misfortunes out of doors, than he that tamely keeps them within.

Lady T. I don't know what figure you may make, my lord; but I shall have no reason to be ashamed of mine, in whatever company I may meet you.

Lord T. Be sparing of your spirit, madam; you'll need it to support you.

Enter LADY GRACE and MANLY.

Mr. Manly, I have an act of friendship to beg of you, which wants more apologies than words can make for it.

Man. Then pray make none, my lord, that I may have the greater merit in obliging you.

Lord T. Sister, I have the same excuse to entreat of you too.

Lady G. To your request, I beg, my lord.

Lord T. Thus then—As you both were present at my ill-considered marriage, I now desire you each will be a witness of my determined separation—I know, sir, your good nature, and my sister's, must be shocked at the office I impose on you; but as I don't ask your justification of my cause, so I hope you are conscious that an ill woman can't reproach you, if you are silent on her side.

Man. My lord, I never thought, till now, it could be difficult to oblige you.

Lord T. For you, my lady Townly, I need not here repeat the provocations of my parting with you—the world, I fear, is too well informed of them—For the good lord, your dear father's sake, I will still support you as his daughter.—As the Lord Townly's wife, you have had every thing a fond husband could bestow, and, to our mutual shame I speak it, more than happy wives desire—But those indulgencies must end—state, equipage, and splendour, but ill become the vices that misuse them—The decent necessities of life shall be supplied, but not one article to luxury—not even the coach, that waits to carry you from hence, shall you ever use again. Your tender aunt, my Lady Lovemore, with tears, this morning, has consented to receive you; where, if time and your condition bring you to a due reflection, your allowance shall be increased—but if you still are lavish of your little, or pine for past licentious pleasures, that little shall be less; nor will I call that soul my friend that names you in my hearing.—Oh, Manly, look there! turn back thy thoughts with me, and witness to my growing love.—There was a time, when I believed that form incapable of vice or of decay; there I proposed the partner of an easy home; there I for ever hoped to find a cheerful companion, a faithful friend, a useful helpmate, and a tender mother—but, oh, how bitter now the disappointment!

Man. The world is different in its sense of happiness; offended as you are, I know you will still be just.

Lord T. Fear me not.

Man. This last reproach, I see, has struck her! [Aside.]

Lord T. No, let me not (though I this moment cast her from my heart for ever), let me not urge her punishment beyond her crimes—I know the world is fond of any tale that feeds its appetite of scandal;—and as I am conscious severities of this kind seldom fail of imputations too gross to mention, I here, before you both, acquit her of the least suspicion raised against the honour of my bed. Therefore, when abroad her conduct may be questioned, do her fame that justice.

Lady T. Oh, sister!

[Turns to Lady Grace, weeping.]

Lord T. When I am spoken of, where, without favour, this action may be canvassed, relate but half my provocations, and give me up to censure. [Going.]

Lady T. Support me—save me—hide me from the world!

[Falling on Lady Grace's Neck.]

Lord T. [Returning] I had forgot me—You have no share in my resentment, therefore, as you have lived in friendship with her, your parting may admit of gentler terms than suit the honour of an injured husband.

[Offers to go out.]

Man. [Interposing] My lord, you must not, shall not, leave her thus!—One moment's stay can do your cause no wrong. If looks can speak the anguish of her heart, I'll answer, with my life, there's something labouring in her mind, that, would you bear the hearing, might deserve it.

Lord T. Consider—since we no more can meet, press not my staying to insult her.

Lady T. Yet stay, my lord—the little I would say will not deserve an insult; and, undeserved, I know your nature gives it not. But as you've called in friends to witness your resentment, let them be equal hearers of my last reply. [be it so.]

Lord T. I shan't refuse you that, madam—

Lady T. My lord, you ever have complained I wanted love; but as you kindly have allowed I never gave it to another, so, when you hear the story of my heart, though you may still complain, you will not wonder at my coldness.

Lord T. Proceed—I am attentive.

Lady T. Before I was your bride, my lord, the flattering world had talked me into beauty; which, at my glass, my youthful vanity confirmed. Wild with that fame, I thought mankind my slaves—I triumphed over hearts, while all my pleasure was their pain: yet was my own so equally insensible to all, that, when a father's firm commands enjoined me to make choice of one, I even there declined the liberty he gave, and to his own election yielded up my youth—his tender care, my lord, directed him to you.—Our hands were joined, but still my heart was wedded to its folly.—My only joy was power, command, society, profuseness, and to lead in pleasures.—The husband's right to rule I thought a vulgar law, which only the deformed or meanly spirited obeyed.—I knew no directors but my passions, no master but my will.—Even you, my lord, sometime o'ercome by love, were pleased with my delights; nor then foresaw this mad misuse of your indulgence.—And though I call myself ungrateful while I own it, yet as a truth it cannot be denied, that kind indulgence has undone me; it added strength to my habitual failings, and, in a heart thus warm in wild, unthinking life, no wonder if the gentler sense of love was lost.

Man. If yet recoverable, how vast the treasure! [Apart.]

Lady T. What I have said, my lord, is not my excuse, but my confession; my errors (give them, if you please, a harder name) cannot be defended—No, what's in its nature wrong, no words can palliate—no plea can alter! What then remains in my condition, but resignation to your pleasure? Time only can convince you of my future conduct: therefore, till I have lived an object of forgiveness, I dare not hope for pardon—The penance of a lonely, contrite life, were little to the innocent; but, to have deserved this separation, will strew perpetual thorns upon my pillow.—Sister, farewell! [Kisses her] Your virtue needs no warning from the shame that falls on me; but when you think I have atoned my follies past, persuade your injured brother to forgive them.

Lord T. No, madam! your errors, thus renounced, this instant are forgotten! So deep, so due a sense of them has made you what my utmost wishes form'd, and all my heart has sigh'd for.—Long parted friends, that pass through easy voyages of life, receive but common gladness in their meeting; but, from a shipwreck saved, we mingle tears with our embraces. [Embraces Lady Townly.]

Lady T. What words—what love—what duty can repay such obligations?

Lord T. Preserve but this desire to please, your power is endless.

Lady T. Oh! till this moment never did I know, my lord, I had a heart to give you!

Lord T. By heaven! this yielding hand, when first it gave you to my wishes, presented not a treasure more desirable!—Oh, Manly! sister! as you have often shared in my disquiet, partake of my felicity—my new-born joy! See here, the bride of my desires! This may be called my wedding-day.

Lady G. Sister (for now, methinks, that name is dearer to me than ever), let me congratulate the happiness that opens to you.

Man. Long, long, and mutual, may it flow!

Lord T. To make our happiness complete, my dear, join here with me to give a hand, that amply will repay the obligation.

Lady T. Sister, a day like this—

Lady G. Admits of no excuse against the general joy. [Gives her Hand to Manly.]

Man. A joy like mine—despairs of words to speak it.

Lord T. Oh, Manly, how the name of friend endears the brother! [Embraces him.]

Man. Your words, my lord, will warm me to deserve them.

Lady T. Sister, to your unerring virtue I now commit the guidance of my future days. Never the paths of pleasure more to tread, But where your guarded innocence shall lead; For, in the marriage state, the world must own, Divided happiness was never known. To make it mutual, nature points the way; Let husbands govern, gentle wives obey.

[Exeunt.]

SHE WOULD AND SHE WOULD NOT;

Or, The kind Impostor, acted at Drury Lane 1705. This is a very busy, sprightly, and entertaining comedy, and still continues a stock play. The plot of it is borrowed from Leonard's Counterfeits, and perhaps from the Novel The Trepanner trepanned, on which that Comedy itself was built.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—An Inn at MADRID.

Enter TRAPPANTI.

Trap. INDEED, my friend Trappanti, thou'rt in a very thin condition; thou hast neither master, meat, nor money: not but, couldst thou part with that unappeasable itch of eating too, thou hast all the ragged virtues that were requisite to set up an ancient philosopher. Contempt and poverty, kicks, thumps, and thinking thou hast endured with the best of 'em; but—when fortune turns thee up to hard fasting, that is to say, positively not eating at all, I perceive thou art a downright dunce, with the same stomach, and no more philosophy than a hound upon horse-flesh—Fasting's the devil!—Let me see—this, I take it, is the most frequented inn about Madrid; and if a keen guest or two should drop in now—Hark!

Host. [Within] Take care of the gentlemen's horses there; see 'em well rubb'd and litter'd.

Trap. Just alighted! If they do but stay to eat now! Impudence assist me; hab! a couple of pretty young sparks, faith!

Enter HYPOLITA and FLORA, in Men's Habits; a Postboy, with a Portmanteau.

Welcome to Madrid, sir; welcome, sir.

Flora. Sir, your servant.

Post. Have the horses pleased your honour?

Hyp. Very well indeed, friend; pr'ythee set down the portmanteau, and see that the poor creatures want nothing: they have performed well, and deserve our care.

Trap. I'll take care of that, sir; here, ostler.

[Exeunt Trappanti and Servant.]

Flora. And pray, madam, what do I deserve?

Hyp. Poor Flora! thou art fatigued indeed, but I shall find a way to thank thee for't.

Flora. And now, madam, pray what do you propose will be the end of our journey?

Hyp. Why, now I hope the end of my wishes—Don Philip, I need not tell you how far he is in my heart.

Flora. No, your sweet usage of him told me that long enough ago; but now, it seems, you think fit to confess it; and what is it you love him for, pray?

Hyp. His manner of bearing that usage.

Flora. Ah! dear pride! how we love to have it tickled! But he does not bear it, you see, for he's coming post to Madrid to marry another woman; nay, one he never saw.

Hyp. An unknown face can't have very far engaged him.

Flora. How came he to be engaged to her at all?

Hyp. Why, I engaged him.

Flora. To another!

Hyp. To my whole sex, rather than own I loved him.

Flora. Ah! done like a woman of courage.

Hyp. I could not bear the thoughts of parting with my power; besides, he took me at such an advantage, and pressed me so home to a surrender, I could have tore him piecemeal.

Flora. Ay! I warrant you, an insolent—agreeable puppy. But let us hear.

Hyp. I'll tell thee, Flora; you know don Philip wants no charm that can recommend him. As a lover in rank and fortune, I confess him my superior; 'tis the thoughts of that has been a constant thorn upon my wishes; I never saw him in the humblest posture, but still I fancied he secretly presumed his rank and fortune might command me; this always stung my pride, and made me over-act it: nay sometimes, when his sufferings have almost drawn the tears into my eyes, I have turn'd the subject with some trifling talk, or hummed a spiteful tune, though I believe his heart was breaking.

Flora. But, love be praised, your proud stomach's come down for it.

Hyp. Indeed, 'tis not altogether so high as 'twas. In a word, his last letter set me at my wit's end, and when I came to myself, you may remember you thought me bewitched, for I immediately called for my boy's clothes, and so rode after him.

Flora. Why truly, madam, as to your wits, I've not much altered my opinion of 'em, for I can't see what you propose by it.

Hyp. My whole design, Flora, lies in this portmanteau, and these breeches.

Flora. A notable design, no doubt; but pray let's hear it.

Hyp. Why, I do propose to be twice married between 'em.

Flora. How! twice?

Hyp. By the help of the portmanteau I intend to marry myself to don Philip's new mistress, and then—I'll put off my breeches and marry him.

Flora. Now I begin to take ye: but pray what's in the portmanteau? and how came you by it?

Hyp. I hired one to steal it from his servant at the last inn we lay at in Toledo: in it are jewels of value, presents to my bride, gold, good store, settlements, and credential letters to certify that the bearer (which I intend to be myself) is don Philip, only son and heir of don Fernando de las Torres, now residing at Seville, whence we came.

Flora. A very smart undertaking, by my troth: and pray, madam, what part am I to act?

Hyp. My woman still; when I can't lie for myself you are to do it for me, in the person of a cousin-german.

Flora. And my name is to be—

Hyp. Don Guzman, Diego, Mendez, or what you please; be your own godfather.

Flora. 'Egad, I begin to like it mightily; this may prove a very pleasant adventure, if we can but come off without fighting, which, by the way, I don't easily perceive we shall; for to be sure don Philip will make the devil to do with us when he finds himself here before he comes hither.

Hyp. O let me alone to give him satisfaction.

Flora. I'm afraid it must be alone, if you do give him satisfaction; for my part I can push no more than I can swim.

Hyp. But you can bully, upon occasion.

Flora. I can scold when my blood's up.

Hyp. That's the same thing. Bullying in breeches, would be scolding in petticoats.

Flora. Say ye so: why then do look to yourself; if I don't give you as good as you bring, I'll be content to wear breeches as long as I live. Well, madam, now you have open'd the plot, pray when is the play to begin?

Hyp. I hope to have it all over in less than four hours; we'll just refresh ourselves with what the house affords, and wait upon my father-in-law—How now! what would this fellow have?—

Re-enter TRAPPANTI.

Trap. Servant, gentlemen, I have taken nice care of your nags; good cattle they are, by my troth, right and sound, I warrant 'em; they deserve care, and they have had it, and shall have it if they stay in this house—I always stand by, sir, see 'em rubb'd down with my own eyes—catch me trusting an ostler, I'll give you leave to fill for me, and drink for me too.

Flora. I have seen this fellow somewhere. [Apart to Hypolita.]

Trap. Hey-day! what, no cloth laid! was ever such attendance! hey, house! tapster! landlord! hey! [Knocks] What was it you bespoke, gentlemen?

Hyp. Really, sir, I ask your pardon, I have almost forgot you.

Trap. Pshaw! dear sir, never talk of it; I live here hard by—I have a lodging—I can't call it a lodging neither—that is, I have a—sometimes I am here, and sometimes I am there; and so here and there one makes shift, you know.—Hey! will these people never come?

Hyp. You give a very good account of yourself, sir.

Trap. O! nothing at all, sir. Lord, sir!—was it fish or flesh, sir?

Flora. Really, sir, we have bespoke nothing yet.

Trap. Nothing! for shame! it's a sign you are young travellers; you don't know this house, sir; why they'll let you starve if you don't stir, and call, and that like thunder too—Hollo!

Hyp. Ha! you eat here sometimes, I presume, sir?

Trap. Umph!—Ay, sir, that's as it happens—I seldom eat at home, indeed—Hollo!

Enter Host.

Host. Did you call, gentlemen?

Trap. Yes, and bawl too, sir: here, the gentlemen are almost famish'd, and nobody comes near 'em: what have you in the house now that will be ready presently?

Host. You may have what you please, sir.

Hyp. Can you get us a partridge?

Host. Sir, we have no partridges; but we'll get you what you please in a moment: we have a very good neck of mutton, sir; if you please it shall be clapp'd down in a moment.

Hyp. Have you no pigeons or chickens?

Host. Truly, sir, we have no fowl in the house at present; if you please you may have any thing else in a moment.

Hyp. Then pr'ythee get us some young rabbits.

Host. Rabbits! odd rabbit it, rabbits are so scarce they are not to be had for money.

Flora. Have you any fish?

Host. Fish! sir, I dress'd yesterday the finest dish that ever came upon a table; I am sorry we have none left, sir; but, if you please, you may have any thing else in a moment.

Trap. Plague on thee, hast thou nothing but any-thing-else in the house?

Host. Very good mutton, sir.

Hyp. Pr'ythee get us a saddle<sup>1)</sup> then.

Host. Don't you love the neck, sir?

Hyp. Ha'ye nothing in the house but the neck?

Host. Really, sir, we don't use to be so unprovided, but at present we have nothing else left.

Trap. 'Egad, it's neck or nothing<sup>1)</sup> here, sir. Faith, sir, I don't know but a nothing else may be very good meat, when any thing else is not to be had.

Hyp. Then pr'ythee, friend, let's have thy neck of mutton before that is gone too.

Trap. Sir, he shall lay it down this minute; I'll see it done:—gentlemen, I'll wait upon ye presently; for a minute I must beg your pardon, and leave to lay the cloth myself.

Hyp. By no means, sir.

Trap. No ceremony, dear sir; indeed I'll do't. [Exeunt Host and Trappanti.]

Hyp. What can this familiar puppy be?

Flora. With much ado I have recollected his face. Don't you remember, madam, about two or three years ago, don Philip had a trusty servant, called Trappanti, that used now and then to slip a note into your hand, as you came from church?

Hyp. Is this he that Philip turn'd away for saying I was as proud as a beauty, and homely enough to be good humour'd?

Flora. The very same, I assure ye; only, as you see starving has altered his air a little.

Hyp. Poor fellow! I am concern'd for him: what makes him so far from Seville?

Flora. I'm afraid all places are alike to him.

Hyp. I have a great mind to take him into my service, his assurance may be useful, as my case stands.

Flora. You would not tell him who you are?

Hyp. There's no occasion for it—I'll talk with him.

Re-enter TRAPPANTI.

Trap. Your dinner's upon the spit, gentlemen, and the cloth is laid in the best room—Are you not for a whet,<sup>2)</sup> sir? What wine? what wine?—Hey!

Flora. We give you trouble, sir.

Trap. Not in the least, sir.—Hey! [Knocks.]

Re-enter Host.

Host. D'ye call, gentlemen?

Hyp. Ay; what wine have ye?

Host. What sort you please, sir.

Flora. Sir, will you please to name it?

[To Trappanti.]

Trap. Nay, pray, sir—

Hyp. No ceremony, dear sir; upon my word you shall.

Trap. Upon my soul, you'll make me leave ye, gentlemen.

Hyp. Come, come, no words! pr'ythee, you shall.

Trap. Pshaw! but why this among friends now? Here—have ye any right Galicia?

Host. The best in Spain, I warrant it.

Trap. Let's taste it; if it be good, set us out half a dozen bottles for dinner.

Host. Yes, sir.

[Exit.]

Flora. Who says this fellow's a starving now? On my conscience, the rogue has more impudence than a lover at midnight.

[Apart to Hypolita.]

1) Fox-hunters in jumping over a hedge or a five-barred gate, on horseback, expose themselves to such danger, that they are sure either to break their neck or break nothing; hence the expression. The pun is easily understood.

2) A whet is one of the numerous expressions for taking a glass of brandy, etc. to sharpen the appetite, keep out the cold; or some other such excuse.

Hyp. Hang him, 'tis inoffensive; I'll humour him.—[Apart] Pray, sir (for I find we are like to be better acquainted, therefore I hope you won't take my question ill)—

Trap. O, dear sir!

Hyp. What profession may you be of?

Trap. Profession, sir—I—I—Ods me! here's the wine.

Re-enter Host.

Come, fill out—hold—let me taste it first—ye blockhead, would ye have the gentleman drink before he knows whether it be good or not?

[Drinks] Yes, 'twill do—give me the bottle, I'll fill myself. Now, sir, is not that a glass of right wine? [To Hypolita.]

Hyp. Extremely good indeed—But, sir, as to my question.

Trap. I'm afraid, sir, that mutton won't be enough for us all.

Hyp. O, pray, sir, bespeak what you please.

Trap. Sir, your most humble servant.—Here, master! pr'ythee get us—Ha! ay, get us a dozen of poach'd eggs—a dozen, d'ye hear—just to—pop down a little.

Host. Yes, sir.

[Going.]

Trap. Friend—let there be a little slice of bacon to every one of 'em.

Host. Yes, sir—a little thin slice, sir?

[Going.]

Trap. No, you dog, not too thin.

Hyp. But, sir—

Trap. Odso! I had like to have forgot—here, a—Sancho! Sancho! ay, isn't your name Sancho?

Host. Diego, sir.

Trap. Oh! ay, Diego! that's true indeed, Diego! Umph!

Hyp. I must e'en let him alone; there's no putting in a word till his mouth's full. [Apart.]

Trap. Come, here's to thee, Diego—[Drinks and fills again] That I should forget thy name though.

Host. No great harm, sir.

Trap. Diego, ha! a very pretty name, faith!—I think you are married, are you not, Diego?

Host. Ay, ay, sir.

Trap. Hah! how many children?

Host. Nine girls and a boy, sir.

Trap. Hah! nine girls—Come, here's to thee again, Diego—Nine girls! a stirring woman, I dare say; a good housewife, ha! Diego?

Host. Pretty well, sir.

Trap. Makes all her pickles herself, I warrant ye—Does she do olives well?

Host. Will you be pleased to taste 'em, sir?

Trap. Taste 'em! humph! pr'ythee let's have a plate, Diego.

Host. Yes, sir.

Hyp. And our dinner as soon as you please, sir; when it's ready, call us.

Host. Yes, sir.

[Exit.]

Hyp. But, sir, I was asking you of your profession.

Trap. Profession! really, sir, I don't use to profess much; I am a plain dealing sort of a man; if I say I'll serve a gentleman, he may depend upon me.

Flora. Have you ever served, sir?

Trap. Not these two last campaigns.

Hyp. How so?

Trap. Some words with my superior officer; I was a little too free in speaking my mind to him.

Hyp. Don't you think of serving again, sir?

Trap. If a good post falls in my way.

Hyp. I believe I could help you.—Pray, sir, when you served last, did you take pay or wages?

Trap. Pay, sir!—Yes, sir, I was paid, clear'd subsistence and arrears to a farthing.

Hyp. And your late commander's name was—

Trap. Don Philip de las Torres.

Hyp. Of Seville?

Trap. Of Seville.

Hyp. Sir, your most humble servant. You need not be curious; for I am sure you don't know me, though I do you, and your condition; which I dare promise you I'll mend upon our better acquaintance. And your first step to deserve it, is to answer me honestly to a few questions: keep your assurance still; it may do me service, I shall like you better for it: come, here's to encourage you.

[Gives him Money.]

Trap. Sir, my humble service to you.

Hyp. Well said.

Flora. Nay, I'll pass my word he shan't dwindle into modesty.

Trap. I never heard a gentleman talk better in my life. I have seen such a sort of face before, but where—I don't know, nor I don't care. It's your glass, sir.

Hyp. Grammercy! here, cousin! [Drinks to Flora] Come, now, what made don Philip turn you out of his service? Why did you leave him?

Trap. 'Twas time, I think; his wits had left him—the man was mad.

Hyp. Mad!

Trap. Ay, stark mad—in love.

Hyp. In love! How pray?

Trap. Very deep—up to the ears, over head, drown'd by this time, he would in—I would have had him stopp'd when he was up to the middle.

Hyp. What was she he was in love with?

Trap. The devil!

Hyp. So! now for a very ugly likeness of my own face. What sort of a devil? [Aside.]

Trap. The damning sort—a woman.

Hyp. Had she no name?

Trap. Her Christian name was donna Hypolita: but her proper name was Shittlecock.

Flora. How d'ye like that?

[Apart to Hypolita.]

Hyp. Pretty well. [Apart] Was she handsome?

Trap. Umph!—so, so!

Flora. How d'ye like that? [Apart.]

Hyp. Umph!—so, so! [Apart] Had she wit?

Trap. Sometimes.

Hyp. Good humour?

Trap. Very seldom.

Hyp. Proud?

Trap. Ever.

Hyp. Was she honest?

Trap. Very proud.

Hyp. What! had she no good qualities?

Trap. Faith! I don't remember 'em.

Hyp. Hah! d'ye think she loved him?

Trap. If she did, 'twas as the cobbler loved

Hyp. How was that? [his wife.]

Trap. Why he beat her thrice a day, and told his neighbours he loved her never the worse; but he was resolved she should never know it.

Hyp. Did she use him so very ill?

Trap. Like a jade.

Flora. How d'ye do now? [Apart.]

Hyp. I don't know—methinks I—[Apart] But sure! What! was she not handsome, say ye?

Trap. A devilish tongue.

Hyp. Was she ugly?

Flora. Ay, say that at your peril. [Aside.]

Hyp. What was she? How did she look?

Trap. Look! Why, faith, the woman look'd very well when she had a blush in her face.

Hyp. Did she often blush?

Trap. I never saw her.

Flora. How d'ye like the picture, madam?

Hyp. I am as humble as an offending lover. [Apart.]

Re-enter Host.

Host. Gentlemen, your dinner's upon table.

Hyp. That's well! Come, sir, at dinner I'll give you further instructions how you may serve yourself and me.

Trap. Come, sir.

Flora. Nay, dear sir, no ceremony.

Trap. Sir, your very humble servant.

[As they are going, Hypolita stops them.]

Hyp. Come back; here's one I don't care should see me.

Trap. Sir, the dinner will be cold.

Hyp. Do you eat it hot then; we are not hungry.

Trap. Sir, your humble servant again. [Exit.]

Flora. You seem concern'd; who is it?

Hyp. My brother Octavio, as I live—Come this way. [They retire.]

Enter OCTAVIO and a Servant.

Oct. Jasper, run immediately to Rosa's woman, tell her I am just come to town, slip that note into her hand, and stay for an answer.

Flora. 'Tis he. [Apart to Hypolita.]

Re-enter Host, conducting DON PHILIP.

Host. Here, sir, please to walk this way.

Flora. And don Philip, by Jupiter! [Apart.]

Don P. When my servant comes, send him to me immediately.

Host. Yes, sir.

Hyp. Nay, then it's time for us to make ready—Allons!

[Apart. Exeunt Hypolita and Flora.]

Oct. Don Philip!

Don P. Dear Octavio!

Oct. What lucky point of the compass could blow us upon one another so?

Don P. Faith! a wind very contrary to my inclination: but the worst I see blows some good; I am overjoy'd to see you.—But what makes you so far from the army?

Oct. O, friend, such an unfortunate occasion, yet such a lucky discovery! such a mixture of joy and torment no poor dog upon earth was ever plagued with.

Don P. Unriddle, pray.

Oct. Don't you remember, about six months ago, I wrote you word of a dear, deliciously sprightly creature, that I had bombarded for a whole summer to no purpose?

Don P. I remember.

Oct. That same silly, stubborn, charming angel now capitulates.

Don P. Then she's taken.

Oct. I can't tell that; for you must know, her perfidious father, contrary to his treaty with me, and her inclination, is going to—

Don P. Marry her to another?

Oct. Of a better estate than mine, it seems. There's her express; read it.

HYPOLITA, FLORA, and TRAPPANTI, appear in the Balcony.

Flora. Trappanti, there's your old master.

Trap. Ay, I know him again: but I may chance to tell him he did not know a good servant when he had him.

Don P. [Reads] My father has concluded a match for me with one I never saw, and intends in two days to perfect it; the gentleman is expected every hour. In the mean time, if you know any friend that has a better title to me, advise him forthwith to put in his claim: I am almost out of my senses; which you'll easily believe, when I tell you, if such a one should make haste, I shan't have time to refuse him any thing.

Hyp. How's this?

Don P. No name.

Oct. She never would trust it in a letter.

Flora. If this should be don Philip's mistress!

Trap. Sir, you may take my word it is; I know the lady, and what the neighbours say of her.

Don P. What will you do in this case?

Oct. That I don't yet know; I have just sent my servant to tell her I am come to town, and beg an opportunity to speak with her: I long to see her: I warrant the poor fool will be so soft and humble, now she's in a fright.

Don P. What will you propose at your meeting her?

Oct. I don't know, may be another meeting: at least it will come to a kind look, a kiss, good by, and a sigh!—ah! if I can but persuade her to run away with me.

Don P. Consider!

Oct. Ah! so I do; what a pleasure 'twould be to have her steal out of her bed in a sweet, moonshiny night! to hear her come pat, pat, pat, along in her slippers, with nothing but a thin silk night-gown loose about her; and in this tempting dress to have her jump into my arms breathless with fear.

Don P. Octavio, I envy thee; thou art the happiest man in thy temper—

Oct. And thou art the most alter'd I ever knew: pr'ythee what makes thee so much upon the hum-drum?<sup>1)</sup> Well, are my sister and you come to a right understanding yet? When do you marry?

Don P. My condition, Octavio, is very much like your mistress's: she is going to marry the man she never saw, and I the woman.

Oct. 'Sdeath! you make me tremble: I hope 'tis not my mistress.

Don P. Thy mistress! that were an idle fear; Madrid's a wide place.—Or if it were (she loving you), my friendship and my honour would oblige me to desist.

Oct. That's generous indeed! But still you amaze me. Are you quite broke off with my sister? I hope she has given you no reason to forget her?

Don P. The most severe that ever beauty printed in the heart of man, a coldness unaccountable to sense.

Oct. Pshaw! dissembled.

Don P. I can't think it; lovers are soon flattered into hope; but she appeared to me indifferent to so nice a point, that she has ruined me without the trouble of resolving it.

Oct. For all her usage of you, I'll be racked if she did not love you.

Don P. I rather think she hated me: however, now 'tis past, and I must endeavour to think no more of her.

Oct. Then you are determined to marry this other lady?

Don P. That's my business to Madrid.

Trap. Which shall be done to your hand.

Don P. Besides, I am now obliged by contract.

Oct. Then (though she be my sister) may some jealous, old, ill-natured dog revenge your quarrel to her.

Don P. Come, forget it.

[Exeunt Hypolita, Flora, and Trappanti.]

Oct. With all my heart; let's go in and drink your new mistress's health. When do you visit her?

Don P. I intended it immediately; but an unlucky accident has hinder'd me; one of my servants fell sick upon the road, so that I am forced to make shift with one, and he is the most negligent, sottish rogue in nature, has left the portmanteau, where all my writings and letters of concern are, behind him at the last town we lay, so that I can't properly visit the lady or her father till I am able to assure them who I am.

Oct. Why don't you go back yourself to see for 'em?

Don P. I have sent my servant; for I am really tired: I was loath to appear too much concern'd for 'em, lest the rascal should think it worth his while to run away with 'em.

Re-enter a Servant to OCTAVIO.

Oct. How now?

Serv. Here's an answer, sir. [Gives a Letter.]

Oct. My dear friend, I beg a thousand pardons, I must leave you this minute; the kind creature has sent for me; I am a soldier, you know, and orders must be obey'd; when I come off duty, I'll immediately wait upon you.

[To Don Philip.]
Don P. You'll find me here, or hear of me: adieu. [Exit Octavio] Here, house!

Re-enter Host.

Pr'ythee see if my servant be come yet.

Host. I believe he is, sir; is he not in blue?

Don P. Ay, where is the sot?

Host. Just refreshing himself with a glass at the gate.

Don P. Pray tell the gentleman I'd speak with him. [Exit Host] In all the necessities of life there is not a greater plague than servants. Hey, Soto! Soto!

Enter Soto, drunk.

Soto. Did you please to—such!—call, sir?

Don P. What's the reason, blockhead, I must always wait upon you thus?

Soto. Sir, I did not know any thing of it; I—I—came as soon as you se—se—se—sent for me.

Don P. And why not without sending, sir? Did you think I expected no answer to the business I sent you about?

Soto. Yes, sir—I did think you would be willing—that is—to have an account—so I staid to take a glass at the door, because I would not be out of the way—hub!

Don P. You are drunk, rascal—where's the portmanteau?

Soto. Sir, I am here—if you please, I'll give you the whole account how the matter is—hub!

Don P. Speak, villain. [Strikes him.]

Soto. I will, sir, as soon as I can put my words into an intelligible order; I an't running away, sir.

Don P. To the point, sirrah!

Soto. Not of your sword, dear sir.

Don P. Sirrah, be brief, or I'll murder you: where's the portmanteau?

Soto. Sir, as I hope to breathe, I made all the strictest search in the world, and drank at every house upon the road, going and coming, and ask'd about it; and so at last, as I was coming within a mile of the town here, I found then—

Don P. What?

Soto. That it must certainly be lost.

Don P. Dog! d'ye think this must satisfy me? [Beats him.]

Soto. Lord, sir, you won't hear reason—Are you sure you han't it about you?—If I know any thing of it, I wish I may be burnt.

Don P. Villain! your life can't make me satisfaction.

Soto. No, sir, that's hard—a man's life can't—for my part—I—I—

Don P. Why do I vent my rage against a sot, a clod of earth? I should accuse myself for trusting him.

Soto. Sir—

Don P. Be dumb!

Soto. Ahub! Yes.

Don P. If this rascal had stole it, sure he would not have ventured to come back again—I am confounded! Neither don Manuel nor his daughter know me, nor any of his family. If I should not visit him till I can receive fresh letters from my father, he'll in the mean time think himself affronted by my neglect—What shall I do? Suppose I go and tell him my misfortune, and beg his patience till we can hear again from Seville. I must think! Hey, Soto!

Soto. I had rather bought a portmanteau out of my own pocket, than had such a life about it. [Exit.]

Re-enter HYPOLITA, FLORA, and TRAPPANTI.

Trap. Hold, sir, let me touch up your fore-top<sup>1)</sup> a little.

Hyp. Well, Trappanti, you know your business; and if I marry the lady, you know my promise too.

Trap. Sir, I shall remember 'em both—

Odso! I had like to have forgot—Here, house! a bason and washball—I've a razor about me. —Hey!

[Knocks.]

Hyp. What's the matter?

Trap. Sir, you are not shaved.

Hyp. Shaved!

Trap. Ever while you live, sir, go with a smooth chin to your mistress. Hey!

[Knocks.]

Hyp. This puppy does so plague me with his impertinence, I shall laugh out, and discover myself.

[Aside.]

Trap. Why, Diego!

[Knocks.]

Hyp. Pshaw! pr'ythee don't stand fooling, we're in haste.

Flora. Ay, ay, shave another time.

Trap. Nay, what you please, sir; your beard is not much, you may wear it to-day.

[Taking her by the Chin.]

Flora. Ay, and to-morrow too: pray, sir, will you see the coach ready, and put in the things?

Trap. Sir, I'll see the coach ready, and put in the things.

[Exit.]

Flora. Come, madam, courage; now let's do something for the honour of our sex, give a proof of our parts, and tell mankind we can contrive, fatigue, bustle, and bring about as well as the best of 'em.

Hyp. Well said, Flora: for the honour of our sex be it then, and let the grave dons think themselves as wise as they please; but nature knows there goes more wit to the management of some amours, than the hardest point in politics.

Therefore to men th' affair of state's confin'd,
Wisely to us the state of love's assign'd,
As love's the weightier business of mankind.

[Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—DON MANUEL'S House.

Enter ROSARA and VILETTA.

Vil. Hear reason.

Ros. Talk of Octavio then.

Vil. How do you know but the gentleman your father designs you for, may prove as pretty a fellow as he? if you should happen to like him as well.

Ros. Do you expect Octavio should thank you for this?

Vil. The gentleman is no fool.

Ros. He'll hate any one that is not a friend to his love.

Vil. Hang 'em, say I: but can't one quench the thirst without jumping into the river? Is there no difference between cooling and drowning? If Octavio must be the man, I say, let don Philip be the husband.

Ros. I tell you, fool, I'll have no man but a husband, and no husband but Octavio: when you find I am weary of him, I'll give you leave to talk to me of somebody else.

Vil. In vain, I see.—I ha' done, madam—one must have time to be wise; but in the mean while what do ye resolve? Positively not to marry don Philip.

Ros. I don't know what I shall do, till I see Octavio; when did he say he would be here?

Vil. Oh! I dare not tell you, madam.

Ros. Why?

Vil. I am bribed to the contrary.

Ros. By whom?

Vil. Octavio! he just now sent me this lovely piece of gold, not to tell you what time he would be here.

Ros. Nay then, Viletta, here are two pieces that are twice as lovely; tell me when I shall see him.

Vil. Umph! these are lovely pieces indeed. [Smiling.]

Ros. When, Viletta?

Vil. Have you no more of 'em, madam?

Ros. Pshaw! there, take purse and all; will that content thee?

Vil. O! dear madam, I should be unconscionable to desire more; but really I was willing to have 'em all first. [Courtesying.]

Ros. When will he come?

Vil. Why the poor gentleman has been banking about the house this quarter of an hour; but I did not observe, madam, you were willing to see him, till you had convinced me by so plain a proof.

Ros. Where's my father?

Vil. Fast asleep in the great chair.

Ros. Fetch him in then before he wakes.

Vil. Let him wake, his habit will protect him.

Rob. His habit!

Vil. Ay, madam, he's turn'd friar to come at you: if your father surprises us, I have a lie ready to back him—Hist, Octavio, you may enter.

Enter OCTAVIO, in a Friar's Habit.

Oct. After a thousand frights and fears, do I live to see my dear Rosara once again, and kind?

Ros. What shall we do, Octavio?

[Looking kindly on him.]

Oct. Kind creature! do! why as lovers should do; what nobody can undo; let's run away this minute, tie ourselves fast in the church-knot, and defy fathers and mothers.

Ros. And fortunes too?

Oct. Pshaw! we shall have it one day: they must leave their money behind 'em.

Ros. Suppose you first try my father's good nature? You know he once encouraged your addresses.

Oct. First let's be fast married; perhaps he may be good-natured when he can't help it; whip a suit of night-clothes into your pocket, and let's march off in a body together.

Ros. Ah! my father.

Oct. Dead!

Vil. To your function.

Enter DON MANUEL.

Don M. Viletta.

Vil. Sir.

Don M. Where's my daughter?

Vil. Hist, don't disturb her.

Don M. Disturb her! why what's the matter?

Vil. She's at confession, sir.

Don M. Confession! I don't like that; a young woman ought to have no sins at all.

Vil. Ah! dear sir, there's no living without 'em.

Don M. I find her aversion to the marriage I have proposed her, has put her upon disobedient thoughts: there can be no confession without guilt.

Vil. Nor no pardon, sir, without confession.

Don M. Fiddle faddle! I won't have her seem wicked: hussy, you shall confess for her; I'll have her send her sins by you, you know 'em, I'm sure; but I'll know what the friar has got out of her.—Save you, father.

Oct. Bless you, son.

Don M. How now, what's become of father Benedict? Why is not he here?

Vil. Sir, he is not well, and so desired this gentleman, his brother here, to officiate for him.

Don M. He seems very young for a confessor.

Vil. Ay, sir! he has not been long at it.

Oct. Nor don't desire to be long in it; I hope I understand it well enough to make a fool of my old don here. [Aside.]

Don M. Well, sir! how do you find the pulse of iniquity beat there? What sort of sin has she most stomach to?

Oct. Why truly, sir, we have all frailties, and your daughter has had most powerful temptations.

Don M. Nay, the devil has been very busy with her these two days.

Oct. She has told me a most lamentable story.

Don M. Ten to one but this lamentable story proves a most damnable lie.

Oct. Indeed, son, I find by her confession, that you are much to blame for your tyrannical government of her.

Don M. Hey-day! what has the jade been inventing sins for me, and confessing 'em instead of her own? Let me come—she shall be lock'd up till she repents 'em too.

Oct. Son, forbear: this is now a corroboration of your guilt: this is inhuman.

Don M. Sir, I have done: but pray, if you please, let's come to the point: what are these terrible cruelties that this tender lady accuses me of?

Oct. Nay, sir, mistake her not: she did not, with any malicious design, expose your faults, but as her own depended on 'em: her frailties were the consequence of your cruelty.

Don M. Let's have 'em both antecedent and consequent.

Oct. Why she confess'd her first maiden, innocent affection, had long been settled upon a young gentleman, whose love to her you once encouraged; and after their most solemn vows of mutual faith, you have most barbarously broke in upon her hopes, and to the utter ruin of her peace, contracted her to a man she never saw.

Don M. Very good, I see no harm in all this.

Oct. Methinks the welfare of a daughter, sir, might be of weight enough to make you serious.

Don M. Serious! so I am, sir; what the devil must I needs be melancholy because I have got her a good husband?

Oct. Her melancholy may tell you, sir, she can't think him a good one.

Don M. Sir, I understand thinking better than she, and I'll make her take my word.

Oct. What have you to object against the man she likes?

Don M. The man I like!

Oct. Suppose the unhappy youth she loves should throw himself distracted at your feet, and try to melt you into pity.

Don M. Ay! That's if he can.

Oct. You would not, sir, refuse to hear him.

Don M. Sir, I shall not refuse him any thing; that I am sure will signify nothing.

Oct. Were you one moment to reflect upon the pangs which separated lovers feel, were nature dead in you, that thought might wake her.

Don M. Sir, when I am ask'd to do a thing I have not a mind to do, my nature sleeps like a top<sup>1</sup>).

Oct. Then I must tell you, sir, this obstinacy obliges me, as a churchman, to put you in mind of your duty: and to let you know too, you ought to pay more reverence to our order.

Don M. Sir, I am not afraid of the sin of marrying my daughter to the best advantage: and so if you please, father, you may walk home again—when any thing lies upon my conscience I'll send for you.

Oct. Nay then, 'tis time to claim a lover's right, and to tell you, sir, the man that dares to ask Rosara from me is a villain.

[Throws off his disguise.]

Vil. So! here will be fine work! [Aside.]

Don M. Octavio! the devil!

Oct. You'll find me one, unless you do me speedy justice: since not the bonds of honour, nature, nor submissive reason can oblige you, I am reduced to take a surer, shorter way, and force you to be just. I leave you, sir, to think on't. [Walks about angrily.]

Don M. Ah! here's a confessor! ah! that jade of mine—and that other jade of my jade's—here has been rare doings!—Well! it shan't hold long, madam shall be noosed to-morrow morning—Ha! sir's in a great passion here, but it won't do—those long strides, don, will never bring you the sooner to your mistress—Rosara! step into that closet, and fetch my spectacles off the table there. Tum, tum! [Sings.]

Vil. I don't like the old gentleman's looks. [Aside.]

Ros. This obstinacy of yours, my dear father, you shall find runs in the family.

[Exit Rosara, and Don Manuel locks her in.]

Don M. Tum! dum! dum! [Sings.]

Oct. Sir, I would advise you, as your nearest friend, to defer this marriage for three days.

Don M. Tum! tum! tum!

Vil. Sir, you have lock'd my mistress in. [Pertly.]

Don M. Tum! dum! dum!

Vil. If you please to lend me the key, sir, I'll let her out.

Don M. Tum! dum! dum!

Oct. You might afford me at least, as I am a gentleman, a civil answer, sir.

Don M. Why then, in one word, sir, you shall not marry my daughter; and as you are a gentleman, I'm sure you won't think it good manners to stay in my house, when I submissively beg of you to walk out.

Oct. You are the father of my mistress, and something, sir, too old, to answer as you ought, this wrong; therefore I'll look for reparation where I can with honour take it; and since you have obliged me to leave your house, I'll watch it carefully, I'll know who dares enter it. This, sir, be sure of, the man that offers at Rosara's love shall have one virtue, courage, at least; I'll be his proof of that, and ere he steps before me, force him to deserve her. [Exit Octavio.]

Don M. Ah! poor fellow! he's mad now, and does not know what he would be at:—But, however, 'twill be no harm to provide against him—Who waits there?

[Enter a Servant.]

Run you for an alguazile, and bid your fellows arm themselves, I expect mischief at my door immediately: if Octavio offers any disturbance, knock him down, and bring him before me.

[Exit Servant.]

Vil. Hist! don't I hear my mistress's voice?

Ros. [Within] Viletta!

Vil. Here! here, madam—bless me, what's this? [Viletta listens at the Closet Door, and Rosara thrusts a Billet to her through the Key-hole.]

Ha! a billet—to Octavio—a—hem.

[Puts it into her Bosom.]

Don M. How now, bussy; what are you fumbling about that door for?

Vil. Nothing, sir; I was only peeping to see if my mistress had done prayers yet.

Don M. Oh! she had as good let 'em alone, for she shall never come out, 'till she has stomach enough to fall to upon the man I have provided for her. But hark you, Mrs. Modesty, was it you, pray, that let in that able comforter for my babe of grace there?

Vil. Yes, sir, I let him in. [Pertly.]

Don M. Did you so?—Ha! then if you please, madam—I'll let you out—go—go—get a sheet of brown paper, pack up your things, and let me never see that damn'd ugly face of thine as long as I live.

Vil. Bless me, sir, you are in a strange humour, that you won't know when a servant does as she should do,

Don M. Thou art strangely impudent.

Vil. Only the furthest from it in the world, sir.

Don M. Then I am strangely mistaken: didst not thou own just now thou let'st him in?

Vil. Yes—but 'twas in disguise—for I did not design you should see him, because I know you did not care my mistress should see him.

Don M. Hah!

Vil. And I knew, at the same time, she had a mind to see him.

Don M. Hah!

Vil. And you know, sir, that the sin of loving him had lain upon her conscience a great while; so I thought it high time she should come to a thorough confession.

Don M. Hah!

Vil. So upon this, sir, as you see—I—I—I let him in; that's all.

Don M. Nay, if it be so as thou say'st, he was a proper confessor indeed.

Vil. Well, sir, and judge you now if my mistress is not beholden to me.

Don M. Oh! extremely; but you'll go to hell, my dear, for all this; though perhaps you'll choose that place; I think you never much car'd for your husband's company; and if I don't mistake, you sent him to heaven in the old road. [Clash] Hark! what noise is that? [Noise without. Exit Viletta.]

<sup>1</sup>) The children, in playing with their tops, say, when it turns round with such velocity as to appear to stand still, that it sleeps.

Enter a Servant, hastily.

How now?

Serv. O sir, Octavio has set upon a couple of gentlemen just as they were alighting out of a coach at the door; one of them, I believe, is he that is to marry my young mistress, I heard 'em name; I'm afraid there will be mischief, sir; there they are all at it, helter skelter.

Don M. Run into the hall, take down my back, breast, and head-piece, call an officer, raise the neighbours, give me my great gun, I'll shoot him out of the garret window.

[Exit Don Manuel.]

Enter HYPOLITA and FLORA, putting up their Swords; TRAPPANTI and OCTAVIO in the Servants' Hands.

Hyp. Bring him along—this is such an insolence! at this rate no gentleman can walk the streets.

Flora. I suppose, sir, your business was more with our pockets than our persons: are our things safe?

Trap. Ay, sir, I secured them as soon as ever I saw his sword out; I guess'd his design, and scower'd off with the portmanteau.

Hyp. I'll know now who set you on, sir.

Oct. Pr'ythee, young man, don't be troublesome, but thank the rascal that knock'd me down for your escape.

Hyp. Sir, I'll have you know, if you had not been knock'd down, I should have owed my escape to the same arm to which you would have owed the reward for your insolence. Pray, sir, what are you? Who knows you?

Oct. I'm glad, at least, to find 'tis not don Philip that's my rival. [Aside.]

Serv. Sir, my master knows the gentleman very well; he belongs to the army.

Hyp. Then, sir, if you'd have me use you like a gentleman, I desire your meaning of those familiar questions you ask'd me at the coach-side.

Oct. Faith, young gentleman, I'll be very short; I love the lady you are to marry; and if you don't quit your pretences in two hours, it will entail perpetual danger upon you and your family.

Hyp. Sir, if you please, the danger's equal—for, rot me if I'm not as fond of cutting your throat as you can be of mine.

Oct. If I were out of these gentlemen's hands, on my word, sir, you shouldn't want an opportunity.

Hyp. O! sir, these gentlemen shall protect neither of us; my friend and I'll be your bail from them.

Flora. Ay, sir, we'll hail you; and if you please, sir, bring your friend; I'm his: damn me! what, d'ye think you have boys to deal with?

Oct. Sir, I ask your pardon, and shall desire to kiss your hands, about an hour hence, at— [Whispers.]

Flora. Very well, sir; we'll meet you.

Hyp. Release the gentleman.

Serv. Sir, we dare not, without my master's order: here he is, sir.

Re-enter DON MANUEL.

Hyp. Sir, don Fernando de las Torres, whom I am proud to call my father, commanded me to deliver this into the hands of his most dear and worthy friend, don Manuel Grimaldi, and at the same time gave me assurance of a kind reception.

Don M. Sir, you are thrice welcome: let me embrace ye; I'm overjoy'd to see you—your friend, sir?

Hyp. Don Pedro Velada, my near relation, who has done me the honour of his company from Seville, sir, to assist at the solemnity of his friend's happiness.

Don M. Sir, you are welcome; I shall be proud to know you.

Flora. You do me honour, sir.

Don M. I hope you are not hurt, gentlemen?

Hyp. Not at all, sir; thanks to a little skill in the sword.

Don M. I am glad of it; however, give me leave to interrupt our business for a moment, till I have done you justice on the person that offer'd you this insolence at my gate.

Hyp. Your pardon, sir; I understand he is a gentleman, and beg you would not let my honour suffer, by receiving a lame reparation from the law.

Don M. A pretty mettled fellow, faith—must not let him fight though. [Aside.] But, sir, you don't know, perhaps, how deeply this man is your enemy.

Hyp. Sir, I know more of his spleen and folly than you imagine, which, if you please to discharge him, I'll acquaint you with.

Don M. Discharge him! pray consider, sir— [They seem to talk.]

Re-enter VILETTA, and gives a Note to OCTAVIO.

Vil. Send your answer to me.

[Apart to Oct. and exit.]

Oct. Now for a beam of hope in a tempest. [Aside. Reads.]

I charge you don't hazard my ruin and your own by the madness of a quarrel: the closet window where I am is but a step to the ground. Be at the back door of the garden exactly in the close of the evening, where you will certainly find one that may put you in the best way of getting rid of a rival.

Dear kind creature! Now, if my little don's fit of honour does but hold out to bail me, I am the happiest dog in the universe. [Aside.]

Don M. Well, sir, since I find your honour is dipp'd so deep in the matter—Here—release the gentleman.

[Servant gives Octavio his Sword.]

Flora. So, sir, you have your freedom; you may depend upon us.

Hyp. You will find us punctual—Sir, your servant.

Oct. So, now I have a very handsome occasion to put off the tilt too. [Aside.] Gentlemen, I ask your pardon; I begin to be a little sensible of the rashness I committed; and I confess your manner of treating me has been so very 'much like men of honour, that I think myself obliged from the same principle to assure ye, that though I love Rosara equal to my life, yet no consideration shall persuade me to be a rude enemy, even to my rival; I thank you for my freedom, and am your humble servant. [Exit Octavio.]

Hyp. Your servant, sir.—I think we released my brother very handsomely; but I han't done with him. [Aside to Flora.]

Don M. What can this sudden turn of civility mean? I am afraid 'tis but a cloke to some new roguery he has in his head.

Hyp. I don't know how old it may be, but my servant here has discovered a piece of villany of his, that exceeds any other he can be capable of.

Don M. Is it possible? Why would you let him go then?

Hyp. Because I'm sure it can do me no harm, sir.

Don M. Pray be plain, sir; what is it?

Hyp. This fellow can inform you—For, to say truth, he's much better at a lie. [Aside.]

Don M. Come hither, friend: pray what is this business?

Hyp. Ay; what was that you overheard between Octavio and another gentleman, at the inn where we alighted?

Trap. Why, sir, as I was unbuckling my portmanteau in the yard there, I observed Octavio and another spark very familiar with your honour's name; upon which, sir, I prick'd up the ears of my curiosity, and took in all their discourse.

Don M. Pray who was that other spark, friend?

Trap. A brother-rake, sir; a damn'd sly-look'd fellow.

Don M. So!

Flora. How familiarly the rogue treats his old master. [Aside.]

Hyp. Poor don Philip! [Aside.]

Trap. Says one of 'em, says he, "No, damn him, the old rogue" (meaning you, sir), "will never let you have her by fair means"—"However," says Octavio, "I'll try soft words: but if those won't do"—"Bully him," says t'other.

Don M. Ah! poor dog! but that would not do neither: sir, he has tried 'em both to-day to no purpose.

Trap. Say you so, sir? then you'll find what I say is all of a piece. "Well," and if neither of these will do," says he, "you must e'en tilt the young prig,<sup>1</sup> your rival;" (meaning you then, sir.) [To Hypolita.]

Don M. Ha, ha! that, I perceive, my spark did not greatly care for.

Trap. No, sir; that he found was catching a Tartar<sup>2</sup>). 'Sbud, my master fought like a lion, sir.

Hyp. Truly, I did not spare him.

Flora. No, faith—after he was knock'd down. [Aside.]

Trap. But now, sir, comes the cream of the roguery.

Hyp. Pray observe, sir.

Trap. "Well," says Sly-looks, "and if all these fail, I have a rare trick in my head, that will certainly defer the marriage for three or four days at least; and in that time the devil's in't if you don't find an opportunity to run away with her."

Don M. Would you so, Mr. Dog? But he'll be hang'd.

Hyp. O sir! you'll find we were mighty fortunate in this discovery.

Don M. Pray, sir, let's hear. What was this trick to be, friend?

Trap. Why, sir, to alarm you, that my master was an impostor, and that Sly-looks was the true don Philip, sent by his father from Seville to marry your daughter; "upon which" (says he), "the old put" (meaning you again, sir), "will be so bamboozled, that—"

Don M. But pray, sir, how did young Mr. Coxcomb conclude that the old put was to believe all this? Had they no sham proofs that they proposed to bamboozle me with, as you call it?

Trap. You shall hear, sir (the plot was pretty well laid top). "I'll pretend," says he, "that the rascal, your rival," (meaning you then, sir) [To Hypolita.] "has robb'd me of my portmanteau, where I had put up all my jewels, money, and letters of recommendation from my father. We are neither of us known in Madrid," says he, "so that a little impudence, and a grave face, will certainly set those two dogs a snarling, while you run away with the bone." That's all, sir.

Don M. Impudent rogue!

Hyp. What think ye, sir? Was not this business pretty handsomely laid?

Flora. Faith, it might have wrought a very ridiculous consequence.

Don M. Why truly, if we had not been fore-arm'd by this discovery, for aught I know, Mr. Dog might have ran away with the bone indeed: but if you please, sir, since these ingenious gentlemen are so pert upon the matter, we'll let 'em see that you and I have wit enough to do our business, and e'en clap up the wedding to-morrow morning.

Hyp. Sir, you are too obliging—But will your daughter, think ye, be prevail'd with?

Don M. Sir, I'll prepare her this minute—It's pity; methinks, we released that bully though—

Flora. We might as well have held him a little.

Hyp. Really, sir, upon second thoughts, I wish we had—his excusing his challenge so abruptly, makes me fancy he is in hopes of carrying his point some other way.—Did not you observe your daughter's woman whisper him?

Don M. Humh!

Flora. They seem'd very busy, that's certain.

Hyp. I can't say about what—but it will be worth our while to be upon our guard.

Don M. I am alarm'd.

Hyp. Where is your daughter at this time?

Don M. I think she's pretty safe—but I'll go make her sure.

Flora. Where's her woman?

Don M. I'll be upon her presently—she shall be search'd for intelligence—you'll excuse me, gentlemen.

Hyp. Sir, the occasion presses you.

Don M. If I find all safe, I'll return immediately; and then, if you please, we'll run over some old stories of my good friend Fernando.—Your servant.

[Exit.

Hyp. Sir, your most humble servant—Trappanti, thou'rt a rare fellow, thou hast an admirable face of brass, and when thou diest I'll have thy whole statue cast all in the same metal.

Flora. Twere pity the rogue was not bred to the law.

Trap. So 'tis, indeed, sir.—A man should not praise himself; but if I had been bred to the gown, I dare venture to say, I become a lie as well as any man that wears it, and that's a bold word.

Hyp. Nay, now thou art modest—but, sirrah, we have more work for ye; you must get in with the servants, attack the lady's woman: there, there's ammunition, rogue. [Gives him Money] Now try if you can make a breach into the secrets of the family.

Trap. Ah! sir, I warrant you—I could never yet meet with a woman that was this sort of pistol-proof.—I have known a handful of these do more than a barrel of gunpowder.

[Exit.

Flora. Well, what must we do next?

Hyp. Why, now for the lady—I'll be a little brisk upon her, and then—

Flora. Victoria!

[Exeunt.

ACT III.

SCENE I.—The same.

Enter VILETTA, hastily; DON MANUEL and TRAPPANTI behind, observing her.

Vil. So! with much ado I have given the old don the slip; he has dangled with me through every room in the house, high and low, up stairs and down; as close to my tail as a great boy hankering after one of his mother's maids. Well, now we will see what monsieur Octavio says.

[Takes a Letter from her Bosom.

Trap. Hist! there she is, and alone: when the devil has any thing to do with a woman, sir, that's his time to take her; stand close.

[Apart to Don Manuel.

Don M. Ah! he's at work already—there's a letter.

[Apart.

Trap. Leave her to me, sir; I'll read it.

[Apart.

Vil. Ha! two pistoles!—Well, I'll say that for him, the man knows his business; his letters always come post paid.

[While she is reading, Trappanti steals behind, and looks over her Shoulder.

Dear Viletta—Convey the enclosed immediately to your mistress, and, as you prize my life, use all possible means to keep the old gentleman from the closet till you are sure she is safe out of the window. Your real friend—

Trap. Octavio!

[Reading.

Vil. Ah!

[Shrieks.

Trap. Madam, your ladyship's most humble servant.

Vil. You're very impertinent, methinks, to look over other people's letters.

Trap. Why—I never read a letter in my life without looking it over.

Vil. I don't know any business you had to look upon this.

Trap. There's the thing—your not knowing that has put you into this passion.

Vil. You may chance to have your bones broke, Mr. Coxcomb.

Trap. Sweet honeycomb, don't be so waspish; or if I keep your counsel, d'ye see, I don't know why my bones mayn't keep their places; but if I peach, whose bones will pay for it then?

Vil. Ha! the fool says true; I had better wheedle him.

[Aside.

Trap. Don't you love money above any thing in the world—except one?

Vil. I except nothing.

Trap. Very good.—And pray how many letters do you expect to be paid for when Octavio has married your mistress, and has no occasion to write to her? While they are lovers, they will always have occasion for a confidant and a go-between; but when they marry—Serviteur—good night vails<sup>1</sup>); our harvest is over:—what d'ye think of me now?

Vil. Why—I like what you say very well: but I don't know, my friend, to me—that same face of yours looks like the title-page to a whole volume of roguery.—What is't you drive at?

Trap. Money, money, money. Don't you let your mistress marry Octavio. I'll do my best to hinder my master: let you and I lay our heads together to keep them asunder, and so make a penny of 'em all three.

Vil. Look you, seignior, I'll meet you half way, and confess to you I had made a rough draught of this project myself: but say I should agree with you to go on upon't, what security can you give me for performance of articles?

Trap. More than bond or judgment—my person in custody.

Vil. Ah! that won't do.

Trap. No, my love, why, there's many a sweet bit in't—taste it.

[Offers to kiss her; she puts him away.

Vil. No!

Trap. Faith, you must give me one.

Vil. Indeed, my friend, you are too ugly for me; though I am not handsome myself, I love to play with those that are.

Trap. And yet, methinks, an honest fellow of my size and complexion, in a careless posture, playing the fool thus with his money.

[Tosses a Purse; she catches it, and he kisses her.

Vil. Pshaw! Well, if I must, come then.—To see how a woman may be deceived at first sight of a man.

Trap. Nay then, take a second thought of me, child.

[Kisses her again.

Don M. Ha!—This is laying their heads together indeed.

[Aside.

Vil. Well, now get you gone; I have a letter to give to my mistress; slip into the garden—I'll come t'ye presently.

Trap. Is't from Octavio?

Vil. Pshaw! be gone, I say.

[Snatches the Letter.

Trap. Hist!

[Beckons Don Manuel, who goes softly behind.

Vil. Madam! Madam! ah!

Don M. Now, strumpet, give me the other letter, or I'll murder you.

[Draws.

Vil. Ah! lud! O lud! there! there! [Squeaks.

<sup>1</sup>) Vails, or perquisites given to servants.

Don M. Now we shall see what my gentleman would be at. [Reads.]

My dear angel—Ha! Soft and impudent—Depend upon me at the garden-door by seven this evening. Pity my impatience, and believe you can never come too soon to the arms of your

OCTAVIO.

Ah! Now would this rampant rogue make no more of debauching my gentlewoman, than the gentlewoman would of him, if he were to debauch her—hold—let's see, what does he say here?—um! um! [Reads to himself.]

Vil. What a stupid wench was I to believe this old fool durst do me any harm! but a fright's the devil. [Aside.]

Don M. [Reads] Um! um!—Sure she is safe out of the window. O! there the mine is to be sprung then. Now, gentlewoman, what do you think in your conscience I ought to do to ye?

Vil. What I think in my conscience you'll not do to me, make a friend of me—You see, sir, I dare be an enemy.

Don M. Nay, thou dost not want courage, I'll say that for thee: but is it possible any thing can make thee honest?

Vil. What do you suppose would make me otherwise?

Don M. Money.

Vil. You have nick'd it.

Don M. And would the same sum make thee surely one as t'other?

Vil. That I can't say neither: one must be heavier than t'other, or else the scale can't turn.

Don M. Say it be so; would that turn thee into my interest?

Vil. The very minute you turn into mine, sir: judge yourself—Here stands Octavio with a letter, and two pieces to give it to my mistress—there stand you with a hem! and four pieces—where would the letter go, d'ye think?

Don M. There needs no more—I'm convinced, and will trust thee—there's to encourage thee beforehand; [Gives her Money] and when thou bring'st me a letter of Octavio's, I'll double the sum.

Vil. Sir, I'll do't—and will take care he shall write presently. [Aside.]

Don M. Now, as you expect I should believe you, be gone, and take no notice of what I have discover'd.

Vil. Oh, I am dumb, dumb, dumb, sir. [Exit.]

Don M. So! this was done like a wise general: and now I have taken the counterscarp, there may be some hopes of making the town capitulate.—Rosara! [Unlocks the Closet.]

Enter ROSARA.

Ros. Did you call me, sir?

Don M. Ay, child: come, be cheerful; what I have to say to you, I'm sure ought to make you so.

Ros. He has certainly made some discovery: Viletta did not cry out for nothing—What shall I do?—dissemble. [Aside.]

Don M. In one word, set your heart at rest, for you shall marry don Philip this very evening.

Ros. That's but short warning for the gentleman, as well as myself; for I don't know that we ever saw one another. How are you sure he will like me?

Don M. O! as for that matter, he shall see you presently; and I have made it his interest to like you—but if you are still positively resolved upon Octavio, I'll make but few words—pull off your clothes and go to him.

Ros. My clothes, sir?

Don M. Ay, for the gentleman shan't have a rag with you.

Ros. I am not in haste to be starved, sir.

Don M. Then let me see you put on your best airs, and receive don Philip as you should do.

Ros. When do you expect don Philip, sir?

Don M. Expect him; sir! he has been here this hour—I only staid to get you out of the sullens.—He's none of your hum-drums, all life and mettle! Odzooks, he has the courage of a cock; a duel's but a dance to him: he has been at sa! sa!—sa for you already.

Ros. Well, sir, I shan't be afraid of his courage, since I see you are resolved he shall be the man. He shall find me a woman, sir, let him win me and wear me as soon as you please.

Don M. Ah! now thou art my own girl; hold but in this humour one quarter of an hour, and I'll toss thee t'other bushel of doubloons into thy portion—Here, bid a—Come, I'll fetch him myself—she's in a rare cue, faith: ah! if he does but nick her now. [Exit.]

Ros. Now I have but one card to play—if that don't hit, my hopes are crush'd indeed: if this young spark hen't a downright coxcomb, I may have a trick to turn all yet.—Dear fortune, give him but common sense, I'll make it impossible for him to like me—Here they come. [Walks carelessly, and sings.]

Re-enter DON MANUEL, with HYPOLITA.

Song.

Divinely fair, so heav'nly form'd,
Such native innocence she wears;
You cannot wonder that I'm charm'd
Whene'er the lovely maid appears.

Her smiles might warm an anchorite,
Her artless glances teach him sin;
Yet in her soul such charms unite,
As might the coldest stoic win.

Hyp. Madam, I kiss your ladyship's hands: I find by your gaiety, you are no stranger to my business; perhaps you expected I should have come in with a grave bow and a long speech; but my affair is in a little more haste; therefore, if you please, madam, we'll cut the work short, be thoroughly intimate at the first sight, and see one another's humours in a quarter of an hour, as well as if we had been weary of them this twelvemonth.

Ros. Troth, sir, I think you are very much in the right; the sooner I see you, the sooner I shall know whether I like you or not.

Hyp. Pshaw! as for that matter, you'll find me a very fashionable husband. I shan't expect my wife to be over fond of me.

Ros. But I love to be in the fashion too, sir, in taking the man I have a mind to.

Hyp. Say you so? why then take me as soon as you please.

1) The old gentleman here puts himself in a fencing posture, lifting his stick, and lunging forward, saying, at every lunge: ça! ça! like a French fencing-master giving a lesson.

Ros. I only stay for my mind, sir: as soon as ever that comes to me, upon my word I am ready to wait upon you.

Hyp. Well, madam, a quarter of an hour shall break no squares<sup>1)</sup>—Sir, if you'll find an occasion to leave us alone, I see we shall come to a right understanding presently.

Don M. I'll do't, sir; well, child, speak, in thy conscience, is not he a pretty fellow?

Ros. The gentleman's very well, sir; but methinks he's a little too young for a husband.

Don M. Young! a fiddle: you'll find him old enough for a wife, I warrant ye: sir, I must beg your pardon for a moment; but if you please, in the mean time, I'll leave you my daughter, and so pray make the best of her.

[Exit.

Hyp. I thank ye, sir. [Hypolita stands some time mute, looks carelessly at Rosara, and smiles as in contempt] Why now methinks, madam, you had as good put on a real smile, for I am doom'd to be the happy man, you see.

Ros. So my father says, sir.

Hyp. I'll take his word.

Ros. A bold man—but he'll break it.

Hyp. He won't.

Ros. He must.

Hyp. Whether he will or no?

Ros. He can't help it now.

Hyp. How so, pray?

Ros. Because he has promised you, you shall marry me; and he has always promised me I should marry the man I could love.

Hyp. Ay—that is, he would oblige you to love the man you should marry.

Ros. The man that I marry will be sure of my love; but for the man that marries me—mercy on him.

Hyp. No matter for that, I'll marry you.

Ros. Come, I don't believe you are so ill-natur'd.

Hyp. Why, dost thou not like me, child?

Ros. Um—No.

Hyp. What's the matter?

Ros. The old fault.

Hyp. What?

Ros. I don't like you.

Hyp. Is that all?

Ros. No.

Hyp. That's hard—the rest.

Ros. That you won't like.

Hyp. I'll stand it—try me.

Ros. Why then, in short, I like another: another man, sir, has got into my head, and made such work there, you'll never be able to set me to rights as long as you live.—What d'ye think of me now, sir? Won't this serve for a reason why you should not marry me?

Hyp. Um—the reason is a pretty smart sort of a reason truly, but it won't do—to be short with ye, madam, I have reason to believe I shall be disinherited if I don't marry you.

Ros. And what have you reason to believe you shall be if you do marry me?

Hyp. In the Spanish fashion I suppose, jealous to a degree.

Ros. You may be in the English fashion, and something else to a degree.

Hyp. Oh! if I have not courage enough to prevent that, madam, let the world think me in the French city fashion, content to a degree. Now here in Spain, child, we have such things as back rooms, barred windows, hard fare, poison, daggers, bolts, chains, and so forth.

Ros. Ay, sir, and there are such things as bribes, plots, shams, letters, lies, walls, ladders, keys, confidants, and so forth.

Hyp. Hey! a very complete regiment indeed! what a world of service might these do in a quarter of an hour, with a woman's courage at the head of 'em! Really, madam, your dress and humour have the prettiest loose French air, something so quality, that let me die, madam, I believe in a month I should be apt to poison ye.

Ros. So! it takes! [Aside] And let me die, sir, I believe I should be apt to deserve it of ye.

Hyp. I shall certainly do't.

Ros. It must be in my breakfast then—for I should certainly run away before the wedding dinner came up.

Hyp. That's over-acted, but I'll startle her.

[Aside] Then I must tell you, madam, a Spanish husband may be provoked as well as a wife. As for your inclination, I'll keep your person honest, however; you shall be lock'd up, and if you don't love me then—I'll stab ye.

[Carelessly.

Ros. With what? Your words? it must be those you say after the priest then—You'll be able to do very little else that will reach my heart, I assure ye.

Hyp. Come, come, this humour is as much affected as my own: I could no more bear the qualities you say you have, than I know you are guilty of 'em: your pretty arts, in striving to avoid, have charmed me. At my first view I wooed ye only to secure a sordid fortune, which now I, overjoy'd, could part with; nay, with life, with any thing, to purchase your unrivall'd heart.

Ros. Now I am plunged indeed. [Aside] Well, sir, I own you have discovered me; and since you have obliged me to be serious, I now from my sincerity protest my heart's already given, from whence no power nor interest shall recall it.

Hyp. I hate my interest, and would owe no power or title but to love.

Ros. If, as you say, you think I find a charm in virtue, you'll know too there's a charm in constancy: you ought to scorn me, should I flatter you with hope, since now you are assured I must be false before I can be yours: if what I have said seems cold, or too neglectful of your merit, call it not ingratitude or scorn, but faith unmoved, and justice to the man I love.

Hyp. Well, madam, to let you see I am a friend to love, though love's an enemy to me, give me but a seeming proof that Octavio is the undisputed master of your heart, and I'll forego the power your father's obligations give me, and throw my hopes into his arms with you.

Ros. Sir, you confound me with this goodness. Command me to what proof you please; or if you'll trust to my sincerity, let these tears of joy convince you: here, on my knees, by all my hopes of peace I swear.

Hyp. Hold—Swear never to make any other your husband but Octavio.

<sup>1)</sup> Make no disagreement.

Ros. I swear, and heaven befriend me as I keep this vow inviolate.

Hyp. Rise, madam, and now receive a secret, which I need not charge you to be careful of, since as well your quiet as my own depends upon it. A little common prudence between us, in all probability, before night may make us happy in our separate wishes.

Ros. What mean you, sir? sure you are some angel sent to my deliverance.

Hyp. Truly, madam, I have been often told so: but, like most angels of my kind, there is a mortal man in the world, who I have a great mind should know that I am—but a woman.

Ros. A woman!

Hyp. As arrant a woman from top to toe as ever a man ran mad for.

Ros. Are not you don Philip?

Hyp. His shadow, madam, no more: I just run before him—nay, and after him too. Octavio, madam, your lover, is my brother; my name Hypolita; my story you shall know at leisure.

Ros. Hypolita! nay then, from what you have said, and what I have heard Octavio say of ye, I guess your story: but this was so extravagant a thought!

Hyp. That's true, madam; it—it—it was a little round about indeed; I might have found a nearer way to don Philip: but these men are such tetchy things, they can never stay one's time; always in haste, just as they please; now we are to look kind, then grave; now soft, then sincere—so you see, there is such a plague, that—I don't know—one does not care to be rid of them neither.

Ros. A very generous confession!

Hyp. Well, madam, now you know me thoroughly, I hope you'll think me as fit for a husband as another woman.

Ros. Then I must marry ye?

Hyp. Ay, and speedily too; for I expect don Philip every moment; and if we don't look about us he will be apt to forbid the banns.

Ros. If he comes, what shall we do?

Hyp. I am provided for him—Here comes your father—he's secure. Come, put on a dumb consenting air, and leave the rest to me.

Ros. Well! this getting the better of my wise papa, won't be the least part of my satisfaction.

Re-enter DON MANUEL.

Don M. So, son! how does the battle go now? Ha'ye cannonaded stoutly? Does she cry quarter?

Hyp. My dear father, let me embrace you—my life's too poor to make you a return.—You have given me an empire, sir, I would not change to be grand seignior.

Don M. Ah, rogue! he has done it; he has done it! he has her! ha! is't not so, my little champion?

Hyp. Victoria, sir, the town's my own. Look here! and here, sir! thus have I been plundering this half hour; and thus, and thus, and thus, till my lips ache again. [Kisses her.]

Don M. Ah! give me the great chair—I can't bear my joy.—You rampant rogue, could not ye give the poor girl a quarter of an hour's warning?

Hyp. My charmer! [Embraces her.]

Don M. Ah, my cares are over.

Hyp. O! I told ye, sir—hearts and towns are never too strong for a surprise.

Don M. Pr'ythee be quiet, I hate the sight of ye.—Rosara! come hither, you wicked thing, come hither, I say.

Ros. I am glad to see you so well pleased, sir.

Don M. Oh! I cannot live—I can't live; it pours upon me like a torrent, I am as full as a bumper—it runs over at my eyes, I shall choke.—Answer me two questions, and kill me outright.

Ros. Any thing that will make you more pleased, sir.

Don M. Are you positively resolved to marry this gentleman?

Ros. Sir, I am convinced 'tis the first match that can make me happy.

Don M. I am the miserablest dog alive—and I warrant you are willing to marry him to-morrow morning, if I should ask you?

Ros. Sooner, sir, if you think it necessary.

Don M. Oh! this malicious jade has a mind to destroy me all at once—Ye cursed toad! how did you do to get in with her so?

[To Hypolita.]

Ros. Come, sir, take heart, your joy won't be always so troublesome.

Don M. You lie, hussy, I shall be plagued with it as long as I live.

Hyp. You must not live above two hours then.

[Aside.]

Don M. I warrant this raking rogue will get her with child too—I shall have a young squab Spaniard upon my lap, that will so grandpapa me!—

Enter a Servant.

Well! what want you, gloomy face?

Serv. Sir, here's a gentleman desires to speak with you; he says he comes from Seville.

Don M. From Seville! ha! pr'ythee let him go thither again—Tell him I am a little busy about being overjoyed.

Hyp. My life on't, sir, this must be the fellow that my servant told you of, employed by Octavio.

Don M. Very likely.

Re-enter TRAPPANTI.

Trap. Sir, sir—News, news!

Don M. Ay, this fellow has a good merry face now—I like him. Well! what dost thou say, lad?—But hold, sirrah! has any body told thee how it is with me?

Trap. Sir!

Don M. Do you know, puppy, that I am ready to cry?

Trap. Cry, sir! for what?

Don M. Joy! joy! you whelp! my cares are over; madam's to marry your master, sirrah; and I am as wet with joy as if I had been thrown into a sea of good luck—Why don't you cry, dog?

Trap. Uh! well, sir, I do—But now if you please let me tell you my business.

Don M. Well, what's the matter, sirrah?

Trap. Nay, no great matter, sir, only—Slylooks is come, that's all.

Don M. Slylooks! what, the bamboozler? ha, ha!

Trap. He, sir, he.

Don M. I'm glad of it, faith—now I shall have a little diversion to moderate my joy—I'll wait on the gentleman myself; don't you be out of the way, son, I'll be with ye presently.—O my jaws! this fit will carry me off. Ye dear toad, good by. [Exit, with Trappanti.]

Hyp. Ha, ha, ha! the old gentleman's as merry as a fiddle; how he'll start when a string snaps in the middle of his tune!

Ros. At least we shall make him change it, I believe.

Hyp. That we shall; and here comes one that's to play upon him.

Enter FLORA, hastily.

Flora. Don Philip! where are ye? I must needs speak with ye. Begging your ladyship's pardon, madam. [Whispers Hypolita] Stand to your arms, the enemy's at the gate faith. But I've just thought of a sure card to win the lady into our party.

Ros. Who can this youth be she's so familiar with?

Hyp. I like your advice so well, that to tell ye the truth, I have made bold to take it before you gave it me. Come, I'll introduce ye. [To Flora.]

Flora. Then the business is done.

Hyp. Madam, if your ladyship pleases. [To Rosara.]

Ros. Is this gentleman your friend, sir?

Hyp. This friend, madam, is my gentleman, at your service.

Ros. Gentlewoman! what, are we all going into breeches then?

Flora. That used to be my post, madam, when I wore a needle: but now I have got a sword by my side, I shall be proud to be your ladyship's humble servant.

Ros. Troth I think it's a pity you should either of you ever part with your swords: I never saw a prettier couple of adroit cavaliers in my life.—Come, ladies—gentlemen, I beg your pardon. [Exeunt.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—The same.

Enter DON MANUEL and DON PHILIP.

Don M. Well, sir! and so you were robbed of your portmanteau, you say, at Toledo, in which were all your letters and writings relating to your marriage with my daughter, and that's the reason you are come without 'em?

Don P. Sir, I was not robbed of the regard I owe my father's friend: that, sir, I have brought with me, and 'twould have been ill manners not to have paid it on my first arrival.

Don M. Ah! how smooth the spark is! [Aside] Well, sir, I am pretty considerably glad to see you: but I hope you'll excuse me, if in a matter of this consequence, I seem a little cautious.

Don P. Sir, I shan't propose any immediate progress in my affair till you receive fresh advice from my father; in the mean time, I shall think myself obliged by the bare freedom of your house, and such entertainment as you'd at least afford a common stranger.

Don M. Impudent rogue! the freedom of my house! yes, that he may be always at hand to secure the main chance for my friend Octavio:—But now I'll have a touch of the bamboozle with him. [Aside]—Look ye, sir, while I see nothing to contradict what you say you are, d'ye see, you shall find me a gentleman.

Don P. So my father told me, sir.

Don M. But then, on the other hand, d'ye see, a man's honesty is not always written in his face; and (begging your pardon) if you should prove a damned rogue now, d'ye see.

Don P. Sir, I can't in reason take any thing ill that proceeds only from your caution.

Don M. Civil rascal. [Aside] No, no, as you say, I hope you won't take it ill neither; for how do I know, you know, but what you tell me (begging your pardon again, sir), may be all a lie?

Don P. Another man indeed might say the same to you: but I shall take it kindly, sir, if you suppose me a villain no oftener than you have occasion to suspect me.

Don M. Sir, you speak like a man of honour, 'tis confessed; but (begging your pardon again, sir) so may a rascal too sometimes.

Don P. But a man of honour, sir, can never speak like a rascal.

Don M. Why then, with your honour's leave, sir, is there nobody here in Madrid that knows you?

Don P. Sir, I never saw Madrid till within these two hours, though there is a gentleman in town that knew me intimately at Seville; I met him by accident at the inn where I alighted; he's known here; if it will give you any present satisfaction, I believe I could easily produce him to vouch for me.

Don M. At the inn, say ye, did you meet this gentleman? What's his name pray?

Don P. Octavio Cruzado.

Don M. Ha! my bully confessor: this agrees word for word with honest Trappanti's intelligence. [Aside] Well, sir, and pray what does he give you for this job?

Don P. Job, sir?

Don M. Ay, that is, do you undertake it out of good fellowship? or are you to have a sort of fellow-feeling in the matter?

Don P. Sir, if you believe me to be the son of don Fernando, I must tell ye your manner of receiving me is what you ought not to suppose can please him, or I can thank you for. If you think me an impostor, I'll ease you of the trouble of suspecting me, and leave your house till I can bring better proofs who I am.

Don M. Do so, friend; and in the mean time, d'ye see, pray give my humble service to the politician, and tell him that to your certain knowledge, the old fellow, the old rogue, and the old put, d'ye see, knows how to bamboozle as well as himself.

Don P. Politician, and bamboozle! Pray, sir, let me understand you, that I may know how to answer you.

Don M. Come, come, don't be discouraged, friend—sometimes, you know, the strongest wits must fail; you have an admirable head, 'tis confess'd, with as able a face to it as ever stuck upon two shoulders; but who the devil can help ill luck? for it happens at this time, d'ye see, that it won't do.

Don P. Won't do, sir?

Don M. Nay, if you won't understand me now, here comes an honest fellow now, that will speak you point blank to the matter.

Enter TRAPPANTI.

Come hither, friend: dost thou know this gentleman?

Trap. Bless me, sir, is it you? Sir, this is my old master I lived with at Seville.

Don P. I remember thee: thy name's Trappanti; thou wert my servant when I first went to travel.

Trap. Ay, sir, and about twenty months after you came home too.

Don P. You see, sir, this fellow knows me.

Don M. O! I never questioned it in the least, sir.—Pr'ythee what's this worthy gentleman's name, friend?

Trap. Sir, your honour has heard me talk of him a thousand times; his name, sir, his name's Guzman; his father, sir, old don Guzman, is the most eminent lawyer in Seville; was the very person that drew up the settlement and articles of my master's marriage with your honour's daughter: this gentleman knows all the particulars as well as if he had drawn 'em up himself. But, sir, I hope there's no mistake in 'em that may defer the marriage?

Don P. Confusion!

Don M. Now, sir, what sort of answer d'ye think fit to make me?

Don P. Now, sir, I'm obliged in honour not to leave your house, till I at least have seen the villain that calls himself don Philip, that has robb'd me; and would you, sir, of your honour, and your daughter.—As for this rascal—

Trap. Sir, I demand protection.

[Runs behind Don Manuel.]

Don M. Hold, sir, since you are so brisk, and in my own house too, call your master, friend; you'll find we have swords within can match you.

Trap. Ay, sir, I may chance to send you one will take down your courage. [Exit.]

Don P. I ask your pardon, sir, I must confess, the villany I saw designed against my father's friend had transported me beyond good manners: but be assured, sir, use me henceforward as you please, I will detect it, though I lose my life. Nothing shall affront me now, till I have proved myself your friend indeed, and don Fernando's son.

Don M. Nay, lookye, sir, I will be very civil too—I won't say a word—you shall e'en squabble it out by yourselves: not but at the same time thou art to me the merriest fellow that ever I saw in my life.

Re-enter TRAPPANTI, with HYPOLITA and FLORA.

Hyp. Who's this that dares usurp my name, and calls himself don Philip de las Torres?

Don P. Ha! this is a young competitor indeed. [Aside.]

Flora. Is this the gentleman, sir?

Don M. Yes, yes, that's he—ha, ha!

Don P. Yes, sir, I'm the man, who but this morning lost that name upon the road.

I'm inform'd an impudent young rascal has picked it out of some writings in the port-manteau he robb'd me of, and has brought it hither before me. d'ye know any such, sir?

Flora. The fellow really does it very well, sir.

[Apart to Don Manuel.]

Don M. Oh! to a miracle! [Apart.]

Hyp. Pr'ythee, friend, how long dost thou expect thy impudence will keep thee out of gaol? Could not the coxcomb that put thee upon this, inform thee too that this gentleman was a magistrate?

Don M. Well said, my little champion.

Don P. Now, in my opinion, child, that might as well put thee in mind of thy own condition; for suppose thy wit and impudence should so far succeed, as to let thee ruin this gentleman's family, by really marrying his daughter, thou canst not but know 'tis impossible thou shouldst enjoy her long; a very few days must unavoidably discover thee; in the mean time, if thou wilt spare me the trouble of exposing thee, and generously confess thy roguery, thus far I'll forgive thee; but if thou still proceedest upon his credulity to a marriage with the lady, don't flatter thyself that all her fortune shall buy off my evidence; for I'm bound in honour, as well as law, to hang thee for the robbery.

Hyp. Sir, you are extremely kind.

Flora. Very civil, 'egad!

Hyp. But mayn't I presume, my dear friend, this wheedle was offer'd as a trial of this gentleman's credulity? Ha, ha, ha!

Don M. Indeed, my friend, 'tis a very shallow one. Canst thou think I'm such a sot as to believe, that if he knew 'twere in thy power to hang him, he would not have run away at the first sight of thee?

Trap. Ay, sir, he must be a dull rogue indeed that would not run away from a halter. Ha, ha, ha! [All laugh.]

Don P. Sir, I ask your pardon: I begin now to be a little sensible of my folly—I perceive this gentleman has done his business with you effectually: however, sir, the duty I owe my father obliges me not to leave your cause, though I leave your house immediately; when you see me next, you'll know don Philip from a rascal.

Don M. Ah! 'twill be the same thing, if I know a rascal from don Philip: but if you please, sir, never give yourself any further trouble in this business; for what you have done, d'ye see, is so far from interrupting my daughter's marriage, that, with this gentleman's leave, I'm resolved to finish it this very hour; so that when you see your friend the politician, you must tell him you had cursed luck, that's all. Ha, ha, ha!

Don P. Very well, sir; I may have better when I see you next.

Hyp. Lookye, sir, since your undertaking (though you design'd it otherwise) has promoted my happiness, thus far I pass it by, though I question if a man, that stoops to do such base injuries, dares defend 'em with his sword. However, now at least you're warn'd; but be assured your next attempt—

Don P. Will startle you, my spark: I'm afraid you'll be a little humbler when you are hand-cuff'd. Though you won't take my word against him, sir, perhaps another magistrate may my oath; which, because I see his marriage is in haste, I am obliged to make immediately: if he can out-face the law too, I shall be content to be the coxcomb then you think me.

[Exit.

Don M. Ah, poor fellow! he's resolved to carry it off with a good face, however. Ha, ha!

Trap. Ay, sir, that's all he has for't indeed.

Hyp. Trappanti, follow him, and do as I directed.

[Apart to Trappanti.

Trap. I warrant ye, sir.

[Exit.

Don M. Ha! my little champion, let me kiss thee; thou hast carried the day like a hero! man nor woman, nothing can stand before thee. I'll make thee monarch of my daughter immediately.

Hyp. That's the Indies, sir.

Don M. Well said, my lad—Oh, my heart's going to dance again—Pr'ythee let's in before it gets the better of me, and give the bride an account of thy victory

[Exeunt.

Enter OCTAVIO, with a Letter.

Oct. Rosara false! distraction! Sure this letter must be but artifice, a humour, to try how far my love can bear—and yet methinks she can't but know the impudence of my young rival, and her father's importunity, are too pressing to allow her any time to fool away: and if she were really false, she could not take a pride in confessing it. Death! I know not what to think; the sex is all a riddle, and we are the fools that crack our brains to expound it.

Enter VILETTA.

Now, dear Viletta!

Vil. Sir, she begs your pardon; they have just sent for the priest; but they will be glad to see you about an hour hence, as soon as the wedding's over.

Oct. Viletta!

Vil. Sir, she says, in short, she can't possibly speak with you now, for she's just going to be married.

Oct. Death! daggers! blood! confusion! and ten thousand furies!

Vil. Hey-day! what's all this for?

Oct. My brains are turn'd, Viletta.

Vil. Ay, by my troth, so one would think, if one could but believe you had any at all; if you have three grains, I'm sure you can't but know her compliance with this match must give her a little liberty; and can you suppose she'd desire to see you an hour hence, if she did not design to make use of it?

Oct. Don't flatter me, Viletta.

Vil. Faith, sir, I'll be very plain, you are to me the dullest person I ever saw in my life; but if you have a mind, I'll tell her you won't come.

Oct. No, don't say so, Viletta.

Vil. Then pray, sir, do as she bids you; don't stay here to spoil your own sport: you'll have the old gentleman come thundering down upon ye by-and-by, and then we shall have ye at your ten thousand furies again—hist! here's company! good bye t'ye.

[Exit.

Re-enter DON PHILIP, with his Sword drawn, and TRAPPANTI.

Don P. Come, sir, there's no retreating now; this you must justify.

Trap. Sir, I will, and a great deal more: but pray, sir, give me leave to recover my courage—I protest the keen looks of that instrument have quite frighted it away. Pray put it up, sir.

Don P. Nay, to let thee see I had rather be thy friend than enemy, I'll bribe thee to be honest: discharge thy conscience like a man, and I'll engage to make these five, ten pieces.

Enter a Servant.

Trap. Sir, your business will be done effectually.

Don P. Here, friend! will ye tell your master I desire to speak with him?

[Exit Servant.

Oct. Don Philip!

Don P. Octavio! This is fortunate indeed—the only place in the world I would have wish'd to have found you in.

Oct. What's the matter?

Don P. You'll see presently—but pr'ythee how stands your affair with your mistress?

Oct. The devil take me if I can tell ye—I don't know what to make of her; about an hour ago she was for scaling walls to come at me, and this minute—whip, she's going to marry the stranger I told you of; nay, confesses too, it is with her own consent; and yet begs by all means to see me as soon as her wedding's over.—Isn't it very pretty?

Re-enter a Servant.

Don P. Something gay indeed.

Serv. Sir, my master will wait on you presently.

[Exit.

Oct. But the plague on't is, my love cannot bear this jesting.—Well now, how stands your affair? Have you seen your mistress yet?

Don P. No; I can't get admittance to her

Oct. How so?

Don P. When I came to pay my duty here to the old gentleman—

Oct. Here!

Don P. Ay, I found an impudent young rascal here before me, that had taken my name upon him, robb'd me of my port-manteau, and by virtue of some papers there, knew all my concerns to a tittle; he has told a plausible tale to her father, faced him down that I'm an impostor, and if I don't this minute prevent him, is going to marry the lady.

Oct. Death and hell! [Aside] What sort of fellow was this rascal?

Don P. A little pert coxcomb; by his impudence and dress, I guess him to be some French page.

Oct. Confusion! my friend at last my rival too—Yet hold! my rival is my friend, he owns he has not seen her yet—

[Aside.

Don P. You seem concern'd.

Oct. Undone for ever, unless dear Philip's still my friend!

Don P. What's the matter?

Oct. Let me conjure ye, by all the ties of honour, friendship, and pity, never to attempt her more!

Don P. You amaze me!

Oct. 'Tis the same dear creature I so passionately dote on.

Don P. Is't possible? Nay then, be easy in thy thoughts, Octavio; and now I dare con-less the folly of my own: I'm not sorry thou'rt my rival here. In spite of all my weak philosophy, I must own the secret wishes of my soul are still Hypolita's.—I know not why, but—I can't help thinking that my fortune still resolves, spite of her cruelty, to make me one day happy.

Oct. Quit but Rosara, I'll engage she shall be yours.

Don P. Not only that, but will assist you with my life to gain her: I shall easily excuse myself to my father for not marrying the mistress of my dearest friend.

Oct. Dear Philip, let me embrace ye.—But how shall we manage the rascal of an impostor? Suppose you run immediately, and swear the robbery against him?

Don P. I was just going about it, but my accidental meeting with this fellow has luckily prevented me; who, you must know, has been chief engineer in the contrivance against me; but between threats, bribes, and promises, has confessed the whole roguery, and is now ready to swear it against him: so, because I understand the spark is very near his marriage, I thought this would be the best and soonest way to detect him.

Oct. That's right! the least delay might have lost all; besides, I am here to strengthen his evidence, for I can swear that you are the true don Philip.

Don P. Right!

Trap. Sir, with humble submission, that will be quite wrong?

Oct. Why so?

Trap. Because, sir, the old gentleman is substantially convinced that 'tis you who have put don Philip upon laying his pretended claim to his daughter, purely to defer the marriage, that in the mean time you might get an opportunity to run away with her; for which reason, sir, you'll find your evidence will but fly in your face, and hasten the match with your rival.

Don P. Ha! there's reason in that; all your endeavours will but confirm his jealousy of me.

Oct. What would you have me do?

Trap. Don't appear at the trial, sir.

Don P. By no means; rather wait a little in the street: be within call and leave the management to me.

Oct. Be careful, dear Philip.

Don P. I always used to be more fortunate in serving my friend than myself.

Oct. But hark ye! here lives an alguazil at the next house; suppose I should send him to you, to secure the spark in the mean time?

Don P. Do so; we must not lose a moment.

Oct. I won't stir from the door.

Don P. You'll soon hear of me; away.

[Exit Octavio.]

Trap. So now I have divided the enemy, there can be no great danger if it should come to a battle [Aside]—Basta! here comes our party.

Don P. Stand aside till I call for you.

[Trappanti retires.]

Re-enter DON MANUEL.

Don M. Well, sir! what service have you to command me now, pray?

Don P. Now, sir, I hope my credit will stand a little fairer for you; all I beg is but your patient hearing.

Don M. Well, sir, you shall have it—Here he comes, bring him to trial as soon as you please.

Re-enter FLORA and HYPOLITA.

Flora. So Trappanti has succeeded, he's come without the officers. [Apart to Hypolita.]

Hyp. Hearing, sir, you were below, I didn't care to disturb the family by putting the officers to the trouble of a needless search; let me see your warrant, I'm ready to obey it.

Don M. Ay, where's your officer?

Flora. I thought to have seen him march in state, with an alguazil before him.

Don P. I was afraid, sir, upon second thoughts, your business would not stay for a warrant, though 'tis possible I may provide for you, for I think this gentleman's a magistrate: in the mean time—O! here, I have prevailed with an alguazil to wait upon ye.

Enter Alguazil.

Alg. Did you send for me, sir?

Don P. Ay, secure that gentleman.

Don M. Hold! hold! sir, all things in order: this gentleman is yet my guest; let me be first acquainted with his crime, and then I shall better know how he deserves to be treated; and that we may have no hard words upon one another, if you please, sir, let me first talk with you in private. [They whisper.]

Hyp. Undone! that fool Trappanti, or that villain, I know not which, has at least mistaken or betray'd me! Ruin'd, past redemption! [Apart to Flora.]

Flora. Death! what d'ye mean? that hanging look were enough to confirm a suspicion; bear up, for shame. [Apart.]

Hyp. Impossible! I am dash'd, confounded; if thou hast any courage left, show it quickly; go speak before my fears betray me. [Apart.]

Don M. If you can make this appear by any witness, sir, I confess 'twill surprise me indeed.

Flora. Ay, sir, if you have any witnesses, we desire you'd produce 'em.

Don P. Sir, I have a witness at your service, and a substantial one. Hey! Trappanti!

Re-enter TRAPPANTI.

Now, sir, what think ye?

Hyp. Ha! the rogue winks—Then there's life again. [Aside] Is this your witness, sir?

Don P. Yes, sir, this poor fellow at last, it seems, happens to be honest enough to confess himself a rogue, and your accomplice.

Hyp. Ha, ha!

Don P. Ha, ha! You are very merry, sir.

Don M. Nay, there's a jest between ye, that's certain—But come, friend, what say you to the business? Have ye any proof to offer upon oath, that this gentleman is the true don Philip, and consequently this other an impostor?

Don P. Speak boldly.

Trap. Ay, sir, but shall I come to no harm if I do speak?

Don M. Let it be the truth, and I'll protect thee.

Trap. Are you sure I shall be safe, sir?

Don M. I'll give thee my word of honour; speak boldly to the question.

Trap. Well, sir, since I must speak, then in the first place, I desire your honour will be pleased to command the officer to secure that gentleman.

Don M. How, friend?

Don P. Secure me, rascal?

Trap. Sir, if I can't be protected, I shall never be able to speak.

Don M. I warrant thee—What is it you say, friend?

Trap. Sir, as I was just now crossing the street, this gentleman, with a sneer in his face, takes me by the hand, claps five pistoles in my palm (here they are), shuts my fist close upon 'em; "My dear friend," says he, "you must do me a piece of service:" upon which, sir, I bows me him to the ground, and desired him to open his case.

Don P. What means the rascal?

Don M. Sir, I am as much amazed as you; but pray let's hear him, that we may know his meaning.

Trap. So, sir, upon this he runs me over a long story of a sham and a flam<sup>1)</sup> he had just contrived, he said, to defer my master's marriage only for two days.

Don P. Confusion!

Flora. Nay, pray, sir, let's hear the evidence.

Trap. Upon the close of the matter, sir, I found at last by his eloquence, that the whole business depended upon my bearing a little false witness against my master.

Hyp. O ho!

Trap. Upon this, sir, I began to demur: "Sir," says I, "this business will never hold water; don't let me undertake it, I must beg your pardon;" gave him the negative shrug, and was for sneaking off with the fees in my pocket.

Don M. Very well!

Don P. Villain!

Flora. Hyp. Ha, ha, ha!

Trap. Upon this, sir, he catches me fast hold by the collar, whips out his poker, claps it within half an inch of my guts: "Now, dog," says he, "you shall do it, or within two hours rot upon the dunghill you came from."

Don P. Sir, if there be any faith in mortal man—

Don M. Nay, nay, one at a time; you shall be heard presently.—Go on friend.

[To Trappanti.]

Trap. Having me at this advantage, sir, I began to think my wit would do me more service than my courage; so prudently pretended out of fear to comply with his threats, and swallow the perjury: but now, sir, being under protection and at liberty of conscience, I have honesty enough, you see, to tell you the whole truth of the matter.

Don M. Ay, this is evidence indeed!

Omnes. Ha, ha, ha!

Don P. Dog! Villain! Did not you confess to me that this gentleman picked you up, not three hours ago, at the same inn where I alighted? that he had own'd his stealing my portmanteau at Toledo? that if he succeeded to marry the lady, you were to have a considerable sum for your pains, and these two were to share the rest of her fortune between them?

1) To pop a sham, or a flam, slang for, to deceive.

Trap. O lud! O lud! sir, as I hope to die in my bed, these are the very words, he threaten'd to stab me if I wouldn't swear against my master—I told him at first, sir, I was not fit for his business; I was never good at a lie in my life.

Alg. Nay, sir, I saw this gentleman's sword at his breast out of my window.

Trap. Look ye there, sir!

Don P. Damnation!

Omnes. Ha, ha, ha!

Don M. Really, my friend, thou'rt almost turn'd fool in this business. If thou hadst prevail'd upon this wretch to perjure himself, couldst thou think I should not have detected him? You may go, friend. [Exit Alguazil.]

Flora. Ha, ha!

Don P. Sir, you're imposed on: defer the marriage but an hour.

Don M. Ay, and in half that time, I suppose, you are in hopes to defer it altogether.

Don P. Perdition seize me, if I have any hope or thought but that of serving you.

Don M. Nay, now thou art a downright distracted man.—Dost thou expect I should take thy bare word, when here were two honest fellows that have just proved thee in a lie to thy face?

Enter Servant.

Serv. Sir, the priest is come.

Don M. Is he so? Then, sir, if you please, since you see you can do me no further service, I believe it may be time for you to go.—Come, son, now let's wait upon the bride, and put an end to this gentleman's trouble altogether. [Exit.]

Hyp. Sir, I'll wait on ye.

Don P. Confusion! I've undone my friend. [Walks about.]

Flora. Trappanti! rogue, this was a masterpiece. [Apart.]

Trap. Sir, I believe it won't be mended in haste. [Apart. Exeunt Flora and Trappanti.]

Hyp. Sir!

Don P. Ha! alone! if we're not prevented now—[Aside] Well, sir—

Hyp. I suppose you don't think the favours you have design'd me are to be put without satisfaction; therefore I shall expect to see you early to-morrow, near the Prado, with your sword in your hand: in the mean time, sir, I'm a little more in haste to be the lady's humble servant than yours. [Going.]

Don P. Hold, sir!—you and I can't part upon such easy terms.

Hyp. Sir!

Don P. You're not so near the lady, sir, perhaps, as you imagine. [Locks the Door.]

Hyp. What d'ye mean?

Don P. Speak softly.

Hyp. Ha!

Don P. Come, sir—draw!

Hyp. My ruin now has caught me; this was the very spite of fortune. [Aside.]

Don P. Come, sir, my time's but short.

Hyp. And mine's too precious to be lost on any thing but love; besides, this is no proper place. To-morrow, sir, I shall find a better.

Don P. No, now, sir, if you please—Draw, villain, or expect such usage as I am sure don Philip would not bear.

Hyp. A lover, sir, may bear any thing to make sure of his mistress—You know it is not fear that—

Don P. No evasion, sir; either this moment confess your villainy, your name, and fortune, or expect no mercy.

Hyp. Nay then—Within there!

Don P. Move but a step, or dare to raise thy voice beyond a whisper, and this minute is thy last. [Seizes her, and holds a Sword to her Breast.]

Hyp. Sir! [Trembling.]

Don P. Villain! be quick, confess, or—

Hyp. Hold, sir—I own I dare not fight with you.

Don P. No, I see thou art too poor a villain—therefore be speedy, as thou hopest I'll spare thy life.

Hyp. Nay then, sir—Mercy! mercy! [Throws herself at his Feet] And, since I must confess, have pity on my youth, have pity on my love!

Don P. Thy love! What art thou? Speak.

Hyp. Unless your generous compassion spares me, sure the most wretched youth that ever felt the pangs and torments of a successful passion.

Don P. Nay, then I must forgive thee. [Raises her] For I have known too well the misery not to pity—any thing in love. Yet hold—nor flatter thy fond hopes too far: you must defer your marriage with this lady.

Hyp. Sir, on my knees.

Don P. Expect no more from me; either comply this moment, or my sword shall force thee.

Hyp. Consider, sir—

Don P. Nay then, discover quick! Tell me thy name and family.

Hyp. Hold, sir—

Don P. Speak, or thou diest.

Hyp. Sir, I will—[A Noise at the Door] Ha! they are entering—O! for a moment's courage! Come on, sir.

[Breaks from him and draws, retiring till Don Manuel, Flora, Trappanti, and Servants rush in and part them.]

Don M. Knock him down! Force him out of the room there; call an officer; in the mean time, secure him in the cellar.

Don P. Hear me but one word, sir!

Don M. Stop his mouth—out with him. [They hurry him off] Come, dear son, be pacified.

Hyp. A villain! [Walks in a Heat.]

Flora. Why should he be concern'd, now he's secure? Such a rascal would but contaminate the sword of a man of honour.

Hyp. I am sorry, sir, such a fellow should have it in his power to disturb me—but—

Enter ROSARA.

Don M. Look! here's my daughter in a fright to seek for you.

Hyp. Then I'm composed again.

[Runs to Rosara.]

Ros. I heard fighting here! I hope you are not wounded, sir?

Hyp. I have no wound but what the priest can heal.

Don M. Ah! well said, my little champion!

Hyp. Oh, madam! I have such a terrible escape to tell you! [Apart to Rosara.]

Ros. Truly, I began to be afraid I should lose my little husband. [Apart.]

Hyp. Husband, quotha! Get me but once safe out of these breeches, if ever I wear 'em again— [Apart. Exeunt.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—The same.

Enter TRAPPANTI.

Trap. What, in the name of roguery, can this new master of mine be? He's either a fool or bewitch'd, that's positive.—First, he gives me fifty pieces for helping him to marry the lady; and soon as the wedding is over, claps me twenty more into the other hand, to help him to get rid of her.—Nay, not only that, but gives me a strict charge to observe his directions, in being evidence against him as an impostor, to refund all the lies I have told in his service, to sweep him clear out of my conscience, and now to swear the robbery against him! What the bottom of this can be, I must confess, does a little puzzle my wit.—There's but one way in the world I can solve it.—He must certainly have some secret reason to hang himself, that he's ashamed to own, and so was resolved first to be married, that his friends might not wonder at the occasion. But here he comes, with his noose in his hand.

Enter HYPOLITA and ROSARA.

Hyp. Trappanti, go to don Pedro, he has business with you.

Trap. Yes, sir.

[Exit.]

Ros. Who's don Pedro pray?

Hyp. Flora, madam; he knows her yet by no other name. Where's your father, madam?

Ros. I saw him go towards his closet; I believe he's gone to fetch you part of my fortune—he seem'd in mighty good humour.

Hyp. We must be sure to keep it up as high as we can, that he may be the more stunn'd when he falls.

Ros. With all my heart; methinks I am possess'd with the very spirit of disobedience—Now could I, in the humour I am in, consent to any mischief that would but heartily plague my old gentleman.

Enter DON MANUEL.

Don M. Ah, my little conqueror! let me embrace thee—That ever I should live to see this day! this most triumphant day, this day of all days in my life!

Hyp. Ay, and of my life too, sir.

[Embraces him.]

Don M. Ay, my cares are over—Now I've nothing to do but to think of the other world; for I've done all my business in this: got as many children as I could; and now I'm grown old, have set a young couple to work. Look you here, children, I have brought you some baubles that will make you merry as long as you live; twelve thousand pistoles are the least value of 'em; and the rest of your fortune shall be paid in the best Barbary gold to-morrow morning.

Hyp. Ay, sir, this is speaking like a father! this is encouragement indeed!

Don M. Much good may do thy heart and soul with 'em—and heaven bless you together

—I've had a great deal of care and trouble to bring it about, children; but, thank my stars, 'tis over—'tis over now—Now I may sleep with my doors open, and never have my slumbers broken with the fear of rogues and rivals.

Ros. Don't interrupt him, and see how far his humour will carry him?

[Apart to Hypolita.]

Don M. But there is no joy lasting in this world; we must all die when we have done our best; sooner or later, old or young, prince or peasant, high or low, kings, lords, and—common whores, must die! Nothing certain; we are forced to buy one comfort with the loss of another.—Now I've married my child, I've lost my companion—I've parted with my girl!—Her heart's gone another way now—she'll forget her old father!—I shall never have her wake me more, like a cheerful lark, with her pretty songs in a morning—I shall have nobody to chat at dinner with me now, or take up a godly book and read me to sleep in an afternoon. Ah! these comforts are all gone now!

[Weeps.]

Hyp. How very near the extreme of one passion is to another! Now he is tired with joy, till he is downright melancholy. [Aside.]

Ros. What's the matter, sir?

Don M. Ah! my child! now it comes to the test, methinks I don't know how to part with thee.

Ros. O, sir, we shall be better friends than ever.

Don M. Uh! uh! shall we? Wilt thou come and see the old man now and then? Well, heaven bless thee, give me a kiss—I must kiss thee at parting! Be a good girl, use thy husband well, make an obedient wife, and I shall die contented.

Hyp. Die, sir! Come, come, you have a great while to live—Hang these melancholy thoughts, they are the worst company in the world at a wedding.—Consider, sir, we are young; if you would oblige us, let us have a little life and mirth, a jubilee to day at least; stir your servants, call in your neighbours, let me see your whole family mad for joy, sir.

Don M. Ha! shall we be merry then?

Hyp. Merry, sir! ah! as beggars at a feast. What, shall a dull Spanish custom tell me, when I am the happiest man in the kingdom, I shan't be as mad as I have a mind to? Let me see the face of nothing to-day but revels, friends, feasts, and music, sir.

Don M. Ah! thou shalt have thy humour—thou shalt have thy humour! Hey, within there! rogues! dogs! slaves! where are my rascals? Ah! my joy flows again—I can't bear it.

Enter several Servants.

Serv. Did you call, sir?

Don M. Call, sir! ay, sir: what's the reason you are not all out of your wits, sir? Don't you know that your young mistress is married, scoundrels?

1 Serv. Yes, sir, and we are all ready to be mad, as soon as your honour will please to give any distracted orders.

Hyp. You see, sir, they only want a little encouragement.

Don M. Ah! there shall be nothing wanting this day! If I were sure to beg for it all my life after—Here, sirrah, cook! look into the Roman history, see what Mark Anthony had for supper, when Cleopatra first treated him with chere entiere: rogue, let me have a repast that will be six times as expensive and provoking—Go.—And, d'ye hear? One of you step to monsieur Vendevin, the king's butler, for the same wine that his majesty reserves for his own drinking; tell him he shall have his price for't.

1 Serv. How much will you please to have, sir?

Don M. Too much, sir! I'll have every thing upon the outside of enough to-day. Go you, sirrah, run to my nephew, don Lewis, give my service and tell him to bring all his family along with him.

Hyp. Ay, sir! this is as it should be! now it begins to look like a wedding.

Don M. Ah! we'll make all the hair in the world stand an end at our joy.

Hyp. Here comes Flora—Now, madam, observe your cue.

Enter FLORA.

Flora. Your servant, gentlemen—I need not wish you joy—You have it, I see—Don Philip, I must needs speak with you.

Hyp. Pshaw! prythee don't plague me with business at such a time as this.

Flora. My business won't be deferred, sir.

Hyp. Sir!

Flora. I suppose you guess it, sir; and I must tell you, I take it ill it was not done before.

Hyp. What d'ye mean?

Flora. Your ear, sir. [They whisper.]

Don M. What's the matter now, 'tro?

Ros. The gentleman seems very free, methinks.

Don M. Troth, I don't like it.

Ros. Don't disturb 'em, sir—We shall know all presently.

Hyp. But what have you done with don Philip?

[Apart to Flora.]

Flora. I drew the servants out of the way, while he made his escape; what we do we must do quickly: come, come, put on your fighting face, and I'll be with 'em presently.

[Aside.]

Hyp. [Aloud] Sir, I have offer'd you very fair; if you don't think so, I have married the lady, and take your course.

Flora. Sir, our contract was a full third; a third part's my right, and I'll have it, sir.

Don M. Hey!

Hyp. Then I must tell you, sir, since you are pleased to call it your right, you shall not have it.

Flora. Not, sir?

Hyp. No, sir—Look ye, don't put on your pert airs to me—'Gad, I shall use you very scurvily.

Flora. Use me!—You little son of a whore, draw.

Hyp. Oh! sir, I am for you.

[They fight, and Don Manuel interposes.]

Ros. Ah! help! murder! [Runs out.]

Don M. Within there! help! murder! Why, gentlemen, are ye mad? Pray put up.

Hyp. A rascal!

Don M. Friends, and quarrel! for shame.

Flora. Friends I scorn his friendship; and since he does not know how to use a gentleman, I'll do a public piece of justice, and use him like a villain.

Don M. Better words, sir. [To Flora.]

Flora. Why, sir, d'ye take this fellow for don Philip?

Don M. What d'ye mean, sir?

Flora. That he has cheated me as well as you—But I'll have my revenge immediately. [Exit.]

[Hyp. walks about, and Don M. stares.]

Don M. Hey! what's all this? What is it—My heart misgives me.

Hyp. Hey! who waits there? Here, you! [To a Servant] Bid my servant run, and hire me a coach and four horses immediately.

Serv. Yes, sir.

[Exit Servant.]

Don M. A coach!

Enter VILETTA.

Vil. Sir, sir!—bless me! What's the matter, sir? Are not you well?

Don M. Yes, yes—I am—that is—ha!

Vil. I have brought you a letter, sir.

Don M. What business can he have for a coach?

Vil. I have brought you a letter, sir, from Octavio.

Don M. To me?

Vil. No, sir, to my mistress—he charged me to deliver it immediately; for he said it concerned her life and fortune.

Don M. How! let's see it—There's what I promised thee—be gone. What can this be now?

[Reads.]

The person whom your father ignorantly designs you to marry, is a known cheat, and an impostor; the true don Philip, who is my intimate friend, will immediately appear with the corregidore, and fresh evidence against him. I thought this advice, though from one you hate, would be well received if it came time enough to prevent your ruin.

OCTAVIO.

O, my heart! this letter was not designed to fall into my hands—I am frightened—I dare not think on't.

Re-enter the Servant.

Serv. Sir, your man is not within.

Hyp. Careless rascal! to be out of the way when my life's at stake—Pr'ythee do thou go and see if thou canst get me any post horses.

Don M. Post horses!

Re-enter ROSARA.

Ros. O, dear sir, what was the matter?

Don M. Hey!

Ros. What made 'em quarrel, sir?

Don M. Child!

Ros. What was it about, sir? You look concern'd.

Don M. Concern'd!

Ros. I hope you are not hurt, sir. [To Hypolita, who minds her not]—What's the matter with him, sir? he won't speak to me.

[To Don Manuel.]

Don M. A—speak!—a—go to him again—try what fair words will do, and see if you can pick out the meaning of all this.

Ros. Dear sir, what's the matter?

Don M. Ay, sir, pray what's the matter?

Hyp. I'm a little vex'd at my servant's being out of the way, and the insolence of this other rascal.

Don M. But what occasion have you for post-horses, sir?

Hyp. Something happens a little cross, sir.

Don M. Pray what is't?

Hyp. I'll tell you another time, sir.

Don M. Another time, sir—pray satisfy me now.

Hyp. Lord, sir, when you see a man's out of humour.

Don M. Sir, it may be I'm as much out of humour as you; and I must tell ye, I don't like your behaviour, and I'm resolv'd to be satisfy'd.

Hyp. Sir, what is't you'd have? [Peevishly.]

Don M. Lookye, sir—in short—I—I have receiv'd a letter.

Hyp. Well, sir.

Don M. I wish it may be well, sir.

Hyp. Bless me, sir! what's the matter with you?

Don M. Matter, sir!—in troth I'm almost afraid and ashamed to tell ye; but if you must needs know—there's the matter, sir.

[Gives the Letter.]

Enter DON LEWIS.

Don L. Uncle, I am your humble seryant.

Don M. I am glad to see you, nephew.

Don L. I received your invitation, and am come to pay my duty: but here I met with the most surprising news.

Don M. Pray what is it?

Don L. Why, first your servant told me, my young cousin was to be married to-day to don Philip de las Torres; and just as I was entering your doors, who should I meet but don Philip with the corregidore, and several witnesses to prove, it seems, that the person whom you were just going to marry my cousin to, has usurp'd his name, betray'd you, robb'd him, and is in short a rask impostor.

Don M. Dear nephew, don't torture me: are ye sure you know don Philip when you see him?

Don L. Know him, sir? were not we school-fellows, fellow collegians, and fellow travellers?

Don M. But are you sure you mayn't have forgot him neither?

Don L. You might as well ask me if I had not forgot you, sir.

Don M. But one question more and I am dumb for ever—Is that he?

Don L. That, sir? No, nor in the least like him.—But pray why this concern? I hope we are not come too late to prevent the marriage?

Don M. Oh! oh! oh! oh! my poor child!

Ros. Oh!

[Seems to faint.]

Don M. Ah! look to my child.

Don L. Is this the villain then that has imposed on you?

Hyp. Sir, I'm this lady's husband; and while I'm sure that name can't be taken from me, I shall be contented with laughing at any other you or your party dare give me.

Don M. Oh!

Don L. Nay then, within there!—such a villain ought to be made an example.

Enter Corregidore and Officers, with DON PHILIP, OCTAVIO, FLORA, TRAPPANTI, and VILETTA.

O gentlemen, we're undone! all comes too late! my poor cousin's married to the impostor.

Don P. How!

Oct. Confusion!

Don M. Oh! oh!

Don P. That's the person, sir, and I demand your justice.

Oct. And I.

Trap. And I.

Flora. And all of us.

Don M. Will my cares never be over?

Cor. Well, gentlemen, let me rightly understand what 'tis you charge him with, and I'll commit him immediately—First, sir, you say, these gentlemen all know you to be the true Don Philip?

Don L. That, sir, I presume my oath will prove.

Oct. Or mine.

Flora. And mine.

Trap. Ay, and mine too, sir. [head?

Don M. Where shall I hide this shameful

Flora. And for the robbery, that I can prove upon him: he confess'd to me at Toledo, he stole this gentleman's portmanteau there, to carry on his design upon this lady, and agreed to give me a third part of her fortune for my assistance; which he refusing to pay as soon as the marriage was over, I thought myself obliged in honour to discover him.

Hyp. Well, gentlemen, you may insult me if you please; but I presume you'll hardly be able to prove that I'm not married to the lady, or hav'n't the best part of her fortune in my pocket; so do your worst: I own my ingenuity, and am proud on't.

Don M. Ingenuity, abandon'd villain!—But, sir, before you send him to gaol, I desire he may return the jewels I gave him as part of my daughter's portion.

Cor. That can't be, sir—since he has married the lady, her fortune's lawfully his: all we can do, is to prosecute him for robbing this gentleman.

Don M. O that ever I was born.

Hyp. Return the jewels, sir! if you don't pay me the rest of her fortune to-morrow morning, you may chance to go to gaol before me.

Don M. O that I were buried! Will my cares never be over?

Hyp. They are pretty near it, sir; you can't have much more to trouble you.

Cor. Come, sir, if you please; I must desire to take your deposition in writing.

[Goes to the Table with Flora.

Don P. Now, sir, you see what your own rashness has brought ye to.

Don M. Pray forbear, sir.

Hyp. Keep it up, madam. [Aside to Rosara.

Ros. Oh, sir! how wretched have you made me! is this the care you have taken of me for my blind obedience to your commands? this my reward for filial duty? [To Don Manuel.

Don M. Ah! my poor child!

Ros. But I deserve it all, for ever listening to your barbarous proposal, when my conscience might have told me, my vows and person in justice and honour were the wronged Octavio's.

Don M. Oh! oh!

Oct. Can she repent her falsehood then at last? Is't possible? then I'm wounded too! O my poor undone Rosara! [Goes to her] Ungrateful! cruel! perjured man!

Don M. Oh! don't insult me! I deserve the worst you can say.—I'm a miserable wretch, and I repent me.

Vil. So! here's the lady in tears, the lover in rage, the old gentleman out of his senses, most of the company distracted, and the bridegroom in a fair way to be hanged.—The merriest wedding that ever I saw in my life.

[Apart to Hypolita.

Cor. Well, sir, have you any thing to say before I make your warrant?

Hyp. A word or two, and I obey ye, sir.—Gentlemen, I have reflected on the folly of my action, and foresee the disquiets I am like to undergo in being this lady's husband; therefore, as I own myself the author of all this seeming ruin and confusion, so I am willing (desiring first the officers may withdraw) to offer something to the general quiet.

Oct. What can this mean?

Don P. Pshaw! some new contrivance—Let's be gone.

Don L. Stay a moment, it can be no harm to hear him—Sir, will you oblige us?

Cor. Wait without. [Exeunt Officers.

Vil. What's to be done now, 'trow?

Trap. Some smart thing, I warrant ye; the little gentleman hath a notable bead, faith.

Flora. Nay, gentlemen, thus much I know of him: that if you can but persuade him to be honest, 'tis still in his power to make you all amends; and, in my opinion, 'tis high time he should propose it.

Don M. Ay, 'tis time he were hang'd indeed: for I know no other amends he can make us.

Hyp. Then I must tell you, sir, I owe you no reparation; the injuries which you complain of, your sordid avarice, and breach of promise here have justly brought upon you: therefore, sir, if you are injured, you may thank yourself for it.

Don M. Nay, dear sir, I do confess my blindness, and could heartily wish your eyes or mine had dropp'd out of our heads before ever we saw one another.

Hyp. Well, sir (however little you have deserved it), yet for your daughter's sake, if you'll oblige yourself, by signing this paper, to keep your first promise, and give her, with her full fortune, to this gentleman, I'm still content, on that condition, to disannul my own pretences, and resign her.

Don M. Sir, I don't know how to answer you: for I can never believe you'll have good nature enough to hang yourself out of the way to make room for him?

Hyp. Then, sir, to let you see I have not only an honest meaning, but an immediate power too, to make good my word, I first renounce all title to her fortune: these jewels, which I received from you, I give him free possession of; and now, sir, the rest of her fortune you owe him with her person.

Don M. This is unaccountable, I must confess—But still, sir, if you disannul your pretences, how you'll persuade that gentleman, to whom I am obliged in contract to part with his—

Don P. That, sir, shall be no lett; I am too well acquainted with the virtue of my friend's title, to entertain a thought that can disturb it.

Hyp. Now, sir, it only stops at you.

Don M. Well, sir, I see the paper is only conditional, and since the general welfare is concern'd, I won't refuse to lend you my helping hand to it; but if you should not make your words good, sir, I hope you won't take it ill if a man should poison you.

Don P. And, sir, let me too warn you how you execute this promise; your flattery and dissembled penitence has deceiv'd me once already, which makes me, I confess, a little slow in my belief; therefore take heed, expect no second mercy! for be assured of this, I never can forgive a villain.

Hyp. If I am proved one spare me not—I ask but this—Use me as you find me.

Don P. That you may depend on.

Don M. There, sir.

[Gives Hypolita the Writing, signed.]

Hyp. And now, don Philip, I confess you are the only injured person here.

Don P. I know not that—do my friend right, and I shall easily forgive thee.

Hyp. His pardon, with his thanks, I am sure I shall deserve: but how shall I forgive myself? Is there in nature left a means that can repair the shameful slights, the insults, and the long disquiets you have known from love?

Don P. Let me understand thee.

Hyp. Examine well your heart, and if the fierce resentment of its wrongs has not extinguished quite the usual soft compassion there, revive at least one spark in pity of my woman's weakness.

Don P. Whither wouldst thou carry me?

Hyp. The extravagant attempt I have this day run through to meet you thus, justly may subject me to your contempt and scorn, unless the same forgiving goodness that used to overlook the failings of Hypolita, prove still my friend, and soften all with the excuse of love. [All seem amazed] O Philip—Hypolita is—yours for ever. [They advance slowly, and at last rush into one another's Arms.]

Don P. It is, it is, Hypolita! And yet 'tis she! I know her by the busy pulses at my heart, which only love like mine can feel, and she alone can give. [Embraces her eagerly.]

Don M. Have I then been pleased, and plagued, and frightened out of my wits, by a woman all this while? Odsbud, she is a notable contriver! Stand clear, ho! For if I have not a fair brush at her lips; nay, if she does not give me the hearty smack too, odds-winds and thunder, she is not the good-humour'd girl I take her for.

Hyp. Come, sir, I won't balk your good humour. [He kisses her] And now I have a favour to beg of you; you remember your promise: only your blessing here, sir.

[Octavio and Rosara kneel.]

Don M. Ah! I can deny thee nothing; and so, children, heaven bless ye together—And now my cares are over again.

Oct. We'll study to deserve your love, sir.

Don P. My friend successful too! Then my joys are double—But how this generous attempt was started first, how it has been pursued, and carried with this kind surprise at last, gives me wonder equal to my joy.

Hyp. Here's one that at more leisure shall inform you all: she was ever a friend to your love, has had a hearty share in the fatigue, and now I am bound in honour to give her part of the garland too.

Don P. How! she!

Flora. Trusty Flora, sir, at your service! I have had many a battle with my lady upon your account; but I always told her we should do her business at last.

Don M. Another metamorphosis! Brave girls, faith! Odzooks, we shall have 'em make campaigns shortly.

Don P. In Seville I'll provide for thee.

Hyp. Nay, here's another accomplice too, confederate I can't say; for honest Trappanti did not know but that I was as great a rogue as himself.

Trap. It's a folly to lie; I did not indeed, madam.—But the world cannot say I have been a rogue to your ladyship—and if you had not parted with your money—

Hyp. Thou hadst not parted with thy honesty.

Trap. Right, madam; but how should a poor naked fellow resist when he had so many pistoles held against him? [Shows Money.]

Don M. Ay, ay, well said, lad.

Vil. Ea? A tempting bait indeed! let him offer to marry me again if he dares. [Aside.]

Don P. Well, Trappanti, thou hast been serviceable, however, and I'll think of thee.

Oct. Nay, I am his debtor too.

Trap. Ah! there's a very easy way, gentlemen, to reward me; and since you partly owe your happiness to my roguery, I should be very proud to owe mine only to your generosity. [nerosity.]

Trap. Why, sir, I find by my constitution, that it is as natural to be in love as to be hungry, and that I han't a jot less stomach than the best of my betters; and though I have often thought a wife but dining every day upon the same dish; yet methinks it's better than no dinner at all. Upon which considerations, gentlemen and ladies, I desire you'll use your interest with Madona here—To admit me into her good graces.

Don M. A pleasant rogue, faith! Odzooks, the jade shall have him. Come, hussy, he's an ingenious person.

Vil. Sir, I don't understand his stuff; when he speaks plain I know what to say to him.

Trap. Why then, in plain terms, let me a lease for life.—Marry me.

Vil. Ay, now you say something—I was afraid, by what you said in the garden, you had only a mind to be a wicked tenant at will.

Trap. No, no, child, I have no mind to be turn'd out at a quarter's warning.

Vil. Well, there's my hand—And now meet me as soon as you will with a canonical lawyer, and I'll give you possession of the rest of the premises.

Don M. Odzooks, and well thought of, I'll send for one presently. Here, you, sirrah, run to father Benedick again, tell him his work don't hold here, his last marriage is dropp'd to pieces; but now we have got better tackle, he must come and stitch two or three fresh couple together as fast as he can.

Don P. Now, my Hypolita!
Let our example teach mankind to love;
From thine the fair their favours may improve:

O! never let a virtuous mind despair,
For constant hearts are love's peculiar care.
[Exeunt.]

GEORGE COLMAN

Was the son of Francis Colman, Esq., His Majesty's resident at the court of the Grand Duke of Tuscany at Florence, by a sister of the Countess of Bath. He was born at Florence about 1733, and had the honour of having king George the Second for his godfather. He received his education at Westminster School, where he very early showed his poetical talents. The first performance by him was a copy of verses addressed to his cousin Lord Pulteney, written in the year 1747, while he was at Westminster, and since printed in The St. James's Magazine, a work published by his unfortunate friend, Robert Lloyd. From Westminster School he removed to Oxford, and became a student of Christchurch. It was there, at a very early age, that he engaged with his friend Bonnel Thornton, in publishing The Connoisseur, a periodical paper which appeared once a week, and was continued from Jan. 31. 1754. to Sept. 30. 1756. When the age of the writers of this entertaining paper is considered, the wit and humour, the spirit, the good sense and shrewd observations on life and manners, with which it abounds, will excite some degree of wonder; but will, at the same time, evidently point out the extraordinary talents which were afterwards to be more fully displayed in The Jealous Wife and The clandestine Marriage. The recommendation of his friends, or his choice, but probably the former, induced him to fix upon the law for his profession; and was accordingly entered at Lincoln's Inn, and in due season called to the bar. He attended there a very short time; though, if our recollection does not mislead us, he was seen often enough in the courts to prevent the supposition of his abandoning the profession merely for want of encouragement. On the 18th of March 1758, he took the degree of Master of arts at Oxford; and in the year 1760 his first dramatic piece, Folly Honeycomb, was acted at Drury Lane, with great success. For several years before, the comic Muse seemed to have relinquished the stage. No comedy had been produced at either theatre since the year 1751, when Moore's Gil Blas was with difficulty performed nine nights. In July 1764 Lord Bath died; and on that event Mr. Colman found himself in circumstances fully sufficient to enable him to follow the bent of his genius. The first publication which he produced, after this period, was a translation in blank verse of the comedies of Terence, 1765; and whoever would wish to see the spirit of an ancient bard transfused into the English language, must look for it in Mr. Colman's version. The successor of Lord Bath, General Pulteney, died in 1767; and Mr. Colman again found himself remembered in his will, by a second annuity, which confirmed the independency of his fortune. He seems, however, to have felt no charms in an idle life; as, in 1767, he united with Messrs. Harris, Rutherford, and Powell, in the purchase of Covent Garden Theatre, and took upon himself the laborious office of acting manager. After continuing manager of Covent Garden Theatre seven years, Mr. Colman sold his share and interest therein to Mr. James Leake, one of his then partners; and, in 1777, purchased of Mr. Foote the Little Theatre in the Haymarket. The estimation in which the entertainments exhibited under his direction were held by the public, the reputation which the theatre acquired, and the continual concourse of the polite world during the height of summer, sufficiently spoke the praises of Mr. Colman's management. Indeed, it has been long admitted, that no person, since the death of Mr. Garrick, was so able to superintend the entertainments of the stage as the subject of this account. About the year 1785 Mr. Colman gave the public a new translation of, and commentary on, Horace's Art of Poetry; in which he produced a new system to explain this very difficult poem. In opposition to Dr. Hurd, he supposed, "that one of the sons of Piso, undoubtedly the elder, had either written or mediated a poetical work, most probably a tragedy; and that he had, with the knowledge of the family, communicated his piece or intention to Horace. But Horace either disapproving of the work, or doubting of the poetical faculties of the elder Piso, or both, wished to dissuade him from all thought of publication. With this view he formed the design of writing this epistle; addressing it, with a courtliness and delicacy perfectly agreeable to his acknowledged character, indifferently to the whole family, the father and his two sons, Epistola ad Pisones de arte Poetica." This hypothesis is supported with much learning, ingenuity, and modesty; and, if not fully established, is at least as well entitled to applause as that adopted by the Bishop of Worcester. On the publication of the Horace, the Bishop said to Dr. Douglas, "Give my compliments to Colman, and thank him for the handsome manner in which he has treated me; and tell him, that I think he is right." Mr. Colman died at Paddington, on the 14th of August 1794, at the age of 61. A few hours before his death he was seized with violent spasms; and these were succeeded by a melancholy stupor, in which he drew his last breath.

THE JEALOUS WIFE,

Com. by Geo. Colman, 1761. This piece made its appearance at Drury Lane with prodigious success. The groundwork of it is derived from Fielding's History of Tom Jones, at the period of Sophia's taking refuge at Lady Bellaston's house. The characters borrowed from that work, however, only serve as a kind of underplot to introduce Mr. and Mrs. Oakley, viz. the Jealous Wife and her husband. It must be confessed, that the passions of the lady are here worked up to a very great height; and Mr. Oakley's vexation and domestic misery, in consequence of her behaviour, are very strongly supported. Yet, perhaps, the author would have better answered his purpose with respect to the passion he intended to expose the absurdity of, had he made her appear somewhat less of the virago, and Mr. Oakley not so much of the henpecked husband; since she now appears rather a lady, who, from a consciousness of her own power, is desirous of supporting the appearance of jealousy, to procure her an undue influence over her husband and family, than one, who, feeling the reality of that turbulent yet fluctuating passion, becomes equally absurd in the suddenness of forming unjust suspicions, and in that hastiness of being satisfied, which love, the only true basis of jealousy, will constantly occasion. When this play was originally acted, it was remarked, that the scene of Mrs. Oakley's hysterical fits bore a near resemblance to the like situation of Mrs. Termagant in The Squire of Alsatia. Mr. Colman has been accused of a misnomer in calling it The Jealous Wife; Mrs. Oakley being totally destitute of that delicacy, which some consider necessary to constitute jealousy. Many exceptions might be taken to the characters in this piece—that of Lady Free Love is perhaps too odious for the stage, while that of Captain O'Cutter does little honour to the navy. The play, however, upon the whole, boasts more than an ordinary share of merit.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A Room in OAKLY'S House.

[Noise heard within.]

Mrs. O. [Within] Don't tell me—I know it is so—It's monstrous, and I will not bear it.

Oak. [Within] But, my dear!—

Mrs. O. Nay, nay, etc. [Squabbling within.]

Enter MRS. OAKLY, with a Letter, followed by OAKLY.

Mrs. O. Say what you will, Mr. Oakly, you shall never persuade me but this is some filthy intrigue of yours.

Oak. I can assure you, my love—

Mrs. O. Your love!—Don't I know your—Tell me, I say, this instant, every circumstance relating to this letter.

Oak. How can I tell you, when you will not so much as let me see it?

Mrs. O. Look you, Mr. Oakly, this usage is not to be borne. You take a pleasure in abusing my tenderness and soft disposition.—To be perpetually running over the whole town, nay, the whole kingdom too, in pursuit of your amours!—Did not I discover that you was great with mademoiselle, my own woman?—Did not you contract a shameful familiarity with Mrs. Freeman?—Did not I detect your intrigue with lady Wealthy?—Was not you—

Oak. Oons! madam, the grand Turk himself has not half so many mistresses—Yo throw me out of all patience—Do I know any body but our common friends?—Am I visited by any body that does not visit you?—Do I ever go out, unless you go with me?—And am I not as constantly by your side as if I was tied to your apron-strings?

Mrs. O. Go, go; you are a false man—Have not I found you out a thousand times? And have not I this moment a letter in my hand, which convinces me of your baseness?—Let me know the whole affair, or I will—

Oak. Let you know! Let me know what you would have of me—You stop my letter before it comes to my hands, and then expect that I should know the contents of it!

Mrs. O. Heaven be praised, I stopped it!—I suspected some of these doings for some time past—But the letter informs me who she is, and I'll be revenged on her sufficiently. Oh, you base man, you!

Oak. I beg, my dear, that you would moderate your passion!—Show me the letter, and I'll convince you of my innocence.

Mrs. O. Innocence!—Abominable!—Innocence!—But I am not to be made such a fool—I am convinced of your perfidy, and very sure that—

Oak. 'Sdeath and fire! your passion hurries you out of your senses—Will you hear me?

Mrs. O. No, you are a base man: and I will not hear you.

Oak. Why then, my dear, since you will neither talk reasonably yourself, nor listen to reason from me, I shall take my leave till you are in a better humour. So your servant!

[Going.]

Mrs. O. Ay, go, you cruel man!—Go to your mistresses, and leave your poor wife to her miseries.—How unfortunate a woman am I!—I could die with vexation—

[Throwing herself into a Chair.]

Oak. There it is—Now dare not I stir a step further—If I offer to go, she is in one of her fits in an instant—Never sure was woman at once of so violent and so delicate a constitution! What shall I say to sooth her?

[Aside] Nay, never make thyself so uneasy, my dear—Come, come, you know I love you.

Mrs. O. I know you hate me; and that your unkindness and barbarity will be the death of me.

[Whining.]

Oak. Do not vex yourself at this rate—I love you most passionately—Indeed I do—This must be some mistake.

Mrs. O. Oh, I am an unhappy woman!

[Weeping.]

Oak. Dry up thy tears, my love, and be comforted! You will find that I am not to blame in this matter—Come, let me see this letter—Nay, you shall not deny me.

[Takes the Letter.]

Mrs. O. There! take it; you know the hand, I am sure.

Oak. [Reads] To Charles Oakly, Esq.—Hand! 'Tis a clerk-like hand, a good round text! and was certainly never penned by a fair lady.

Mrs. O. Ay, laugh at me, do!

Oak. Forgive me, my love, I did not mean to laugh at thee—But what says the letter?

[Reads] Daughter eloped—you must be privy to it—scandalous—dishonourable—satisfaction—revenge—um, um, um—injured father.

HENRY RUSSET.

Mrs. O. [Rising] Well, sir—you see I have detected you—Tell me this instant where she is concealed.

Oak. So—so—so—This hurts me—I'm shocked.

[To himself.]

Mrs. O. What, are you confounded with your guilt? Have I caught you at last?

Oak. O the wicked Charles! To decoy a young lady from her parents in the country! The profligacy of the young fellows of this age is abominable.

[To himself.]

Mrs. O. [Half aside, and musing] Charles!—Let me see!—Charles!—No!—Impossible! This is all a trick.

Oak. He has certainly ruined this poor lady.

[To himself.]

Mrs. O. Art! art! all art! There's a sudden turn now! You have ready wit for an intrigue, I find.

Oak. Such an abandoned action! I wish I had never had the care of him.

Mrs. O. Mighty fine, Mr. Oakly! Go on, sir, go on! I see what you mean.—Your assurance provokes me beyond your very falsehood itself. So you imagine, sir, that this affected concern, this flimsy pretence about Charles, is to bring you off. Matchless confidence! But I am armed against every thing—I am prepared for all your dark schemes: I am aware of all your low stratagems.

Oak. See there now! Was ever any thing so provoking? To persevere in your ridiculous—For heaven's sake, my dear, don't distract me. When you see my mind thus agitated and uneasy, that a young fellow, whom his dying father, my own brother, committed to my care, should be guilty of such enormous wickedness; I say, when you are witness of my distress on this occasion, how can you be weak enough and cruel enough to—

Mrs. O. Prodigiously well, sir! You do it very well. Nay, keep it up, carry it on; there's nothing like going through with it. O, you artful creature! But, sir, I am not to be so easily satisfied. I do not believe a syllable of all this—Give me the letter—[Snatches the Letter] You shall sorely repent this vile business, for I am resolved that I will know the bottom of it. [Exit.]

Oak. This is beyond all patience. Provoking woman! Her absurd suspicions interpret every thing the wrong way. But this ungracious boy! In how many troubles will he involve his own and his lady's family!—I never imagined that he was of such abandoned principles.

Enter MAJOR OAKLY and CHARLES.

Charles. Good morrow, sir!

Maj. O. Good morrow, brother, good morrow!—What! you have been at the old work, I find. I heard you—ding! dong! i'faith!—She has rung a noble peal in your ears. But how now? Why sure you've had a remarkable warm bout on't.—You seem more ruffled than usual.

Oak. I am, indeed, brother! Thanks to that young gentleman there. Have a care, Charles! you may be called to a severe account for this. The honour of a family, sir, is no such light matter.

Charles. Sir!

Maj. O. Hey-day! What, has a curtain lecture produced a lecture of morality? What is all this?

Oak. To a profligate mind, perhaps, these things may appear agreeable in the beginning. But don't you tremble at the consequences?

Charles. I see, sir, that you are displeased with me; but I am quite at a loss to guess at the occasion.

Oak. Tell me, sir!—where is miss Harriot Russet?

Charles. Miss Harriot Russet!—Sir—Explain.

Oak. Have not you decoyed her from her father?

Charles. I!—Decoyed her—Decoyed my Harriot!—I would sooner die than do her the least injury—What can this mean?

Maj. O. I believe the young dog has been at her, after all.

Oak. I was in hopes, Charles, you had better principles. But there's a letter just come from her father—

Charles. A letter!—What letter? Dear sir, give it me. Some intelligence of my Harriot, major!—The letter, sir, the letter this moment, for heaven's sake!

Oak. If this warmth, Charles, tends to prove your innocence—

Charles. Dear sir, excuse me—I'll prove any thing—Let me but see this letter, and I'll—

Oak. Let you see it!—I could hardly get a sight of it myself. Mrs. Oakly has it.

Charles. Has she got it? Major, I'll be with you again directly. [Exit hastily.]

Maj. O. Hey-day! The devil's in the boy! What a fiery set of people! By my troth, I think the whole family is made of nothing but combustibles.

Oak. I like this emotion; it looks well: it may serve too to convince my wife of the folly of her suspicions. Would to heaven I could quiet them for ever!

Maj. O. Why pray now, my dear, naughty brother, what heinous offence have you committed this morning? What new cause of suspicion? You have been asking one of the maids to mend your ruffle, I suppose, or have been hanging your head out at the window, when a pretty young woman has passed by, or—

Oak. How can you trifle with my distresses, major? Did not I tell you it was about a letter?

Maj. O. A letter!—hum—A suspicious circumstance, to be sure! What, and the seal a truelover's knot now, hey? or a heart transfixed with darts; or possibly the wax bore the industrious impression of a thimble; or perhaps the folds were lovingly connected by a wafer, pricked with a pin, and the direction written in a vile scrawl, and not a word spelt as it should be! ha, ha, ha!

Oak. Pooh! brother—Whatever it was, the letter, you find, was for Charles, not for me—this outrageous jealousy is the devil.

Maj. O. Mere matrimonial blessings and domestic comfort, brother! jealousy is a certain sign of love.

Oak. Love! it is this very love that hath made us both so miserable. Her love for me has confined me to my house, like a state prisoner, without the liberty of seeing my friends, or the use of pen, ink, and paper; while my love for her has made such a fool of me, that I have never had the spirit to contradict her.

Maj. O. Ay, ay, there you've hit it, Mrs. Oakly would make an excellent wife, if you did but know how to manage her.

Oak. You are a rare fellow indeed to talk of managing a wife—A debauched bachelor—a rattle-brained, rioting fellow—who have picked up your commonplace notions of women in bagnios, taverns, and the camp; whose most refined commerce with the sex has been in order to delude country girls at your quarters, or to besiege the virtue of abigail, milliners, or mantua-makers' prentices.

Maj. O. So much the better!—so much the better! women are all alike in the main, brother, high or low, married or single, quality or no quality. I have found them so, from a duchess down to a milk-maid; every woman is a tyrant at the bottom. But they could never make a fool of me.—No, no! no woman should ever domineer over me, let her be mistress or wife.

Oak. Single men can be no judges in these cases. They must happen in all families. But when things are driven to extremities—to see a woman in uneasiness—a woman one loves too—one's wife—who can withstand it? You neither speak nor think like a man that has loved and been married, major!

Maj. O. I wish I could hear a married man speak my language—I'm a bachelor, it's true; but I am no bad judge of your case for all that. I know yours and Mrs. Oakly's disposition to a hair. She is all impetuosity and fire—a very magazine of touchwood and gunpowder. You are hot enough too, upon occasion, but then it's over in an instant. In comes love and conjugal affection, as you call it; that is, mere folly and weakness—and you draw off your forces, just when you should pursue the attack, and follow your advantage. Have at her with spirit, and the day's your own, brother.

Oak. Why, what would you have me do?

Maj. O. Do as you please for one month, whether she likes it or not: and I'll answer for it she will consent you shall do as you please all her life after. In short, do but show yourself a man of spirit, leave off whining about love and tenderness, and nonsense, and the business is done, brother.

Oak. I believe you are in the right, major! I see you are in the right. I'll do it—I'll certainly do it.—But then it hurts me to the soul, to think what uneasiness I shall give her. The first opening of my design will throw her into fits, and the pursuit of it, perhaps, may be fatal.

Maj. O. Fits! ha, ha, ha!—I'll engage to cure her of her fits. Nobody understands hysterical cases better than I do; besides, my sister's symptoms are not very dangerous. Did you ever hear of her falling into a fit when you was not by?—Was she ever found in convulsions in her closet?—No, no, these fits, the more care you take of them, the more you will increase the distemper: let them alone, and they will wear themselves out, I warrant you.

Oak. True, very true—you are certainly in the right—I'll follow your advice. Where do you dine to-day?—I'll order the coach, and go with you.

Maj. O. O brave! keep up this spirit, and you are made for ever.

Oak. You shall see now, major!—Who's there?

Enter Servant.

Order the coach directly. I shall dine out to-day.

Serv. The coach, sir?—Now, sir?

Oak. Ay, now, immediately.

Serv. Now, sir!—the—the—coach, sir?—that is—my mistress—

Maj. O. Sirrah! do as you are bid. Bid them put to this instant.

Serv. Ye—yes, sir—yes, sir.

[Exit.]

Oak. Well, where shall we dine?

Maj. O. At the St. Albans, or where you will. This is excellent; if you do but hold it.

Oak. I will have my own way, I am determined.

Maj. O. That's right.

Oak. I am steel.

Maj. O. Bravo!

Oak. Adamant.

Maj. O. O Bravissimo!

Oak. Just what you'd have me.

Maj. O. Why that's well said. But will you do it?

Oak. I will.

Maj. O. You won't.

Oak. I will. I'll be a fool to her no longer. But harkye, major, my hat and cane lie in my study. I'll go and steal them out, while she is busy talking with Charles.

Maj. O. Steal them! for shame! Pr'ythee take them boldly; call for them! make them bring them to you here; and go out with spirit, in the face of your whole family.

Oak. No, no—you are wrong—let her rave after I am gone, and when I return, you know, I shall exert myself with more propriety, after this open affront to her authority.

Maj. O. Well, take your own way.

Oak. Ay, ay—let me manage it, let me manage it. [Exit.]

Maj. O. Manage it! ay, to be sure, you are a rare manager! It is dangerous, they say, to meddle between man and wife. I am no great favourite of Mrs. Oakly's already; and in a week's time I expect to have the door shut in my teeth.

Enter CHARLES.

How now, Charles, what news?

Charles. Ruined and undone! She's gone, uncle! my Harriot's lost for ever.

Maj. O. Gone off with a man?—I thought so; they are all alike.

Charles. Oh no! Fled to avoid that hateful match with sir Harry Beagle.

Maj. O. Faith, a girl of spirit; but whence comes all this intelligence?

Charles. In an angry letter from her father—How miserable I am! If I had not offended my Harriot, much offended her, by that foolish riot and drinking at your house in the country, she would certainly, at such a time, have taken refuge in my arms.

Maj. O. A very agreeable refuge for a young lady to be sure, and extremely decent!

Charles. What a heap of extravagancies was I guilty of!

Maj. O. Extravagancies with a witness! Ah, you silly young dog, you would ruin yourself with her father, in spite of all I could do. There you sat, as drunk as a lord, telling the old gentleman the whole affair, and swearing you would drive sir Harry Beagle out of the country, though I kept winking and nodding, pulling you by the sleeve, and kicking your shins under the table, in hopes of stopping you; but all to no purpose.

Charles. What distress may she be in at this instant! Alone and defenceless!—Where, where can she be?

Maj. O. What relations or friends has she in town?

Charles. Relations! let me see.—Faith, I have it!—If she is in town, ten to one but she is at her aunt's, lady Freelove's. I'll go thither immediately.

Maj. O. Lady Freelove's! Hold, hold, Charles!—do you know her ladyship?

Charles. Not much! but I'll break through all, to get to my Harriot.

Maj. O. I do know her ladyship.

Charles. Well, and what do you know of her?

Maj. O. O, nothing!—Her ladyship is a woman of the world, that's all—

Charles. What do you mean?

Maj. O. That lady Freelove is an arrant—By-the by, did not she, last summer, make formal proposals to Harriot's father from lord Trinket?

Charles. Yes; but they were received with the utmost contempt. The old gentleman, it seems, hates a lord, and he told her so in plain terms.

Maj. O. Such an aversion to the nobility may not run in the blood. The girl, I warrant you, has no objection. However, if she's there, watch her narrowly, Charles. Lady Freelove is as mischievous as a monkey, and as cunning too.—Have a care of her, I say, have a care of her.

Charles. If she's there, I'll have her out of the house within this half hour, or set fire to it.

Maj. O. Nay, now you are too violent—stay a moment, and we'll consider what's best to be done.

Enter OAKLY.

Oak. Come, is the coach ready? Let us be gone. Does Charles go with us?

Charles. I go with you!—What can I do? I am so vexed and distracted, and so many thoughts crowd in upon me, I don't know which way to turn myself.

Mrs. O. [Within] The coach!—dines out!—where is your master?

Oak. Zounds, brother! here she is!

Re-enter MRS. OAKLY.

Mrs. O. Pray, Mr. Oakly, what is the matter you cannot dine at home to-day?

Oak. Don't be uneasy, my dear!—I have a little business to settle with my brother; so I am only just going to dinner, with him and Charles, to the tavern.

Mrs. O. Why cannot you settle your business here, as well as at a tavern? but it is some of your ladies' business, I suppose, and so you must get rid of my company.—This is chiefly your fault, major Oakly!

Maj. O. Lord, sister, what signifies it, whether a man dines at home or abroad? [Coolsy.]

Mrs. O. It signifies a great deal, sir! and I don't choose—

Maj. O. Phoo! let him go, my dear sister, let him go! he will be ten times better company when he comes back. I tell you what, sister—you sit at home till you are quite tired of one another, and then you grow cross, and fall out. If you would but part a little now and then, you might meet again in humour.

Mrs. O. I beg, major Oakly, that you would trouble yourself about your own affairs; and let me tell you, sir, that I—

Oak. Nay, do not put thyself into a passion with the major, my dear!—It is not his fault; and I shall come back to thee very soon.

Mrs. O. Come back;—why need you go out?—I know well enough when you mean to deceive me; for then there is always a pretence of dining with sir John, or my lord, or somebody; but when you tell me that you are going to a tavern, it's such a bare-faced affront—

Oak. This is so strange now!—Why, my dear, I shall only just—

Mrs. O. Only just go after the lady in the letter, I suppose.

Oak. Well, well, I won't go then.—Will that convince you? I'll stay with you, my dear.—Will that satisfy you?

Maj. O. For shame! hold out, if you are a man. [Apart.]

Oak. She has been so much vexed this morning already, I must humour her a little now. [Apart.]

Maj. O. Fie! fie! go out, or you are undone. [Apart.]

Oak. You see it's impossible.—I'll dine at home with thee, my love.

[Apart to Mrs. Oakly.]

Mrs. O. Ay, ay, pray do, sir.—Dine at a tavern indeed! [Going.]

Oak. [Returning] You may depend on me another time, major.

Maj. O. Steel and adamant!—Ah!

Mrs. O. [Returning] Mr. Oakly!

Oak. O, my dear! [Exit, with Mrs. Oakly.]

Maj. O. Ha, ha, ha! there's a picture of resolution! there goes a philosopher for you! ha! Charles!

Charles. O, uncle! I have no spirits to laugh now.

Maj. O. So! I have a fine time on't between you and my brother. Will you meet me to dinner at the St. Albans by four? We'll drink her health, and think of this affair.

Charles. Don't depend on me. I shall be running all over the town, in pursuit of my Harriot; at all events I'll go directly to lady Freelove's. If I find her not there, which way I shall direct myself, heaven knows.

Maj. O. Harkye, Charles! If you meet with her, you may be at a loss. Bring her to my house; I have a snug room, and—

Charles. Phoo! Pr'ythee, uncle, don't trifle with me now.

Maj. O. Well, seriously then, my house is at your service.

Charles. I thank you; but I must be gone.

Maj. O. Ay, ay, bring her to my house, and we'll settle the whole affair for you. You shall clap her into a post-chaise, take the chaplain of our regiment along with you, wheel her down to Scotland<sup>1</sup>), and when you come back, send to settle her fortune with her father; that's the modern art of making love, Charles! [Exit.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—A Room in the Bull and Gate Inn.

Enter SIR HARRY BEAGLE<sup>2</sup>) and TOM.

Sir H. Ten guineas a mare, and a crown the man? hey, Tom!

Tom. Yes, your honour.

Sir H. And are you sure, Tom, that there is no flaw in his blood?

Tom. He's a good thing, sir, and as little beholden to the ground, as any horse that

1) A spirited girl in England, when opposed in her choice of a husband by her parents, used to make nothing of agreeing with her lover to set off with him to Gretna Green (on the borders of Scotland), to get married; but now this custom is abolished, and the blacksmith who used to perform the marriage ceremony has been forbidden to act, since Lord E—took his flight towards those regions on the same errand; so that, now the lovers are obliged to have the ceremony performed in a boat on the river there, and this marriage is perfectly valid.

2) We have an excellent specimen, in sir H. Beagle, of one of our racing and fox-hunting country-squires; as he speaks entirely in the language of the turf (race-ground), some of his sporting terms require an explanation.

ever went over the turf upon four legs. Why here's his whole pedigree, <sup>1)</sup> your honour!

Sir H. Is it attested?

Tom. Very well attested; it is signed by Jack Spur and my lord Startal.

[Giving the Pedigree.]

Sir H. Let me see. [Reads] Tom-come-tickle-me was out of the famous Tantwivy mare, by sir Aaron Driver's chesnut horse, White Stockings. White Stockings, his dam, was got by lord Hedge's South Barb, full sister to the Proserpine Filly, and his sire Tom Jones; his grandam was the Irish Duchess, and his grandsire Squire Sportley's Trajan; his great and great great grandam were Newmarket Peggy and Black Moll; and his great grandsire, and great great grandsire, were sir Ralph Whip's Regulus, and the famous Prince Ananaboo.

mark.

STARTAL.

Tom. All fine horses, and won every thing! a foal out of your honour's bald-fac'd Venus, by this horse, would beat the world.

Sir H. Well then, we'll think on't.—But, plague on't, Tom, I have certainly knocked up my little roan gelding in this damn'd wild-goose chase of threescore miles an end. <sup>2)</sup>

Tom. He's deadly blown, to be sure, your honour; and I am afraid we are upon a wrong scent after all. Madam Harriot certainly took across the country, instead of coming on to London.

Sir H. No, no, we traced her all the way up.—But d'ye hear, Tom, look out among the stables and repositories here in town, for a smart road nag, and a strong horse to carry a portmanteau.

Tom. Sir Roger Turf's horses are to be sold—I'll see if there's ever a tight thing there—but I suppose, sir, you would have one somewhat stronger than Snip—I don't think he's quite enough of a horse for your honour.

Sir H. Not enough of a horse! Snip's a powerful gelding; master of two stone more than my weight. If Snip stands sound, I would not take a hundred guineas for him. Poor Snip! go into the stable, Tom, see they give him a warm mash, and look at his heels and his eyes.—But where's Mr. Russet all this while?

Tom. I left the squire at breakfast on a cold pigeon pie, and inquiring after madam Harriot, in the kitchen. I'll let him know your honour would be glad to see him here.

Sir H. Ay, do; but harkye, Tom, be sure you take care of Snip.

Tom. I'll warrant your honour.

Sir H. I'll be down in the stables myself by-and-by. [Exit Tom] Let me see—out of the famous Tantwivy by White Stockings; White Stockings, his dam, full sister to the Proserpine Filly; and his sire—pox on't, how unlucky it is that this damned accident should happen in the Newmarket week!—ten to one

I lose my match with lord Chokejade, by not riding myself, and I shall have no opportunity to hedge <sup>1)</sup> my bets neither—what a damned piece of work have I made on't—I have knocked up poor Snip, shall lose my match, and as to Harriot, why the odds are that I lose my match there too—a skittish young tit! <sup>2)</sup> If I once get her tight in hand, I'll make her wince for it.—Her estate, joined to my own, I would have the finest stud and the noblest kennel in the whole country.—But here comes her father, puffing and blowing, like a broken-winded horse up hill.

Enter RUSSET.

Rus. Well, sir Harry, have you heard any thing of her?

Sir H. Yes, I have been asking Tom about her, and he says you may have her for five hundred guineas.

Rus. Five hundred guineas! how d'ye mean? where is she? which way did she take?

Sir H. Why, first she went to Epsom, then to Lincoln, then to Nottingham, and now she is at York.

Rus. Impossible! she could not go over half the ground in the time. What the devil are you talking of?

Sir H. Of the mare you was just now saying you wanted to buy.

Rus. The devil take the mare!—who would think of her, when I am mad about an affair of so much more consequence?

Sir H. You seemed mad about her a little while ago. She's a fine mare, and a thing of shape and blood.

Rus. Damn her blood!—Harriot! my dear, provoking Harriot! Where can she be? Have you got any intelligence of her?

Sir H. No, faith, not I: we seem to be quite thrown out <sup>3)</sup> here—but, however, I have ordered Tom to try if he can hear any thing of her among the ostlers.

Rus. Why don't you inquire after her yourself? why don't you run up and down the whole town after her?—t'other young rascal knows where she is, I warrant you.—What a plague it is to have a daughter! When one loves her to distraction, and has toiled and laboured to make her happy, the ungrateful slut will sooner go to hell her own way—but she shall have him—I will make her happy, if I break her heart for it.—A provoking gipsy—to run away, and torment her poor father, that dotes on her! I'll never see her face again.—Sir Harry, how can we get any intelligence of her? Why don't you speak? why don't you tell me?—Zounds! you seem as indifferent as if you did not care a farthing about her.

Sir H. Indifferent! you may well call me indifferent!—this damned chase after her will cost me a thousand—if it had not been for her, I would not have been off the course <sup>4)</sup> this week to have saved the lives of my whole family—I'll hold you six to two that—

Rus. Zounds! hold your tongue, or talk

<sup>1)</sup> The pedigree of a horse, is as religiously kept as that of any ancient family in Wales, or rather as the same is done among the Arabians, where as in England the blood proves the goodness of the horse; and the names given to the horses are sometimes not a little singular.

more to the purpose—I swear she is too good for you—you don't deserve such a wife—a fine, dear, sweet, lovely, charming girl!—She'll break my heart.—How shall I find her out?—Do, pr'ythee, sir Harry, my dear honest friend, consider how we may discover where she is fled to.

Sir H. Suppose you put an advertisement into the newspapers; describing her marks, her age, her height, and where she strayed from. I recovered a bay mare once by that method.

Rus. Advertise her!—What! describe my daughter, and expose her, in the public papers, with a reward for bringing her home, like horses stolen or strayed!—recovered a bay mare!—the devil's in the fellow!—he thinks of nothing but racers, and bay mares, and stallions.—Sdeath, I wish your—

Sir H. I wish Harriot was fairly pounded; <sup>1)</sup> it would save us both a deal of trouble.

Rus. Which way shall I turn myself?—I am half distracted.—If I go to that young dog's house, he has certainly conveyed her somewhere out of my reach—if she does not send to me to-day, I'll give her up for ever—perhaps, though, she may have met with some accident, and has nobody to assist her.—No, she is certainly with that young rascal.—I wish she was dead, and I was dead.—I'll blow young Oakly's brains out.

Re-enter TOM.

Sir H. Well, Tom, how is poor Snip?

Tom. A little better, sir, after his warm mash: but Lady, the pointing bitch that followed you all the way, is deadly foot-sore.

Rus. Damn Snip and Lady!—have you heard any thing of Harriot?

Tom. Why, I came on purpose to let my master and your honour know, that John Ostler says as how, just such a lady as I told him madam Harriot was, came here in a four-wheel chaise, and was fetched away soon after by a fine lady in a chariot.

Rus. Did she come alone?

Tom. Quite alone, only a servant maid, please your honour.

Rus. And what part of the town did they go to?

Tom. John Ostler says as how they bid the coachman drive to Grosvenor-square,

Sir H. Soho! puss—Yoics! <sup>2)</sup>

Rus. She is certainly gone to that young rogue—he has got his aunt to fetch her from hence—or else she is with her own aunt, lady Freelove—they both live in that part of the town. I'll go to his house, and in the mean while, sir Harry, you shall step to lady Freelove's, We'll find her, I warrant you. I'll

Sir H. Soho! hark forward! wind 'em and cross 'em! hark forward! Yoics! Yoics! [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—OAKLY'S House.

Enter MRS. OAKLY.

Mrs. O. After all, that letter was certainly intended for my husband. I see plain enough they are all in a plot against me. My husband intriguing, the major working him up to affront me, Charles owning his letters, and so playing into each other's hands.—They think me a fool, I find—but I'll be too much for them yet.—I have desired to speak with Mr. Oakly, and expect him here immediately. His temper is naturally open; and if he thinks my anger abated, and my suspicions laid asleep, he will certainly betray himself by his behaviour. I'll assume an air of good humour, pretend to believe the fine story they have trumped up, throw him off his guard, and so draw the secret out of him.—Here he comes.—How hard it is to dissemble one's anger! Oh, I could rate him soundly! but I'll keep down my indignation at present, though it chokes me.

Enter OAKLY.

O, my dear! I am very glad to see you. Pray sit down [They sit] I longed to see you. It seemed an age till I had an opportunity of talking over the silly affair that happened this morning. [Mildly.]

Oak. Why really, my dear—

Mrs. O. Nay, don't look so grave now. Come—it's all over. Charles and you have cleared up matters. I am satisfied.

Oak. Indeed! I rejoice to hear it! You make me happy beyond my expectation. This disposition will ensure our felicity. Do but lay aside your cruel, unjust suspicion, and we should never have the least difference.

Mrs. O. Indeed I begin to think so. I'll endeavour to get the better of it. And really sometimes it is very ridiculous. My uneasiness this morning, for instance, ha, ha, ha! To be so much alarmed about that idle letter, which turned out quite another thing at last—was not I very angry with you? ha, ha, ha! [Affecting a Laugh.]

Oak. Don't mention it. Let us both forget it. Your present cheerfulness makes amends for every thing.

Mrs. O. I am apt to be too violent; I love you too well to be quite easy about you. [Fondly] Well—no matter—what is become of Charles?

Oak. Poor fellow! he is on the wing, rambling all over the town, in pursuit of this young lady.

Mrs. O. Where is he gone pray?

Oak. First of all, I believe, to some of her relations.

Mrs. O. Relations! Who are they? Where do they live?

Oak. There is an aunt of hers lives just in the neighbourhood; lady Freelove.

Mrs. O. Lady Freelove! Oho! gone to lady

Freelove's, is he?—and do you think he will bear any thing of her?

Oak. I don't know; but I hope so, with all my soul.

Mrs. O. Hope! with all your soul; do you hope so?

Oak. Hope so! ye—yes—why, don't you hope so?

Mrs. O. Why—yes—[Recovering]—O, ay, to be sure. I hope it of all things. You know, my dear, it must give me great satisfaction, as well as yourself, to see Charles well settled.

Oak. I should think so; and really I don't know where he can be settled so well. She is a most deserving young woman, I assure you.

Mrs. O. You are well acquainted with her then?

Oak. To be sure, my dear; after seeing her so often last summer, at the major's house in the country, and at her father's.

Mrs. O. So often!

Oak. O, ay—very often—Charles took care of that—almost every day.

Mrs. O. Indeed! But pray—a—a—a—I say—

Oak. What do you say, my dear?

Mrs. O. I say—a—a—[Stammering] Is she handsome?

Oak. Prodigiously handsome indeed.

Mrs. O. Prodigiously handsome! and is she reckoned a sensible girl?

Oak. A very sensible, modest, agreeable, young lady as ever I knew. You would be extremely fond of her, I am sure. You can't imagine how happy I was in her company. Poor Charles! she soon made a conquest of him, and no wonder, she has so many elegant accomplishments! such an infinite fund of cheerfulness and good humour! Why, she's the darling of the whole country.

Mrs. O. Lord! you seem quite in raptures about her!

Oak. Raptures!—not at all. I was only telling you the young lady's character. I thought you would be glad to find that Charles had made so sensible a choice, and was so likely to be happy.

Mrs. O. Oh, Charles! True, as you say, Charles will be mighty happy.

Oak. Don't you think so?

Mrs. O. I am convinced of it. Poor Charles! I am much concerned for him. He must be very uneasy about her. I was thinking whether we could be of any service to him in this affair.

Oak. Was you, my love? that is very good of you. Why, to be sure, we must endeavour to assist him. Let me see—How can we manage it? 'Gad! I have hit it. The luckiest thought! and it will be of great service to Charles.

Mrs. O. Well, what is it? [Eagerly]—You know I would do any thing to serve Charles, and oblige you.

Oak. That is so kind! Lord, my dear, if you would but always consider things in this proper light, and continue this amiable temper, we should be the happiest people—

Mrs. O. I believe so; but what's your proposal?

Oak. I am sure you'll like it.—Charles, you know, may perhaps be so lucky as to meet with this lady

Mrs. O. True.

Oak. Now I was thinking, that he might, with your leave, my dear.

Mrs. O. Well!

Oak. Bring her home here—

Mrs. O. How!

Oak. Yes, bring her home here, my dear;—it will make poor Charles's mind quite easy: and you may take her under your protection till her father comes to town.

Mrs. O. Amazing! this is even beyond my expectation.

Oak. Why!—what!—

Mrs. O. Was there ever such assurance! [Rises] Take her under my protection! What! would you keep her under my nose?

Oak. Nay, I never conceived—I thought you would have approved—

Mrs. O. What! make me your convenient woman!—No place but my own house to serve your purposes?

Oak. Lord, this is the strangest misapprehension! I am quite astonished.

Mrs. O. Astonished! yes—confused, detected, betrayed, by your vain confidence of imposing on me. Why, sure you imagine me an idiot, a driveller. Charles, indeed! yes, Charles is a fine excuse for you. The letter this morning, the letter, Mr. Oakly!

Oak. The letter! why sure that—

Mrs. O. Is sufficiently explained. You have made it very clear to me. Now I am convinced. I have no doubt of your perfidy. But I thank you for some hints you have given me, and you may be sure I shall make use of them: nor will I rest till I have full conviction, and overwhelm you with the strongest proof of your baseness towards me.

Oak. Nay, but—

Mrs. O. Go, go! I have no doubt of your falsehood: away! [Exit.

Oak. Was there ever any thing like this? Such unaccountable behaviour! angry I don't know why! jealous of I know not what! Hints!—hints I have given her!—What can she mean?—

Enter TOILET, crossing the Stage.

Toilet! where are you going?

Toil. To order the porter to let in no company to my lady to-day. She won't see a single soul, sir. [Exit.

Oak. What an unhappy woman! Now will she sit all day feeding on her suspicions, till she has convinced herself of the truth of them.

Enter JOHN, crossing the Stage.

Well, sir, what's your business?

John. Going to order the chariot, sir!—my lady's going out immediately. [Exit.

Oak. Going out! what is all this?—But every way she makes me miserable. Wild and ungovernable as the sea or the wind! made up of storms and tempests! I can't bear it: and one way or other I will put an end to it. [Exit.

SCENE III.—LADY FREELove's House.

Enter LADY FREELove, with a Card; a Servant following.

Lady F. [Reading as she enters]—And will take the liberty of waiting on her ladyship en cavalier, as he comes from the manège. Does any body wait that brought this card?

Serv. Lord Trinket's servant is in the hall, madam.

Lady F. My compliments, and I shall be glad to see his lordship.—Where is miss Russet?

Serv. In her own chamber, madam.

Lady F. What is she doing?

Serv. Writing, I believe, madam.

Lady F. Oh, ridiculous!—scribbling to that Oakly, I suppose. [Apart].—Let her know, I should be glad of her company here. [Exit Servant]. It is a mighty troublesome thing to manage a simple girl, that knows nothing of the world. Harriot, like all other girls, is foolishly fond of this young fellow of her own choosing, her first love; that is to say, the first man that is particularly civil; and the first air of consequence which a young lady gives herself. Poor silly soul!—But Oakly must not have her, positively. A match with lord Trinket will add to the dignity of the family. I must bring her into it. But here she comes.

Enter HARRIOT.

Well, Harriot, still in the pouts! nay, pr'ythee, my dear little runaway girl, be more cheerful! your everlasting melancholy puts me into the vapours.

Har. Dear madam, excuse me. How can I be cheerful in my present situation? I know my father's temper so well, that I am sure this step of mine must almost distract him. I sometimes wish that I had remained in the country, let what would have been the consequence.

Lady F. Why, it is a naughty <sup>1)</sup> child, that's certain; but it need not be so uneasy about papa, as you know that I wrote by last night's post to acquaint him that his little lost sheep was safe, and that you were ready to obey his commands in every particular, except marrying that oaf, sir Harry Beagle.—Lord! Lord! what a difference there is between a country and a town education! Why, a London lass would have jumped out of a window into a gallant's arms, and without thinking of her father, unless it were to have drawn a few bills on him, been a hundred miles off in nine or ten hours, or perhaps out of the kingdom in twenty-four.

Har. I fear I have already been too precipitate. I tremble for the consequences.

Lady F. I swear, child, you are a downright prude. Your way of talking gives me the spleen; so full of affection, and duty, and virtue, 'tis just like a funeral sermon. And yet, pretty soul! it can love.—Well, I wonder at your taste; a sneaking, simple gentleman, without a title! and when to my knowledge you might have a man of quality to-morrow.

Har. Perhaps so. Your ladyship must excuse me, but many a man of quality would make me miserable.

Lady F. Indeed, my dear, these antediluvian notions will never do now-a-days; and at the same time too, those little wicked eyes of yours speak a very different language. Indeed you have fine eyes, child! and they have made fine work with lord Trinket.

Har. Lord Trinket! [Contemptuously.]

Lady F. Yes, lord Trinket; you know it as well as I do; and yet, you ill-natured thing, you will not vouchsafe him a single smile. But you must give the poor soul a little encouragement, pr'ythee do.

Har. Indeed I can't, madam, for of all mankind lord Trinket is my aversion.

Lady F. Why so, child? He is counted a well-bred, sensible, young fellow, and the women all think him handsome.

Har. Yes, he is just polite enough to be able to be very unmannerly, with a great deal of good breeding; is just handsome enough to make him most excessively vain of his person; and has just reflection enough to finish him for a coxcomb; qualifications which are all very common among these whom your ladyship calls men of quality.

Lady F. A satirist too! Indeed, my dear, this affectation sits very awkwardly upon you. There will be a superiority in the behaviour of persons of fashion.

Har. A superiority, indeed! for his lordship always behaves with so much insolent familiarity, that I should almost imagine he was soliciting me for other favours, rather than to pass my whole life with him.

Lady F. Innocent freedoms, child, which every fine woman expects to be taken with her, as an acknowledgment of her beauty.

Har. They are freedoms which I think no innocent woman can allow.

Lady F. Romantic to the last degree!—Why, you are in the country still, Harriot!

Enter a Servant.

Serv. My lord Trinket, madam. [Exit.]

Lady F. I swear now I have a good mind to tell him all you have said.

Enter LORD TRINKET, in Boots, etc. as from the Riding-house.

Your lordship's most obedient humble servant.

Lord T. Your ladyship does me too much honour. Here I am en bottine as you see—just come from the manège.

Lady F. Your lordship is always agreeable in every dress.

Lord T. Vastly obliging, lady Freelove. Miss Russet, I am your slave. I declare it makes me quite happy to find you together. 'Pon honour, ma'am, [To Harriot] I begin to conceive great hopes of you; and as for you, lady Freelove, I cannot sufficiently commend your assiduity with your fair pupil. She was before possessed of every grace that nature could bestow on her, and nobody is so well qualified as your ladyship to give her the bon ton.

Har. Compliment and contempt all in a breath!—My lord, I am obliged to you. But, waving my acknowledgments, give me leave to ask your lordship whether nature and the bon ton (as you call it) are so different, that we must give up one in order to obtain the other?

Lord T. Totally opposite, madam. The chief aim of the bon ton is to render persons of family different from the vulgar, for whom indeed nature serves very well. For this reason it has, at various times, been ungenteel to see, to hear, to walk, to be in good health, and to have twenty other horrible perfections of nature.<sup>1)</sup> Nature indeed may do very well sometimes. It made you, for instance, and it then made something very lovely; and if you would suffer us of quality to give you the ton, you would be absolutely divine: but now—me—madam—me—nature never made such a thing as me.

Har. Why, indeed, I think your lordship has very few obligations to her.

Lord T. Then you really think it's all my own? I declare now that is a mighty genteel compliment: nay, if you begin to flatter already, you improve apace. 'Pon honour, lady Freelove, I believe we shall make something of her at last.

Lady F. No doubt on't. It is in your lordship's power to make her a complete woman of fashion at once.

Lord T. Hum! Why, ay—

Har. Your lordship must excuse me. I am of a very tasteless disposition. I shall never bear to be carried out of nature.

Lady F. You are out of nature now, Harriot! I am sure no woman but yourself ever objected to being carried among persons of quality. Would you believe it, my lord! here has she been a whole week in town, and would never suffer me to introduce her to a rout, an assembly, a concert, or even to court, or the opera; nay, would hardly so much as mix with a living soul that has visited me.

Lord T. No wonder, madam, you do not adopt the manners of persons of fashion, when you will not even honour them with your company. Were you to make one in our little coteries, we should soon make you sick of the boors and bumkins of the horrid country. By-the-by, I met a monster at the riding-house this morning who gave me some intelligence, that will surprise you, concerning your family.

Har. What intelligence?

Lady F. Who was this monster, as your lordship calls him? a curiosity, I dare say.

Lord T. This monster, madam, was formerly my head groom, and had the care of all my running horses; but growing most abominably surly and extravagant, as you know all these fellows do, I turned him off; and ever since my brother, Slouch Trinket, has had the care of my stud, rides all my principal matches himself, and—

Har. Dear, my lord, don't talk of your groom and your brother, but tell me the news. Do you know any thing of my father?

Lord T. Your father, madam, is now in town. This fellow, you must know, is now groom to sir Harry Beagle, your sweet rural swain, and informed me that his master and your father were running all over the town in quest of you; and that he himself had orders to inquire after you: for which reason, I suppose, he came to the riding-house stables to look after a horse, thinking it, to be sure, a very likely place to meet you. Your father, <sup>1)</sup> Horrid, vulgar, healthy red-cheeks, as was once said, in company, of a beautiful young lady from the country.

perhaps, is gone to seek you at the Tower, or Westminster Abbey, which is all the idea he has of London; and your faithful lover is probably cheapening a hunter, and drinking strong beer, at the Horse and Jockey in Smithfield.

Lady F. The whole set admirably disposed of!

Har. Did not your lordship inform him where I was?

Lord T. Not I, 'pon honour, madam; that I left to their own ingenuity to discover.

Lady F. And pray, my lord, where in this town have this polite company bestowed themselves?

Lord T. They lodge, madam, of all places in the world, at the Bull and Gate Inn, in Holborn.

Lady F. Ha, ha, ha! The Bull and Gate! Incomparable! What, have they brought any hay or cattle to town?

Lord T. Very well, lady Freelove, very well indeed! There they are, like so many graziers; and there it seems they have learned that this lady is certainly in London.

Har. Do, dear madam, send a card directly to my father, informing him where I am, and that your ladyship would be glad to see him here. For my part I dare not venture into his presence, till you have in some measure pacified him; but for heaven's sake, desire him not to bring that wretched fellow along with him.

Lord T. Wretched fellow! Oho! Courage, Milor Trinket!

[Aside.

Lady F. I'll send immediately. Who's there?

Re-enter Servant.

Serv. [Apart to Lady Freelove] Sir Harry Beagle is below, madam.

Lady F. [Apart to Servant] I am not at home.—Have they let him in?

Serv. Yes, madam.

Lady F. How abominably unlucky this is! Well, then, show him into my dressing-room, I will come to him there. [Exit Servant.

Lord T. Lady Freelove! no engagement, I hope? We won't part with you, 'pon honour.

Lady F. The worst engagement in the world. A pair of musty old prudes! lady Formal and miss Prate.

Lord T. O the beldams! As nauseous as ipecacuanha, 'pon honour.

Lady F. Lud, lud! what shall I do with them? Why do these foolish women come troubling me now? I must wait on them in the dressing-room, and you must excuse the card, Harriot, till they are gone. I'll dispatch them as soon as I can, but heaven knows when I shall get rid of them, for they are both everlasting gossips! though the words come from her ladyship one by one, like drops from a still, while the other tiresome woman overwhelms us with a flood of impertinence. Harriot, you'll entertain his lordship till I return. [Exit.

Lord T. Gone!—'Pon honour, I am not sorry for the coming in of these old tabbies, and am much obliged to her ladyship for leaving us such an agreeable tête-à-tête.

Har. Your lordship will find me extremely bad company.

Lord T. Not in the least, my dear! We'll entertain ourselves one way or other, I'll warrant you.—'Egad, I think it a mighty good opportunity to establish a better acquaintance with you.

Har. I don't understand you.

Lord T. No?—Why then I'll speak plainer. —[Pausing, and looking her full in the Face] You are an amazing fine creature, 'pon honour.

Har. If this be your lordship's polite conversation, I shall leave you to amuse yourself in soliloquy. [Going.]

Lord T. No, no, no, madam, that must not be. [Stopping her] This place, my passion, the opportunity, all conspire—

Har. How, sir! you don't intend to do me any violence?

Lord T. 'Pon honour, ma'am, it will be doing great violence to myself, if I do not. You must excuse me. [Struggling with her.]

Har. Help! help! murder! help!

Lord T. Your yelping will signify nothing—nobody will come. [Struggling.]

Har. For heaven's sake!—Sir!—My lord— [Noise within.]

Lord T. Plague on't, what noise!—Then I must be quick. [Still struggling.]

Har. Help! murder! help! help!

Enter CHARLES, hastily.

Charles. What do I hear? My Harriot's voice calling for help!—Ha! [Seeing them] Is it possible?—Turn, ruffian! I'll find you employment. [Drawing.]

Lord T. You are a most impertinent scoundrel, and I'll whip you through the lungs, 'pon honour.

[They fight. Harriot runs out, screaming Help, etc.]

Re-enter LADY FREELove, with SIR HARRY BEAGLE and Servants.

Lady F. How's this?—Swords drawn in my house!—Part them—[They are parted] This is the most impudent thing—

Lord T. Well, rascal, I shall find a time; I know you, sir!

Charles. The sooner the better; I know your lordship too.

Sir H. I'faith, madam, [To Lady Freelove] we had like to have been in at the death.<sup>1)</sup>

Lady F. What is all this? Pray, sir, what is the meaning of your coming hither, to raise this disturbance? Do you take my house for a brothel? [To Charles.]

Charles. Not I, indeed, madam; but I believe his lordship does.

Lord T. Impudent scoundrel!

Lady F. Your conversation, sir, is as insolent as your behaviour. Who are you? What brought you here?

Charles. I am one, madam, always ready to draw my sword in defence of innocence in distress, and more especially in the cause of that lady I delivered from his lordship's fury;

in search of whom I troubled your ladyship's house.

Lady F. Her lover, I suppose; or what?

Charles. At your ladyship's service; though not quite so violent in my passion as his lordship there.

Lord T. Impertinent rascal!

Lady F. You shall be made to repeat of this insolence.

Lord T. Your ladyship may leave that to me.

Charles. Ha, ha!

Sir H. But, pray what is become of the lady all this while? Why, lady Freelove, you told me she was not here; and i'faith, I was just drawing off another way, if I had not heard the view-halloo.

Lady F. You shall see her immediately, sir! Who's there?

Enter Servant.

Where is miss Russet!

Serv. Gone out, madam.

Lady F. Gone out?—Where?

Serv. I don't know, madam: but she run down the back stairs, crying for help, crossed the servants' hall in tears, and took a chair at the door.

Lady F. Blockheads! to let her go out in a chair alone!—Go and inquire after her immediately. [Exit Servant.]

Sir H. Gone!—When I had just run her down, and is the little puss stole away at last?

Lady F. Sir, if you will walk in, [To Sir Harry] with his lordship and me, perhaps you may hear some tidings of her; though it is most probable she may be gone to her father. I don't know any other friend she has in town.

Charles. I am heartily glad she is gone. She is safer any where than in this house.

Lady F. Mighty well, sir!—My lord, sir Harry,—I attend you.

Lord T. You shall hear from me, sir!

[To Charles.]

Charles. Very well, my lord.

Sir H. Stole away!—plague on't—stole away!

[Exeunt Sir Harry and Lord Trinket.]

Lady F. Before I follow the company, give me leave to tell you, sir, that your behaviour here has been so extraordinary—

Charles. My treatment here, madam, has indeed been very extraordinary.

Lady F. Indeed!—Well, no matter—permit me to acquaint you, sir, that there lies your way out, and that the greatest favour you can do me, is to leave the house immediately.

Charles. That your ladyship may depend on. Since you have put miss Russet to flight, you may be sure of not being troubled with my company. I'll after her immediately.

Lady F. If she has any regard for her reputation, she'll never put herself into such hands as yours.

Charles. O, madam, there can be no doubt of her regard for that, by her leaving your ladyship.

Lady F. Leave my house.

Charles. Directly—A charming house! and a charming lady of the house too!—Ha, ha, ha!

Lady F. Vulgar fellow!

Charles. Fine lady! [Exeunt severally.]

<sup>1)</sup> A very honourable thing for a sportsman is, to be on the spot—when hounds have caught the game, he then leaps from his horse, whips the dogs away, and seizing the game holds it triumphantly over his head giving the death-halloo; and then he is entitled to the brush, if a fox, antlers, if a stag, and one of the fore-feet, if a kid for his reward. These honourable tokens of prowess are to be seen in all the halls of the gentlemen fox-hunters in the country, tending to bring back many a moment of pleasure to the sportsman.

ACT III.

SCENE I.—LADY FREELOVE'S House.

Enter LADY FREELOVE and LORD TRINKET.

Lord T. Doucement, doucement, my dear lady Freelove!—Excuse me, I meant no harm, 'pon honour!

Lady F. Indeed, indeed, my lord Trinket, this is absolutely intolerable! What, to offer rudeness to a young lady in my house! What will the world say of it?

Lord T. Just what the world pleases.—It does not signify a doit what they say.—However, I ask pardon; but, 'egad, I thought it was the best way.

Lady F. For shame, for shame, my lord! I am quite hurt at your want of discretion; and as this is rather an ugly affair in regard to me as well as your lordship, and may make some noise, I think it absolutely necessary, merely to save appearances, that you should wait on her father, palliate matters as well as you can, and make a formal repetition of your proposal of marriage.

Lord T. Your ladyship is perfectly in the right.—You are quite au fait of the affair. It shall be done immediately, and then your reputation will be safe, and my conduct justified to all the world. But should the old rustic continue as stubborn as his daughter, your ladyship I hope has no objections to my being a little rusé, for I must have her, 'pon honour.

Enter Servant.

Serv. Captain O'Cutter, to wait on your ladyship.

Lady F. O the hideous fellow! The Irish sailor-man, for whom I prevailed on your lordship to get the post of regulating captain. I suppose he is come to load me with his odious thanks. I won't be troubled with him now.

Lord T. Let him in, by all means. He is the best creature to laugh at in nature. He is a perfect seamonster, and always looks and talks as if he was upon deck. Besides, a thought strikes me—He may be of use.

Lady F. Well—send the creature up then. [Exit Servant] But what fine thought is this?

Lord T. A coup de maitre, 'pon honour! I intend—but, hush! here the porpus comes.

Enter CAPTAIN O'CUTTER.

Lady F. Captain, your humble servant! I am very glad to see you.

O'Cut. I am much obliged to you, my lady! Upon my conscience, the wind favours me at all points. I had no sooner got under weigh,<sup>1)</sup> to tank your ladyship, but I have borne down upon<sup>2)</sup> my noble friend his lordship too. I hope your lordship's well?

Lord T. Very well, I thank you, captain:—But you seem to be hurt in the service: what is the meaning of that patch over your right eye?

1) Captain O'Cutter's mixture of Irish and sea terms is laughable enough on the stage, because the actor must not only speak Irish, but look Irish also, if he will perform his part well. To get under weigh means, to raise the anchor, set the sails; and when the wind has filled them, the vessel moves on its way.

2) Sail towards.

O'Cut. Some advanced wages from my new post, my lord! This pressing is hot work, though it entitles us to smart<sup>1)</sup> money.

Lady F. And pray in what perilous adventure did you get that scar, captain?

O'Cut. Quite out of my element, indeed, my lady. I got it in an engagement by land. A day or two ago, I spied three stout fellows, belonging to a merchantman. They made down Wapping. I immediately gave my lads the signal to chase, and we bore down right upon them. They tacked, and lay to<sup>2)</sup>—We gave them a thundering broadside, which they resaved<sup>3)</sup> like men; and one of them made use of small arms, which carried off the weathermost<sup>4)</sup> corner of Ned Gage's hat; so I immediately stood in with him, and raked<sup>5)</sup> him, but resaved a wound on my starboard<sup>6)</sup> eye, from the stock of the pistol. However we took them all, and they now lie under the hatches, with fifty more, aboard a tender<sup>7)</sup> off the Tower.

Lord T. Well done, noble captain!—But however you will soon have better employment, for I think the next step to your present post, is commonly a ship.

O'Cut. The sooner the better, my lord! Honest Terence O'Cutter shall never flinch, I warrant you; and has had as much sea-sarvice as any man in the navy.

Lord T. You may depend on my good offices, captain! But, in the mean time, it is in your power to do me a favour.

O'Cut. A favour, my lord?—your lordship does me honour. I would go round the world, from one end to the other, by day or by night, to sarve your lordship, or my good lady here.

Lord T. Dear madam, the luckiest thought in nature! [Apart to Lady F.] The favour I have to ask of you, captain, need not carry you so far out of your way. The whole affair is, that there are a couple of impudent fellows at an inn in Holborn, who have affronted me, and you would oblige me infinitely, by pressing them into his majesty's service.

Lady F. Now I understand—Admirable!

[Apart.]

O'Cut. With all my heart, my lord, and tank you too, 'fait.<sup>8)</sup> But, by-the-by, I hope they are not house-keepers, or freemen of the city. There's the devil to pay in meddling with them. They boder<sup>9)</sup> one so about liberty, and property, and stuff.—It was but t'other day, that Jack Trowser was carried before my lord mayor, and lost above a twelve-month's pay for nothing at all, at all.

Lord T. I'll take care you shall be brought into no trouble. These fellows were formerly

1) The smart is the money which is sometimes taken to obtain the discharge of any one who has entered as a sailor, or enlisted as a soldier.

2) Turned round and stood still. 3) Received.

4) Windward-side, that side of any thing from which the wind comes. 5) I went up to him, and began fighting. 6) Right eye.

7) The tender is a vessel which receives the men who have been pressed for the service, previous to their being sent on board any of the king's ships wanting hands; from here the parties can appeal to the magistrates for their release; and if they can 'prove' they do not come within the persons denominated by the act, they are liberated, and the press-gang punished.

8) And thank you too in faith.

9) Either, Irish for trouble.

my grooms. If you'll call on me in the morning, I'll go with you to the place.

O'Cut. I'll be with your lordship, and bring with me four or five as pretty boys as you'll wish to clap your two good looking eyes upon of a summer's day.

Lord T. I am much obliged to you—But, captain, I have another little favour to beg of you.

O'Cut. Upon my shoul I'll do it.

Lord T. What, before you know it?

O'Cut. Fore and aft, my lord!

Lord T. A gentleman has offended me in a point of honour—

O'Cut. Cut his throat!

Lord T. Will you carry him a letter from me?

O'Cut. Indeed and I will:—and I'll take you in tow<sup>1</sup>) too; and you shall engage him yard-arm and yard-arm.<sup>2</sup>)

Lord T. Why then, captain, you'll come a little earlier to-morrow morning than you proposed, that you may attend him with my billet, before you proceed on the other affair.

O'Cut. Never fear it, my lord—Your servant!—My ladyship, your humble servant!

Lady F. Captain, yours—Pray give my service to my friend Mrs. O'Cutter. How does she do?

O'Cut. I tank your ladyship's axing—The dear creature is purely tight and well.

Lord T. How many children have you, captain?

O'Cut. Four, and please your lordship, and another upon the stocks.

Lord T. When it is launched, I hope to be at the christening.—I'll stand godfather, captain.

O'Cut. Your lordship's very good.

Lord T. Well, you'll come to-morrow.

O'Cut. Ay, my lord, and every day next week.—Little Terence O'Cutter never fails, fait, when a troat is to be cut. [Exit.]

Lady F. Ha, ha, ha! But, sure you don't intend to ship off both her father and her country lover for the Indies?

Lord T. O no! Only let them contemplate the inside of a ship, for a day or two.

Lady F. Well, my lord, what use do you propose to make of this stratagem?

Lord T. Every use in nature. This artifice must, at least, take them out of the way for some time; and in the mean while measures may be concerted to carry off the girl.

Re-enter Servant.

Serv. Mrs. Oakly, madam, is at the door, in her chariot, and desires to have the honour of speaking to your ladyship on particular business.

Lord T. Mrs. Oakly! what can that jealous-pated woman want with you?

Lady F. No matter what.—I hate her mortally.—Let her in. [Exit Servant.]

Lord T. What wind blows her hither?

Lady F. A wind that must blow us some good.

Lord T. How?—I was amazed you chose to see her.

Lady F. How can you be so slow of apprehension?—She comes, you may be sure, on some occasion relating to this girl: in order to assist young Oakly, perhaps, to sooth me, and gain intelligence, and so forward the match; but I'll forbid the banns, I warrant you.—Whatever she wants, I'll draw some sweet mischief out of it.—But away! away!—I think I hear her—slip down the back stairs—or—stay, now I think on't, go out this way—meet her—and be sure to make her a very respectful bow, as you go out.

Lord T. Hush! here she is!

Enter MRS. OAKLY.

[Lord Trinket bows, and exit.]

Mrs. O. I beg pardon, for giving your ladyship this trouble.

Lady F. I am always glad of the honour of seeing Mrs. Oakly.

Mrs. O. There is a letter, madam, just come from the country, which has occasioned some alarm in our family. It comes from Mr. Russet—

Lady F. Mr. Russet!

Mrs. O. Yes, from Mr. Russet, madam; and is chiefly concerning his daughter. As she has the honour of being related to your ladyship, I took the liberty of waiting on you.

Lady F. She is indeed, as you say, madam, a relation of mine; but, after what has happened, I scarce know how to acknowledge her.

Mrs. O. Has she been so much to blame then?

Lady F. So much, madam!—Only judge for yourself.—Though she had been so indiscreet, not to say indecent in her conduct, as to elope from her father, I was in hopes to have hushed up that matter, for the honour of our family.—But she has run away from me too, madam:—went off in the most abrupt manner, not an hour ago.

Mrs. O. You surprise me. Indeed, her father, by his letter, seems apprehensive of the worst consequences.—But does your ladyship imagine any harm has happened?

Lady F. I can't tell—I hope not—But indeed she's a strange girl. You know, madam, young women can't be too cautious in their conduct. She is, I am sorry to declare it, a very dangerous person to take into a family.

Mrs. O. Indeed! [Alarmed.]

Lady F. If I was to say all I know—

Mrs. O. Why sure your ladyship knows of nothing that has been carried on clandestinely between her and Mr. Oakly? [In disorder.]

Lady F. Mr. Oakly!

Mrs. O. Mr. Oakly—no, not Mr. Oakly—that is, not my husband—I don't mean him—not him—but his nephew—young Mr. Oakly.

Lady F. Jealous of her husband! So, so! now I know my game. [Aside.]

Mrs. O. But pray, madam, give me leave to ask, was there any thing very particular in her conduct while she was in your ladyship's house?

Lady F. Why really, considering she was here scarce a week, her behaviour was rather mysterious;—letters and messages, to and fro, between her and I don't know who.—I suppose you know that Mr. Oakly's nephew has been here, madam?

Mrs. O. I was not sure of it. Has he been to wait on your ladyship already on this occasion?

Lady F. To wait on me!—The expression is much too polite for the nature of his visit.—My lord Trinket, the nobleman whom you met as you came in, had, you must know,

1) Conduct, defend. 2) Closely.

madam, some thoughts of my niece, and, as it would have been an advantageous match, I was glad of it: but I believe, after what he has been witness to this morning, he will drop all thoughts of it.

Mrs. O. I am sorry that any relation of mine should so far forget himself—

Lady F. It's no matter—his behaviour indeed, as well as the young lady's, was pretty extraordinary—and yet, after all, I don't believe he is the object of her affections.

Mrs. O. Ha! [Much alarmed.]

Lady F. She has certainly an attachment somewhere, a strong one; but his lordship, who was present all the time, was convinced, as well as myself, that Mr. Oakly's nephew was rather a convenient friend, a kind of go-between, than the lover.—Bless, me, madam, you change colour!—you seem uneasy! What's the matter?

Mrs. O. Nothing—madam—nothing—a little shocked, that my husband should behave so.

Lady F. Your husband, madam!

Mrs. O. His nephew, I mean.—His unpardonable rudeness—But I am not well—I am sorry I have given your ladyship so much trouble—I'll take my leave.

Lady F. I declare, madam, you frighten me. Your being so visibly affected makes me quite uneasy. I hope I have not said any thing—I really don't believe your husband is in fault. Men, to be sure, allow themselves strange liberties—But I think, nay, I am sure, it cannot be so—It is impossible! Don't let what I have said have any effect on you.

Mrs. O. No, it has not—I have no idea of such a thing.—Your ladyship's most obedient—[Going, returns] But sure, madam, you have not heard—or don't know any thing—

Lady F. Come, come, Mrs. Oakly, I see how it is, and it would not be kind to say all I know. I dare not tell you what I have heard. Only be on your guard—there can be no harm in that. Do you be against giving the girl any countenance, and see what effect it has.

Mrs. O. I will—I am much obliged—But does it appear to your ladyship then that Mr. Oakly—

Lady F. No, not at all—nothing in't, I dare say—I would not create uneasiness in a family—but I am a woman myself, have been married, and can't help feeling for you.—But don't be uneasy; there's nothing in't, I dare say.

Mrs. O. I think so.—Your ladyship's humble servant.

Lady F. Your servant, madam.—Pray don't be alarmed; I must insist on your not making yourself uneasy.

Mrs. O. Not at all alarmed—not in the least uneasy—Your most obedient. [Exit]

Lady F. Ha, ha, ha! There she goes, brimful of anger and jealousy, to vent it all on her husband.—Mercy on the poor man!

Re-enter LORD TRINKET.

Bless me, my lord, I thought you was gone!

Lord T. Only into the next room. My curiosity would not let me stir a step further. I heard it all, and was never more diverted in my life, 'pon honour. Ha, ha, ha!

Lady F. How the silly creature took it.—Ha, ha, ha!

Lord T. Ha, ha, ha!—My dear lady Free-love, you have a deal of ingenuity, a deal of esprit, 'pon honour.

Lady F. A little shell<sup>1)</sup> thrown into the enemy's works, that's all.

Both. Ha, ha, ha, ha!

Lady F. But I must leave you—I have twenty visits to pay. You'll let me know how you succeed in your secret expedition.

Lord T. That you may depend on.

Lady F. Remember then that to-morrow morning I expect to see you. At present, your lordship will excuse me. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—MR. OAKLY'S House.

Enter HARRIOT, following WILLIAM.

Har. Not at home! Are you sure that Mrs. Oakly is not at home, sir?

Wil. She is just gone out, madam.

Har. I have something of consequence—if you will give me leave, sir, I will wait till she returns.

Wil. You would not see her, if you did, madam. She has given positive orders not to be interrupted with any company to-day.

Har. Sure, sir, if you was to let her know that I had particular business—

Wil. I should not dare to trouble her, indeed, madam.

Har. How unfortunate this is! What can I do?—Pray, sir, can I see Mr. Oakly then?

Wil. Yes, madam: I'll acquaint my master, if you please.

Har. Pray do, sir.

Wil. Will you favour me with your name, madam?

Har. Be pleased, sir, to let him know that a lady desires to speak with him.

Wil. I shall, madam. [Exit.]

Har. I wish I could have seen Mrs. Oakly. What an unhappy situation am I reduced to by my father's obstinate perseverance to force me into a marriage which my soul abhors.

Enter OAKLY.

Oak. [At entering] Where is this lady? [Seeing her]—Bless me, miss Russet, is it you?—Was ever any thing so unlucky? [Aside] Is it possible, madam, that I see you here?

Har. It is too true, sir; and the occasion on which I am now to trouble you, is so much in need of an apology, that—

Oak. Pray make none, madam.—If my wife should return before I get her out of the house again! [Aside.]

Har. I dare say, sir, you are not quite a stranger to the attachment your nephew has professed to me.

Oak. I am not, madam.—I hope Charles has not been guilty of any baseness towards you. If he has, I'll never see his face again.

Har. I have no cause to accuse him.—But—

Oak. But what, madam? Pray be quick!—The very person in the world I would not have seen! [Aside.]

Har. You seem uneasy, sir!

Oak. No, nothing at all—Pray go on, madam.

Har. I am at present, sir, through a concurrence of strange accidents, in a very unfortunate situation, and do not know what will become of me without your assistance,

Oak. I'll do every thing in my power to serve you. I know of your leaving your father, by a letter we have had from him. Pray let me know the rest of your story.

Har. My story, sir, is very short. When I left my father's, I came immediately to London, and took refuge with a relation; where, instead of meeting with the protection I expected, I was alarmed with the most infamous designs upon my honour. It is not an hour ago since your nephew rescued me from the attempts of a villain. I tremble to think that I left him actually engaged in a duel.

Oak. He is very safe. He has just sent home the chariot from the St. Albans tavern, where he dines today.—But what are your commands for me, madam?

Har. The favour, sir, I would now request of you is, that you would suffer me to remain, for a few days, in your house.

Oak. Madam!

Har. And that, in the mean time, you will use your utmost endeavours to reconcile me to my father, without his forcing me into a marriage with sir Harry Beagle.

Oak. This is the most perplexing situation!—Why did not Charles take care to bestow you properly?

Har. It is most probable, sir, that I should not have consented to such a measure myself. The world is but too apt to censure, even without a cause: and if you are so kind as to admit me into your house, I must desire not to consider Mr. Oakly in any other light than as your nephew.

Oak. What an unlucky circumstance!—Upon my soul, madam, I would do any thing to serve you—but being in my house creates a difficulty that—

Har. I hope, sir, you do not doubt the truth of what I have told you?

Oak. I religiously believe every tittle of it, madam; but I have particular family considerations, that—

Har. Sure, sir, you cannot suspect me to be base enough to form any connexions in your family contrary to your inclinations, while I am living in your house!

Oak. Such connexions, madam, would do me and all my family great honour. I never dreamt of any scruples on that account.—What can I do?—Let me see—let me see—suppose—

[Pausing.]

Enter MRS. OAKLY behind, in a Capuchin, Tippet, etc.

Mrs. O. I am sure I heard the voice of a woman, conversing with my husband—Ha! [Seeing Harriot] It is so indeed! Let me contain myself—I'll listen.

Har. I see, sir, you are not inclined to serve me—good heaven! what am I reserved to?—Why, why did I leave my father's house, to expose myself to greater distresses?

[Ready to weep.]

Oak. I would do any thing for your sake, indeed I would. So pray be comforted, and I'll think of some proper place to bestow you in.

Mrs. O. So! so!

Har. What place can be so proper as your own house?

Oak. My dear madam, I—I—

Mrs. O. My dear madam!—Mighty well!—

[Aside.]

Oak. Hush!—hark!—what noise?—no—nothing. But I'll be plain with you, madam; we may be interrupted.—The family consideration I hinted at is nothing else than my wife. She is a little un'appy in her temper, madam;—and if you were to be admitted into the house, I don't know what would be the consequence.

Mrs. O. Very fine!

[Aside.]

Har. My behaviour, sir!—

Oak. My dear life, it would be impossible for you to behave in such a manner as not to give her suspicion.

Har. But if your nephew, sir, took every thing upon himself—

Oak. Still that would not do, madam.—Why, this very morning, when the letter came from your father, though I positively denied any knowledge of it, and Charles owned it, yet it was almost impossible to pacify her.

Har. What shall I do?—What will become of me?

Oak. Why lookye, my dear madam, since my wife is so strong an objection, it is absolutely impossible for me to take you into the house. Nay, if I had not known she was gone out, just before you came, I should be uneasy at your being here, even now. So we must manage as well as we can.—I'll take a private lodging for you a little way off, unknown to Charles, or my wife, or any body; and if Mrs. Oakly should discover it at last, why the whole matter will light upon Charles, you know.

Mrs. O. Upon Charles!

Har. How unhappy is my situation! [Weeping] I am ruined for ever.

Oak. Ruined! Not at all. Such a thing as this has happened to many a young lady before you, and all has been well again—Keep up your spirits! I'll contrive, if I possibly can, to visit you every day.

Mrs. O. [Advances] Will you so? O, Mr. Oakly! have I discovered you at last? I'll visit you, indeed! And you, my dear madam, I'll—

Har. Madam, I don't understand—

Mrs. O. I understand the whole affair, and have understood it for some time past.—You shall have a private lodging, miss!—It is the fittest place for you, I believe.—How dare you look me in the face?

Oak. For heaven's sake, my love, don't be so violent.—You are quite wrong in this affair—you don't know who you are a talking to. This lady is a person of fashion.

Mrs. O. Fine fashion indeed! to seduce other women's husbands!

Har. Dear madam, how can you imagine—

Oak. I tell you, my dear, this is the young lady that Charles—

Mrs. O. Mighty well! but that won't do, sir!—Did not I hear you lay the whole intrigue together? Did not I hear your fine plot of throwing all the blame upon Charles?—

Oak. Nay, be cool a moment.—You must know, my dear, that the letter which came this morning related to this lady—

Mrs. O. I know it.

Oak. And since that, it seems, Charles has been so fortunate as to—

Mrs. O. O, you deceitful man!—That trick is too stale to pass again with me.—It is plain now what you meant by your proposing to take her into the house this morning.—But the gentlewoman could introduce herself, I see.

Oak. Fie! fie! my dear, she came on purpose to inquire for you.

Mrs. O. For me!—better and better!—Did not she watch her opportunity, and come to you just as I went out? But I am obliged to you for your visit, madam. It is sufficiently paid. Pray, don't let me detain you.

Oak. For shame! for shame! Mrs. Oakly! How can you be so absurd? Is this proper behaviour to a lady of her character?

Mrs. O. I have heard her character. Go, my fine, runaway madam! Now you have eloped from your family, and run away from your aunt! Go!—You shan't stay here, I promise you.

Oak. Pr'ythee, be quiet. You don't know what you are doing. She shall stay.

Mrs. O. She shan't stay a minute.

Oak. She shall stay a minute, an hour, a day, a week, a month, a year!—'Sdeath, madam, she shall stay for ever, if I choose it.

Mrs. O. How!

Har. For heaven's sake, sir, let me go. I am frightened to death.

Oak. Don't be afraid, madam!—She shall stay, I insist upon it.

Rus. [Within] I tell you, sir, I will go up. I am sure the lady is here, and nothing shall hinder me.

Har. O, my father! my father! [Faints.

Oak. See! she faints. [Catches her] Ring the bell! Who's there?

Mrs. O. What! take her into your arms too!—I have no patience.

Enter Russet.

Rus. Where is this—ha! fainting! [Runs to her] O, my dear Harriot! my child! my child!

Oak. Your coming so abruptly shocked her spirits. But she revives. How do you do, madam?

Har. [To Russet] O, sir!

Rus. O, my dear girl! how could you run away from your father, that loves you with such fondness?—But I was sure I should find you here—

Mrs. O. There—there!—sure he should find her here! Did I not tell you so?—Are not you a wicked man, to carry on such base underhand doings, with a gentleman's daughter?

Rus. Let me tell you, sir, whatever you may think of the matter, I shall not easily put up with this behaviour.—How durst you encourage my daughter to an elopement, and receive her in your house?

Mrs. O. There, mind that!—The thing is as plain as the light.

Oak. I tell you, you misunderstand—

Rus. Look you, Mr. Oakly, I shall expect satisfaction from your family for so gross an affront.—Zounds, sir, I am not to be used ill by any man in England.

Har. My dear sir, I can assure you—

Rus. Hold your tongue, girl! You'll put me in a passion.

Oak. Sir, this is all a mistake.

Rus. A mistake! Did not I find her in your house?

Oak. Upon my soul, she has not been in my house above—

Mrs. O. Did not I hear you say, you would take her a lodging, a private lodging?

Oak. Yes, but that—

Rus. Has not this affair been carried on a long time in spite of my teeth?

Oak. Sir, I never troubled myself—

Mrs. O. Never troubled yourself! Did not you insist on her staying in the house, whether I would or no?

Oak. No.

Rus. Did not you send to meet her, when she came to town?

Oak. No.

Mrs. O. Did not you deceive me about the letter this morning?

Oak. No—no—no—I tell you, no.

Mrs. O. Yes—yes—yes—I tell you, yes.

Rus. Shan't I believe my own eyes?

Mrs. O. Shan't I believe my own ears?

Oak. I tell you you are both deceived.

Rus. Zounds, sir, I'll have satisfaction.

Mrs. O. I'll stop these fine doings, I warrant you.

Oak. 'Sdeath, you will not let me speak—and you are both alike, I think.—I wish you were married to one another with all my heart.

Mrs. O. Mighty well! mighty well!

Rus. I shall soon find a time to talk with you.

Oak. Find a time to talk! you have talked enough now for all your lives.

Mrs. O. Very fine! Come along, sir! Leave that lady with her father. Now she is in the properest hands. [Exit.

Oak. I wish I could leave you in his hands, [Going, returns] One word with you, sir!—The height of your passion, and Mrs. Oakly's strange misapprehension of this whole affair, makes it impossible to explain matters to you at present. I will do it when you please, and how you please.

Rus. Yes, yes; I'll have satisfaction.—So, madam! I have found you at last.—You have made a fine confusion here.

Har. I have indeed been the innocent cause of a great deal of confusion.

Rus. Innocent!—What business had you to be running hither after—

Har. My dear sir, you misunderstand the whole affair. I have not been in this house half an hour.

Rus. Zounds, girl, don't put me in a passion!—You know I love you—but a lie puts me in a passion. But come along—we'll leave this house directly. [Charles sings without]—Hey-day? what now?

After a Noise without, enter CHARLES, drunk.

Charles. [Sings] But my wine neither nurses nor babies can bring,
And a big-bellied bottle's a mighty good thing.
What's here? a woman? Harriot! impossible!
My dearest, sweetest Harriot! I have been looking all over the town for you, and at last—when I was tired—and weary—and disappointed—why then the honest major and I sat down together to drink your health in pint bumpers. [Running to her.

Rus. Stand off!—How dare you take any liberty with my daughter before me? Zounds, sir, I'll be the death of you.

Charles. Ha! 'Squire Russet too!—You jolly old cock, how do you do?—But, Harriot! my dear girl; [Taking hold of her] My life, my soul, my—

Rus. Let her go, sir—come away, Harriot!—Leave him this instant, or I'll tear you asunder.

Har. There needs no violence to tear me from a man who could disguise himself in such a gross manner, at a time when he knew I was in the utmost distress.

[Disengages herself, and exit with Russet.]

Charles. Only hear me, sir—madam!—my dear Harriot—Mr. Russet—gone!—she's gone!—and, 'egad, in very ill humour, and in very bad company!—I'll go after her—but hold!—I shall only make it worse—as I did—now I recollect—once before. How the devil came they here?—Who would have thought of finding her in my own house?—My head turns round with conjectures.—I believe I am drunk—very drunk—so, 'egad, I'll e'en go and sleep myself sober, and then inquire the meaning of all this. For.

I love Sue, and Sue loves me, etc.

[Exit, singing.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—OAKLY'S House.

Enter CHARLES and MAJOR OAKLY.

Maj. O. Poor Charles! What a scene of confusion! I would give the world to have been there.

Charles. And I would give the world to have been any where else.—May wine be my poison, if ever I am drunk again!

Maj. O. Ay, ay, so every man says the next morning.

Charles. Where, where can she be? Her father would hardly carry her back to lady Freelove's, and he has no house in town himself, nor sir Harry—I don't know what to think—I'll go in search of her, though I don't know where to direct myself.

Enter WILLIAM.

Wil. A gentleman, sir, that calls himself captain O'Cutter, desires to speak with you.

Charles. Don't trouble me—I'll see no body—I'm not at home—

Wil. The gentleman says he has very particular business, and he must see you.

Charles. What's his name? Who did you say?

Wil. Captain O'Cutter, sir.

Charles. Captain O'Cutter! I never heard of him before. Do you know any thing of him, major?

Maj. O. Not I—But you hear he has particular business. I'll leave the room.

Charles. He can have no business that need be a secret to you.—Desire the captain to walk up.

[Exit William.]

Enter CAPTAIN O'CUTTER.

O'Cut. Jontlemen, your sarvant. Is either of your names Charles Oakly, esq.?

Charles. Charles Oakly, sir, is my name, if you have any business with it.

O'Cut. Avast, avast, my dear!—I have a little business with your name; but as I was to let nobody know it, I can't mention it till you clear the decks, fait.

[Pointing to the Major.]

Charles. This gentleman, sir, is my most intimate friend, and any thing that concerns me may be mentioned before him.

O'Cut. O, if he's your friend, my dear, we may do all above board. It's only about your deciding a deferance with my lord Trinket. He wants to show you a little warm work; and, as I was steering this way, he desired me to fetch you this letter.

[Gives a Letter.]

Maj. O. How, sir, a challenge!

O'Cut. Yes, fait, a challenge. I am to be his lordship's second; and if you are fond of a hot birth, and will come along with that jontleman, we'll all go to it together, and make a little line of battle a-head of our own, my dear.

Charles. [Reads] Ha! what's this? This may be useful.

[Aside.]

Maj. O. Sir, I am infinitely obliged to you.—A rare fellow this! [Aside] Yes, yes, I'll meet all the good company. I'll be there in my waistcoat and pumps, and take a morning's breathing with you. Are you very fond of fighting, sir?

O'Cut. Indeed, and I am; I love it better than grog.

Maj. O. But pray, sir, how are you interested in this difference? Do you know what it is about?

O'Cut. O, the devil burn me, not I. What signifies what it's about, you know? so we do but tilt a little.

Maj. O. What, fight, and not know for what?

O'Cut. When the signal's out for engaging, what signifies talking?

Maj. O. I fancy, sir, a duel's a common breakfast with you. I'll warrant now, you have been engaged in many such affairs.

O'Cut. Upon my shoul, and I have: sea or land, it's all one to little Terence O'Cutter.—When I was last in Dublin, I fought one jontleman for cheating me out of a thousand pounds; I fought two of the Mermaid's crew about Sally Macguire; tree about politics; and one about the playhouse in Smock Alley. But upon my fait, since I am in England, I have done noting at all, at all.

Charles. This is lucky—but my transport will discover me. [Aside]—Will you be so kind, sir, [To O'Cutter] as to make my compliments to his lordship, and assure him, that I shall do myself the honour of waiting on him.

O'Cut. Indeed, and I will.—Arrah, my dear, won't you come too? [To Major Oakly.]

Maj. O. Depend upon it, captain.—A very extraordinary fellow!

[Aside.]

Charles. Now to get my intelligence. [Aside]—I think, the time, sir, his lordship appoints in his letter, is—a—

O'Cut. You say right—Six o'clock.

Charles. And the place—a—a—is—I think, behind Montague House?

O'Cut. No, my dear!—Avast, by the ring in Ilydepark, 'fait—I settled it there myself, for faie of interruption.

Charles. True, as you say, the ring in Hyde-park—I had forgot—Very well, I'll not fail you, sir.

O'Cut. Devil burn me, nor I. Upon my shoul, little Terence O'Cutter will see fair play, or he'll know the reason—And so, my dear, your sarvant.—You'll not forget to come, my dear?

Maj. O. Ha, ha, ha! What a fellow!—He loves fighting like a game cock.

Charles. O uncle! the luckiest thing in the world!

Maj. O. What, to have the chance of being run through the body? I desire no such good fortune.

Charles. Wish me joy, wish me joy! I have found her, my dear girl, my Harriot!—She is at an inn in Holborn, major!

Maj. O. Ay! how do you know?

Charles. Why, this dear, delightful, charming, blundering captain has delivered me a wrong letter.

Maj. O. A wrong letter!

Charles. Yes, a letter from lord Trinket to lady Freelove.

Maj. O. The devil! What are the contents?

Charles. The news I told you just now, that she's at an inn in Holborn: and, besides, an excuse from my lord, for not waiting on her ladyship this morning according to his promise, as he shall be entirely taken up with his design upon Harriot.

Maj. O. So! so!—A plot between the lord and the lady.

Charles. There! read, read, man!

[Giving the Letter.]

Maj. O. [Reading] Um—um—um—Very fine! And what do you propose doing?

Charles. To go thither immediately.

Maj. O. Then you shall take me with you. Who knows what his lordship's designs may be? I begin to suspect foul play.

Charles. No, no; pray mind your own business. If I find there is any need of your assistance, I'll send for you.

Maj. O. You'll manage this affair like a boy, now—Go on rashly with noise and bustle, and fury, and get yourself into another scrape.

Charles. No—no—Let me alone; I'll go incog.—Leave my chariot at some distance—Proceed prudently, and take care of myself, I warrant you. I did not imagine that I should ever rejoice at receiving a challenge, but this is the most fortunate accident that could possibly have happened. B'ye, b'ye, uncle!

[Exit, hastily.]

Maj. O. I don't half approve of this—and yet I can hardly suspect his lordship of any very deep designs neither.—Charles may easily outwit him.—Harkye, William!

[At seeing William at some distance.]

Re-enter WILLIAM.

Wil. Sir!

Maj. O. Where's my brother?

Wil. In his study, sir.

Maj. O. Is he alone?

Wil. Yes, sir.

Maj. O. And how is he, William?

Wil. Pretty well, I believe, sir.

Maj. O. Ay, ay, but is he in good humour, or—

Wil. I never meddle in family affairs, not I, sir.

[Exit.]

Maj. O. Well said, William!—No bad hint for me, perhaps!—What a strange world we live in! No two people in it love one another better than my brother and sister, and yet the bitterest enemies could not torment each other more heartily.—However, yesterday, to give him his due, he behaved like a man. Keep it up, brother! keep it up! or it's all over with you. Since mischief is on foot, I'll even set forwards on all sides. I'll in to him directly, read him one of my morning lectures, and persuade him, if I possibly can, to go out with me immediately: or work him to some open act of rebellion against the sovereign authority of his lady wife. Zounds, brother! rant, and roar, and rave, and turn the house out of the window. If I was a husband!—'Sdeath, what a pity it is that nobody knows how to manage a wife but a bachelor.

[Exit.]

SCENE II.—The Bull and Gate Inn.

Enter HARRIOT.

Har. What will become of me? Among all my distresses, I must confess that Charles's behaviour yesterday is not the least. So wild! so given up to excesses! And yet—I am ashamed to own it even to myself—I love him: and death itself shall not prevail on me to give my hand to sir Harry—But here he comes! What shall I do with him?

Enter SIR HARRY BEAGLE.

Sir H. Your servant, miss!—What! Not speak!—Bashful, mayhap—Why then I will—Lookye, miss, I am a man of few words—What signifies haggling? It looks just like a dealer.—What d'ye think of me for a husband?—I am a tight young fellow—sound wind and limb—free from all natural blemishes—Rum<sup>1)</sup> all over, damme.

Har. Sir, I don't understand you. Speak English, and I'll give you an answer.

Sir H. English! Why so I do—and good plain English too.—What d'ye think of me for a husband?—That's English—e'nt it?—I know none of your French lingo, none of your parlyvoos, not I.—What d'ye think of me for a husband? The squire says you shall marry me.

Har. What shall I say to him? I had best be civil. [Aside]—I think, sir, you deserve a much better wife, and beg—

Sir H. Better! No, no,—though you're so knowing, I'm not to be taken in so.—You're a fine thing—Your points are all good<sup>2)</sup>.

Har. Sir Harry! Sincerity is above all ceremony. Excuse me, if I declare I never will be your wife.

Sir H. Hey! how! what! be off!—Why, it's a match, miss!—It's done and done on both sides<sup>3)</sup>.

Har. For heaven's sake, sir, withdraw your claim to me.—I never can be prevailed on—indeed I can't—

Sir H. What, make a match and then draw stakes! That's doing of nothing—Play or pay all the world over.

Har. I am determined not to marry you, at all events.

1) Good.

2) Expressions in speaking of a horse.

3) In making a bargain, or betting a wager, on the turf, it is customary to shake hands and say done.

Sir H. But your father's determined you shall, miss—So the odds are on my side.—I am not quite sure of my horse, but I have the rider hollow<sup>1)</sup>

Har. Your horse! sir—d'ye take me for—but I forgive you.—I beseech you, come into my proposal. It will be better for us both in the end.

Sir H. I can't be off<sup>2)</sup>.

Har. Let me entreat you.

Sir H. I tell you, it's impossible.

Har. Pray, pray do, sir.

Sir H. I can't, damme.

Har. I beseech you. [Sir Harry whistles]
How! laughed at?

Sir H. Will you marry me, dear Ally, Ally Croker?

Har. Marry you! I had rather be married to a slave, a wretch—You! [Walks about.]

Sir H. A fine going thing—She has a deal of foot<sup>3)</sup>—treads well upon her pasterns—goes above her ground—

Har. Peace, wretch!—Do you talk to me as if I were your horse?

Sir H. Horse! Why not speak of my horse? If your fine ladies had half as many good qualities, they would be much better bargains.

Har. And if their wretches of husbands liked them half so well as they do their horses, they would lead better lives.

Sir H. Mayhap so.—But what signifies talking to you?—The squire shall know your tricks—He'll doctor you.—I'll go and talk to him.

Har. Go any where, so that you go from me.

Sir H. He'll break you in—If you won't go in a snaffle, you must be put in a curb—He'll break you, damme. [Exit.]

Har. A wretch!—But I was to blame to suffer his brutal behaviour to ruffle my temper—I could expect nothing else from him, and he is below my anger.

Enter RUSSET.

Rus. Are not you a sad girl! a perverse, stubborn, obstinate—

Har. My dear sir—

Rus. Lookye, Harriot, don't speak,—you'll put me in a passion—Will you have him?—Answer me that—Why don't the girl speak?—Will you have him?

Har. Dearest sir, there is nothing in the world else—

Rus. Why there!—there!—Lookye there!—Zounds, you shall have him—Hussy, you shall have him—you shall marry him to-night—Did not you promise to receive him civilly?—How came you to affront him

Har. Sir, I did receive him very civilly; but his behaviour was so insolent and insupportable—

Rus. Insolent!—Zounds, I'll blow his brains out.—Insolent to my dear Harriot!—A rogue, a villain! a scoundrel! I'll—but it's a lie—I know it's a lie—He durst not behave insolent—Will you have him? Answer me that. Will you have him?—Zounds, you shall have him.

Har. If you have any love for me, sir—

Rus. Love for you!—You know I love you

—You know your poor fond father dotes on you to madness.—I would not force you, if I did not love you—Don't I want you to be happy?—But I know what you would have. You want young Oakly, a rakebelly, drunken—

Har. Release me from sir Harry, and if I ever marry against your consent, renounce me for ever.

Rus. I will renounce you, unless you'll have sir Harry.

Har. Consider, my dear sir, you'll make me miserable.—Absolve me from this hard command, and in every thing else it will be happiness to obey you.

Rus. You'll break my heart, Harriot, you'll break my heart—Make you miserable!—Don't I want to make you happy? Is not he the richest man in the county?—That will make you happy.—Don't all the pale-faced girls in the country long to get him?—And yet you are so perverse, and wayward, and stubborn—Zounds, you shall have him.

Har. For heaven's sake, sir—

Rus. Hold your tongue, Harriot!—I'll hear none of your nonsense.—You shall have him, I tell you, you shall have him—He shall marry you this very night—I'll go for a licence and a parson immediately. Zounds! Why do I stand arguing with you? An't I your father? Have not I a right to dispose of you? You shall have him.

Har. Sir!—

Rus. I won't hear a word. You shall have him. [Exit.]

Har. Sir!—Hear me!—but one word!—He will not hear me, and is gone to prepare for this odious marriage. I will die before I consent to it.

Enter CHARLES, in a Frock, etc.

Ha! What do I see? [Screaming.]

Charles. Peace, my love!—My dear life, make no noise! I have been hovering about the house this hour—I just now saw your father and sir Harry go out, and have seized this precious opportunity to throw myself at your feet.

Har. You have given yourself, sir, a great deal of needless trouble. I did not expect or hope for the favour of such a visit.

Charles. O, my Harriot, upbraid me, reproach me, do any thing but look and talk with that air of coldness and indifference. Let me, while their absence allows it, convey you from the brutal violence of a constrained marriage.

Har. No, I will wait the event, be it what it may;—Oh, Charles, I am too much inclined—they shan't force me to marry sir Harry—but your behaviour—Not half an hour ago, my father reproached me with the looseness of your character. [Weeping.]

Charles. I see my folly, and am ashamed of it;—you have reclaimed me, Harriot, on my soul you have. If all women were as attentive as yourself to the morals of their lovers, a libertine would be an uncommon character. But let me persuade you to leave this place while you may. Major Oakly will receive us at his house with pleasure. I am shocked at the thoughts of what your stay here may reserve you to.

Har. No, I am determined to remain. To

1) To have a person hollow, is to be sure of him.

2) To be off is the same as to hedge.

3) A good strong foot—Walks well on her houghs—lifts her feet gracefully from the ground.

leave my father again, to go off openly with a man, of whose libertine character he has himself so lately been a witness, would justify his anger, and impeach my reputation.

Enter Chambermaid.

Chamb. O law, ma'am!—Such a terrible accident!—As sure as I am here, there's a pressgang has seized the two gemmin, and is carrying them away, thof so be one an'em says as how he's a knight and baronight, and that t'other's a squire and a housekeeper.

Har. Seized by a pressgang! impossible!

Charles. Oh, now the design comes out.—But I'll balk his lordship.

Chamb. Lack-a-daisy, ma'am, what can we do? There is master, and John Ostler, and Bootcatcher, all gone a'ter'em.—There is such an uproar as never was! [Exit.

Har. If I thought this was your contrivance, sir, I would never speak to you again.

Charles. I would sooner die than be guilty of it.—This is lord Trinket's doing, I am sure. I knew he had some scheme in agitation, by a letter I intercepted this morning. [Harriot screams] Ha! here he comes. Nay, then, it's plain enough. Don't be frightened, my love! I'll protect you. But now I must desire you to follow my directions.

Enter LORD TRINKET.

Lord T. Now, madam.—Pox on't, be here again!—Nay then, [Draws] come, sir! You're unarm'd, I see. Give up the lady: give her up, I say, or I am through you in a twinkling. [Going to make a Pass at Charles.

Charles. Keep your distance, my lord! I have arms. [Produces a Pistol] If you come a foot nearer, you have a brace off balls through your lordship's head.

Lord T. How? what's this? pistols!

Charles. At your lordship's service.—Sword and pistol, my lord.—Those, you know, are our weapons.—If this misses, I have the fellow to it in my pocket.—Don't be frightened, madam. His lordship has removed your friends and relations, but he will take great care of you. Shall I leave you with him?

Har. Cruel Charles! you know I must go with you now.

Charles. A little way from the door, if your lordship pleases. [Waves his Hand.

Lord T. Sir!—'Sdeath!—Madam!—

Charles. A little more round, my lord. [Waves.

Lord T. But, sir!—Mr. Oakly!

Charles. I have no leisure to talk with your lordship now.—A little more that way, if you please. [Waves]—You know where I live.—If you have any commands for miss Russet, you will hear of her too at my house.—Nay, keep back, my lord. [Presents] Your lordship's most obedient, humble servant.

[Exit, with Harriot.

ACT V.

SCENE I.—LADY FREELOVE'S House.

Enter LORD TRINKET, LADY FREELOVE, with a Letter, and CAPTAIN O'CUTTER.

Lord T. Was ever any thing so unfortunate! Plague on't, captain, how could you make such a strange blunder?

O'Cut. I never thought of a blunder. I was to deliver two letters; and if I gave them one a piece, I thought it would do.

Lady F. And so, my lord, the ingenious captain gave the letter intended for me to young Oakly, and here has brought me a challenge.

Lord T. Ridiculous! Never was any thing so mal apropos.—Did you read the direction, captain?

O'Cut. VWho, me?—Devil burn me, not I. I never rade at all.

Lord T. 'Sdeath! how provoking! VWhen I had secured the servants, and got all the people out of the way—when every thing was en train.

Lady F. Nay, never despair, my lord! I've hit upon a method to set every thing to rights again.

Lord T. How? how? my dear lady Free-love, how?

Lady F. Suppose then your lordship was to go and deliver these country gentlemen from their confinement; make them believe it was a plot of young Oakly's to carry off my niece; and so make a merit of your own services with the father.

Lord T. Admirable! I'll about it immediately.

O'Cut. Has your lordship any occasion for my sarvice in this expedition?

Lord T. O, no—Only release me these people, and then keep out of the way, dear captain.

O'Cut. VWith all my heart, 'fait. But you are all wrong:—this will not signify a brass farding. If you would let me alone, I would give him a salt eel<sup>1</sup>), I warrant you.—But upon my credit, there's noting to be done without a little tilting. [Exit.

Lord T. But where shall I carry them, when I have delivered them?

Lady F. To Mr. Oakly's, by all means; you may be sure my niece is there.

Lord T. To Mr. Oakly's!—VWhy, does your ladyship consider! 'Tis going directly in the fire of the enemy—throwing the dementi full in their teeth.

Lady F. So much the better. Face your enemies—nay, you shall outface them too. I'll certainly meet you there. It's hard indeed if two persons of condition can't bear themselves out against such trumpery folks as the family of the Oakly's.

Lord T. Odious low people! But I lose time—I must after the captain—and so, till we meet at Mr. Oakly's, I kiss your ladyship's hands—you won't fail me?

Lady F. You may depend on me. [Exit Lord Trinket] So, here is fine work! this artful little hussy has been too much for us all. VWell, what's to be done? VWhy, when a woman of fashion gets into a scrape, nothing but a fashionable assurance can get her out of it again. I'll e'en go boldly to Mr. Oakly's, as I have promised, and if it appears practicable, I will forward lord Trinket's match; but if I find that matters have taken another turn, his lordship must excuse me. In that case, I'll fairly drop him, seem a perfect stranger to all his intentions, and give my visit an air of congratulation to my niece and any other husband, which fortune, her wise father, or her ridiculous self has provided for her. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—MRS. OAKLY'S Dressing-room.

Enter MRS. OAKLY.

Mrs. O. This is worse and worse!—He never held me so much in contempt before—To go out without speaking to me, or taking the least notice.—I am obliged to the major for this.—How could he take him out? and how could Mr. Oakly go with him?—

Enter TOILET.

Well, Toilet.

Toil. My master is not come back yet, ma'am.

Mrs. O. Where is he gone?

Toil. I don't know, I can assure your ladyship.

Mrs. O. Why don't you know?—You know nothing.—But I warrant you know well enough, if you would tell.—You shall never persuade me but you knew of Mr. Oakly's going out to-day.

Toil. I wish I may die, ma'am, upon my honour, and I protest to your ladyship I knew nothing in the world of the matter, no more than the child unborn. There is Mr. Paris, my master's gentleman, knows—

Mrs. O. What does he know?

Toil. That I knew nothing at all of the matter.

Mrs. O. Where is Paris? What is he doing?

Toil. He is in my master's room, ma'am.

Mrs. O. Bid him come here.

Toil. Yes, ma'am. [Exit.]

Mrs. O. He is certainly gone after this young flirt.—His confidence and the major's insolence provoke me beyond expression.

Re-enter TOILET, with PARIS.

Where's your master?

Par. Il est sorti. He is gone out.

Mrs. O. Where is he gone?

Par. Ah, madame, je n'en sçais rien. I know nothing of it.

Mrs. O. Nobody knows any thing. Why did not you tell me he was going out?

Par. I dress him—Je ne m'en soucie pas du plus—He go where he will—I have no business with it.

Mrs. O. Yes, you should have told me—that was your business—and if you don't mind your business better, you shan't stay here, I can tell you, sir.

Par. Voila quelque chose d'extraordinaire!

Mrs. O. Don't stand jabbering and shrugging your shoulders, but go (and inquire—go—and bring me word where he is gone.

Par. I don't know what I am do.

Mrs. O. Bid John come to me.

Par. De tout mon cœur.—Jean! ici! Jean!—speak, my lady. [Exit.]

Mrs. O. Impudent fellow! His insolent gravity and indifference is insupportable—Toilet!

Toil. Ma'am!

Mrs. O. Where's John? Why don't he come? Why do you stand with your hands before you? Why don't you fetch him?

Toil. Yes, ma'am, I'll go this minute.—O here, John! my lady wants you.

Enter JOHN.

Mrs. O. Where's your master?

John. Gone out, madam.

Mrs. O. Why did not you go with him?

John. Because he went out in the major's chariot, madam.

Mrs. O. Where did they go to?

John. To the major's, I suppose, madam.

Mrs. O. Suppose! Don't you know?

John. I believe so, but can't tell for certain, indeed, madam.

Mrs. O. Believe and suppose!—and don't know, and can't tell!—You are all fools.—Go about your business. [John going] Come here. [Returns] Go to the major's—no—it does not signify—go along—[John going] Yes, harkye, [Returns] go to the major's, and see if your master is there.

John. Give your compliments, madam?

Mrs. O. My compliments, blockhead! Get along. [John going] Come hither. [Returns] Can't you go to the major's, and bring me word if Mr. Oakly is there, without taking any further notice?

John. Yes, ma'am.

Mrs. O. Well, why don't you go then? And make haste back.—And, d'ye hear, John?

[John going, returns.]

John. Madam!

Mrs. O. Nothing at all—go along—[John goes] How uneasy Mr. Oakly makes me!—Harkye, John! [John returns.]

John. Madam!

Mrs. O. Send the porter here.

John. Yes, madam. [Exit.]

Toil. So, she's in a rare humour! I shall have a fine time on't. [Aside] Will your ladyship choose to dress?

Mrs. O. Pr'ythee, creature, don't tease me with your fiddle-faddle stuff—I have a thousand things to think of.—Where is the porter? why has not that booby sent him? What is the meaning—

Re-enter JOHN.

John. Madam, my master is this moment returned, with major Oakly, and my young master, and the lady that was here yesterday.

Mrs. O. Very well. [Exit John] Returned—yes, truly, he is returned—and in a very extraordinary manner. This is setting me at open defiance. But I'll go down, and show them I have too much spirit to endure such usage. [Going] Or, stay—I'll not go amongst his company—I'll go out—Toilet!

Toil. Ma'am!

Mrs. O. Order the coach; I'll go out. [Toilet going] Toilet, stay—I'll e'en go down to them—No—Toilet!

Toil. Ma'am!

Mrs. O. Order me a boiled chicken—I'll not go down to dinner—I'll dine in my own room, and sup there—I'll not see his face these three days. [Exeunt.]

Enter OAKLY, MAJOR OAKLY, CHARLES, and HARRIOT.

Charles. My dear Harriot, do not make yourself so uneasy.

Har. Alas! I have too much cause for my uneasiness. Who knows what that vile lord has done with my father?

Oak. Be comforted, madam; we shall soon hear of Mr. Russet, and all will be well, I dare say.

Har. You are too good to me, sir; I shall never forgive myself for having disturbed the peace of such a worthy family.

Maj. O. Don't mind that, madam; they'll be very good friends again. This is nothing among married people—'Sdeath, here she is!—No—its only Mrs. Toilet.

Re-enter TOILET.

Oak. Well, Toilet, what now? [Toilet whispers] Not well?—Can't come down to dinner?—Wants to see me above?—Harkye, brother, what shall I do?

Maj. O. If you go, you are undone.

Har. Go, sir, go to Mrs. Oakly—Indeed you had better—

Maj. O. 'Sdeath, brother, don't budge a foot—This is all fractiousness and ill humour—

Oak. No, I'll not go—Tell her I have company, and we shall be glad to see her here.

[Exit Toilet.]

Maj. O. That's right.

Oak. Suppose I go and watch how she proceeds?

Maj. O. What d'ye mean? You would not go to her? Are you mad?

Oak. By no means go to her—I only want to know how she takes it. I'll lie perdue in my study, and observe her motions.

Maj. O. I don't like this pitiful ambuscade work—this bush fighting. Why can't you stay here?—Ay, ay!—I know how it will be—She'll come bounce in upon you with a torrent of anger and passion, or, if necessary a whole flood of tears, and carry all before her at once.

Oak. You shall find that you are mistaken, major. Now I am convinced I'm in the right, I'll support that right with ten times your steadiness.

Maj. O. You talk this well, brother.

Oak. I'll do it well, brother.

Maj. O. If you don't, you are undone.

Oak. Never fear, never fear.

[Exit.]

Maj. O. Well, Charles.

Charles. I can't bear to see my Harriot so uneasy. I'll go immediately in quest of Mr. Russet. Perhaps I may learn at the inn where his lordship's ruffians have carried him.

Rus. [Without] Here! Yes, yes, I know she's here well enough. Come along, sir Harry, come along.

Har. He's here!—My father; I know his voice. Where is Mr. Oakly? O, now, good sir, [To the Major], do but pacify him, and you'll be a friend indeed.

Enter RUSSET, LORD TRINKET, and SIR HARRY BEAGLE.

Lord T. There, sir—I told you it was so!

Rus. Ay, ay, it is too plain.—O you provoking slut! Elopement after elopement!—And at last to have your father carried off by violence! to endanger my life! Zounds! I am so angry I dare not trust myself within reach of you.

Charles. I can assure you, sir, that your daughter is entirely—

Rus. You assure me! You are the fellow that has perverted her mind—That has set my own child against me—

Charles. If you will but hear me, sir—

Rus. I won't hear a word you say. I'll have my daughter—I won't hear a word.

Maj. O. Nay, Mr. Russet, hear reason. If you will but have patience—

Rus. I'll have no patience, I'll have my daughter, and she shall marry sir Harry to-night.

Lord T. That is dealing rather too much en cavalier with me, Mr. Russet, 'pon honour. You take no notice of my pretensions, though my rank and family—

Rus. What care I for rank and family? I don't want to make my daughter a rantipole woman of quality. I'll give her to whom I please. Take her away, sir Harry; she shall marry you to-night.

Maj. O. Only three words, Mr. Russet—

Rus. Why don't the booby take her?

Sir H. Hold hard! Hold hard!<sup>1)</sup> You are all on a wrong seent; Hold hard! I say, hold hard!—Harkye, squire Russet.

Rus. Well, what now?

Sir H. It was proposed, you know, to match me with miss Harriot—But she can't take kindly to me.—When one has made a bad bet, it is best to hedge off, you know—and so I have e'en swopped<sup>2)</sup> her with lord Trinket here for his brown horse, Nabob.

Rus. Swopped her? Swopped my daughter for a horse! Zounds, sir, what d'ye mean?

Sir H. Mean? Why I mean to be off, to be sure—It won't do—I tell you it won't do—First of all I knocked up myself and my horses, when they took for London—and now I have been stewed aboard a tender—I have wasted three stone at least—If I could have rid my match it would not have grieved me—And so, as I said before, I have swopped her for Nabob.

Rus. The devil take Nabob, and yourself, and lord Trinket, and—

Lord T. Pardon! je vous demande pardon, monsieur Russet, 'pon honour.

Rus. Death and the devil! I shall go distracted! My daughter plotting against me—the—

Maj. O. Come, come, Mr. Russet, I am your man after all. Give me but a moment's hearing, and I'll engage to make peace between you and your daughter, and throw the blame where it ought to fall most deservedly.

Sir H. Ay, ay, that's right. Put the saddle on the right horse, my buck!

Rus. Well, sir—What d'ye say?—Speak—I don't know what to do.

Maj. O. I'll speak the truth, let who will be offended by it.—I have proof presumptive and positive for you, Mr. Russet. From his lordship's behaviour at lady Freelove's, when my nephew rescued her, we may fairly conclude that he would stick at no measures to carry his point—there's proof presumptive.—But, sir, we can give you proof positive too—proof under his lordship's own hand, that he likewise was the contriver of the gross affront that has just been offered you.

<sup>2)</sup> Exchanged.

Rus. Hey! how?

Lord T. Every syllable romance, 'pon honour.

Maj. O. Gospel, every word on't.

Charles. This letter will convince you, sir! In consequence of what happened at lady Freelove's, his lordship thought fit to send me a challenge; but the messenger blundered, and gave me this letter instead of it: [Giving the Letter] I have the case which enclosed it in my pocket.

Lord T. Forgery from beginning to end, 'pon honour.

Maj. O. Truth, upon my honour.—But read, read, Mr. Russet, read, and be convinced.

Rus. Let me see—let me see—[Reads]—Um—um—um—um—so, so—um—um—um—damnation!—Wish me success—obedient slave—TRINKET—Fire and fury! How dare you do this?

Lord T. When you are cool, Mr. Russet, I will explain this matter to you.

Rus. Cool! 'Sdeath and hell!—I'll never be cool again—I'll be revenged—So my Harriot, my dear girl, is innocent at last. Say so, my Harriot; tell me you are innocent.

[Embraces her.]

Har. I am indeed, sir, and happy beyond expression at your being convinced of it.

Rus. I am glad on't—I am glad on't—I believe you, Harriot!—You was always a good girl.

Maj. O. So she is, an excellent girl!—Worth a regiment of such lords and baronets—Come, sir, finish every thing handsomely at once.—Come, Charles will have a handsome fortune.

Rus. Marry!—she durst not do it.

Maj. O. Consider, sir, they have long been fond of each other—old acquaintance—faithful lovers—turtles—and may be very happy.

Rus. Well, well—since things are so—I love my girl.—Harkye, young Oakley, if you don't make her a good husband, you'll break my heart, you rogue.

Maj. O. I'll cut his throat if he don't.

Charles. Do not doubt it, sir! my Harriot has reformed me altogether.

Rus. Has she?—Why then—there—heaven bless you both—there—now there's an end on't.

Sir H. So, my lord, you and I are both distanced<sup>1)</sup>—A hollow thing, damme.

Lord T. N'importe.

Sir H. Now this stake is drawn, my lord may be for hedging off, mayhap. Ecod! I'll go to Jack Speed's, secure Nabob, and be out of town in an hour. [Aside, and exit.]

Enter LADY FREELOVE.

Lady F. My dear miss Russet, you'll excuse—

Charles. Mrs. Oakly, at your ladyship's service.

Lady F. Married?

Har. Not, yet, madam; but my father has been so good as to give his consent.

Lady F. I protest I am prodigiously glad of it. My dear, I give you joy—and you, Mr. Oakly.—I wish you joy, Mr. Russet and all the good company—for I think the most of them are parties concerned.

Maj. O. How easy, impudent, and familiar!

[Aside.]

Lady F. Lord Trinket here too! I vow I did not see your lordship before.

Lord T. Your ladyship's most obedient slave.

[Bowing.]

Lady F. You seem grave, my lord! Come, come, I know there has been some difference between you and Mr. Oakley—You must give me leave to be a mediator in this affair.

Lord T. Here has been a small fracas, to be sure, madam!—We are all blown<sup>1)</sup>, 'pon honour.

Lady F. Blown! what do you mean, my lord?

Lord T. Nay, your ladyship knows that I never mind these things, and I know that they never discompose your ladyship—But things have happened a little en travers—The little billet I sent your ladyship has fallen into the hands of that gentleman—[Pointing to Charles]—and so there has been a little brouillerie about it—that's all.

Lady F. You talk to me, my lord, in a very extraordinary style—If you have been guilty of any misbehaviour, I am sorry for it; but your ill conduct can fasten no imputation on me.—Miss Russet will justify me sufficiently.

Maj. O. Had not your ladyship better appeal to my friend Charles here?—The letter, Charles!—Out with it this instant!

Charles. Yes, I have the credentials of her ladyship's integrity in my pocket.—Mr. Russet, the letter you read a little while ago was enclosed in this cover, which also I now think it my duty to put into your hands.

Rus. [Reading] To the Right Honourable Lady Freelove—'Sdeath and hell!—and now I recollect, the letter itself was pieced with scraps of French, and madam, and your ladyship—Fire and fury! madam, how came you to use me so? I am obliged to you, then, for the insult that has been offered me!

Lady F. What is all this? Your obligations to me, Mr. Russet, are of a nature, that—

Rus. Fine obligations! I dare say, I am partly obliged to you too for the attempt on my daughter by that thing of a lord yonder at your house. Zounds, madam! these are injuries never to be forgiven—They are the grossest affronts to me and my family—All the world shall know them—Zounds!—I'll—

Lady F. Mercy on me! how boisterous are these country gentlemen! Why, really, Mr. Russet, you rave like a man in Bedlam—I am afraid you'll beat me—and then you swear most abominably.—How can you be so vulgar?—I see the meaning of this low malice—But the reputations of women of quality are not so easily impeached—My rank places me above the scandal of little people, and I shall meet such petty insolence with the greatest ease and tranquillity. But you and your simple girl will be the sufferers—I had some thoughts of introducing her into the first company—But now, madam, I shall neither receive nor return your visits, and will entirely withdraw my protection from the ordinary part of the family, [Exit.]

<sup>1)</sup> In racing one horse gets to the winning-post before another, and being at distance before the other thus distances him.

<sup>2)</sup> What we would do is made public.

Lord T. Fine presence of mind, faith!—The true French nonchalance—But, good folks, why such a deal of rout and tapage about nothing at all?—If mademoiselle Harriot had rather be Mrs. Oakly than lady Trinket—Why—I wish her joy—that's all.—Mr. Russet, I wish you joy of your son-in-law—Mr. Oakly, I wish you joy of the lady—and you, madam, [To Harriot] of the gentleman—And, in short, I wish you all joy of one another, 'pon honour! [Exit.]

Rus. There's a fine fellow of a lord now! The devil's in your London folks of the first fashion, as you call them. They will rob you of your estate, debauch your daughter, or lie with your wife—and all as if they were doing you a favour—'pon honour!—

Maj. O. Hey! what now?

[Bell rings violently.]

Re-enter OAKLY.

Oak. D'ye hear, major, d'ye hear?

Maj. O. Zounds! what a clatter!—She'll pull down all the bells in the house.

Oak. My observations since I left you, have confirmed my resolution. I see plainly that her good humour, and her ill humour, her smiles, her tears, and her fits, are all calculated to play upon me.

Maj. O. Did not I always tell you so? It's the way with them all—they will be rough and smooth, and hot and cold, and all in a breath. Any thing to get the better of us.

Oak. She is in all moods at present, I promise you—There has she been in her chamber, fuming and fretting, and dispatching a messenger to me every two minutes—servant after servant—now she insists on my coming to her—now again she writes a note to entreat—then Toilet is sent to let me know that she is ill, absolutely dying—then the very next minute, she'll never see my face again—she'll go out of the house directly. [Bell rings] Again! now the storm rises!—

Maj. O. It will soon drive this way then—now, brother, prove yourself a man—You have gone too far to retreat.

Oak. Retreat!—Retreat!—No, no!—I'll preserve the advantage I have gained, I am determined.

Maj. O. Ay, ay!—keep your ground!—fear nothing—up with your noble heart! Good discipline makes good soldiers; stick close to my advice, and you may stand buff to a tigress—

Oak. Here she is, by heavens! now, brother!

Maj. O. And now, brother!—Now or never!

Re-enter MRS. OAKLY.

Mrs. O. I think, Mr. Oakly, you might have had humanity enough to have come to see how I did. You have taken your leave, I suppose, of all tenderness and affection—but I'll be calm—I'll not throw myself into a passion—you want to drive me out of your house—I see what you aim at, and will be beforehand with you—let me keep my temper! I'll send for a chair, and leave the house this instant.

Oak. True, my love: I knew you would not think of dining in your chamber alone, when I had company below. You shall sit at the head of the table, as you ought, to be sure, as you say, and make my friends welcome.

Mrs. O. Excellent raillery! Lookye, Mr. Oakly, I see the meaning of all this affected coolness and indifference.

Oak. My dear, consider where you are—

Mrs. O. You would be glad, I find, to get me out of your house, and have all your flirts about you.

Oak. Before all this company! Fie!

Mrs. O. But I'll disappoint you, for I shall remain in it, to support my due authority—as for you, major Oakly—

Maj. O. Hey-day! What have I done?

Mrs. O. I think you might find better employment, than to create divisions between married people—and you, sir!

Oak. Nay but, my dear!—

Mrs. O. Might have more sense, as well as tenderness, than to give ear to such idle stuff.

Oak. Lord, Lord!

Mrs. O. You and your wise counsellor there, I suppose, think to carry all your points with me—

Oak. Was ever any thing—

Mrs. O. But it won't do, sir. You shall find that I will have my own way, and that I will govern my own family.

Oak. You had better learn to govern yourself, by half. Your passion makes you ridiculous. Did ever any body see so much fury and violence; affronting your best friends, breaking my peace, and disconcerting your own temper. And all for what? For nothing. 'Sdeath, madam! at these years you ought to know better.

Mrs. O. At these years!—Very fine!—Am I to be talked to in this manner?

Oak. Talked to!—Why not?—You have talked to me long enough—almost talked me to death—and I have taken it all, in hopes of making you quiet—but all in vain. Patience, I find, is all thrown away upon you; and henceforward, come what may, I am resolved to be master of my own house.

Mrs. O. So, so!—Master, indeed!—Yes, sir; and you'll take care to have mistresses enough too, I warrant you.

Oak. Perhaps I may; but they shall be quiet ones, I can assure you.

Mrs. O. Indeed!—And do you think I am such a tame fool, as to sit quietly and bear all this? You shall know, sir, that I will resent this behaviour—You shall find that I have a spirit—

Oak. Of the devil.

Mrs. O. Intolerable!—You shall find then that I will exert that spirit. I am sure I have need of it. As soon as the house is once cleared again, I'll shut my doors against all company.—You shan't see a single soul for this month.

Oak. 'Sdeath, madam, but I will!—I'll keep open house for a year.—I'll send cards to the whole town—Mr. Oakly's rout!—All the world will come—and I'll go among the world too—I'll be mewed up no longer.

Mrs. O. Provoking insolence! This is not to be endured—Lookye, Mr. Oakly—

Oak. And lookye, Mrs. Oakly, I will have my own way.

Mrs. O. Nay, then let me tell you, sir—

Oak. And let me tell you, madam, I will not be crossed—I won't be made a fool.

Mrs. O. Why, you won't let me speak.

Oak. Because you don't speak as you ought. Madam, madam! you shan't look; nor walk, nor talk, nor think, but as I please.

Mrs. O. Was there ever such a monster! I can bear this no longer. [Bursts into Tears] O you vile man! I can see through your design—you cruel, barbarous, inhuman—such usage to your poor wife!—you'll be the death of her.

Oak. She shan't be the death of me, I am determined.

Mrs. O. That it should ever come to this!—To be contradicted—[Sobbing]—insulted—abused—hated—'tis too much—my heart will burst with—oh—oh!—

[Falls into a Fit. Harriot, Charles, etc. run to her assistance.]

Oak. [Interposing] Let her alone.

Har. Sir, Mrs. Oakly—

Charles. For heaven's sake, sir, she will be—

Oak. Let her alone—let her alone.

Har. Pray, my dear sir, let us assist her. She may—

Oak. I don't care—Let her alone, I say.

Mrs. O. [Rising] O, you monster!—you villain!—you base man!—Would you let me die for want of help?—would you—

Oak. Bless me! madam, your fit is very violent—take care of yourself.

Mrs. O. Despised, ridiculed—but I'll be revenged—you shall see, sir—

Oak. Tol-de-rol lol-de-rol lol-de-rol lol.

[Singing.]

Mrs. O. What, am I made a jest of? Exposed to all the world?—If there's law or justice—

Oak. Tol-de-rol lol-de-rol lol-de-rol lol.

[Singing.]

Mrs. O. I shall burst with anger.—Have a care, sir; you may repent this.—Scorned and made ridiculous!—No power on earth shall hinder my revenge!

[Going.]

Har. [Interposing] Stay, madam.

Mrs. O. Let me go. I cannot bear this place.

Har. Let me beseech you, madam.

Maj. O. Courage, brother! you have done wonders.

[Apart.]

Oak. I think she'll have no more fits. [Apart.]

[Apart.]

Har. Stay, madam—Pray stay but one moment. I have been a painful witness of your uneasiness, and in great part the innocent occasion of it. Give me leave then—

Mrs. O. I did not expect, indeed, to have found you here again. But however—

Har. I see the agitation of your mind, and it makes me miserable. Suffer me to tell the real truth. I can explain every thing to your satisfaction.

Mrs. O. May be so—I cannot argue with you.

Charles. Pray, madam, hear her—for my sake—for your own—dear madam!

Mrs. O. Well, well—proceed.

Har. I understand, madam, that your first alarm was occasioned by a letter from my father to your nephew.

Rus. I was in a bloody passion, to be sure, madam!—The letter was not over civil, I believe.—I did not know but the young rogue had ruined my girl. But it's all over now, and so—

Mrs. O. You was here yesterday, sir?

Rus. Yes; I came after Harriot. I thought I should find my young madam with my young sir here.

Mrs. O. With Charles, did you say, sir?

Rus. Ay, with Charles, madam! The young rogue has been fond of her a long time, and she of him, it seems.

Mrs. O. I fear I have been to blame. [Aside.]

Rus. I ask pardon, madam, for the disturbance I made in your house.

Har. And the abrupt manner in which I came into it demands a thousand apologies. But the occasion must be my excuse.

Mrs. O. How have I been mistaken! [Aside] But did not I overhear you and Mr. Oakly—

[To Harriot.]

Har. Dear madam! you had but a partial hearing of our conversation. It related entirely to this gentleman.

Charles. To put it beyond doubt, madam, Mr. Russet and my guardian have consented to our marriage; and we are in hopes that you will not withhold your approbation.

Mrs. O. I have no further doubt—I see you are innocent, and it was cruel to suspect you—You have taken a load of anguish off my mind—and yet your kind interposition comes too late; Mr. Oakly's love for me is entirely destroyed.

[Weeping.]

Oak. I must go to her—

[Apart.]

Maj. O. Not yet!—Not yet!

[Apart.]

Har. Do not disturb yourself with such apprehensions; I am sure Mr. Oakly loves you most affectionately.

Oak. I can hold no longer. [Going to her] My affection for you, madam, is as warm as ever. My constrained behaviour has cut me to the soul—for it was all constrained—and it was with the utmost difficulty that I was able to support it.

Mrs. O. O, Mr. Oakly, how have I exposed myself! What low arts has my jealousy induced me to practise! I see my folly, and fear that you can never forgive me.

Oak. Forgive you!—This change transports me!—Brother! Mr. Russet! Charles! Harriot! give me joy!—I am the happiest man in the world!

Maj. O. Joy, much joy, to you both! though, by-the-by, you are not a little obliged to me for it. Did not I tell you I would cure all the disorders in your family? I beg pardon, sister, for taking the liberty to prescribe for you. My medicines have been somewhat rough, I believe, but they have had an admirable effect, and so don't be angry with your physician.

Mrs. O. I am indeed obliged to you, and I feel—

Oak. Nay, my dear, no more of this. All that's past must be utterly forgotten.

Mrs. O. I have not merited this kindness, but it shall hereafter be my study to deserve it. Away with all idle jealousies! And since my suspicions have hitherto been groundless, I am resolved for the future never to suspect at all.

[Exeunt.]

THE DOUBLE DEALER,

Comedy by W. Congreve, acted at the Theatre Royal 1692. This is the second play this author wrote; the characters of it are strongly drawn, the wit is genuine and original; the plot finely laid, and the conduct inimitable: yet such is, and ever has been, the capricious disposition of audiences, that it met not equal encouragement with his Old Bachelor (in some respects a much more exceptionable play), nor had it the same success with his later performances.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A Gallery in LORD TOUCHWOOD'S House.

CARELESS crosses the Stage, as just risen from Table; MELLEFONT following.

Mel. NED, Ned, whither so fast? What, turned flincher? <sup>1)</sup> Why, you wo'ndt leave us?

Care. Where are the women? I'm weary of drinking, and begin to think them the better company.

Mel. Then thy reason staggers, and thou'rt almost tipsy.

Care. No, faith, but your fools grow noisy; and if a man must endure the noise of words without sense, I think the women have more musical voices, and become nonsense better.

Mel. Why, they are at the end of the gallery, retired to their tea and scandal. But I made a pretence to follow you, because I had something to say to you in private, and I am not like to have many opportunities this evening.

Care. And here's this coxcomb most critically come to interrupt you,

Enter BRISK.

Brisk. Boys, boys, lads, where are you? What, do you give ground? Mortgage for a bottle, ha? Careless, this is your trick; you're always spoiling company by leaving it.

Care. And thou art always spoiling company by coming into't.

Brisk. Pho! ha, ha, ha! I know you envy me. Spite, proud spite, by the gods, and burning envy. I'll be judged by Mellefont here, who gives and takes raillery better, you or I. Pshaw, man, when I say you spoil company by leaving it, I mean you leave nobody for the company to laugh at. I think there I was with you. Ha, Mellefont?

Mel. O'my word, Brisk, that was a home thrust: you have silenced him.

Brisk. O, my dear Mellefont, let me perish, if thou art not the soul of conversation, the very essence of wit, and spirit of wine. The deuce take me, if there were three good things said, or one understood, since thy amputation from the body of our society. He! I think, that's pretty, and metaphorical enough:

<sup>1)</sup> To be afraid of drinking half a dozen bottles of claret at a sitting, used to be called flinching from your bottle; but very happily at the present day, drinking is not one of the necessary accomplishments; and a party of Englishmen can meet together now, enjoy themselves, and separate, without being any thing more than a little merry.

'egad, I could not have said it out of thy company. Careless, ha?

Care. Hum, ay, what is't?

Brisk. O mon coeur! What is't? Nay, 'gad, I'll punish you for want of apprehension: the deuce take me, if I tell you.

Mel. No, no, hang him, he has no taste. But, dear Brisk, excuse me; I have a little business.

Care. Pr'ythee, get thee gone; thou seest we are serious.

Mel. We'll come immediately, if you'll but go in and keep up good humour and sense in the company; pr'ythee do, they'll fall asleep else.

Brisk. 'Egad, so they will. Well, I will, I will: 'gad, you shall command me from the zenith to the nadir. But, the deuce take me, if I say a good thing till you come. But pr'ythee, dear rogue, make haste; pr'ythee, make haste, I shall burst else; and yonder your uncle, my lord Touchwood, swears he'll disinherit you; and Sir Paul Pliant threatens to disclaim you for a son-in-law; and my lord Froth won't dance at your wedding to-morrow; nor, the deuce take me, I won't write your epithalamium; and see what a condition you're like to be brought to.

Mel. Well, I'll speak but three words, and follow you.

Brisk. Enough, enough. Careless, bring your apprehension along with you. [Exit.]

Care. Pert coxcomb!

Mel. Faith, 'tis a good-natured coxcomb, and has very entertaining follies; you must be more humane to him; at this juncture it will do me service. I'll tell you, I would have mirth continued this day at any rate, though patience purchase folly, and attention be paid with noise: there are times when sense may be unseasonable, as well as truth: pr'ythee, do thou wear none to-day; but allow Brisk to have wit, that thou may'st seem a fool.

Care. Why, how now? Why this extravagant proposition?

Mel. O, I would have no room for serious design, for I am jealous of a plot. I would have noise and impertinence, to keep my lady Touchwood's head from working.

Care. I thought your fear of her had been over. Is not to-morrow appointed for your marriage with Cynthia? and her father, sir Paul Pliant, come to settle the writings this day, on purpose?

Mel. True; but you shall judge whether I have not reason to be alarmed. None, besides you and Maskwell, are acquainted with the secret of my aunt Touchwood's violent passion for me. Since my first refusal of her addresses, she has endeavoured to do me all ill offices with my uncle; yet has managed 'em with that subtilty, that to him they have borne the face of kindness; while her malice, like a dark lantern, only shone upon me where it was directed; but, whether urg'd by her despair, and the short prospect of time she saw to accomplish her designs, whether the hopes of revenge, or of her love, terminated in the view of this my marriage with Cynthia, I know not; but this morning she surprised me in my own chamber.

Care. Was there ever such a fury? Well, bless us! proceed. What followed?

Mel. It was long before either of us spoke; passion had tied her tongue, and amazement mine. In short, the consequence was thus; she omitted nothing that the most violent love could urge, or tender words express; which when she saw had no effect, but still I pleaded honour and nearness of blood to my uncle, then came the storm I fear'd at first; for, starting from my bedside, like a fury she flew to my sword, and with much ado I prevented her doing me or herself a mischief. Having disarmed her, in a gust of passion she left me, and in a resolution, confirmed by a thousand curses, not to close her eyes till they had seen my ruin.

Care. Exquisite woman! But, what the devil, does she think thou hast no more sense than to disinherit thyself? For, as I take it, this settlement upon you is with a proviso that your uncle have no children.

Mel. It is so. Well, the service you are to do me, will be a pleasure to yourself: I must get you to engage my lady Pliant all this evening, that my pious aunt may not work her to her interest: and if you chance to secure her to yourself, you may incline her to mine. She's handsome, and knows it; is very silly, and thinks she has sense; and has an old fond husband.

Care. I confess a very fair foundation for a lover to build upon.

Mel. For my lord Froth, he and his wife will be sufficiently taken up with admiring one another, and Brisk's gallantry, as they call it. I'll observe my uncle myself; and Jack Maskwell has promised me to watch my aunt narrowly, and give me notice upon any suspicion. As for sir Paul, my wise father-in-law that is to be, my dear Cynthia has such a share in his fatherly fondness, he would scarce make her a moment uneasy to have her happy hereafter.

Care. So, you have manned your works: but I wish you may not have the weakest guard, where the enemy is strongest.

Mel. Maskwell, you mean: pr'ythee, why should you suspect him?

Care. Faith, I cannot help it: you know I never lik'd him; I am a little superstitious in physiognomy.

Mel. He has obligations of gratitude to bind him to me; his dependance upon my uncle is through my means.

Care. Upon your aunt, you mean.

Mel. My aunt?

Care. I'm mistaken if there be not a familiarity between them you do not suspect, for all her passion for you.

Mel. Pho, pho! nothing in the world but his design to do me service; and he endeavours to be well in her esteem that he may be able to effect it.

Care. Well, I shall be glad to be mistaken; but your aunt's aversion in her revenge, cannot be any way so effectually shown, as in promoting a means to disinherit you. She is handsome, and cunning, and naturally amorous: Maskwell is flesh and blood at best, and opportunities between them are frequent. His affection for you, you have confessed, is grounded upon his interest; that you have transplanted; and, should it take root in my lady, I don't see what you can expect from the fruit.

Mel. I confess the consequence is visible were your suspicions just. But see, the company is broke up: let's meet 'em.

Re-enter BRISK, with LORD TOUCHWOOD, LORD FROTH, and SIR PAUL PLIANT.

Lord T. Out upon't, nephew; leave your father-in-law and me to maintain our ground against young people.

Mel. I beg your lordship's pardon. We were just returning—

Sir P. Where you, son? 'Gadsbud, much better as it is—Good, strange! I swear I'm almost tipsy; 't'other bottle would have been too powerful for me—as sure as can be, it would: we wanted your company; but, Mr. Brisk—where is he? I swear and vow he's a most facetious person, and the best company; and, my lord Froth, your lordship is so merry a man, he, he, he!

Lord F. O fie, sir Paul, what do you mean? Merry! O, barbarous! I'd as lieve you call'd me—fool.

Sir P. Nay, I protest and vow now 'tis true; when Mr. Brisk jokes, your lordship's laugh does so become you, he, he, he.

Lord F. Ridiculous, sir Paul! you are strangely mistaken: I find champaign is powerful. I assure you, sir Paul, I laugh at nobody's jest but my own, or a lady's, I assure you, sir Paul.

Brisk. How! how, my lord? What, affront my wit! Let me perish! do I never say any thing worthy to be laugh'd at?

Lord F. O fie, don't misapprehend me: I don't say so; for I often smile at your conceptions. But there is nothing more unbecoming a man of quality than to laugh: 'tis such a vulgar expression of the passion! every body can laugh. Then especially to laugh at the jest of an inferior person, or when any body else of the same quality does not laugh with him: ridiculous! to be pleased with what pleases the crowd! Now, when I laugh, I always laugh alone.

Brisk. I suppose that's because you laugh at your own jests, 'egad; ha, ha, ha!

Lord F. He, he! I swear though your railery provokes me to a smile.

Brisk. Ay, my lord, it's a sign I hit you in the teeth, if you show 'em.

Lord F. He, he, he! I swear that's so very pretty, I can't forbear.

Lord T. Sir Paul, if you please we'll retire to the ladies, and drink a dish of tea to settle our heads.

Sir P. With all my heart.—Mr. Brisk, you'll come to us—or call me when you're going to joke: I'll be ready to laugh incontinently.

[Exeunt Lord Touchwood and Sir Paul Pliant.]

Mel. But does your lordship never see comedies?

Lord F. O yes, sometimes; but I never laugh.

Mel. No!

Lord F. Oh no—Never laugh, indeed, sir.

Care. No! why what d'ye go there for?

Lord F. To distinguish myself from the commonality, and mortify the poets; the fellows grow so conceited when any of their foolish wit prevails upon the side boxes!—I swear—he, he, he—I have often constrain'd my inclinations to laugh—he, he, he—to avoid giving them encouragement.

Mel. You are cruel to yourself, my lord, as well as malicious to them.

Lord F. I confess I did myself some violence at first; but now I think I have conquered it.

Brisk. Let me perish, my lord, but there is something very particular and novel in the humour; 'tis true, it makes against wit, and I'm sorry for some friends of mine that write; but—'egad, I love to be malicious. Nay, deuce take me, there's wit in't too; and wit must be foil'd by wit: cut a diamond with a diamond; no other way, 'egad.

Lord F. Oh, I thought you would not be long before you found out the wit.

Care. Wit! in what? Where the devil's the wit, in not laughing when a man has a mind to't?

Brisk. O Lord, why can't you find it out?—Why, there 'tis, in the not laughing.—Don't you apprehend me?—My lord, Careless is a very honest fellow; but, harkye, you understand me, somewhat heavy; a little shallow, or so. Why, I'll tell you now: suppose now you come up to me—nay, pr'ythee, Careless, be instructed—Suppose, as I was saying, you come up to me, holding your sides, and laughing as if you would—Well! I look grave, and ask the cause of this immoderate mirth: you laugh on still, and are not able to tell me: still I look grave; not so much as smile—

Care. Smile! no; what the devil should you smile at, when you suppose I can't tell you?

Brisk. Pshaw, pshaw, pr'ythee don't interrupt me—but I tell you, you shall tell me at last; but it shall be a great while first.

Care. Well, but pr'ythee don't let it be a great while, because I long to have it over.

Brisk. Well then, you tell me some good jest, or very witty thing, laughing all the while as if you were ready to die—and I hear it, and look thus; would not you be disappointed?

Care. No; for if it were a witty thing, I should not expect you to understand it.

Lord F. O fie, Mr. Careless; all the world allow Mr. Brisk to have wit: my wife says he has a great deal; I hope you think her a judge.

Brisk. Pho, my lord, his voice goes for nothing—I can't tell how to make him apprehend.—Take it t'other way: suppose I say a witty thing to you. [To Careless.]

Care. Then I shall be disappointed indeed.

Mel. Let him alone, Brisk; he is obstinately bent not to be instructed.

Brisk. I'm sorry for him, the deuce take me.

Mel. Shall we go to the ladies, my lord?

Lord F. With all my heart; methinks we are a solitude without 'em.

Mel. Or, what say you to another bottle of champagne?

Lord F. O, for the universe, not a drop more, I beseech you. Oh, intemperate! I have a flushing in my face already.

[Takes out a pocket Glass, and looks in it.]

Brisk. Let me see, let me see, my lord—I broke my glass that was in the lid of my snuff-box. Hum! Deuce take me, I have encouraged a pimple here too.

[Takes the Glass, and looks in it.]

Lord F. Then you must fortify him with a patch; my wife shall supply you. Come, gentlemen, allons. [Exeunt.]

Enter MASKWELL and LADY TOUCHWOOD.

Lady T. I'll hear no more.—You're false and ungrateful; come, I know you false.

Mask. I have been frail, I confess, madam, for your ladyship's service.

Lady T. That I should trust a man whom I had known betray his friend!

Mask. What friend have I betray'd? or to whom?

Lady T. Your fond friend, Mellefont, and to me; can you deny it?

Mask. I do not.

Lady T. Have you not wrong'd my lord, who has been a father to you in your wants, and given you being? Have you not wrong'd him in the highest manner?

Mask. With your ladyship's help, and for your service; as I told you before—I can't deny that neither. Any thing more, madam?

Lady T. More, audacious villain! O, what's more is most my shame—Have you not dishonour'd me?

Mask. No, that I deny; for I never told in all my life; so that accusation's answer'd—on to the next.

Lady T. Death! do you dally with my passion? insolent devil! But have a care; provoke me not; you shall not escape my vengeance.—Calm villain! how unconcern'd he stands, confessing treachery and ingratitude! Is there a vice more black? O, I have excuses, thousands, for my faults: fire in my temper; passions in my soul, apt to every provocation; oppressed at once with love, and with despair.—But a sedate, a thinking villain, whose black blood runs temperately bad, what excuse can clear?

Mask. Will you be in temper, madam? I would not talk not to be heard. I have been a very great rogue for your sake, and you reproach me with it; I am ready to be a rogue still to do you service; and you are flinging conscience and honour in my face, to rebate my inclinations. How am I to behave myself? You know I am your creature; my life and fortune in your power; to disoblige you brings me certain ruin. Allow it, I would betray you, I would not be a traitor to myself: I don't pretend to honesty, because you know I am a rascal: but I would convince you, from the necessity, of my being firm to you.

Lady T. Necessity, impudence! Can no gratitude incline you? no obligations touch you? Were you not in the nature of a servant? and have not I, in effect, made you lord of all, of me, and of my lord? Where is that humble love, the languishing, that adoration which was once paid me, and everlastingly engaged?

Mask. Fixed, rooted in my heart, whence nothing can remove 'em; yet you—

Lady T. Yet; what yet?

Mask. Nay, misconceive me not, madam, when I say I have had a generous, and a faithful passion, which you had never favoured but through revenge and policy.

Lady T. Ha!

Mask. Look you, madam, we are alone—pray contain yourself, and hear me. You know you lov'd your nephew, when I first sigh'd for you; I quickly found it: an argument that I loved; for, with that art you veil'd your passion, 'twas imperceptible to all but jealous eyes. This discovery made me bold, I confess it; for by it I thought you in my power: your nephew's scorn of you added to my hopes; I watched the occasion, and took you, just repulsed by him, warm at once with love and indignation; your disposition, my arguments, and happy opportunity, accomplish'd my design. How I have loved you since, words have not shown; then how should words express?

Lady T. Well, mollifying devil! and have I not met your love with forward fire?

Mask. Your zeal, I grant, was ardent, but misplaced: there was revenge in view; that woman's idol had defil'd the temple of the god, and love was made a mock-worship.—A son and heir would have edg'd young Mellefont upon the brink of ruin, and left him nought but you to catch at for prevention.

Lady T. Again, provoke me! Do you wind me like a larum, only to rouse my own still'd soul for your diversion? Confusion!

Mask. Nay, madam, I'm gone, if you relapse.—What needs this? I say nothing but what yourself, in open hours of love, have told me. Why should you deny it? Nay, how can you? Is not all this present heat owing to the same fire? Do not you love him still? How have I this day offended you, but in not breaking off his match with Cynthia? which, ere to-morrow, shall be done, had you but patience.

Lady T. How! what said you, Maskwell?—Another caprice to unwind my temper?

Mask. No, by my love, I am your slave; the slave of all your pleasures; and will not rest till I have given you peace, would you suffer me.

Lady T. O, Maskwell, in vain do I disguise me from thee; thou knowest me; knowest the very inmost windings and recesses of my soul. O Mellefont!—Married to-morrow!—Despair strikes me. Yet my soul knows I hate him too: let him but once be mine, and next immediate ruin seize him.

Mask. Compose yourself; you shall have your wish.—Will that please you?

Lady T. How, how? thou dear, thou precious villain, how?

Mask. You have already been tampering with my lady Pliant.

Lady T. I have: she is ready for any impression I think fit.

Mask. She must be thoroughly persuaded that Mellefont loves her.

Lady T. She is so credulous that way naturally, and likes him so well, that she will believe it faster than I can persuade her. But I don't see what you can propose from such a trifling design; for her first conversing with Mellefont will convince her of the contrary.

Mask. I know it.—I don't depend upon it; but it will prepare something else, and gain us leisure to lay a stronger plot: if I gain a little time, I shall not want contrivance.

One minute gives invention to destroy

What, to rebuild, will a whole age employ.

[Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—The same.

Enter LADY FROTH and CYNTHIA.

Cyn. Indeed, madam! is it possible your ladyship could have been so much in love?

Lady F. I could not sleep; I did not sleep one wink for three weeks together.

Cyn. Prodigious! I wonder want of sleep, and so much love, and so much wit as your ladyship has, did not turn your brain.

Lady F. O, my dear Cynthia, you must not rally your friend. But really, as you say, I wonder too—But then I had a way; for, between you and I, I had whimsies and vapours; but I gave them vent.

Cyn. How pray, madam?

Lady F. O, I writ; writ abundantly.—Do you never write?

Cyn. Write! what?

Lady F. Songs, elegies, satires, encomiums, panegyrics, lampoons, plays, or heroic poems.

Cyn. O Lord, not I, madam; I'm content to be a courteous reader.

Lady F. O, inconsistent! In love, and not write! If my lord and I had been both of your temper, we had never come together.—O, bless me! what a sad thing would that have been, if my lord and I should never have met!

Cyn. Then neither my lord or you would ever have met with your match, on my conscience.

Lady F. O my conscience, no more we should; thou say'st right; for sure my lord Froth is as fine a gentleman, and as much a man of quality!—Ah! nothing at all of the common air—I think I may say, he wants nothing but a blue ribbon and a star to make him shine the very phosphorus of our hemisphere. Do you understand those two hard words? If you don't I'll explain 'em to you.

Cyn. Yes, yes, madam, I'm not so ignorant.—At least I won't own it, to be troubled with your instructions.

[Aside.]

Lady F. Nay, I beg your pardon; but, being derived from the Greek, I thought you might have escap'd the etymology.—But I'm the more amazed, to find you a woman of letters, and not write! Bless me, how can Mellefont believe you love him?

Cyn. Why faith, madam, he that won't take my word shall never have it under my hand.

Lady F. I vow, Mellefont's a pretty gentleman; but methinks he wants a manner.

Cyn. A manner! what's that, madam?

Lady F. Some distinguishing quality; as, for example, the bel air, or brilliant, of Mr. Brisk; the solemnity, yet complaisance, of my lord; or something of his own, that should look a little je-ne-sais-quoi-ish; he is too much a mediocrity, in my mind.

Cyn. He does not, indeed, affect either pertness or formality; for which I like him: here he comes.

Lady F. And my lord with him: pray observe the difference.

Enter LORD FROTH; MELLEFONT, and BRISK.

Cyn. Impertinent creature! I could almost be angry with her now. [Aside.

Lady F. My lord, I have been telling Cynthia how much I have been in love with you; I swear I have; I'm not ashamed to own it now; ah! it makes my heart leap; I vow I sigh when I think on't.—My dear lord! Ha, ha, ha! do you remember, my lord?

[Squeezes him by the Hand, looks kindly on him, sighs, and then laughs out.

Lord F. Pleasant creature! Perfectly well. Ah! that look, ay, there it is; who could resist? 'Twas so my heart was made a captive first, and ever since it has been in love with happy slavery.

Lady F. O that tongue, that dear deceitful tongue! that charming softness in your mien and your expression!—and then your bow! Good, my lord, bow as you did when I gave you my picture. Here, suppose this my picture—[Gives him a pocket Glass] Pray mind my lord; ah! he bows charmingly. [Lord Froth bows profoundly low, then kisses the Glass] Nay, my lord, you shan't kiss it so much; I shall grow jealous, I vow now.

Lord F. I saw myself there, and kissed it for your sake.

Lady F. Ah! gallantry to the last degree. Mr. Brisk, you're a judge; was ever any thing so well bred as my lord?

Brisk. Never any thing—but your ladyship, let me perish.

Lady F. O, prettily turned again! let me die but you have a great deal of wit.—Mr. Mellefont, don't you think Mr. Brisk has a world of wit?

Mel. O yes, madam.

Brisk. O dear, madam.

Lady F. An infinite deal.

Brisk. O heavens, madam—

Lady F. More wit than any body.

Brisk. I'm everlastingly your humble servant, deuce take me, madam.

Lord F. Don't you think us a happy couple? [To Cyn.]

Cyn. I vow, my lord, I think you are the happiest couple in the world; for you're not only happy in one another, and when you are together, but happy in yourselves, and by yourselves.

Lord F. I hope Mellefont will make a good husband too.

Cyn. 'Tis my interest to believe he will, my lord.

Lord F. D'ye think he'll love you as well as I do my wife? I'm afraid not.

Cyn. I believe he'll love me better.

Lord F. Heavens! that can never be: but why do you think so?

Cyn. Because he has not so much reason to be fond of himself.

Lady F. O, your humble servant for that, dear madam: Well, Mellefont, you'll be a happy creature.

Mel. Ay, my lord, I shall have the same reason for my happiness that your lordship has, I shall think myself happy.

Lord F. Ah, that's all.

Brisk. Your ladyship is in the right; [To Lady Froth] but, 'egad; I'm wholly turned into satire. I confess I write but seldom; but when I do—keen iambics, 'egad:—But my lord was telling me, your ladyship has made an essay toward an heroic poem.

Lady F. Did my lord tell you? Yes, I vow, and the subject is my lord's love to me. And what do you think I call it? I dare swear you won't guess—The Syllabub, ha, ha, ha!

Brisk. Because my lord's title's Froth, 'egad, ha, ha, ha!—deuce take me, very apropos and surprising, ha, ha, ha!

Lady F. Hey, ay, is not it? And then I call my lord Spumoso; and myself—what d'ye think I call myself?

Brisk. Lactilla, may be—'gad, I cannot tell.

Lady F. Biddy, that's all; just my own name.

Brisk. Biddy! 'egad, very pretty—deuce take me, if your ladyship has not the art of surprising the most naturally in the world. I hope you'll make me happy in communicating the poem.

Lady F. O, you must be my confidant; I must ask your advice.

Brisk. I'm your humble servant, let me perish. I presume your ladyship has read Bossu?

Lady F. O yes; and Rapin, and Dacier upon Aristotle and Horace. My lord, you must not be jealous, I'm communicating all to Mr. Brisk.

Lord F. No, no, I'll allow Mr. Brisk. Have you nothing about you to show him, my dear?

Lady F. Yes, I believe I have. Mr. Brisk, come, will you go into the next room? and there I'll show you what I have.

[Exit with Brisk.]

Lord F. I'll walk a turn in the garden, and come to you. [Exit]

Mel. You're thoughtful, Cynthia.

Cyn. I'm thinking that though marriage makes man and wife one flesh, it leaves 'em still two fools; and they become more conspicuous by setting off<sup>1)</sup> one another.

Mel. That's only when two fools meet, and their follies are opposed.

Cyn. Nay, I have known two wits meet, and by the opposition of their wit, render themselves as ridiculous as fools. Matrimony is a hazardous game to engage in. What think you of drawing stakes, and giving over in time?

Mel. No, hang't, that's not endeavouring to win, because it's possible we may lose; since we have shuffled and cut, let's e'en turn up trump now.

<sup>1)</sup> For instance, a lady's white hand is set off (embellished) by the contrast of the black keys of the piano-forte; and gentlemen generally prefer to play on an ebony flute.

Cyn. Then I find it's like cards; if either of us have a good hand, it is an accident of fortune.

Mel. No, marriage is rather like a game at bowls; fortune indeed makes the match, and the two nearest, and sometimes the two furthest are together; but the game depends entirely upon judgment.

Cyn. Still it is a game, and consequently one of us must be a loser.

Mel. Not at all; only a friendly trial of skill, and the winnings to be laid out in an entertainment.

Enter SIR PAUL and LADY PLIANT.

Sir P. 'Gadsbud! I am provoked into a fermentation, as my lady Froth says. Was ever the like read of in story?

Lady P. Sir Paul, have patience, let me alone to rattle him up.

Sir P. 'Pray your ladyship, give me leave to be angry; I'll rattle him up, I warrant you; I'll teach him, with a certiorari, to make love to my wife.

Lady P. You teach him! I'll teach him myself; so pray, sir Paul, hold you contented.

Sir P. Hold yourself contented, my lady Pliant; I find passion coming upon me even to desperation, and I cannot submit as formerly, therefore give way.

Lady P. How now? will you be pleased to retire, and—

Sir P. No, marry, will I not be pleased; I am pleased to be angry, that's my pleasure at

Mel. What can this mean? [this time.

Lady P. 'Gads my life, the man's distracted. Why, how now, who ate you? What am I? Slidikins, can't I govern you? What did I marry you for? Am I not to be absolute and uncontrolable? Is it fit a woman of my spirit and conduct should be contradicted in a matter of this concern?

Sir P. It concerns me, and only me; besides, I'm not to be governed at all times. When I am in tranquillity, my lady Pliant shall command sir Paul; but when I'm provoked to fury, I cannot incorporate with patience and reason; as soon may tigers match with tigers, lambs with lambs, and every creature couple with its foe, as the poet says.

Lady P. He's hot-headed still! 'Tis in vain to talk to you; but remember I have a curtain-lecture<sup>1)</sup> for you, you disobedient, headstrong brute.

Sir P. No, 'tis because I won't be headstrong, because I won't be a brute, and have my head fortified, that I am thus exasperated. But I will protect my honour: and yonder is the violater of my fame.

Lady P. 'Tis my honour that is concerned, and the violation was intended to me. Your honour! you have none! but what is in my keeping, and I can dispose of it when I please; therefore don't provoke me.

Sir P. Hum, 'gadsbud, she says true. [Aside] Well, my lady, march on; I will fight under you then: I am convinced, as far as passion will permit. [Sir Paul and Lady Pliant come up to Mellefont.

<sup>1)</sup> 'Tis a dreadful thing for a man to be subject to the threats of a curtain-lecture; but what a scene when put in practice.—The lady commences her discourses in bed, depriving the husband of his sleep.—It is called curtain-lecture from the bed curtains.

Lady P. Inhuman and treacherous—

Sir P. Thou serpent and first tempter of womankind—

Cyn. Bless me! Sir—madam—what mean you?

Sir P. Thy, Thy, come away, Thy; touch him not; come hither, girl; go not near him, there's nothing but deceit about him; snakes are in his looks, and the crocodile of Nilus is in his wicked appetite; he would devour thy fortune, and starve thee alive.

Lady P. Dishonourable, impudent creature!

Mel. For heaven's sake, madam, to whom do you direct this language?

Lady P. Have I behaved myself with all the decorum and nicety besitting the person of sir Paul's wife; have I preserved my honour as it were in a snow-house; have I, I say, preserved myself like a fair sheet of paper, for you to make a blot upon?

Sir P. And she shall make a simile with any woman in England.

Mel. I am so amazed, I know not what to say.

Sir P. Do you think my daughter—this pretty creature—'Gadsbud, she's a wife for a cherubim!—Do you think her fit for nothing but to be a stalking-horse,<sup>1)</sup> to stand before you while you take aim at my wife? 'Gadsbud, I was never angry before in my life, and I'll never be appeased again.

Mel. Confusion! this is my aunt; such malice can be engendered no where else. [Aside.

Lady P. Sir Paul, take Cynthia from his sight; leave me to strike him with the remorse of his intended crime.

Cyn. Pray, sir, stay; hear him; I dare affirm he's innocent.

Sir P. Innocent! Why, harkye; come hither, Thy, harkye, I had it from his aunt, my sister Touchwood. 'Gadsbud, he does not care a farthing for any thing of thee, but thy portion; why he's in love with my wife; he would have tantalized thee, and dishonour'd thy poor father, and that would certainly have broke my heart. I'm sure, if ever I should have horns, they would kill me; they would never come kindly; I should die of 'em, like any child that was cutting his teeth—I should indeed, Thy, therefore come away; but Providence has prevented all, therefore come away when I bid you.

Cyn. I must obey. [Exit with Sir Paul.

Lady P. O, such a thing! the impiety of it startles me; to wrong so good, so fair a creature, and one that loves you tenderly: 'tis a barbarity of barbarities, and nothing could be guilty of it—

Mel. But the greatest villain imagination can form, I grant it; and next to the villany of such a fact, is the villany of aspersing me with the guilt. How? which way was I to wrong her? for yet I understand you not.

Lady P. Why, 'gads my life, cousin Mellefont, you cannot be so peremptory as to deny it, when I tax you with it to your face; for, now sir Paul's gone, you are corum nobus.

<sup>1)</sup> It is a custom to go on moonlight nights shooting curlews on the sea-shore; but as these birds are very shy, there is no means of approaching them, but by hiding behind any old horse, which is made to go backwards to the place, for the purpose. The birds not being frightened, by this means are easily aimed at, though it is difficult to get more than one shot in the same place the same night.

Mel. By heaven, I love her more than life, or —

Lady P. Fiddle, faddle, don't tell me of this and that, and every thing in the world; but give me mathemacular demonstration, answer me directly. But I have not patience. Oh! the impiety of it, as I was saying, and the unparalleled wickedness! O merciful father! how could you think to reverse nature so, to make the daughter the means of procuring the mother!

Mel. The daughter procure the mother!

Lady P. Ay; for though I am not Cynthia's own mother, I am her father's wife; and that's near enough to make it incest.

Mel. O my precious aunt, and the devil in conjunction! [Aside.]

Lady P. O reflect upon the horror of that, and then the guilt of deceiving every body; marrying the daughter, only to dishonour the father; and then seducing me —

Mel. Where am I? is it day? and am I awake? Madam —

Lady P. And nobody knows how circumstances may happen together. To my thinking now, I could resist the strongest temptation; but yet I know 'tis impossible for me to know whether I could or no; there's no certainty in the things of this life.

Mel. Madam, pray give me leave to ask you one question.

Lady P. O Lord, ask me the question! I'll swear I'll refuse it; I swear I'll deny it, therefore don't ask me; nay, you shan't ask me; I swear I'll deny it. O gemini, you have brought all the blood into my face; I warrant, I am as red as a turkey-cock. O fie, cousin Mellefont!

Mel. Nay, madam, hear me —

Lady P. Hear you? No, no: I'll deny you first, and hear you afterwards; for one does not know how one's mind may change upon hearing. Hearing is one of the senses, and all the senses are fallible; I won't trust my honour, I assure you; my honour is infallible and un-come-at-ible.

Mel. For heaven's sake, madam —

Lady P. O name it no more.—Bless me, how can you talk of heaven, and have so much wickedness in your heart? May be, you don't think it a sin—they say some of you gentlemen don't think it a sin—Indeed, if I did not think it a sin—But still my honour, if it were no sin—But then, to marry my daughter, for the conveniency of frequent opportunities—I'll never consent to that; as sure as can be, I'll break the match.

Mel. Death and amazement! Madam, upon my knees —

Lady P. Nay, nay, rise up: come, you shall see my good nature. I know love is powerful, and nobody can help his passion: 'tis not your fault, nor I swear it is not mine. How can I help it, if I have charms? And how can you help it, if you are made a captive? O Lord, here's somebody coming; I dare not stay. Well, you must consider of your crime, and strive as much as can be against it—strive, be sure: but don't be melancholy, don't despair: but never think that I'll grant you any thing—O Lord, no: but be sure you lay aside all thoughts of the marriage; for though I know you don't love Cynthia, only as a blind for your passion to me, yet it will make me jealous—O Lord, what did I say? Jealous! no, no, I can't be jealous; for I must not love you—therefore don't hope—but don't despair neither. O, they're coming, I must fly. [Exit.]

Mel. [After a Pause] So then, spite of my care and foresight, I am caught, caught in my security: yet this was but a shallow artifice, unworthy of my machiavilian aunt: there must be more behind: destruction follows hard, if not presently prevented.

Enter MASKWELL.

Maskwell, welcome! Thy presence is a view of land appearing to my shipwrecked hopes: the witch has raised the storm, and her ministers have done their work; you see the vessels are parted.

Mask. I know it: I met sir Paul towing away Cynthia. Come, trouble not your head, I'll join you together ere to-morrow morning, or drown between you in the attempt.

Mel. There's comfort in a hand stretch'd out to one that's sinking, though never so far off.

Mask. No sinking, nor no danger. Come, cheer up; why, you don't know that, while I plead for you, your aunt has given me a retaining fee; nay, I am your greatest enemy, and she does but journey-work under me.

Mel. Ha! how's this?

Mask. What d'ye think of my being employed in the execution of all her plots? Ha, ha, ha! Nay, it's true: I have undertaken to break the match: I have undertaken to make your uncle disinherit you; to get you turn'd out of doors, and to—Ha, ha, ha!—I can't tell you for laughing—O she has opened her heart to me—I'm to turn you a grazing, and to—Ha, ha, ha! marry Cynthia myself; there's a plot for you.

Mel. Ha! O see, I see my rising sun! Light breaks through clouds upon me, and I shall live in day.—O, my Maskwell, how shall I thank or praise thee! thou hast outwitted woman. But tell me, how couldst thou thus get into her confidence, ha—how? But was it her contrivance to persuade my lady Pliant to this extravagant belief?

Mask. It was; and, to tell you the truth, I encouraged it for your diversion: though it made you a little uneasy for the present, yet the reflection of it must needs be entertaining. I warrant she was very violent at first.

Mel. Ha, ha, ha! Ay, a very fury.

Mask. Ha, ha, ha! I know her temper. Well, you must know then that all my contrivances were but bubbles; till at last I pretended to have been long secretly in love with Cynthia; that did my business; that convinced your aunt I might be trusted; since it was as much my interest as hers to break the match: then she thought my jealousy might qualify me to assist her in her revenge; and, in short, in that belief, told me the secrets of her heart. At length we made this agreement: if I accomplish her designs (as I told you before), she has engaged to put Cynthia, with all her fortune, into my power.

Mel. She is most gracious in her favour.—

Well, and, dear Jack, how hast thou contrived?

Mask. I would not have you stay to hear it now; for I don't know but she may come this way. I am to meet her anon; after that I'll tell you the whole matter. Be here in this gallery an hour hence: by that time, I imagine, our consultation may be over.

Mel. I will. Till then, success attend thee.

[Exit.]

Mask. Till then, success will attend me; for when I meet you, I meet the only obstacle to my fortune.—Cynthia, let thy beauty gild my crimes; and whatsoever I commit of treachery or deceit shall be imputed to me as a merit.—Treachery! what treachery? Love cancels all the bonds of friendship, and sets men right upon their first foundations. Duty to kings, piety to parents, gratitude to benefactors, and fidelity to friends, are different and particular ties: but the name of rival cuts 'em all asunder, and is a general acquittance. Rival is equal; and love, like death, a universal leveller of mankind.—Ha! but is there not such a thing as honesty? Yes, and whosoever has it about him bears an enemy in his breast; for your honest man, as I take it, is that nice, scrupulous, conscientious person, who will cheat nobody but himself: such another cockcomb as your wise man, who is too hard for all the world, and will be made a fool of by nobody but himself.—Ha, ha, ha! Well, for wisdom and honesty, give me cunning and hypocrisy! Oh, 'tis such a pleasure to angle for fairfaced fools! Then that hungry gudgeon, credulity, will bite at any thing.—Why, let me see: I have the same face, the same words and accents, when I speak what I do think, and when I speak what I do not think; the very same: and dear dissimulation is the only art not to be known from nature.

Why will mankind be fools, and be deceiv'd?

And why are friends and lovers' oaths believ'd?

When each, who searches strictly his own mind,

May so much fraud and power of baseness find.

[Exit.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—The same.

Enter LORD and LADY TOUCHWOOD.

Lady T. My lord, can you blame my brother Pliant, if he refuse his daughter upon this provocation? The contract's void by this unheard-of impiety.

Lord T. I don't believe it true; he has better principles—pho, 'tis nonsense. Come, come, I know my lady Pliant: 'tis not the first time she has mistaken respect for love, and made sir Paul jealous of the civility of an undesigning person, the better to bespeak his security in her unfeigned pleasures.

Lady T. You censure hardly, my lord: my sister's honour is very well known.

Lord T. Yes, I believe I know some that have been familiarly acquainted with it. This is a little trick wrought by some pitiful contriver, envious of my nephew's merit.

Lady T. Nay, my lord, it may be so, and I hope it will be found so; but that will require some time; for, in such a case as this, demonstration is necessary.

Lord T. There should have been demonstration of the contrary too, before it had been believed.

Lady T. So I suppose there was.

Lord T. How? where? when?

Lady T. That I can't tell; nay, I don't say there was; I am willing to believe as favourably of my nephew as I can.

Lord T. I don't know that. [Half aside.]

Lady T. How? Don't you believe that, say you, my lord?

Lord T. No, I don't say so. I confess I am troubled to find you so cold in his defence.

Lady T. His defence? Bless me, would you have me defend an ill thing?

Lord T. You believe it then?

Lady T. I don't know; I am very unwilling to speak my thoughts in any thing that may be to my cousin's disadvantage; besides, I find, my lord, you are prepared to receive an ill impression from any opinion of mine, which is not consenting with your own; but since I am like to be suspected in the end, and 'tis a pain any longer to dissemble, I own it to you: in short, I do believe it; nay, and can believe any thing worse, if it were laid to his charge.—Don't ask me my reasons, my lord; for they are not fit to be told you.

Lord T. I'm amazed! Here must be something more than ordinary in this. [Aside] Not fit to be told me, madam? You can have no interests wherein I am not concerned; and consequently the same reasons ought to be convincing to me, which create your satisfaction or disquiet.

Lady T. But those which cause my disquiet, I am willing to have remote from your hearing. Good my lord, don't press me.

Lord T. Don't oblige me to press you.

Lady T. Whatever it was, 'tis past; and that is better to be unknown, which cannot be prevented; therefore let me beg of you to rest satisfied.

Lord T. When you have told me I will.

Lady T. You won't.

Lord T. By my life, my dear, I will.

Lady T. What if you can't?

Lord T. How? Then I must know; nay, I will: no more trifling—I charge you tell me—by all our mutual peace to come, upon your duty—

Lady T. Nay, my lord, you need say no more, to make me lay my heart before you; but don't be thus transported; compose yourself: it is not of concern, to make you lose one minute's temper. 'Tis not indeed, my dear. O Lord, I wish I had not told you any thing.—Indeed, my lord, you have frightened me. Nay, look pleased, I'll tell you.

Lord T. Well, well.

Lady T. Nay, but will you be calm? Indeed it's nothing but—

Lord T. But what?

Lady T. But will you promise me not to be angry?—nay, you must—not to be angry with Mellefont?—I dare swear he's sorry; and, were it to do again, would not—

Lord T. Sorry for what? 'Death, you rack me with delay.

Lady T. Nay, no great matter, only—well, I have your promise—pho, why nothing, only your nephew had a mind to amuse himself sometimes with a little gallantry towards me. Nay, I can't think he meant any thing seriously; but methought it looked oddly.

Lord T. Confusion! what do I hear?

Lady T. Or, may be, he thought he was not enough akin to me upon your account, and had a mind to create a nearer relation on his own; a lover, you know, my lord—ha, ha, ha!—VWell, but that's all. Now you have it.—VWell, remember your promise, my lord; and don't take any notice of it to him.

Lord T. No, no, no.

Lady T. Nay, I swear you must not—a little harmless mirth—only misplaced, that's all.—But if it were more, 'tis over now, and all's well. For my part, I have forgot it; and so has he, I hope; for I have not heard any thing from him these two days.

Lord T. These two days! Is it so fresh?—Unnatural villain! I'll have him stripped, and turned naked out of my doors this moment, and let him rot and perish!

Lady T. O, my lord, you'll ruin me, if you take such public notice of it; it will be a town-talk: consider your own and my honour.—Stay, I told you you would not be satisfied when you knew it.

Lord T. Before I've done, I will be satisfied. Ungrateful monster! How long—

Lady T. Lord, I don't know: I wish my lips had grown together when I told you. Almost a twelvemonth—nay, I won't tell you any more, till you are yourself. Pray, my lord, don't let the company see you in this disorder: yet I confess I can't blame you; for I think I was never so surprised in my life. VWho would have thought my nephew could have so misconstrued my kindness?—But will you go into your closet, and recover your temper? I'll make an excuse of sudden business to the company, and come to you. Pray, good, dear my lord, let me beg you do now: I'll come immediately, and tell you all. Will you, my lord?

Lord T. I will. I am mute with wonder.

Lady T. VWell, but go now; here's somebody coming.

Lord T. VWell, I go. You won't stay; for I would hear more of this.

Lady T. I'll follow instantly.

[Exit Lord Touchwood.]

Enter MASKWELL.

So!

Mask. This was a masterpiece, and did not need my help; though I stood ready for a cue to come in, and confirm all, had there been occasion.

Lady T. Have you seen Mellefont?

Mask. I have; and am to meet him here about this time.

Lady T. How does he bear his disappointment?

Mask. Secure in my assistance, he seemed not much afflicted, but rather laughed at the shallow artifice, which so little time must of necessity discover: yet he is apprehensive of some further design of yours, and has engaged me to watch you. I believe he will hardly be able to prevent your plot; yet I would have you use caution and expedition.

Lady T. Expedition indeed; for all we do must be performed in the remaining part of this evening, and before the company break up, lest my lord should cool, and have an opportunity to talk with him privately: my lord must not see him again.

Mask. By no means; therefore you must aggravate my lord's displeasure to a degree that will admit of no conference with him.—VWhat think you of mentioning me?

Lady T. How?

Mask. To my lord, as having been privy to Mellefont's design upon you, but still using my utmost endeavours to dissuade him: though my friendship and love to him has made me conceal it, yet you may say I threatened the next time he attempted any thing of that kind, to discover it to my lord.

Lady T. To what end is this?

Mask. It will confirm my lord's opinion of my honour and honesty, and create in him a new confidence in me, which (should this design miscarry) will be necessary to the forming of another plot that I have in my head—to cheat you, as well as the rest. [Aside.

Lady T. I'll do it.

Mask. You had best go to my lord, keep him as long as you can in his closet, and I doubt not but you will mould him to what you please: your guests are so engaged in their own follies and intrigues, they'll miss neither of you.

Lady T. VWhen shall we meet?—At eight this evening in my chamber; there rejoice at our success, and toy away an hour in mirth.

Mask. I will not fail. [Exit Lady Touchwood] I know what she means well enough. I have lost all appetite to her; yet she's a fine woman, and I loved her once; but I don't know, the case is altered; what was my pleasure is become my duty; and I am as indifferent to her now, as if I were her husband. Should she smoke my design upon Cynthia, I were in a fine pickle. She has a penetrating head, and knows how to interpret a coldness the right way; therefore I must dissemble ardour and ecstasy, that's resolved. How easily and pleasantly is that dissembled before fruition! Plague on't, that a man can't drink without quenching his thirst.—Ha! yonder comes Mellefont, thoughtful. Let me think: meet her at eight—hum—ha! I have it. If I can speak to my lord before, I will deceive 'em all, and yet secure myself. 'Twas a lucky thought! VWell, this double dealing is a jewel.—Here he comes—now for me.

Enter MELLEFONT, musing.—MASKWELL, pretending not to see him, walks by him, and speaks, as it were, to himself.

Mercy on us! what will the wickedness of this world come to!

Mel. How now, Jack? VWhat, so full of contemplation that you run over?

Mask. I'm glad you're come, for I could not contain myself any longer; and was just going to give vent to a secret, which nobody but you ought to drink down.—Your aunt's just gone from hence.

Mel. And having trusted thee with the secrets of her soul, thou art villanously bent to discover 'em all to me, ha?

Mask. I'm afraid my frailty leans that way;

but I don't know whether I can in honour discover all.

Mel. All, all, man. What, you may in honour betray her as far as she betrays herself. No tragical design upon my person, I hope?

Mask. No, but it's a comical design upon mine.

Mel. What dost thou mean?

Mask. Listen, and be dumb: we have been bargaining about the rate of your ruin —

Mel. Like any two guardians to an orphan heiress.—Well.

Mask. And whereas pleasure is generally paid with mischief, what mischief I shall do is to be paid with pleasure.

Mel. So when you've swallowed the potion, you sweeten your mouth with a plum?

Mask. You are merry, sir; but I shall probe your constitution: in short, the price of your banishment is to be paid with the person of—

Mel. Of Cynthia, and her fortune.—Why, you forget, you told me this before.

Mask. No, no; so far you are right; and I am, as an earnest of that bargain, to have full and free possession of the person of—your aunt.

Mel. Ha!—Pho! you trifle.

Mask. By this light, I'm serious, all raillery apart. I knew 'twould stun you. This evening, at eight, she will receive me in her bed-chamber.

Mel. Hell and the devil! is she abandoned of all grace?—Why, the woman is possessed.

Mask. Well, will you go in my stead?

Mel. Into a hot furnace sooner.

Mask. No you would not; it would not be so convenient, as I can order matters.

Mel. What d'ye mean?

Mask. Mean! not to disappoint the lady, I assure you.—Ha, ha, ha! how gravely he looks.—Come, come, I won't perplex you. 'Tis the only thing that Providence could have contrived to make me capable of serving you, either to my inclination or your own necessity.

Mel. How, how, for heaven's sake, dear Maskwell?

Mask. Why thus: I'll go according to appointment; you shall have notice, at the critical minute, to come and surprise your aunt and me together. Counterfeit a rage against me, and I'll make my escape through the private passage from her chamber, which I'll take care to leave open. 'Twill be hard if then you can't bring her to any conditions; for this discovery will disarm her of all defence, and leave her entirely at your mercy: nay, she must ever after be in awe of you.

Mel. Let me adore thee, my better genius! I think it is not in the power of fate now to disappoint my hopes—my hopes? my certainty!

Mask. Well, I'll meet you here, within a quarter of eight, and give you notice.

Mel. Good fortune ever go with thee!

[Exit Maskwell.]

Enter CARELESS.

Care. Mellefont, get out o'the way.—My lady Pliant's coming, and I shall never succeed while thou art in sight, though she begins to tack about; but I made love a great while to no purpose.

Mel. Why, what's the matter? She's convinced that I don't care for her.

Care. I can't get an answer from her, that does not begin with her honour, or her virtue, or some such cant. Then she has told me the whole history of sir Paul's nine years' courtship; how he has lain for whole nights together upon the stairs, before her chamber-door; and that the first favour he received from her, was a piece of an old scarlet petticoat for a stomacher; which, since the day of his marriage, he has, out of a piece of gallantry, converted into a night-cap; and wears it still, with much solemnity, on his anniversary wedding-night.

Mel. You are very great with him. I wonder he never told you his grievances: he will, I warrant you.

Care. Excessively foolish!—But that which gives me most hopes of her, is her telling me of the many temptations she has resisted.

Mel. Nay, then you have her; for a woman's bragging to a man that she has overcome temptations, is an argument that they were weakly offered, and a challenge to him to engage her more irresistibly.—Here she comes with sir Paul. I'll leave you. Ply her close, and by-and-by clap a billet-doux into her hand; for a woman never thinks a man truly in love with her, till he has been fool enough to think of her out of her sight, and to lose so much time as to write to her. [Exit.]

Enter SIR PAUL and LADY PLIANT.

Sir P. Shan't we disturb your meditation, Mr. Careless? you would be private?

Care. You bring that along with you, sir Paul, that shall be always welcome to my privacy.

Sir P. O, sweet sir, you load your humble servants, both me and my wife, with continual favours.

Lady P. Sir Paul, what a phrase was there! You will be making answers, and taking that upon you which ought to lie upon me: that you should have so little breeding, to think Mr. Careless did not apply himself to me. Pray what have you to entertain any body's privacy? I swear and declare, in the face of the world, I'm ready to blush for your ignorance.

Sir P. I acquiesce, my lady; but don't snub so loud. [Apart.]

Lady P. Mr. Careless, if a person that is wholly illiterate might be supposed to be capable of being qualified to make a suitable return to those obligations, which you are pleased to confer upon one that is wholly incapable of being qualified in all those circumstances, I'm sure I should rather attempt it than any thing in the world! [Courtesies] for, I'm sure, there's nothing in the world that I would rather. [Courtesies] But I know Mr. Careless is so great a critic, and so fine a gentleman, that it is impossible for me—

Care. O heavens, madam! you confound me.

Sir P. 'Gadsbud, she's a fine person.

Lady P. O Lord, sir, pardon me, we women have not those advantages: I know my own imperfections; but, at the same time, you must give me leave to declare in the face of the world, that nobody is more sensible of favours and things; for, with the reserve of my honour, I assure you, Mr. Careless, I don't know any thing in the world I would refuse to a person so meritorious.—You'll pardon my want of expression.

Care. O, your ladyship is abounding in all excellence, particularly that of phrase.

Lady P. You are so obliging, sir.

Care. Your ladyship is so charming.

Sir P. So, now, now; now, my lady.

Lady P. So well bred.

Care. So surprising.

Lady P. So well dressed, so bonne mine, so eloquent, so unaffected, so easy, so free, so particular, so agreeable—

Sir P. Ay, so, so, there.

Care. O Lord, I beseech you, madam, don't—

Lady P. So gay, so graceful, so good teeth, so fine shape, so fine limbs, so fine linen; and I don't doubt but you have a very good skin, sir.

Care. For heaven's sake, madam—I'm quite out of countenance.

Sir P. And my lady's quite out of breath, or else you should hear.—Gadsbud, you may talk of my lady Froth—

Care. O fie, fie; not to be nam'd of a day. My lady Froth is very well in her accomplishments, but it is when my lady Pliant is not thought of; if that can ever be.

Lady P. O, you overcome me—that is so excessive.

Sir P. Nay, I swear and vow, that was pretty.

Care. O, sir Paul, you are the happiest man alive. Such a lady! that is the envy of her sex, and the admiration of ours.

Sir P. Your humble servant.—I am, I thank heaven, in a fine way of living, as I may say, peacefully and happily; and, I think, need not envy any of my neighbours, blessed be Providence!—Ay, truly, Mr. Careless, my lady is a great blessing; a fine, discreet, wellspoken woman, as you shall see, if it becomes me to say so; and we live very comfortably together: she is a little hasty sometimes, and so am I; but mine is soon over, and then I'm so sorry. O, Mr. Careless, if it were not for one thing—

Enter TIMOTHY, with a Letter, and offers it to SIR PAUL PLIANT.

'Gadso, 'gadsbud—Tim, carry it to my lady; you should have carried it to my lady first.

Tim. 'Tis directed to your worship.

Sir P. Well, well, my lady reads all letters first.

Lady P. How often have you been told of that, you jackanapes?

Sir P. Child, do so no more; d'ye hear, Tim?

Tim. No, and please you. [Exit.]

Sir P. A humour of my wife's—you know, women have little fancies. But, as I was telling you, Mr. Careless, if it were not for one thing, I should think myself the happiest man in the world; indeed, that touches me near, very near.

Care. What can that be, sir Paul?

Sir P. Why, I have, I thank heaven, a very plentiful fortune, a good estate in the country, some houses in town, and some money, a pretty tolerable personal estate: and it is a great grief to me, indeed it is, Mr. Careless, that I have not a son to inherit this.—'Tis true, I have a daughter; and a fine dutiful child she is, though I say it—blessed be Providence, I may say; for indeed, Mr. Careless, I am mightily beholding to Providence—a poor unworthy sinner!—But if I had a son—ah, that's my affliction, and my only affliction; indeed, I cannot refrain from tears when it comes in my mind. [Cries.]

Care. Why, methinks that might be easily remedied—my lady's a fine likely woman.

Sir P. Oh, a fine likely woman as you shall see in a summer's day—indeed she is, Mr. Careless, in all respects.

Care. And I should not have taken you to have been so old—

Sir P. Alas, that's not it, Mr. Careless; ah! that's not it; no, no, you shoot wide of the mark a mile, indeed you do; that's not it, Mr. Careless; no, no, that's not it.

Care. No! what can be the matter then?

Sir P. You'll scarcely believe me, when I shall tell you.—Why, my lady is so nice—I am her husband, as I may say, though far unworthy of that honour; yet I am her husband; but, alas-a-day, I have no more familiarity with her person, as to that matter, than with my own mother; no indeed.

Care. Alas-a-day, this is a lamentable story; 'tis an injury to the world; my lady must be told on't; she must, ifaith, sir Paul.

Sir P. Ah! would to heaven you would, Mr. Careless; you are mightily in her favour.

Care. I warrant you;—what! we must have a son some way or other.

Sir P. Indeed I should be mightily bound to you, if you could bring it about, Mr. Careless.

Lady P. Sir Paul, it's from your steward; here's a return of six hundred pounds; you may take fifty of it for your next half year.

[Gives him the Letter.]

Enter LORD FROTH and CYNTHIA.

Sir P. How does my girl? Come hither to thy father—poor lamb, thou'rt melancholy.

Lord F. Heaven's, sir Paul! you amaze me, of all things in the world—You are never pleased but when we are all upon the broad grin; all laugh, and no company: ah, then 'tis such a sight to see some teeth—Sure you're a great admirer of my lady Whifler, Mr. Sneer, and sir Lawrence Loud, and that gang.

Sir P. I vow and swear she's a very merry woman; but I think she laughs a little too much.

Lord F. Merry! O Lord, what a character that is of a woman of quality!—You have been at my lady Whifler's upon her day, madam? [To Cynthia.]

Cyn. Yes, my lord.—I must humour this fool. [Aside.]

Lord F. Well, and how? he! What is your sense of the conversation there?

Cyn. O, most ridiculous! a perpetual concert of laughing without any harmony; for sure, my lord, to laugh out of time is as disagreeable as to sing out of time, or out of tune.

Lord F. He, he, he! right; and then, my lady Whifler is so ready, she always comes in three bars too soon: and then what do they laugh at? For, you know, laughing without a jest, is as impertinent, he! as, as—

Cyn. As dancing without a fiddle.

Lord F. Just, 'faith—that was at my tongue's end.

Cyn. But that cannot be properly said of them; for, I think, they are all in good nature with the world, and only laugh at one another; and, you must allow, they have all jests in their person's, though they have none in their conversation.

Lord F. True, as I'm a person of honour: for heavens sake, let us sacrifice 'em to mirth a little.

Re-enter TIMOTHY, and whispers SIR PAUL PLIANT.

Sir P. 'Gadso—Wife, wife; my lady Pliant, I have a word—

Lady P. I'm busy, sir Paul, I wonder at your impertinence.

Care. Sir Paul, hearken, I'm reasoning the matter, you know.—Madam, if your ladyship pleases, we'll discourse of this in the next room.

[Exit, with Lady Pliant.]

Sir P. O ho, I wish you good success; I wish you good success!—Boy, tell my lady, when she has done, I would speak with her below.

[Exeunt.]

Enter LADY FROTH and BRISK.

Lady F. Then you think that episode between Susan the dairy-maid, and our coachman, is not amiss? you know, I may suppose the dairy in town, as well as in the country.

Brisk. Incomparable, let me perish.—But then, being an heroic poem, had not you better call him a charioteer? Charioteer sounds great; besides, your ladyship's coachman having a red face, and you comparing him to the sun—and, you know, the sun is called heaven's charioteer.

Lady F. Oh, infinitely better; I'm extremely beholding to you for the hint. Stay, we'll read over those half a score lines again. [Pulls out a Paper] Let me see here—you know what goes before—the comparison, you know.

[Reads.]

For as the sun shines ev'ry day,

So of our coachman I may say—

Brisk. I'm afraid that simile won't do in wet weather, because you say the sun shines every day.

Lady F. No, for the sun it won't; but it will do for the coachman; for, you know, there's most occasion for a coach in wet weather.

Brisk. Right, right, that saves all.

Lady F. Then, I don't say the sun shines all the day; but, that he peeps now and then: yet he does shine all the day too, you know, though we don't see him.

Brisk. Right; but the vulgar will never comprehend that.

Lady F. Well, you shall hear—Let me see.

[Reads.]

For as the sun shines ev'ry day,

So of our coachman I may say.

He shows his drunken fiery face,

Just as the sun does, more or less.

Brisk. That's right; all's well, all's well—more or less.

Lady F. [Reads] And when at night his labour's done,

Then too, like heaven's charioteer, the sun—

Ay, charioteer does better. [Reads.]

Into the dairy he descends,

And there his whipping and his driving ends;

There he's secure from danger of a bilk,

His fare is paid him, and he sets in milk.

For Susan, you know, is Thetis, and so—

Brisk. Incomparable well and proper, 'egad; but I have one exception to make—Don't you think bilk (I know it's good rhyme); but don't you think bilk and fare too like a hackney-coachman?

Lady F. I swear and vow I'm afraid so; and yet our Jehu was a hackney-coachman when my lord took him.

Brisk. Was he? I'm answered, if Jehu was a hackney-coachman—You may put that into the marginal notes though, to prevent criticism: only mark it with a small asterism, and say, Jehu was formerly a hackney coachman.

Lady F. I will. You'd oblige me extremely to write notes to the whole poem.

Brisk. With all my heart and soul; and proud of the vast honour, let me perish.

Lord F. He, he, he! My dear, have you done? Won't you join with us? we were laughing at my lady Whifler, and Mr. Sneer.

Lady F. Ay, my dear, were you? O, filthy Mr. Sneer! he's a nauseous figure, a most fulsamic fop, pho! He spent two days together in going about Coventgarden to suit the lining of his coach with his complexion.

Lord F. O, silly! yet his aunt is as fond of him, as if she had brought the ape into the world herself.

Brisk. Who, my lady Toothless? O, she's a mortifying spectacle; she's always chewing the cud, like an old ewe.

Cyn. Fie, Mr. Brisk; 'tis eringoes for her cough.

Lady F. Then she's always ready to laugh when Sneer offers to speak; and sits in expectation of his no jest, with her mouth open.

Brisk. Like an oyster at low ebb, 'egad. Ha, ha, ha!

Lady F. Then that t'other great strapping lady; I can't hit of her name; the old fat fool that paints so exorbitantly.

Brisk. I know whom you mean: but deuce take me, I can't hit of her name neither. Paints, d'ye say? why she lays it on with a trowel; then she has a great beard that bristles through it, and makes her look as if she were plastered with lime and hair, let me perish.

Lady F. O, you made a song upon her, Mr. Brisk.

Brisk. He! 'egad, so I did. My Lord can sing it. 'Tis not a song, neither: it's a sort of an epigram, or rather an epigrammatic sonnet: I don't know what to call it, but it's satire. Sing it, my lord.

SONG.—LORD FROTH.

Ancient Phillis has young graces,

'Tis a strange thing, but a true one;

Shall I tell you how?

She herself makes her own faces,

And each morning wears a new one;

Where's the wonder now?

Brisk. Short, but there's salt in it; my way of writing, 'egad.

Enter THOMAS.

Lady F. How now?

Tho. Your ladyship's chair is come.

Lady F. Is nurse and the child in it?

Tho. Yes, madam. [Exit.]

Lady F. O the dear creature! let's go see it.

Lord F. I swear, my dear, you'll spoil that child with sending it to and again so often; this is the seventh time the chair has gone for her to-day.

Lady F. O law, I swear it's but the sixth, and I han't seen her these two hours. The poor dear creature! I swear, my lord, you don't love poor little Sapho. Come, my dear Cynthia; Mr. Brisk, we'll go see Sapho, though my lord won't.

Cyn. I'll wait upon your ladyship.

Brisk. Pray, madam, how old is lady Sapho?

Lord F. Three quarters; but I swear she has a world of wit, and can sing a tune already. My lord, won't you go? won't you? what, not to see Saph? Pray, my lord, come see little Saph. I knew you could not stay, [Exeunt.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—The same.

Enter MELLEFONT and CYNTHIA.

Cyn. I heard him loud as I came by the closet-door, and my lady with him: but she seemed to moderate his passion.

Mel. Ay, as gentle breezes moderate a fire; but I shall counterwork her spells.

Cyn. It's impossible; she'll cast beyond you still. I'll lay my life it will never be a match.

Mel. What?

Cyn. Between you and me.

Mel. Why so? I don't know why we should not steal out of the house this moment, and marry one another without consideration or the fear of repentance. Hang fortune, portion, settlements, and jointures.

Cyn. Ay, ay, what have we to do with them? You know we marry for love.

Mel. Love, love, downright, very villanous love.

Cyn. Here then, I give you my promise, in spite of duty, any temptation of wealth, your inconstancy, or my own inclination to change—

Mel. To run most wilfully and unreasonably away with me this moment, and be married.

Cyn. Hold—never to marry any body else.

Mel. That's but a kind of negative consent. Why, you won't balk the frolic?

Cyn. If you had not been so assured of your own conduct, I would not. But 'tis but reasonable that, since I consent to like a man without the vile consideration of money, he should give me a very evident demonstration of his wit: therefore let me see you undermine my lady Touchwood, as you boasted, and force her to give her consent, and then—

Mel. I'll do't.

Cyn. And I'll do't.

Mel. This very next ensuing hour of eight o'clock is the last minute of her reign, unless the devil assist her in propria persona.

Cyn. Well, if the devil should assist her, and your plot miscarry.

Mel. Ay, what am I to trust to then?

Cyn. Why, if you give me very clear demonstration that it was the devil, I'll allow for irresistible odds. Here's my mother-in-law, and your friend Careless: I would not have 'em see us together yet. [Exeunt.]

Enter CARELESS and LADY PLIANT.

Lady P. I swear, Mr. Careless, you are very alluring, and say so many fine things, and nothing is so moving to me as a fine thing. Well, I must do you this justice, and declare in the face of the world, never any body gained so far upon me as yourself; with blushes I must own it, you have shaken, as I may say, the very foundation of my honour. Well, sure if I escape your importunities, I shall value myself as long as I live, I swear.

Care. And despise me. [Sighing.]

Lady P. The last of any man in the world, by my purity; now you make me swear. O gratitude; forbid that I should ever be wanting in a respectful acknowledgment of an entire resignation of all my best wishes, for the person and parts of so accomplished a person, whose merit challenges much more. I'm sure than my illiterate praises can description.

Care. Ah, heavens, madam, you ruin me with kindness! Your charming tongue pursues the victory of your eyes, while at your feet your poor adorer dies. [In a whining Tone.]

Lady P. Ah! very fine.

Care. Ah, why are you so fair, so bewitching fair? O let me grow to the ground here, and feast upon that hand! O let me press it to my heart, my trembling heart! the nimble movement shall instruct your pulse, and teach it to alarm desire. [Still whining.] I'm almost at the end of my cant, if she does not yield quickly. [Aside.]

Lady P. O that's so passionate and fine, I cannot hear it. I am not safe if I stay, and must leave you.

Care. And must you leave me? Rather let me languish out a wretched life, and breathe my soul beneath your feet. I must say the same thing over again, and can't help it. [Aside.]

Lady P. I swear, I'm ready to languish too. O my honour! whither is it going? I protest you have given me the palpitation of the heart.

Care. Can you be so cruel?

Lady P. O rise, I beseech you; say no more till you rise. Why did you kneel so long? I swear I was so transported, I did not see it. Well, to show you how far you have gained upon me, I assure you, if sir Paul should die, of all mankind there's none I'd sooner make my second choice.

Care. O heaven! I can't outlive this night without your favour. I feel my spirits faint, a general dampness overspreads my face, a cold deadly dew already vents through all my pores, and will to-morrow wash me for ever from your sight, and drown me in my tomb.

Lady P. O, you have conquer'd; sweet, melting, moving sir, you have conquered. What sheart of marble can refrain to weep, and yield to such sad sayings? [Cries.]

Care. I thank heaven they are the saddest that I ever said [Aside] Oh!

Lady P. O! I yield myself all up to your uncontrollable embraces. Say, thou dear dying man, when, where, and how? Ah, there's sir Paul.

Care. 'Slife, yonder's sir Paul; but if he were not come, I'm so transported I cannot speak. This note will inform you.

[Gives her a Note, and exit.]

Re-enter CYNTHIA, with SIR PAUL PLIANT.

Sir P. Thou art my tender lambkin, and shalt do what thou wilt; but endeavour to forget this Mellefont,

Cyn. I would obey you to my power, sir; but, if I have not him, I have sworn never to marry.

Sir P. Never to marry! Heaven's forbid! must I neither have sons nor grandsons? must the family of the Pliants be utterly extinct for want of issue male? Oh, impiety! but did you swear? did that sweet creature swear, ha? How durst you swear without my consent, ha? 'Gadsbud, who am I?

Cyn. Pray don't be angry, sir; when I swore I had your consent; and therefore I swore.

Sir P. Why then the revoking my consent does annul or make of non effect your oath: so you may unswear it again; the law will allow it.

Cyn. Ay, but my conscience never will.

Sir P. 'Gadsbud, no matter for that; conscience and law never go together; you must not expect that.

Lady P. Ay, but sir Paul, I conceive, if she has sworn, d'ye mark me? if she has once sworn, it is most unchristian, inhuman, and obscene that she should break it. I'll make up the match again, because Mr. Careless said it would oblige him. [Aside.]

Sir P. Does your ladyship conceive so? Why I was of that opinion once too. Nay, if your ladyship conceives so, I'm of that opinion again; but I can neither find my lord nor my lady, to know what they intend.

Lady P. I am satisfied that my cousin Mellefont has been much wronged.

Cyn. I'm amazed to find her of our side, for I'm sure she loved him. [Aside.]

Lady P. I know my lady Touchwood has no kindness for him; and besides I have been informed by Mr. Careless, that Mellefont had never any thing more than a profound respect. That he has owned himself to be my admirer, 'tis true; but he was never so presumptuous as to entertain any dishonourable notions of things; so that if this be made plain, I don't see how my daughter can in conscience, or honour, or any thing in the world—

Sir P. Indeed if this be made plain, as my lady your mother says, child—

Lady P. Plain! I was informed of it by Mr. Careless; and I assure you Mr. Careless is a person—that has a most extraordinary respect and honour for you, sir Paul.

Cyn. And for your ladyship too, I believe; or else you had not changed sides so soon. [Aside] Now I begin to find it.

Sir P. I am much obliged to Mr. Careless really; he is a person that I have a great value for, not only for that, but because he has a great veneration for your ladyship.

Lady P. O law, no indeed, sir Paul; 'tis upon your account.

Sir P. No, I protest and vow I have no title to his esteem, but in having the honour to appertain in some measure to your ladyship, that's all.

Lady P. O law, now, I swear and declare, it shan't be so; you're too modest, sir Paul.

Str P. It becomes me, when there is any comparison made between—

Lady P. O fie, fie, sir Paul, you'll put me out of countenance. Your very obedient and affectionate wife, that's all, and highly honoured in that title.

Sir P. 'Gadsbud, I am transported! Give me leave to kiss your ladyship's little finger.

Lady P. My lip indeed, sir Paul; I swear you shall. [He kisses her, and bows very low.]

Sir P. I humbly thank your ladyship; I don't know whether I fly on ground, or walk in air. 'Gadsbud, she was never thus before. Well, I must own myself the most beholden to Mr. Careless; as sure as can be this is all his doing, something that he has said; well, 'tis a rare thing to have an ingenious friend. Well, your ladyship is of opinion that the match may go forward?

Lady P. By all means. Mr. Careless has satisfied me of the matter.

Sir P. Well, why then, lamb, you may keep your oath: but have a care of making rash vows. Come hither to me, and kiss papa.

Lady P. I swear and declare, I am in such a twitter to read Mr. Careless's letter, that I can't forbear any longer; but though I may read all letters first by prerogative, yet I'll be sure to be unsuspected this time. [Aside] Sir Paul.

Sir P. Did your ladyship call?

Lady P. Nay, not to interrupt you, my dear. Only lend me your letter which you had from your steward to-day: I would look upon the account again, and may be increase your allowance.

Sir P. There it is, madam. Do you want a pen and ink? [Bows and gives the Letter.]

Lady P. No, no, nothing else, I thank you, sir Paul. So now I can read my own letter under the cover of his. [Aside.]

Sir P. He! and shall I have a grandson, a brave chopping boy, to perpetuate the line of the Pliant's? I'll settle a thousand pounds a year upon the rogue as soon as ever he looks me in the face, I will. 'Gadsbud, I hope the young cherub will be like me: I would fain have some resemblance of myself in my posterity. Ha, Thy, shouldn't you wish he was like his grand-papa?

Cyn. I'm glad to see you so merry, sir.

Sir P. Merry! 'gadsbud, I'm serious; I'll give thee five hundred pounds for every feature of him that resembles me. Ah, this eye, this left eye! a thousand pounds for this left eye: this has done execution in its time, girl. Why thou hast my leer, hussy; just thy father's leer.—Let it be transmitted to the young rogue by the help of imagination. Why, 'tis the mark of our family, Thy: our house is distinguished by a languishing eye, as the house of Austria is by a thick lip.

Lady P. O, dear Mr. Careless! I swear he writes charmingly, and he looks charmingly, and he has charmed me as much as I have charmed him; and so I'll tell him in the wardrobe, when 'tis dark. O crimine! I hope sir Paul has not seen both letters. [Aside. Puts up the wrong Letter, and gives him her own] Sir Paul, here's your letter: to-morrow morning I'll settle accounts to your advantage.

Sir P. I humbly thank your ladyship.

Lady P. So, now I'll retire, and study a complimentary rebuke to Mr. Careless, for the pathetic tender of his regards; but it shall not be too severe neither. [Aside, and exit.]

Enter BRISK.

Brisk. Sir Paul, 'gadsbud, you're an uncivil person, let me tell you, and all that; and I did not think it had been in you.

Sir P. O law, what's the matter now? I hope you are not angry, Mr. Brisk?

Brisk. Deuce take me, I believe you intend to marry your daughter yourself; you're always brooding over her like an old hen, as if she were not well hatched, 'egad, he!

Sir P. Good, strange! Mr. Brisk is such a merry facetious person; he, he, he. No, no, I have done with her, I have done with her now.

Brisk. The fiddles have stayed this hour in the hall, and my lord Froth wants a partner; we can never begin without her.

Sir P. Go, go, child; go, get you gone, and dance and be merry; I'll come and look at you by-and-by. [Exit Cynthia] Where's my son Mellefont?

Brisk. I'll send him to them; I know where he is; and, sir Paul, will you send Careless into the hall, if you meet him?

Sir P. I will, I will; I'll go and look for him on purpose. [Exit.]

Brisk. So, now they are all gone, and I have an opportunity to practise.—Ah! my dear lady Froth! she's a most engaging creature, if she were not so fond of that damn'd coxcomby lord of hers; and yet I am forc'd to allow him wit too, to keep in with him. No matter; she's a woman of parts, and, 'egad, parts will carry her. She said she would follow me into the gallery. Now, to make my approaches—Hem, hem! Ah! ma—[Bows] dam!—Plague on't, why should I disparage my parts by thinking what to say? None but dull rogues think: witty men, like rich fellows, are always ready for all expenses; while your blockheads, like poor needy scoundrels, are forc'd to examine their stock, and forecast the charges of the day. Here she comes; I'll seem not to see her, and try to win her with a new airy invention of my own, hem!

[Sings, walking about.]

Enter LADY FROTH.

I'm sick with love, ha, ha, ha! pr'ythee come cure me—I'm sick with, etc.—O, ye powers! O, my lady Froth, my lady Froth, my lady Froth! Heigho, break heart! Gods, I thank you. [Stands musing with his arms across.]

Lady F. O heaven's, Mr. Brisk! what's the matter?

Brisk. My lady Froth! your ladyship's most humble servant.—The matter, madam? nothing, madam; nothing at all, 'egad: I was fallen into the most agreeable amusement in the whole province of contemplation, that's all.—I'll seem to conceal my passion, and that will look like respect.

[Aside.]

Lady F. Bless me, why did you call out upon me so loud?

Brisk. O Lord! I, madam? I beseech your ladyship, when?

Lady F. Just now, as I came in. Bless me, why don't you know it?

Brisk. Not I, let me perish; but did I? strange! I confess your ladyship was in my thoughts; and I was in a sort of dream, that did in a manner represent a very pleasing object to my imagination: but—but did I indeed?—To see how love and murder will out! But did I really name my lady Froth?

Lady F. Three times aloud, as I love letters. But did you talk of love?—O, Parnassus! who would have thought Mr. Brisk could have been in love? ha, ha, ha! O heaven's, I thought you could have no mistress but the nine muses.

Brisk. No more I have, 'egad, for I adore 'em all in your ladyship. Let me perish, I don't know whether to be splenetic or airy upon't; the deuce take me, if I can tell whether I am glad or sorry, that your ladyship has made the discovery.

Lady F. O be merry, by all means.—Prince Volscius in love! Ha, ha, ha!

Brisk. O, barbarous, to turn me into ridicule! yet, ha, ha, ha, the deuce take me, I can't help laughing myself, ha, ha, ha! yet, by heaven's, I have a violent passion for your ladyship, seriously.

Lady F. Seriously? ha, ha, ha!

Brisk. Seriously, ha, ha, ha! 'Gad, I have, for all I laugh.

Lady F. Ha, ha, ha! What d'ye think I laugh at? ha, ha, ha!

Brisk. Me, 'egad; ha, ha!

Lady F. No; the deuce take me if I don't laugh at myself; for, hang me, if I have not a violent passion for Mr. Brisk; ha, ha, ha!

Brisk. Seriously?

Lady F. Seriously; ha, ha, ha!

Brisk. That's well enough, let me perish; ha, ha, ha! O, miraculous! what a happy discovery! Ah, my dear charming lady Froth.

Lady F. Oh, my adored Mr. Brisk!

[They embrace.]

Enter LORD FROTH.

Lord F. The company are all ready.—How now?

Brisk. Zoons, madam, there's my lord.

[Apart to her.]

Lady F. Take no notice; but observe me. [Aside] Now cast off, and meet me at the lower end of the room, and then join hands again. I could teach my lord this dance purely; but I vow, Mr. Brisk, I can't tell how to come so near any other man.—Oh, here's my lord; now you shall see me do it with him. [They pretend to practise part of a Country Dance.]

Lord F. Oh, I see there's no harm yet; but I don't like this familiarity. [Aside.]

Lady F. Shall you and I do our close dance, to show Mr. Brisk? [To Lord Froth.]

Lord F. No, my dear, do it with him.

Lady F. I'll do it with him, my lord, when you are out of the way.

Brisk. That's good, 'egad, that's good; deuce take me, I can hardly hold laughing in his face. [Aside.]

Lord F. Any other time, my dear; or we'll dance it below.

Lady F. With all my heart.

Brisk. Come, my lord, I'll wait on you.—My charming witty angel!

[Apart to Lady F.]

Lady F. We shall have whispering time enough, you know, since we are partners.

[Apart, and exeunt.]

Re-enter LADY PLIANT and CARELESS.

Lady P. O, Mr. Careless, Mr. Careless, I'm ruin'd, I'm undone.

Care. What's the matter, madam?

Lady P. O the unluckiest accident! I'm afraid I shan't live to tell it you.

Care. Heaven forbid! What is it?

Lady P. I'm in such a fright; the strangest quandary and premunire! I'm all over in a universal agitation.—O your letter, your letter! By an unfortunate mistake, I have given sir Paul your letter instead of his own.

Care. That was unlucky.

Lady P. O, yonder he comes reading of it; step in here, and advise me quickly, before he sees. [Exeunt.]

Re-enter SIR PAUL PLIANT, with the Letter.

Sir P. O Providence, what a conspiracy have I discovered;—but let me see to make an end on't. [Reads] Hum—After supper in the wardrobe by the gallery. If sir Paul should surprise us, I have a commission from him, to treat with you about the very matter of fact—Matter of fact! very pretty; it seems then I'm conducting to my own dishonour: why this is the very traitorous position of taking up arms by my authority against my person! Well, let me see. [Reads] Till then I languish in expectation of my adored charmer.—Dying. NED CARELESS.—

'Gadsbud, would that were matter of fact too! Die and be damn'd, for a Judas Maccabeus, and Iscariot both. O friendship! what art thou but a name! Henceforward let no man take a friend into the bosom of his family; for if he does—O, we know what will follow, from the example of sir Paul Pliant, and his bosom friend, Ned Careless. Have I for this been pinion'd night after night for three years past? Have I approached the marriage bed with reverence, as to a sacred shrine, and must I now find it polluted by foreign iniquity? O, my lady Pliant, you were chaste as ice; but you are melted now, and false as water! But Providence has been constant to me in discovering this conspiracy; still I am beholden to Providence: if it were not for Providence, sure, poor sir Paul, thy heart would break.

Re-enter LADY PLIANT.

Lady P. So, sir, I see you have read the letter,—Well, now, sir Paul, what do you think of your friend Careless? Has he been treacherous? or did you give his insolence a license to make trial of your wife's suspected virtue? D'ye see here? [Snatches the Letter as in anger] Look, read it!—'Gad's my life, if I thought it were so, I would this moment renounce all communication with you. Ungrateful monster! He? is it so? Ay, I see it; a plot, upon my honour; your guilty cheeks confess it. Oh, where shall wrong'd virtue fly for reparation? I'll be divorced this instant.

Sir P. 'Gadsbud, what shall I say? this is the strangest surprise! [Aside] Why, I don't know any thing at all; nor I don't know whether there be any thing at all in the world or no.

Lady P. I thought I should try you, false man. I, that never dissembled in my life, yet, to make trial of you, pretended to like that monster of iniquity, Careless; and found out that contrivance, to let you see this letter, which now I find was of your own inditing, I do, heathen, I do! See my face no more; I'll be divorced presently.

Sir P. O strange, what will become of me?—I'm so amazed, and so overjoy'd, so afraid, and so sorry. But did you give me this letter on purpose? he? Did you?

Lady P. Did I? Do you doubt me, Turk, Saracen? I have a cousin that's a proctor in the Commons; I'll go to him instantly. [Going.]

Sir P. Hold, stay, I beseech your ladyship—I'm so overjoyed—stay, I'll confess all.

Lady P. What will you confess, Jew?

Sir P. Why now, as I hope to be saved, I had no hand in this letter. Nay, hear me, I beseech your ladyship, the devil take me now, if he did not go beyond my commission. If I desired him to do any more than speak a good word only just for me, 'gadsbud, only for poor sir Paul, I'm an Anabaptist or a Jew, or what you please to call me.

Lady P. Why, is not here matter of fact?

Sir P. Ay; but by your own virtue and continency, that matter of fact is all his own doing. I confess I had a great desire to have some honours conferred upon me, which lay all in your ladyship's breast; and he being a well-spoken man, I desired him to intercede for me.

Lady P. Did you so, presumption? Oh, he comes, he comes; I cannot bear his sight.

[Exit.]

Re-enter CARELESS.

Care. Sir Paul, I'm glad I've met with you.—'Gad, I have said all I could, but can't prevail. Then my friendship to you has carried me a little further in this matter—

Sir P. Indeed! Well, sir—I'll dissemble with him a little. [Aside.]

Care. Why, faith, I have in my time known honest gentlemen abused by a pretended coyness in their wives, and I had a mind to try my lady's virtue: and when I could not prevail for you, 'gad, I pretended to be in love myself; but all in vain; she would not hear a word upon that subject: then I writ a letter to her; I don't know what effect that will have, but I'll be sure to tell you when I do; though, by this light, I believe her virtue is impregnable.

Sir P. O Providence, Providence! what discoveries are here made! Why, this is better, and more miraculous than the rest.

Care. What do you mean?

Sir P. I can't tell you, I'm so overjoyed; come along with me to my lady; I can't contain myself; come, my dear friend.

Care. So, so, so! this difficulty's over.

[Aside, and exeunt.]

Re-enter MELLEFONT, with MASKWELL.

Mel. Maskwell, I have been looking for you; 'tis within a quarter of eight.

Mask. My lady is just gone into my lord's closet; you had best steal into her chamber before she comes, and lie concealed there; otherwise she may lock the door when we are together, and you not easily get in to surprise us.

Mel. He! you say true.

Mask. You had best make haste; for, after she has made some apology to the company for her own and my lord's absence all this while, she'll retire to her chamber instantly.

Mel. I go this moment. Now, fortune, I defy thee. [Exit.]

Mask. I confess you may be allowed to be secure in your own opinion: the appearance is very fair; but I have an after-game to play that shall turn the tables; and here come the man that I must manage.

Enter LORD TOUCHWOOD.

Lord T. Maskwell, you are the man I wish'd to meet.

Mask. I am happy to be in the way of your lordship's commands.

Lord T. I have always found you prudent and careful in any thing that has concern'd me, or my family.

Mask. I were a villain else. I am bound by duty and gratitude, and my own inclination, to be ever your lordship's servant.

Lord T. Enough; you are my friend; I know it: yet there has been a thing in your knowledge, which has concerned me nearly, that you have concealed from me.

Mask. My lord!—

Lord T. Nay, I excuse your friendship to my unnatural nephew thus far; but I know you have been privy to his impious designs upon my wife. This evening she has told me all: her good nature concealed it as long as it was possible; but he perseveres so in villainy, that she has told me, even you were weary of dissuading him.

Mask. I am sorry, my lord, I can't make you an answer: this is an occasion in which I would not willingly be silent.

Lord T. I know you would excuse him; and I know as well that you can't.

Mask. Indeed I was in hopes it had been a youthful heat, that might have soon boiled over; but—

Lord T. Say on.

Mask. I have nothing more to say, my lord, but to express my concern; for I think his frenzy increases daily.

Lord T. How?—Give me but proof of it, ocular proof, that I may justify my dealing with him to the world—and share my fortunes.

Mask. O, my lord, consider that is hard: besides, time may work upon him. Then for me do to it! I have professed an everlasting friendship to him.

Lord T. He is your friend—and what am I?

Mask. I am answered.

Lord T. Fear not his displeasure; I will put you out of his, and fortune's power: and, for that thou art scrupulously honest, I will secure thy fidelity to him, and give my honour never to own any discovery that you shall make me.—Can you give me a demonstrative proof? speak.

Mask. I wish I could not. To be plain, my lord, I intended this evening to have tried all arguments to dissuade him from a design, which I suspect; and if I had not succeeded, to have informed your lordship of what I knew.

Lord T. I thank you. What is the villain's purpose?

Mask. He has owned nothing to me of late; and what I mean now is only a bare suspicion of my own.—If your lordship will meet me a quarter of an hour hence—there—in that lobby by my lady's bed-chamber, I shall be able to tell you more.

Lord T. I will.

Mask. My duty to your lordship makes me do a severe piece of justice.

Lord T. I will be secret, and reward your honesty beyond your hopes. [Exeunt]

SCENE II.—LADY TOUCHWOOD'S Bed-chamber.

Enter MELLEFONT.

Mel. Pray heaven my aunt keep touch with her assignation.—O, that her lord were but sweating behind this hanging, with the expectation of what I shall see!—Hist, she comes. Little does she think what a mine is just ready to spring under her feet.—But to my post.

[Retires.]

Enter LADY TOUCHWOOD.

Lady T. 'Tis eight o'clock: methinks I should have found him here. Who does not prevent the hour of love, outstays the time; for, to be duly punctual, is too slow.

Enter MASKWELL.

I was accusing you of neglect.

Mask. I confess you do reproach me when I see you here before me; but 'tis fit I should be still behindhand, still to be more and more indebted to your goodness.

Lady T. You can excuse a fault too well not to have been to blame: a ready answer shows you were prepared.

Mask. Guilt is ever at a loss, and confusion waits upon it; when innocence and bold truth are always ready for expression.

Lady T. Not in love: words are the weak support of cold indifference: love has no language to be heard.

Mask. Excess of joy has made me stupid.—Thus—

Lady T. Hold, let me lock the door first.

[Goes to the Door.]

Mask. That I did suppose. 'Twas well I left the private passage open. [Aside.]

Lady T. So, that's safe.]

Mask. And so may all your pleasures be, and secret as this kiss.

Mel. [Leaps out] And may all treachery be thus discovered.

Lady T. Ah!

[Shrieks.]

Mel. Villain!

[Offers to draw.]

Mask. Nay, then there's but one way. [Runs out.]

Mel. Say you so? Were you provided for an escape? Hold, madam, you have no more holes to your burrow. I'll stand between you and this sally-port.

Lady T. Shame, grief, and ruin haunt thee for this deceit:—O! I could rack myself, play the vulture to my own heart, and gnaw it piecemeal, for not boding to me this misfortune!

Mel. Be patient.

Lady T. Patient!

Mel. Consider I have you on the hook; you will but flounder yourself a-weary, and be nevertheless my prisoner.

Lady T. I'll hold my breath and die, but I'll be free.

Mel. O madam, have a care of dying unprepared. I doubt you have some unrepented sins that may hang heavy and retard your flight.

Lady T. What shall I do? whither shall I turn?—Hold in, my passion, and fall, fall a little, thou swelling heart! Let me have some intermission of this rage, and one minute's coolness to dissemble. [Aside. Weeps.]

Mel. You have been to blame. I like those tears, and hope they are of the purest kind—penitential tears.

Lady T. O, the scene was shifted quick before me; I had not time to think; I was surprised to see a monster in the glass, and now I find 'tis myself. Can you have mercy to forgive the faults I have imagined, but never put in practice?—O consider, consider how fatal you have been to me, you have already killed the quiet of this life. The love of you was the first wandering fire that e'er misled my steps; and while I had only that in view, I was betrayed into unthought-of ways of ruin.

Mel. May I believe this true?

Lady T. O, be not cruelly incredulous. How can you doubt these streaming eyes? Keep the severest eye o'er all my future conduct; and if I once relapse, let me not hope forgiveness: 'twill ever be in your power to ruin me. My lord shall sign to your desires; I will myself create your happiness, and Cynthia shall this night be your bride—do but conceal my failings, and forgive. [Kneels.]

Mel. Upon such terms, I will be ever yours in every honest way.

Lady T. Eternal blessings thank you!

Re-enter MASKWELL, with LORD TOUCHWOOD.

Mask. I have kept my word. He's here; but I must not be seen.

[Apart to Lord Touchwood, and exit.]

Lady T. Ha! my lord listening; then all's my own. [Aside.]

Mel. Nay, I beseech you rise.

Lady T. Never, never! I'll grow to the ground, be buried quick beneath it, e'er I'll be consenting to such a sin as incest! unnatural incest! [Aloud.]

Mel. Ha!

Lady T. O cruel man! will you not let me go? I'll forgive all that's past. O heaven, you will not force me!

Lord T. Monster! dog! your life shall answer this.

[Draws, and runs at Mellefont; is held by Lady Touchwood.]

Lady T. O, my lord! hold, hold, for mercy's sake!

Mel. Confusion! my uncle!—O the cursed sorceress!

Lady T. Moderate your rage, good my lord! he's mad, alas! he's mad; indeed he is, my lord, and knows not what he does. See how wild he looks!

Mel. By heaven, 'twere senseless not to be mad, and see such witchcraft.

Lady T. My lord, you hear him; he talks idly.

Lord T. Hence from my sight, thou living infamy to my name! When next I see that face, I'll write villain in't with my sword's point.

Mel. Now, by my soul, I will not go till I have made known my wrongs; nay, till I have made known yours, which, if possible, are greater—though she has all the host of hell her servants.

Lady T. Alas, he raves! talks very poetry! For heaven's sake, away, my lord; he'll either tempt you to extravagance, or commit some himself.

Mel. Death and furies! will you not hear me? Why, she laughs, grins, points at you, makes you her mark of insult and derision.

[As Lady Touchwood is going, she turns back and smiles at him.]

Lord T. I fear he's mad indeed. Let's send Maskwell to him.

Mel. Send him to her.

Lady T. Come, come, good my lord; my heart aches so, I shall faint if I stay.

[Exeunt Lord and Lady Touchwood.]

Mel. O, I could curse my stars, fate, and chance; all causes and accidents of fortune in this life! But to what purpose? They talk of sending Maskwell to me; I never had more need of him. But what can he do? Imagination cannot form a fairer or more plausible design than this of his, which has miscarried. O, my precious aunt! I shall never thrive, without I deal with the devil or another woman. Women, like flames, have a destroying power, Ne'er to be quench'd, till they themselves devour. [Exit.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—The Gallery in LORD TOUCHWOOD'S House.

Enter LADY TOUCHWOOD and MASKWELL.

Lady T. Was't not lucky?

Mask. Lucky! fortune is your own, and 'tis her interest so to be; I believe you can control her power, and she fears it; though chance brought my lord, 'twas your own art that turned it to advantage.

Lady T. 'Tis true, it might have been my ruin; but yonder's my lord; I believe he's coming to find you; I'll not be seen. [Exit.]

Mask. So! I durst not own my introducing my lord, though it succeeded well for her; for she would have suspected a design, which I should have been puzzled to excuse. My lord is thoughtful; I'll be so too; yet he shall know my thoughts, or think he does.

Enter LORD TOUCHWOOD.

What have I done?

Lord T. Talking to himself! [Aside.]

Mask. 'Twas honest; and shall I be rewarded for it? No, 'twas honest, therefore

I shan't: nay, rather, therefore I ought not; for it rewards itself.

Lord T. Unequalled virtue! [Aside.

Mask. But should it be known, then I have lost a friend. He was an ill man, and I have gained; for half myself I lent him, and that I have recalled; so I have served myself: and what is yet better, I have served a worthy lord, to whom I owe myself.

Lord T. Excellent man! [Aside.

Mask. Yet I am wretched. O, there is a secret burns within this breast, which, should it once blaze forth, would ruin all, consume my honest character, and brand me with the name of villain.

Lord T. Ha! [Aside.

Mask. O, should it once be known I love fair Cynthia, all this that I have done would look like a rival's malice, false friendship to my lord, and base self interest. Let me perish first, and from this hour avoid all sight and speech; and, if I can, all thought of that pernicious beauty.

[Seems to start at seeing Lord Touchwood.

Lord T. Start not!—let guilty and dishonest souls start at the revelation of their thoughts; but be thou fixed, as is thy virtue. Honest Maskwell! thy and my good genius led me hither: mine, in that I have discovered so much manly virtue; thine, in that thou shalt have due reward of all thy worth. Give me thy hand: my nephew is the alone remaining branch of all our ancient family; him I thus blow away, and constitute thee in his room, to be my heir.

Mask. Now fate forbid—

Lord T. No more; I have resolved. The writings are ready drawn, and wanted nothing but to be signed, and have his name inserted: yours will fill the blank as well—I will have no reply. Let me command this time, for 'tis the last in which I will assume authority: hereafter you shall rule where I have power.

Mask. I humbly would petition—

Lord T. Is't for yourself? [Maskwell pauses] I'll hear of nought for any body else.

Mask. Then witness, heaven, for me, this wealth and honour was not of my seeking; nor would I build my fortune on another's ruin; I had but one desire.

Lord T. Thou shalt enjoy it. If all I'm worth in wealth or interest can purchase Cynthia, she is thine. I'm sure sir Paul's consent will follow fortune; I'll quickly show him which way that is going.

Mask. You oppress me with bounty.

Lord T. I will confirm it, and rejoice with thee. [Exit.

Mask. This is prosperous indeed! Why, let him find me out a villain: settled in possession of a fair estate, and full fruition of my love, I'll bear the railings of a losing gamester. But should he find me out before! 'tis dangerous to delay. Let me think—Should my lord proceed to treat openly of my marriage with Cynthia, all will be discovered, and Mellefont can be no longer blinded. It must not be. Nay, should my lady know it—ay, then were fine work indeed! her fury would spare nothing, though she involv'd herself in ruin. No, it must be by stratagem: I must deceive Mellefont once more, and get my lord to consent to my private management. He comes opportunely. Now will I, in my old way, discover the whole and real truth of the matter to him, that he may not suspect one word on't.

No mask, like open truth, to cover lies;
As to go naked is the best disguise.

Enter MELLEFONT.

Mel. O, Maskwell, what hopes? I am confounded in a maze of thoughts, each leading into one another, and all ending in perplexity. My uncle will not see nor hear me.

Mask. No matter, sir; don't trouble your head; all's in my power.

Mel. How, for heaven's sake?

Mask. Little do you think that your aunt has kept her word. How she wrought my lord into the dotage I know not; but he's gone to sir Paul about my marriage with Cynthia, and has appointed me his heir.

Mel. The devil he has! What's to be done?

Mask. I have it: it must be by stratagem; for it's in vain to make application to him. I think I have that in my head that cannot fail. Where's Cynthia?

Mel. In the garden.

Mask. Let us go and consult her. My life for yours I cheat my lord. [Exeunt.

Re-enter LORD and LADY TOUCHWOOD.

Lady T. Maskwell your heir, and marry Cynthia!

Lord T. I cannot do too much for so much merit.

Lady T. But this is a thing of too great moment to be so suddenly resolved. Why Cynthia? Why must he be married? Is there not reward enough in raising his low fortune, but he must mix his blood with mine, and wed my niece? How know you that my brother will consent, or she? Nay, he himself, perhaps, may have affections elsewhere.

Lord T. No; I am convinced he loves her.

Lady T. Maskwell love Cynthia? Impossible.

Lord T. I tell you he confessed it to me.

Lady T. Confusion! how's this? [Aside.

Lord T. His humility long stifled his passion, and his love of Mellefont would have made him still conceal it; but, by encouragement, I wrung the secret from him: and know, he's no way to be rewarded but in her. I'll defer my further proceedings in it till you have considered it; but remember how we are both indebted to him. [Exit.

Lady T. Both indebted to him! Yes, we are both indebted to him, if you knew all. Villain! Oh, I am wild with this surprise of treachery! it is impossible, it cannot be.—He love Cynthia! What, have I been dupe to his designs; his property only? Now I see what made him false to Mellefont. What shall I do? How shall I think? I cannot think. All my designs are lost, my love unsated, my revenge unfinished, and fresh cause of fury from unthought-of plagues.

Enter SIR PAUL PLIANT.

Sir P. Madam—sister, my lady, sister! did you see my lady, my wife?

Lady T. O, torture!

Sir P. 'Gadsbud, I can't find her high nor low:—where can she be, think you?

Lady T. Where she's serving you as all your sex ought to be served, making you a beast. Don't you know that you're a fool, brother?

Sir P. A fool! he, he, he! you're merry—No, no, not I; I know no such matter.

Lady T. Why then you don't know half your happiness.

Sir P. That's a jest, with all my heart, faith and troth. But harkye, my lord told me something of a revolution of things; I don't know what to make on't: 'gadsbud, I must consult my wife. He talks of disinheriting his nephew, and I don't know what. Look you, sister, I must know what my girl has to trust to, or not a syllable of a wedding, 'gadsbud, to show you that I am not a fool.

Lady T. Hear me:—consent to the breaking off this marriage, and the promoting any other, without consulting me, and I'll renounce all blood, all relation, and concern with you for ever: nay, I'll be your enemy, and pursue you to destruction; I'll tear your eyes out, and tread you under my feet.

Sir P. Why, what's the matter now? Good Lord, what's all this for? Pho, here's a joke indeed.—Why, where's my wife?

Lady T. With Careless, fool! most likely.

Sir P. O, if she be with Mr. Careless 'tis well enough.

Lady T. Fool, sot, insensible ox! But remember what I said to you, or you had better see my face no more; by this light, you had. [Exit.]

Sir P. You're a passionate woman, 'gadsbud; but, to say truth, all our family are choleric; I am the only peaceable person amongst 'em. [Exit.]

Re-enter MELLEFONT and MASKWELL, with CYNTHIA.

Mel. I know no other way but this he has proposed, if you have love enough to run the venture.

Cyn. I don't know whether I have love enough, but I find I have obstinacy enough to pursue whatever I have once resolved, and a true female courage to oppose any thing that resists my will, though 'twere reason itself.

Mask. That's right. Well, I'll secure the writings, and run the hazard along with you.

Cyn. But how can the coach be got ready without suspicion?

Mask. Leave it to my care; that shall be so far from being suspected, that it shall be got ready by my lord's own order.

Mel. How?

Mask. Why, I intend to tell my lord the whole matter of our contrivance, that's my way.

Mel. I don't understand you.

Mask. Why, I'll tell my lord I laid this plot with you on purpose to betray you; and that which put me upon it, was the finding it impossible to gain the lady any other way but in the hopes of her marrying you.

Mel. So—

Mask. So!—why so: while you're busied in making yourself ready, I'll wheedle her into the coach, and instead of you, borrow my lord's chaplain, and so run away with her myself.

Mel. O, I conceive you: you'll tell him so.

Mask. Tell him so! ay; why you don't think I mean to do so?

Mel. No, no; ha, ha! I dare swear thou wilt not.

Mask. Therefore, for our further security, I would have you disguised like a parson, that, if my lord should have curiosity to peep, he may not discover you in the coach, but think the cheat is carried on as he would have it.

Mel. Excellent Maskwell!

Mask. Well, get yourselves ready, and meet me in half an hour, yonder in my lady's dressing-room: I'll send the chaplain to you with his robes: I have made him my own, and ordered him to meet us to-morrow morning at St. Alban's; there we will sum up this account to all our satisfaction.

Mel. Should I begin to thank or praise thee, I should waste the little time we have. [Exit.]

Mask. Madam, you will be ready?

Cyn. I will be punctual to the minute.

[Going.]

Mask. Stay, I have a doubt. Upon second thoughts we had better meet in the chaplain's chamber here; there is a back way into it, so that you need not come through this door, and a pair of private stairs leading down to the stables. It will be more convenient.

Cyn. I am guided by you; but Mellefont will mistake.

Mask. No, no; I'll after him immediately, and tell him. [Exit Cynthia] Why, qui vult decipi decipiat. 'Tis no fault of mine; I have told 'em in plain terms how easy 'tis for me to cheat 'em; and if they will not hear the serpent's hiss, they must be stung into experience and future caution.—Now to prepare my lord to consent to this. But first, I must instruct my little Levite; he promised me to be within at this hour. Mr. Saygrace, Mr. Saygrace!

[Goes to the Chamber-door, and knocks.]

Say. [Within] Sweet sir, I will but pen the last line of an acrostic, and be with you in the twinkling of an ejaculation, or before you can—

Mask. Nay, good Mr. Saygrace, do not prolong the time, by describing to me the shortness of your stay; rather, if you please, defer the finishing of your wit, and let us talk about our business; it shall be tithes in your way.

Enter SAYGRACE.

Say. You shall prevail; I would break off in the middle of a sermon to do you a pleasure.

Mask. You could not do me a greater, except the business in hand. Have you provided a habit for Mellefont?

Say. I have; it is ready in my chamber, together with a clean-starched band and cuffs.

Mask. Good. Let them be carried to him. Have you stitched the gown sleeve, that he may be puzzled, and waste time in putting it on?

Say. I have; the gown will not be indued without perplexity.

Mask. Meet me in half an hour, here in your own chamber. When Cynthia comes, let there be no light, and do not speak, that she may not distinguish you from Mellefont. I'll urge haste, to excuse your silence.

Say. You have no more commands?

Mask. None; your text is short.

Say. But pithy; and I will handle it with discretion. [Exit.]

Mask. It will be the first you have so served.

Re-enter LORD TOUCHWOOD.

Lord T. Sure, I was born to be controlled by those I should command! my very slaves will shortly give me rules how I shall govern them!

Mask. I am concerned to see your lordship discomposed.

Lord T. Have you seen my wife lately, or disobliged her?

Mask. No, my lord. What can this mean? [Aside.]

Lord T. Then Mellefont has urged somebody to incense her. Something she has heard of you, which carries her beyond the bounds of patience.

Mask. This I feared. [Aside] Did not your lordship tell her of the honours you designed me?

Lord T. Yes.

Mask. 'Tis that: you know my lady has a high spirit; she thinks I am unworthy.

Lord T. Unworthy! 'tis an ignorant pride in her to think so. Honesty to me is true nobility. However, 'tis my will it shall be so, and that should be convincing to her as much as reason. I'll not be wife-ridden. Were it possible it should be done this night.

Mask. Ha! he meets my wishes. [Aside] Few things are impossible to willing minds.

Lord T. Instruct me how this may be done, and you shall see I want no inclination.

Mask. I had laid a small design for tomorrow (as love will be inventing), which I thought to communicate to your lordship: but it may be as well done to-night.

Lord T. Here's company: come this way, and tell me. [Exeunt.]

Re-enter CYNTHIA, with CARELESS.

Care. Is not that he, now gone out with my lord?

Cyn. I am convinced there's treachery. The confusion that I saw your father in, my lady Touchwood's passion, with what imperfectly I overheard between my lord and her, confirm me in my fears. Where's Mellefont?

Care. Here he comes.

Re-enter MELLEFONT.

Cyn. Did Maskwell tell you any thing of the chaplain's chamber?

Mel. No, my dear. Will you get ready? The things are all in my chamber; I want nothing but the habit.

Care. You are betrayed, and Maskwell is the villain I always thought him.

Cyn. When you were gone, he said his mind was changed; and bid me meet him in the chaplain's room, pretending immediately to follow you, and give you notice.

Care. There's Saygrace tripping by with a bundle under his arm. He cannot be ignorant that Maskwell means to use his chamber; let's in, and examine him.

Mel. 'Tis loss of time; I cannot think him false. [Exeunt Careless and Mellefont.]

Re-enter LORD TOUCHWOOD.

Cyn. My lord musing! [Aside.]

Lord T. He has a quick invention, if this were suddenly designed. Yet, he says, he had prepared my chaplain already.

Cyn. How's this? Now I fear, indeed. [Aside.]

Lord T. Cynthia here! Alone, fair cousin, and melancholy.

Cyn. Your lordship was thoughtful.

Lord T. My thoughts were on serious business, not worth your hearing.

Cyn. Mine were on treachery concerning you, and may be worth your hearing.

Lord T. Treachery concerning me! Pray be plain. What noise?

Mask. [Within] Will you not hear me?

Lady T. [Within] No, monster! traitor! No.

Cyn. My lady and Maskwell! This may be lucky. My lord, let me entreat you to stand behind this screen and listen; perhaps this chance will give you proof of what you never could have believed from my suspicions.

[They retire behind the Screen.]

Re-enter MASKWELL, and LADY TOUCHWOOD with a Dagger.

Lady T. You want but leisure to invent fresh falsehood, and sooth me to a fond belief of all your fictions: but I will stab the lie that's forming in your heart, and save a sin in pity to your soul.

Mask. Strike then, since you will have it so.

Lady T. Ha! a steady villain to the last!

Mask. Come, why do you dally with me thus?

Lady T. Thy stubborn temper shocks me, and you knew it would. This is cunning all; I know thee well; but thou shalt miss thy aim.

Mask. Ha, ha, ha!

Lady T. Ha! do you mock my rage? Then this shall punish your fond rash contempt. Again smile? And such a smile as speaks in ambiguity! Ten thousand meanings lurk in each corner of that various face; O! that they were written in thy heart, that I with this might lay thee open to my sight! But then 'twill be too late to know—Thou hast, thou hast found the only way to turn my rage; too well thou knowest my jealous soul could never bear uncertainty. Speak then, and tell me! Yet are you silent? O, I am wildered in all passions! But thus my anger melts. [Weeps] Here, take this poniard; for my very spirits faint, and I want strength to hold it: thou hast disarm'd my soul.

[Gives him the Dagger.]

Mask. So, 'tis well; let your wild fury have a vent: and when you have temper tell me.

Lady T. Now, now, now I am calm, and can hear you.

Mask. Thanks, my invention; and now I have it for you. [Aside] First, tell me what urged you to this violence? for your passion broke in such imperfect terms, that yet I am to learn the cause.

Lady T. My lord himself surprised me with the news, you were to marry Cynthia; that you had owned your love to him; and his indulgence would assist you to attain your ends.

Mask. I grant you, in appearance, all is true; I seemed consenting to my lord, nay, transported with the blessing: but could you think that I, who had been happy in your lov'd embraces, could e'er be fond of an inferior slavery?—No. Yet, though I dote on each last favour more than all the rest, though I would give a limb for every look you cheaply throw away on any other object of your love, yet, so far I prize your pleasures o'er my own, that all this seeming plot that I have laid, has been to gratify your taste, and cheat the world to prove a faithful rogue to you.

Lady T. If this were true; but how can it be?

Mask. I have so contrived, that Mellefont will presently, in the chaplain's habit, wait for Cynthia in your dressing-room; but I have put the change upon her, that she may be otherwise employed. Do you muffle yourself, and meet him in her stead. You may go privately by the back stairs, and unperceived; there you may propose to reinstate him in his uncle's favour, if he'll comply with your desires. His case is desperate, and I believe he'll yield to any conditions: if not, here, take this; you may employ it better than in the heart of one, who is nothing when not yours.

[Gives her the Dagger.]

Lady T. Thou canst deceive every body: nay, thou hast deceived me. But 'tis as I would wish.—Trusty villain! I could worship thee.

Mask. No more.—It wants but a few minutes of the time; and Mellefont's love will carry him there before his hour.

Lady T. I go, I fly, incomparable Maskwell!

Mask. So! This was a pinch indeed! My invention was upon the rack, and made discovery of her last plot.—I hope Cynthia and my chaplain will be ready. I'll prepare for the expedition.

[Exit. Cynthia and Lord Touchwood come forward.]

Cyn. Now, my lord!

Lord T. Astonishment binds up my rage! Villany upon villany! Heavens, what a long track of dark deceit has this discovered! I am confounded when I look back, and want a clue to guide me through the various mazes of unheard-of treachery. My wife!—Oh, torture!—my shame, my ruin!

Cyn. My lord, have patience; and be sensible how great our happiness is, that this discovery was not made too late.

Lord T. I thank you. Yet it may be still too late, if we don't presently prevent the execution of their plots.—She'll think to meet him in that dressing-room: was't not so? And Maskwell will expect you in the chaplain's chamber.—For once, I'll add my plot too.—Let us haste to find out, and inform my nephew; and do you, quickly as you can, bring all the company into this gallery.—I'll expose the traitress and the villain.

[Exeunt.]

Re-enter SIR PAUL PLIANT, with LORD FROTH.

Lord F. By heavens, I have slept an age. Sir Paul, what o'clock is't? Past eight, on my conscience. My lady's is the most inviting couch, and a slumber there is the prettiest amusement!—But where's all the company?

Sir P. The company? 'Gadsbud, I don't know, my lord; but here's the strangest revolution! all turned topsy-turvy, as I hope for Providence.

Lord F. O heavens, what's the matter? Where's my wife?

Sir P. All turned topsy-turvy, as sure as a gun.

Lord F. How do you mean? My wife?

Sir P. The strangest posture of affairs!

Lord F. What, my wife?

Sir P. No, no; I mean the family.—Your lady? I saw her go into the garden with Mr. Brisk.

Lord F. How, where, when, what to do?

Sir P. I suppose they have been laying their heads together.

Lord F. How?

Sir P. Nay, only about poetry, I suppose, my lord; making couplets.

Lord F. Couplets!

Sir P. O, here they come.

Enter LADY FROTH and BRISK.

Brisk. My lord, your humble servant; sir Paul, yours.—The finest night!

Lady F. My dear, Mr. Brisk and I have been stargazing I don't know how long.

Sir P. Does it not tire your ladyship? Are you not weary with looking up?

Lady F. O, no; I love it violently.—My dear, you're melancholy.

Lord F. No, my dear, I'm but just awake.

Lady F. Snuff some of my spirit of hartshorn.

Lord F. I've some of my own, thank you, my dear.

Lady F. Well, I swear, Mr. Brisk, you understand astronomy like an old Egyptian.

Brisk. Not comparable to your ladyship; you are the very Cynthia of the skies, and queen of stars.

Lady F. That's because I have no light, but what's by reflection from you, who are the sun.

Brisk. Madam, you have eclipsed me quite, let me perish; I can't answer that.

Lady F. No matter.—Harkye, shall you and I make an almanac together?

Brisk. With all my soul. Your ladyship has made me the man in't<sup>1</sup>) already, I'm so full of the wounds which you have given.

Lady F. O, finely taken! I swear now you are even with me.—O Parnassus! you have an infinite deal of wit.

Sir P. So he has, 'gadsbud! and so has your ladyship.

Re-enter CARELESS and CYNTHIA, with LADY PLIANT.

Lady P. You tell me most surprising things.—Bless me, who would ever trust a man?—O, my heart aches for fear they should be all deceitful alike.

1) Moore's Almanac has got a very curious wood-cut of a man, marked with the different signs and planets that govern the different parts of the face and body, according to Aristotle's Physiognomy, and he thus appears to be full of wounds; for instance, the forehead is governed by Mars, the right eye is under the dominion of Sol, the left eye is ruled by the Moon, the right ear is the care of Jupiter, the left of Saturn, the rule of the nose is claimed by Venus, and Mercury seizes upon the mouth. The signs of the Zodiac have also their share in the government, and form the House of Commons of the realm.

Care. You need not fear, madam; you have charms to fix inconstancy itself.

Lady P. O dear, you make me blush.

Lord F. Come, my dear, shall we take leave of my lord and lady?

Cyn. They'll wait upon your lordship presently.

Lady F. Mr. Brisk, my coach shall set you down.

[Lady Touchwood shrieks from within.]

All. What's the matter?

LADY TOUCHWOOD, muffled up, runs in affrighted; followed by LORD TOUCHWOOD, dressed like a Parson, with a Dagger
in his Hand.

Lady T. O, I'm betrayed.—Save me! help me!

Lord T. Now what evasion, wicked woman?

Lady T. Stand off; let me go. [Exit.]

Lord T. Go, and thy own infamy pursue thee!—You stare, as you were all amazed. I don't wonder at it; but too soon you will know mine, and that woman's, shame.

[Throws off his Gown.]

Re-enter MELLEFONT, disguised in a Parson's Habit, with two Servants, bringing in MASKWELL.

Mel. Nay, by heaven, you shall be seen.
[To Maskwell] Careless, your hand.—Do you hold down your head? [To Maskwell] Yes, I am your chaplain. Look in the face of your injured friend, thou wonder of all falsehood.

[Throws off his Disguise.]

Lord T. Are you silent, monster?

Mel. Good heavens! how I believed and loved this man! Take him hence, for he's a disease to my sight.

Lord T. Secure the manifold villain.

[Servants take Maskwell off.]

Care. Miracle of ingratitude!

Sir P. O Providence, Providence, what discoveries are here!

Brisk. This is all very surprising, let me perish.

Lady F. You know I told you Saturn looked a little more angry than usual.

Lord T. We'll think of punishment at leisure. But let me hasten to do justice, in rewarding virtue and wronged innocence.
Nephew, I hope I have your pardon, and Cynthia's.

Mel. We are your lordship's creatures.

Lord T. And be each other's comfort. Let me join your hands. Uninterrupted bliss attend you both! May circling joys tread round each happy year of your long lives!

Let secret villany from hence be warn'd,
Howe'er in private mischiefs are conceiv'd,
Torture and shame attend their open birth.
Like vipers in the breast, base treach'ry lies,
Still gnawing that whence first it did arise;
No sooner born, but the vile parent dies.

Exeunt.

THE WAY OF THE WORLD,

Comedy by W. Congreve. Acted at Lincoln's Inn Fields. 1700. This was the last play its author wrote, and perhaps the best; the language is pure, the wit genuine, the characters are natural, and the painting is highly finished; yet, such is the strange capriciousness of public taste, that, notwithstanding the great and deserved reputation this author had acquired by his three former comedies, this before us met with but indifferent success; while his Mourning Bride, a piece of not the twentieth part of its merit, was in the full meridian of applause. It is not very improbable (says Mr. Baker) that this testimonial of want of judgment in the audience might be the motive for the author's quitting the stage so early; for, though he was at that time in the prime of life, not above twenty-seven years of age, and lived about twenty-nine years afterwards, he never obliged the public with any other dramatic piece. Time, however, has since opened the eyes of the town to its perfections; and it is now as frequently performed as any of his other plays.—Mr. Baker's memory seems to have failed him when he asserted, that Congreve never obliged the public with any dramatic piece after this; his Judgment of Paris was performed in the following year; and his Semle, an opera, in 1707; and these, though not very important works, are still dramatic pieces.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A Chocolate House.

MIRABELL and FAINALL, rising from Cards,
BETTY waiting.

Mir. You are a fortunate man, Mr. Fainall.

Fain. Have we done?

Mir. What you please. I'll play on to entertain you.

Fain. No, I'll give you your revenge another time, when you are not so indifferent; you are thinking of something else now, and play too negligently; the coldness of a losing game-ster lessens the pleasure of the winner. I'd no more play with a man that slighted his ill fortune, than I'd make love to a woman who undervalued the loss of her reputation.

Mir. You have a taste extremely delicate, and are for refining on your pleasures.

Fain. Pr'ythee, why so reserved? Something has put you out of humour.

Mir. Not at all: I happen to be grave to-day; and you are gay; that's all.

Fain. Confess, Millamant and you quarrelled last night, after I left you: my fair cousin has some humours that would tempt the patience of a stoic. What, some coxcomb came in, and was well received by her, while you were by?

Mir. Witwould and Petulant! and what was worse, her aunt, your wife's mother, my evil genius; or to sum up all in her own name, my old lady Wishfort came in.

Fain. O there it is then. She has a lasting passion for you, and with reason. What, then my wife was there?

Mir. Yes, and Mrs. Marwood, and three or four more, whom I never saw before. Seeing me, they all put on their grave faces, whispered one another, then complained aloud of the vapours, and after fell into a profound silence.

Fain. They had a mind to be rid of you,

Mir. For which reason I resolved not to stir. At last the good old lady broke through her painful taciturnity, with an invective against long visits. I would not have understood her, but Millamant joining in the argument, I rose, and with a constrained smile told her, I thought nothing was so easy as to know when a visit began to be troublesome; she reddened, and I withdrew, without expecting her reply.

Fain. You were to blame to resent what she spoke only in compliance with her aunt.

Mir. She is more mistress of herself than to be under the necessity of such resignation.

Fain. What! though half her fortune depends upon her marrying with my lady's approbation?

Mir. I was then in such a humour, that I should have been better pleased if she had been less discreet.

Fain. Now I remember, I wonder not they were weary of you; last night was one of their cabal nights; they have 'em three times a week, and meet by turns, at one another's apartments! where they come together, like the coroner's inquest,<sup>1)</sup> to sit upon the murder'd reputations of the week. You and I are excluded; and it was once proposed that all the male sex should be excepted; but somebody moved, that, to avoid scandal, there might be one man of the community; upon which motion Witwould and Petulant were enrolled members.

Mir. And who may have been the foundress of this sect? My lady Wishfort, I warrant, who publishes her detestation of mankind; and, full of the vigour of fifty-five, declares for a friend and ratafia; and let posterity shift for itself, she'll breed no more.

Fain. The discovery of your sham addresses to her, to conceal your love to her niece, has provoked this separation: had you dissembled better, things might have continued in the state of nature.

Mir. I did as much as man could, with any reasonable conscience; I proceeded to the very last act of flattery with her, and was guilty of a song in her commendation. Nay, I got a friend to put her into a lampoon, and compliment her with the addresses of a young fellow. The devil's in't if an old woman is to be flatter'd farther. But for the discovery of this amour, I am indebted to your friend, or your wife's friend, Mrs. Marwood.

Fain. What should provoke her to be your enemy, unless she has made you advances which you have slighted? Women do not easily forgive omissions of that nature.

Mir. She was always civil to me, till of late; I confess I am not one of those coxcombs who are apt to interpret a woman's good manners to her prejudice; and think that she who does not refuse 'em every thing, can refuse 'em nothing.

Fain. You are a gallant man, Mirabell; and though you may have cruelty enough not to answer a lady's advances, you have too much generosity not to be tender of her honour. Yet you speak with an indifference which seems to be affected, and confesses you are conscious of a negligence.

Mir. You pursue the argument with a distrust that seems to be unaffected, and confesses you are conscious of a concern for which the lady is more indebted to you, than is your wife.

Fain. Fie, fie, friend, if you grow censorious, I must leave you. I'll look upon the gamesters in the next room.

Mir. Who are they?

Fain. Petulant and Witwould. Bring me some chocolate. [Exit.]

Mir. Betty, what says your clock?

Betty. Turn'd of the last canonical hour, sir.

Mir. How pertinently the jade answers me!

[Aside] Ha! almost one o'clock! [Looking on his Watch] O, y'are come.

Enter Footman.

Well; is the grand affair over? You have been something tedious.

Foot. Sir, there's such coupling at Pancras, that they stand behind one another, as 'twere in a country dance. Ours was the last couple to lead up; and no hopes appearing of dispatch, besides, the parson growing hoarse, we were afraid his lungs would have failed before it came to our turn; so we drove round to Duke's-place; and there they were rivetted in a trice.

Mir. So, so; you are sure they are married?

Foot. Incontestibly, sir: I am witness.

Mir. Have you the certificate?

Foot. Here it is, sir.

Mir. Has the tailor brought Waitwell's clothes home, and the new liveries?

Foot. Yes, sir.

Mir. That's well. Do you go home again, d'ye hear, bid Waitwell shake his ears, and dame Partlet rustle up her feathers, and meet me at one o'clock by Rosamond's-pond, that I may see her before she returns to her lady; and as you tender your ears, be secret.

[Exit Footman.]

Enter FAINALL.

Fain. Joy of your success, Mirabell; you look pleased.

Mir. Ay; I have been engaged in a matter of some sort of mirth, which is not yet ripe for discovery. I am glad this is not a cabal-night. I wonder, Fainall, that you, who are married, and of consequence should be dis-

1) The business of a coroner (coronator) is, to assemble twelve of the inhabitants of the parish, to examine into the cause of the death of any one who has been killed; and the verdict given in their sitting in cases of murder, is of very great weight in the affair.

creet, will suffer your wife to be of such a party.

Fain. Faith, I am not jealous. Besides, most who are engaged are women and relations; and for the men, they are of a kind too contemptible to give scandal.

Mir. I am of another opinion. The greater the coxcomb, always the more the scandal: for a woman who is not a fool, can have but one reason for associating with a man who is one.

Fain. Are you jealous as often as you see Witwould entertained by Millamant?

Mir. Of her understanding I am, if not of her person.

Fain. You do her wrong; for, to give her her due, she has wit.

Mir. She has beauty enough to make any man think so; and complaisance enough not to contradict him who shall tell her so.

Fain. For a passionate lover, methinks you are a man somewhat too discerning in the failings of your mistress.

Mir. And for a discerning man, somewhat too passionate a lover; for I like her with all her faults; nay, like her for her faults. Her follies are so natural, or so artful, that they become her; and those affectations, which in another woman would be odious, serve but to make her more agreeable. I'll tell thee, Fainall, she once used me with that insolence, that in revenge I took her to pieces; sifted her, and separated her failings; I studied 'em and got 'em by rote. The catalogue was so large, that I was not without hopes, one day or other, to hate her heartily: to which end I so used myself to think of 'em, that at length, contrary to my design and expectation, they gave me every hour less disturbance; till in a few days it became habitual to me, to remember 'em without being displeased. They are now grown as familiar to me as my own frailties; and in all probability, in a little time longer, I shall like 'em as well.

Fain. Marry her, marry her; be half as well acquainted with her charms, as you are with her defects, and my life on't you are your own man again.

Mir. Say you so?

Fain. I, I, I have experience: I have a wife, and so forth.

Enter Messenger.

Mess. Is one squire Witwould here?

Betty. Yes; what's your business?

Mess. I have a letter for him, from his brother sir Wilful, which I am charged to deliver into his own hands.

Betty. He's in the next room, friend. That way.

[Exit Messenger.]

Mir. What, is the chief of that noble family in town, sir Wilful Witwould?

Fain. He is expected to-day. Do you know him?

Mir. I have seen him. He promises to be an extraordinary person. I think you have the honour to be related to him.

Fain. Yes; he is half-brother to this Witwould by a former wife, who was sister to my lady Wishfort, my wife's mother. If you marry Millamant, you must call cousins too.

Mir. I would rather be his relation than his acquaintance.

Fain. He comes to town in order to equip himself for travel.

Mir. For travel! Why, the man that I mean is above forty.

Fain. No matter for that; 'tis for the honour of England, that all Europe should know we have blockheads of all ages.

Mir. I wonder there is not an act of parliament to save the credit of the nation, and prohibit the exportation of fools.

Fain. By no means, 'tis better as 'tis; 'tis better to trade with a little loss, than to be quite eaten up with being overstock'd.

Mir. Pray are the follies of this knight-errant, and those of the squire, his brother, any thing related?

Fain. Not at all; Witwould grows by the knight, like a medlar grafted on a crab. One will melt in your mouth, and t'other set your teeth on edge; one is all pulp, and the other all core.

Mir. So one will be rotten before he be ripe, and the other will be rotten without ever being ripe at all.

Fain. Sir Wilful is an odd mixture of bashfulness and obstinacy. But when he's drunk, he's as loving as the monster in the Tempest; and much after the same manner. To give t'other his due, he has something of good nature, and does not always want wit.

Mir. Not always; but as often as his memory fails him, and his common-place of comparisons. He is a fool with a good memory, and some few scraps of other folks' wit. He is one whose conversation can never be approved, yet it is now and then to be endured. He has indeed one good quality, he is not exceptionous; for he so passionately affects the reputation of understanding raillery, that he will construe an affront into a jest; and call downright rudeness and ill language, satire and fire.

Fain. If you have a mind to finish his picture, you have an opportunity to do it at full length. Behold the original.

Enter Witwould.

Wit. Afford me your compassion, my dears; pity me, Fainall; Mirabell, pity me.

Mir. I do, from my soul.

Fain. Why, what's the matter?

Wit. No letters for me, Betty?

Betty. Did not a messenger bring you one but now, sir?

Wit. Ay, but no other?

Betty. No, sir.

Wit. That's hard, that's very hard! a messenger, a mule, a beast of burden; he has brought me a letter from the fool my brother, as heavy as a panegyric in a funeral sermon, or a copy of commendatory verses from one poet to another. And what's worse, 'tis as sure a forerunner of the author, as an epistle dedicatory.

Mir. A fool, and your brother, Witwould!

Wit. Ay, ay, my half-brother. My half-brother he is, no nearer upon honour.

Mir. Then 'tis possible he may be but half a fool.

Wit. Good, good, Mirabell le drole! Good, good; hang him, don't let's talk of him. Fainall, how does your lady? Gad, I say any thing in the world to get this fellow out of my head. I beg pardon that I should ask a man of pleasure, and the town, a question at once so foreign and domestic. But I talk like an old maid at a marriage; I don't know what I say: but she's the best woman in the world.

Fain. 'Tis well you don't know what you say, or else your commendation would go near to make me either vain or jealous.

Wit. No man in town lives well with a wife but Fainall. Your judgment, Mirabell?

Mir. You had better step and ask his wife, if you would be credibly informed.

Wit. Mirabell.

Mir. Ay.

Wit. My dear, I ask ten thousand pardons. —Gad, I have forgot what I was going to say to you.

Mir. I thank you heartily, heartily.

Wit. No, but, pr'ythee, excuse me—my memory is such a memory.

Mir. Have a care of such apologies, Witwould; for I never knew a fool but he affected to complain, either of the spleen or his memory.

Fain. What have you done with Petulant?

Wit. He's reckoning his money,—my money it was. I have had no luck to-day.

Fain. You may allow him to win of you at play; for you are sure to be too hard for him at repartee. Since you monopolize the wit that is between you, the fortune must be his of course.

Mir. I don't find that Petulant confesses the superiority of wit to be your talent, Witwould.

Wit. Come, come, you are malicious now, and would breed debates. Petulant's my friend, and a very pretty fellow, and a very honest fellow, and has a smattering—faith, and troth, a pretty deal of an odd sort of a small wit: nay, I do him justice, I'm his friend, I won't wrong him. And if he had any judgment in the world, he would not be altogether contemptible. Come, come, don't detract from the merits of my friend.

Fain. You don't take your friend to be over-nicely bred.

Wit. No, no, hang him, the rogue has no manners at all, that I must own; no more breeding than a bumbailly,<sup>1)</sup> that I grant you: 'tis pity; the fellow has fire and life.

Mir. What, courage?

Wit. Hum, faith, I don't know as to that; I can't say as to that. Yes, faith, in controversy, he'll contradict any body.

Mir. Though 'twere a man whom he feared, or a woman whom he loved.

Wit. Well, well, he does not always think before he speaks; we have all our failings: you are too hard upon him, you are, faith. Let me excuse him: I can defend most of his faults, except one or two; one he has, that's the truth on't; if he were my brother, I could not acquit him—that indeed I could wish were otherwise.

Mir. Ay, marry, what's that, Witwould?

Wit. O pardon me—expose the infirmities of my friend!—no, my dear, excuse me there.

Fain. What, I warrant he's insincere, or 'tis some such trifle.

Wit. No, no; what if he be? 'tis no matter for that, his wit will excuse that: a wit should no more be sincere, than a woman constant; one argues a decay of parts, as t'other of beauty.

Mir. May be you think him too positive?

Wit. No, no, his being positive is an incentive to argument, and keeps up conversation.

Fain. Too illiterate?

Wit. That! that's his happiness, his want of learning gives him the more opportunity to show his natural parts.

Mir. He wants words?

Wit. Ay: but I like him for that now; for his want of words gives me the pleasure very often to explain his meaning.

Fain. He's impudent?

Wit. No, that's not it.

Mir. Vain?

Wit. No.

Mir. What, he speaks unseasonable truths sometimes, because he has not wit enough to invent an evasion?

Wit. Truth! ha, ha, ha! No, no; since you will have it—I mean, he never speaks truth at all,—that's all. He will lie like a chambermaid, or a woman of quality's porter. Now that is a fault.

Enter Coachman.

Coach. Is master Petulant here, mistress?

Betty. Yes.

Coach. Three gentlewomen in a coach would speak with him.

Fain. O brave Petulant! three!

Betty. I'll tell him.

Coach. You must bring two dishes of chocolate and a glass of cinnamon-water.

[Exeunt Coachman and Betty.]

Wit. That should be for two fasting bona robas, and a procuress troubled with wind. Now you may know what the three are.

Mir. You are very free with your friend's acquaintance.

Wit. Ay, ay, friendship without freedom is as dull as love without enjoyment, or wine without toasting; but, to tell you a secret, these are trulls whom he allows coach-hire, and something more, by the week, to call on him once a day at public places.

Mir. How!

Wit. You shall see he won't go to 'em, because there's no more company here to take notice of him.—Why, this is nothing to what he used to do: before he found out this way, I have known him call for himself.

Fain. Call for himself! what dost thou mean?

Wit. Mean, why he would slip you out of this chocolate-house, just when you had been talking to him—as soon as your back was turned, whip he was gone;—then trip to his lodging, clap on a hood and scarf, and a mask, slap into a hackney-coach, and drive hither to the door again in a trice; where he would send in for himself, that is, I mean, call for himself, wait for himself, nay, and what's more, not finding himself, sometimes leave a letter for himself.

Mir. I confess this is something extraordinary—I believe he waits for himself now, he is so long a coming: O, I ask his pardon.

<sup>1)</sup> One of those gentlemen known by the name of catch-poles, from their familiarly putting their hand on the shoulder (towards the pole, or back of the neck) of the person whom they are to arrest, when, by showing a warrant, the other party most submissively follows to the lock-up house, if he is not strong enough to knock the bailiff down, and make his escape.

Enter PETULANT and BETTY.

Betty. Sir, the coach stays.

Pet. Well, well; I come;—'Sbud, a man had as good be a profess'd midwife, as a profess'd gallant, at this rate; to be knock'd up, and raised at all hours, and in all places. Deuce on 'em, I won't come—D'ye hear, tell 'em I won't come—Let 'em snivel and cry their hearts out. [Exit Betty.]

Fain. You are very cruel, Petulant.

Pet. All's one, let it pass—I have a humour to be cruel.

Mir. I hope they are not persons of condition that you use at this rate.

Pet. Condition! condition's a dried fig, if I am not in humour—By this hand, if they were your—a—a—your what-d'ye-call-'ems themselves, they must wait or rub off, if I am not in the vein.

Mir. What-d'ye-call-'ems! what are they, Witwould?

Wit. Empresses, my dear—By your what-d'ye-call-'ems he means sultana queens.

Pet. Ay, Roxalanas.

Mir. Cry you mercy.

Fain. Witwould says they are—

Pet. What does he say th'are?

Wit. I? fine ladies, I say.

Pet. Pass on, Witwould—Harkee, by this light, his relations; two co-heiresses his cousins, and an old aunt, who loves intriguing better than a conventicle.

Wit. Ha, ha, ha! I had a mind to see how the rogue would come off; ha, ha, ha! gad, I can't be angry with him, if he had said they were my mother and my sisters.

Mir. No!

Wit. No; the rogue's wit and readiness of invention charm me, dear Petulant.

Enter BETTY.

Betty. They are gone, sir, in great anger.

Pet. Enough, let 'em trundle. Anger helps complexions, saves paint.

Fain. This continence is all dissembled; this is in order to have something to brag of the next time he makes court to Millamant, and swear he has abandoned the whole sex for her sake.

Mir. Have you not left off your impudent pretensions there yet? I shall cut your throat, some time or other, Petulant, about that business.

Pet. Ay, ay, let that pass; there are other throats to be cut.

Mir. Meaning mine, sir?

Pet. Not I, I mean nobody, I know nothing; but there are uncles and nephews in the world, and they may be rivals. What then? all's one for that.

Mir. Now, harkee, Petulant, come hither; explain, or I shall call your interpreter.

Pet. Explain! I know nothing. Why you have an uncle, have you not, lately come to town, and lodges by my lady Wishfort's?

Mir. True.

Pet. Why, that's enough; you and he are not friends: and if he should marry and have a child, you may be disinherited, ha!

Mir. Where hast thou stumbled upon all this truth?

Pet. All's one for that; why then say I know something.

Mir. Come, thou art an honest fellow, Petulant, and shalt make love to my mistress, thou shalt, faith. What hast thou heard of my uncle?

Pet. I! nothing; I! If throats are to be cut, let swords clash; snug's the word, I shrug and am silent.

Mir. O raillery, raillery. Come, I know thou art in the women's secrets; what, you're a cabalist; I know you staid at Millamant's last night, after I went. Was there any mention made of my uncle or me? tell me. If thou hadst but good nature equal to thy wit, Petulant, Tony Witwould, who is now thy competitor in fame, would show as dim by thee as a dead whiting's eye by a pearl of orient; he would no more be seen by thee, than Mercury is by the sun. Come, I'm sure thou wo't tell me.

Pet. If I do, will you grant me common sense then, for the future?

Mir. Faith, I'll do what I can for thee, and I'll pray that it may be granted thee in the mean time.

Pet. Well, harkee! [They talk apart.]

Fain. Petulant, and you both, will find Mirabell as warm a rival as a lover.

Wit. Pshaw, pshaw! that she laughs at Petulant is plain. And for my part, but that it is almost a fashion to admire her, I should, harkee—to tell you a secret, but let it go no farther—between friends, I shall never break my heart for her.

Fain. How!

Wit. She's handsome; but she's a sort of an uncertain woman.

Fain. I thought you had died for her.

Wit. Umph! no.

Fain. She has wit.

Wit. 'Tis what she will hardly allow any body else—now, I should hate that, if she were as handsome as Cleopatra. Mirabell is not so sure of her as he thinks.

Fain. Why do you think so?

Wit. We staid pretty late there last night, and heard something of an uncle to Mirabell, who is lately come to town, and is between him and the best part of his estate. Mirabell and he are at some distance, as my lady Wishfort has been told; and you know she hates Mirabell worse than a quaker hates a parrot, or than a fishmonger hates a hard frost. Whether this uncle has seen Mrs. Millamant or not, I cannot say; but there were items of such a treaty being in embryo; and if it should come to life, poor Mirabell would be in some sort unfortunately fobb'd, i'faith.

Fain. 'Tis impossible; Millamant should hearken to it.

Wit. Faith, my dear, I can't tell; she's a woman, and a kind of a humourist.

Mir. And this is the sum of what you could collect last night?

Pet. The quintessence. May be Witwould knows more, he staid longer; besides, they never mind him; they say any thing before him. [favourite.]

Mir. I thought you had been the greatest

Pet. Ay, tête à tête; but not in public, because I make remarks.

Mir. You do?

Pet. Ay, ay; I'm malicious, man. Now he's soft, you know; they are not in awe of him: the fellow's well bred; he's what you call a—what-d'ye-call'em, a fine gentleman: but he's silly withal.

Mir. I thank you, I know as much as my curiosity requires. Fainall, are you for the Mall?<sup>1)</sup>

Fain. Ay, I'll take a turn before dinner.

Wit. Ay, we'll all walk in the park; the ladies talk of being there.

Mir. I thought you were obliged to watch for your brother, sir Wilsfull's arrival.

Wit. No, no; he comes to his aunt's, my lady Wishfort: plague on him, I shall be troubled with him too; what shall I do with the fool?

Pet. Beg him for his estate, that I may beg you afterwards; and so have but one trouble with you both.

Wit. O rare Petulant; thou art as quick as fire in a frosty morning; thou shalt to the Mall with us, and we'll be very severe.

Pet. Enough, I'm in a humour to be severe.

Mir. Are you? Pray then walk by yourselves. Let not us be accessory to your putting the ladies out of countenance with your senseless ribaldry, which you roar out aloud as often as they pass by you; and when you have made a handsome woman blush, then you think you have been severe.

Pet. What, what? then let 'em either show their innocence by not understanding what they hear, or else show their discretion by not hearing what they would not be thought to understand.

Mir. But hast not thou then sense enough to know that thou ought'st to be most ashamed thyself, when thou hast put another out of countenance?

Pet. Not I, by this hand; I always take blushing either for a sign of guilt or ill-breeding.

Mir. I confess you ought to think so. You are in the right, that you may plead the error of your judgment in defence of your practice.

Where modesty's ill-manners, 'tis but fit
That impudence and malice pass for wit.

[Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—St. James's Park.

Enter MRS. FAINALL and MRS. MARWOOD.

Mrs. F. Ay, ay, dear Marwood, 'if we will be happy, we must find the means in ourselves, and among ourselves. Men are ever in extremes; either doating or averse. While they are lovers, if they have fire and sense, their jealousies are insupportable: and when they cease to love (we ought to think at least) they loathe: they look upon us with horror and distaste; they meet us like the ghosts of what we were, and as from such, fly from us.

<sup>1)</sup> Formerly the fashionable walk in St. James's Park, when there was a little green and a tree or two to be seen within 10 miles of Temple-Bar; but now it is upon the point of being covered with houses; and the poor swans' country—residence on the canal will be turned into a town (not a large) house, and the Chinese bridge will probably be made into a ponte de seepiri for the loss of nature.

Mrs. Mar. True, 'tis an unhappy circumstance of life, that love should ever die before us; and that the man so often should outlive the lover. But say what you will, 'tis better to be left than never to have been loved. To pass our youth in dull indifference, to refuse the sweets of life because they once must leave us, is as preposterous, as to wish to have been born old, because we one day must be old. For my part, my youth may wear and waste, but it shall never rust in my possession.

Mrs. F. Then it seems you dissemble an aversion to mankind, only in compliance to my mother's humour.

Mrs. Mar. Certainly. To be free; I have no taste of those insipid dry discourses, with which our sex of force must entertain themselves apart from men. We may affect endearments to each other, profess eternal friendships, and seem to dote like lovers; but 'tis not in our natures long to persevere. Love will resume his empire in our breasts, and every heart, or soon or late, receive and readmit him as its lawful tyrant.

Mrs. F. Bless me, how have I been deceived? Why you're a professed libertine.

Mrs. Mar. You see my friendship by my freedom. Come, be as sincere, acknowledge that your sentiments agree with mine.

Mrs. F. Never.

Mrs. Mar. You hate mankind?

Mrs. F. Heartily, inveterately.

Mrs. Mar. Your husband?

Mrs. F. Most transcendently; ay, though I say it, meritoriously.

Mrs. Mar. Give me your hand upon it.

Mrs. F. There.

Mrs. Mar. I join with you; what I have said has been to try you.

Mrs. F. Is it possible? dost thou hate those vipers, men?

Mrs. Mar. I have done hating 'em, and am now come to despise 'em; the next thing I have to do, is eternally to forget 'em.

Mrs. F. There spoke the spirit of an Amazon, a Penthesilea.

Mrs. Mar. And yet I am thinking sometimes to carry my aversion farther.

Mrs. F. How?

Mrs. Mar. By marrying; if I could but find one that loved me very well, and would be thoroughly sensible of ill usage, I think I should do myself the violence of undergoin g the ceremony.

Mrs. F. You would not dishonour him?

Mrs. Mar. No: but I'd make him believe I did, and that's as bad.

Mrs. F. Why had you not as good do it?

Mrs. Mar. O if he should ever discover it, he would then know the worst, and be out of his pain; but I would have him ever to continue upon the rack of fear and jealousy.

Mrs. F. Ingenious mischief! would thou wert married to Mirahell!

Mrs. Mar. Would I were!

Mrs. F. You change colour.

Mrs. Mar. Because I hate him.

Mrs. F. So do I; but I can bear him named. But what reason have you to hate him in particular?

Mrs. Mar. I never loved him; he is, and always was, insufferably proud.

Mrs. F. By the reason you give for your aversion, one would think it dissembled; for you have laid a fault to his charge, of which his enemies must acquit him.

Mrs. Mar. O then it seems you are one of his favourable enemies. Methinks you look a little pale, and now you flush again.

Mrs. F. Do I? I think I am a little sick o'the sudden.

Mrs. Mar. What ails you;

Mrs. F. My husband. Don't you see him? He turn'd short upon me unawares, and has almost overcome me.

Enter FAINALL and MIRABELL.

Mrs. Mar. Ha, ha, ha! he comes opportunely for you.

Mrs. F. For you, for he has brought Mirabell with him.

Fain. My dear.

Mrs. F. My soul.

Fain. You don't look well to-day, child.

Mrs. F. D'ye think so?

Mir. He's the only man that does, madam.

Mrs. F. The only man that would tell me so, at least; and the only man from whom I could hear it without mortification.

Fain. O my dear, I am satisfied of your tenderness; I know you cannot resent any thing from me; especially what is an effect of my concern.

Mrs. F. Mr. Mirabell, my mother interrupted you in a pleasant relation last night; I could fain hear it out.

Mir. The persons concern'd in that affair, have yet a tolerable reputation. I am afraid Mr. Fainall will be censorious.

Mrs. F. He has a humour more prevailing than his curiosity, and will willingly dispense with the hearing of one scandalous story, to avoid giving an occasion to make another, by being seen to walk with his wife. This way, Mr. Mirabell, and I dare promise you will oblige us both.

[Exeunt Mrs. Fainall and Mirabell.]

Fain. Excellent creature! well, sure, if I should live to be rid of my wife, I should be a miserable man.

Mrs. Mar. Ay?

Fain. For having only that one hope, the accomplishment of it, of consequence, must put an end to all my hopes; and what a wretch is he who must survive his hopes! nothing remains, when that day comes, but to sit down and weep like Alexander, when he wanted other worlds to conquer.

Mrs. Mar. Will you not follow 'em?

Fain. No! I think not.

Mrs. Mar. Pray let us; I have a reason.

Fain. You are not jealous?

Mrs. Mar. Of whom?

Fain. Of Mirabell.

Mrs. Mar. If I am, is it inconsistent with my love to you, that I am tender of your honour?

Fain. You would intimate then, as if there were a particular understanding between my wife and him?

Mrs. Mar. I think she does not hate him to that degree she would be thought.

Fain. But he, I fear, is too insensible.

Mrs. Mar. It may be you are deceived.

Fain. It may be so. I do not now begin to apprehend it.

Mrs. Mar. What?

Fain. That I have been deceived, madam, and you are false.

Mrs. Mar. That I am false! What mean you?

Fain. To let you know, I see through all your little arts—Come, you both love him, and both have equally dissembled your aversion. Your mutual jealousies of one another have made you clash till you have both struck fire. I have seen the warm confession, reddening on your cheeks, and sparkling from your eyes.

Mrs. Mar. You do me wrong.

Fain. I do not. 'Twas for my ease to oversee and wilfully neglect the gross advances made him by my wife; that, by permitting her to be engaged, I might continue unsuspected in my pleasures, and take you offener to my arms in full security. But could you think, because the nodding husband would not wake, that e'er the watchful lover slept?

Mrs. Mar. And wherewithal can you reproach me?

Fain. With infidelity, with loving another, with love of Mirabell.

Mrs. Mar. 'Tis false. I challenge you to show an instance that can confirm your groundless accusation. I hate him.

Fain. And wherefore do you hate him? He is insensible, and your resentment follows his neglect. An instance! The injuries you have done him are a proof: your interposing in his love. What cause had you to make discoveries of his pretended passion? to undeceive the credulous aunt, and be the officious obstacle of his match with Millamant?

Mrs. Mar. My obligations to my lady urged me: I had profess'd a friendship to her; and could not see her easy nature so abused by that dissembler.

Fain. What, was it conscience then? Profess'd a friendship! O the pious friendships of the female sex!

Mrs. Mar. More tender, more sincere, and more enduring, than all the vain and empty vows of men, whether professing love to us, or mutual faith to one another.

Fain. Ha, ha, ha! you are my wife's friend too.

Mrs. Mar. Shame and ingratitude! Do you reproach me? You, you upbraid me! Have I been false to her through strict fidelity to you, and sacrificed my friendship to keep my love inviolate? and have you the baseness to charge me with the guilt, unmindful of the merit! To you it should be meritorious, that I have been vicious; and do you reflect that guilt upon me, which should lie buried in your bosom?

Fain. You misinterpret my reproof. I meant but to remind you of the slight account you once could make of strictest ties, when set in competition with your love to me.

Mrs. M. 'Tis false, you urged it with deliberate malice; 'twas spoke in scorn, and I never will forgive it.

Fain. Your guilt, not your resentment, begets your rage. If yet you loved, you could forgive a jealousy: but you are stung to find you are discover'd.

Mrs. Mar. It shall be all discover'd. You too shall be discover'd; be sure you shall. I can but be exposed; if I do it myself, I shall prevent your baseness.

Fain. Why, what will you do?

Mrs. Mar. Disclose it to your wife; own what has past between us.

Fain. Frenzy!

Mrs. Mar. By all my wrongs I'll do't. I'll publish to the world the injuries you have done me, both in my fame and fortune: with both I trusted you, you bankrupt in honour, as indigent of wealth.

Fain. Your fame I have preserved. Your fortune has been bestow'd as the prodigality of your love would have it, in pleasures which we both have shared. Yet, had not you been false, I had ere this rapaid it. 'Tis true, had you permitted Mirabell with Millamant to have stolen their marriage, my lady had been incensed beyond all means of reconciliation: Millamant had forfeited the moiety of her fortune, which then would have descended to my wife. And wherefore did I marry, but to make lawful prize of a rich widow's wealth, and squander it on love and you.

Mrs. Mar. Deceit and frivolous pretence.

Fain. Death, am I not married? what's pretence? Am I not imprison'd, fetter'd? have I not a wife? nay, a wife that was a widow, a young widow, a handsome widow; and would be again a widow, but that I have a heart of proof, and something of a constitution to bustle through the ways of wedlock and this world. Will you be reconciled to truth and me?

Mrs. Mar. Impossible. Truth and you are inconsistent. I hate you, and shall for ever.

Fain. For loving you?

Mrs. Mar. I loathe the name of love after such usage: and next to the guilt with which you would asperse me, I scorn you most. Farewell.

Fain. Nay, we must not part thus.

Mrs. Mar. Let me go.

Fain. Come, I'm sorry.

Mrs. Mar. I care not.—Let me go.—Break my hands, do—I'd leave 'em to get loose.

Fain. I would not hurt you for the world. Have I no other hold to keep you here?

Mrs. Mar. Well, I have deserved it all.

Fain. You know I love you.

Mrs. Mar. Poor dissembling! O that—Well, it is not yet—

Fain. What? what is it not? what is not yet? is it not yet too late?

Mrs. Mar. Ho, it is not yet too late, I have that comfort.

Fain. It is, to love another.

Mrs. Mar. But not to loathe, detest, abhor mankind, myself, and the whole treacherous world.

Fain. Nay, this is extravagance—Come, I ask your pardon—No tears—I was to blame—I could not love you and be easy in my doubts—Pray forbear—I believe you; I'm convinced I've done you wrong; and any way, every way will make amends; I'll hate my wife yet more; damn her, I'll part with her, rob her of all she's worth, and we'll retire somewhere, any where, to another world. I'll marry thee—Be pacified—'Sdeath! they come, hide your face, your tears—You have a mask, wear it a moment. This way, this way, be persuaded. [Exeunt.]

Enter MIRABELL and MRS. FAINALL.

Mrs. F. They are here yet.

Mir. They are turning into the other walk.

Mrs. F. While I only hated my husband, I could bear to see him; but since I have despised him, he's too offensive.

Mir. O you should hate with prudence.

Mrs. F. Yes, for I have loved with indiscretion.

Mir. You should have just so much disgust for your husband, as may be sufficient to make you relish your lover.

Mrs. F. You have been the cause that I have loved without bounds; and would you set limits to that aversion, of which you have been the occasion? Why did you make me marry this man?

Mir. Why do we daily commit disagreeable and dangerous actions? To save that idol reputation. If the familiarities of our loves had produced that consequence, of which you were apprehensive, where could you have fixed a father's name with credit, but on a husband? I knew Fainall to be a man lavish of his morals, an interested and professing friend, a false and a designing lover; yet one whose wit and outward fair behaviour have gain'd a reputation with the town, enough to make that woman stand excused, who has suffered herself to be won by his addresses. A better man ought not to have been sacrificed to the occasion; a worse had not answer'd to the purpose. When you are weary of him, you know your remedy.

Mrs. F. I ought to stand in some degree of credit with you, Mirabell.

Mir. In justice to you, I have made you privy to my whole design, and put it in your power to ruin or advance my fortune.

Mrs. F. Whom have you instructed to represent your pretended uncle?

Mir. Waitwell, my servant.

Mrs. F. He is an humble servant to Foible, my mother's woman, and may win her to your interest.

Mir. Care is taken for that—she is won and worn by this time. They were married this morning.

Mrs. F. Who?

Mir. Waitwell and Foible. I would not tempt my servant to betray me by trusting him too far. If your mother, in hopes to ruin me, should consent to marry my pretended uncle, he might like Mosca in the Fox, stand upon terms; so I made him sure before-hand.

Mrs. F. So, if my poor mother is caught in a contract, you will discover the imposture betimes; and release her, by producing a certificate of her gallant's former marriage.

Mir. Yes, upon condition that she consent to my marriage with her niece, and surrender the moiety of her fortune in her possession.

Mrs. F. She talked last night of endeavouring at a match between Millamant and your uncle.

Mir. That was by Foible's direction; and my instruction, that she might seem to carry it more privately.

Mrs. F. Well, I have an opinion of your success; for I believe my lady will do any thing to get a husband; and when she has this, which you have provided for her, I suppose she will submit to any thing to get rid of him.

Mir. Yes, I think the good lady would marry any thing that resembled a man, though 'twere no more than what a butler could pinch out of a napkin.

Mrs. F. Female frailty! we must all come to it, if we live to be old, and feel the craving of a false appetite when the true is decay'd.

Mir. An old woman's appetite is depraved like that of a girl—'tis the green-sickness of a second childhood; and like the faint offer of a latter spring, serves but to usher in the fall, and withers in an affected bloom.

Mrs. F. Here's your mistress.

Enter MRS. MILLAMANT, WITWOULD, and MINCING.

Mir. Here she comes, i'faith, full sail, with her fan spread and streamers out, and a shoal of fools for tenders—ha, no; I cry her mercy.

Mrs. F. I see but one poor empty sculler; and he tows her woman after him.

Mir. You seem to be unattended, madam.—You used to have the beau-monde throng after you, and a flock of gay fine perukes hovering round you.

Wit. Like moths about a candle—I had like to have lost my comparison for want of breath.

Mrs. Mill. O I have denied myself airs to-day. I have walk'd as fast through the crowd—

Wit. As a favourite just disgraced; and with as few followers.

Mrs. Mill. Dear Mr. Witwould, truce with your similitudes; for I am as sick of 'em—

Wit. As a physician of a good air—I cannot help it, madam, though 'tis against myself.

Mrs. Mill. Yet again! Mincing, stand between me and his wit.

Wit. Do, Mrs. Mincing, like a screen before a great fire. I confess I do blaze to-day, I am too bright.

Mrs. F. But, dear Millamant, why were you so long?

Mrs. Mill. Long! lud! have I not made violent haste? I have ask'd every living thing I met for you; I have inquired after you, as after a new fashion.

Wit. Madam, truce with your similitudes—no, you met her husband, and did not ask him for her.

Mir. By your leave, Witwould, that were like inquiring after an old fashion, to ask a husband for his wife.

Wit. Hum, a hit, a hit, a palpable hit, I confess it.

Min. You were dress'd before I came abroad.

Mrs. Mill. Ay, that's true—O but then I had—Mincing, what had I? why was I so long?

Min. O mem,<sup>1)</sup> your la'ship staid to peruse a packet of letters.

Mrs. Mill. O ay, letters—I had letters—I am persecuted with letters—I hate letters—nobody knows how to write letters; and yet one has 'em, one does not know why—they serve one to pin up one's hair.

Wit. Is that the way? Pray, madam, do you pin up your hair with all your letters? I find I must keep copies.

Mrs. Mill. Only with those in verse, Mr. Witwould. I never pin up my hair with prose. I think, I tried once, Mincing.

Min. O mem, I shall never forget it.

Mrs. Mill. Ay, poor Mincing tilt and tift<sup>1)</sup> all the morning.

Min. Till I had the cramp in my fingers, I'll vow, mem, and all to no purpose. But when your la'ship pins it up with poetry, it sits so pleasant the next day as any thing, and is so pure and so crips.<sup>2)</sup>

Wit. Indeed, so crips?

Min. You're such a critic, Mr. Witwould.

Mrs. Mill. Mirabell, did you take exceptions last night? O ay, and went away—Now I think on't I'm angry—No, now I think on't I'm pleased—For I believe I gave you some pain.

Mir. Does that please you?

Mrs. Mill. Infinitely; I love to give pain.

Mir. You would affect a cruelty which is not in your nature; your true vanity is in the power of pleasing.

Mrs. Mill. O, I ask your pardon for that—One's cruelty is one's power, and when one parts with one's cruelty one parts with one's power; and when one has parted with that, I fancy one's old and ugly.

Mir. Ay, ay, suffer your cruelty to ruin the object of your power, to destroy your lover; and then how vain, how lost a thing you'll be! Nay, 'tis true: you are no longer handsome when you have lost your lover; your beauty dies upon the instant: for beauty is the lover's gift; 'tis he bestows your charms—Your glass is all a cheat. The ugly and the old, whom the looking-glass mortifies, yet, after commendation, can be flatter'd by it, and discover beauties in it; for that reflects our praises, rather than your face.

Mrs. Mill. O the vanity of these men! Fainall, d'ye hear him? If they did not commend us, we were not handsome! Now you must know they could not commend one, if one was not handsome. Beauty the lover's gift! Dear me, what is a lover, that it can give? Why, one makes lovers as fast as one pleases, and they live as long as one pleases, and they die as soon as one pleases; and then, if one pleases, one makes more.

Wit. Very pretty. Why you make no more of making of lovers, madam, than of making so many card-matches.

Mrs. Mill. One no more owes one's beauty to a lover, than one's wit to an echo: they can but reflect what we look and say, vain, empty things, if we are silent or unseen, and want a being.

Mir. Yet, to those two vain empty things, you owe two of the greatest pleasures of your life.

Mrs. Mill. How so?

Mir. To your lover you owe the pleasure of hearing yourselves praised; and to an echo the pleasure of hearing yourselves talk.

Wit. But I know a lady that loves talking so incessantly, she won't give an echo fair play; she has that everlasting rotation of tongue, that an echo must wait till she dies, before it can catch her last words.

<sup>2)</sup> Crisp.

Mrs. Mill. O fiction! Fainall, let us leave these men.

Mir. Draw off Witwould.

[Aside to Mrs. Fainall.

Mrs. F. Immediately: I have a word or two for Mr. Witwould.

[Exeunt Mrs. Fainall and Witwould.

Mir. I would beg a little private audience too—You had the tyranny to deny me last night; though you knew I came to impart a secret to you that concern'd my love.

Mrs. Mill. You saw I was engaged.

Mir. Unkind. You had the leisure to entertain a herd of fools; things who visit you from their excessive idleness; bestowing on your easiness that time, which is the incumbrance of their lives. How can you find delight in such society? It is impossible they should admire you, they are not capable; or if they were, it should be to you as a mortification; for sure to please a fool is some degree of folly.

Mrs. Mill. I please myself—Besides, sometimes to converse with fools is for my health.

Mir. Your health! Is there a worse disease than the conversation of fools?

Mrs. Mill. Yes, the vapours; fools are physic for it, next to asa-fetida.

Mir. You are not in a course of fools?

Mrs. Mill. Mirabell, if you persist in this offensive freedom, you'll displease me. I think I must resolve, after all, not to have you—We shan't agree.

Mir. Not in our physic, it may be.

Mrs. Mill. And yet our distemper, in all likelihood, will be the same; for we shall be sick of one another. I shan't endure to be reprimanded, nor instructed; 'tis so dull to act always by advice, and so tedious to be told of one's faults—I can't bear it. Well, I won't have you, Mirabell—I'm resolved—I think—You may go—Ha, ha, ha! What would you give that you could help loving me?

Mir. I would give something that you did not know I could not help it.

Mrs. Mill. Come, don't look grave then. Well, what do you say to me?

Mir. I say that a man may as soon make a friend by his wit, or a fortune by his honesty, as win a woman with plain-dealing and sincerity.

Mrs. Mill. Sententious Mirabell! Pry'thee don't look with that violent and inflexible wise face, like Solomon at the dividing of the child in an old tapestry hanging.

Mir. You are merry, madam; but I would persuade you for a moment to be serious.

Mrs. Mill. What, with that face? No, if you keep your countenance, 'tis impossible I should hold mine. Well, after all, there is something very moving, in a love-sick face. Ha, ha, ha! Well, I won't laugh, don't be peevish—Heigho! Now I'll be melancholy, as melancholy as a watch-light. Well, Mirabell, if ever you will win me, woo me now—Nay, if you are so tedious, fare you well: I see they are walking away.

Mir. Can you not find, in the variety of your disposition, one moment—

Mrs. Mill. To hear you tell me Foible's married, and your plot like to speed?—No,

Mir. But how you came to know it—

Mrs. Mill. Without the help of conjuration, you can't imagine; unless she should tell me herself. Which of the two it may have been, I will leave you to consider; and when you have done thinking of that, think of me.

[Exeunt Millamant and Mincing.

Mir. I have something more—Gone—Think of you! to think of a whirlwind, though 'twere in a whirlwind, were a case of more steady contemplation; a very tranquillity of mind and mansion. A fellow that lives in a windmill, has not a more whimsical dwelling than the heart of a man that is lodg'd in a woman. There is no point of the compass to which they cannot turn, and by which they are not turn'd; and by one as well as another; for motion, not method, is their occupation. To know this, and yet continue to be in love, is to be made wise from the dictates of reason, and yet persevere to play the fool by the force of instinct—O here comes my pair of turtles—What, billing so sweetly! is not Valentine's day over with you yet?

[Enter WAITWELL and FOIBLE.

Sirrah, Waitwell, why sure you think you were married for your own recreation; and not for my conveniency.

Wait. Your pardon, sir. With submission, we have indeed been billing; but still with an eye to business, sir. I have instructed her as well as I could. If she can take your directions as readily as my instructions, sir, your affairs are in a prosperous way.

Mir. Give you joy, Mrs. Foible.

Foi. O-las, sir, I'm so ashamed—I'm afraid my lady has been in a thousand inquietudes for me. But I protest, sir, I made as much haste as I could.

Wait. That she did indeed, sir.

Foi. I told my lady, as you instructed me, sir, that I had a prospect of seeing sir Rowland, your uncle; and that I would put her ladyship's picture in my pocket to show him; which I'll be sure to say has made him so enamour'd of her beauty, that he burns with impatience to lie at her ladyship's feet, and worship the original.

Mir. Excellent Foible! Matrimony has made you eloquent in love.

Wait. I think she has profited, sir, I think so.

Foi. You have seen madam Millamant, sir?

Mir. Yes.

Foi. I told her, sir, because I did not know that you might find an opportunity; she had so much company last night.

Mir. Your diligence will merit more—in the mean time—

[Gives Money.

Foi. O, dear sir, your humble servant.

Wait. Spouse.

Mir. Stand off, sir, not a penny—Go on and prosper, Foible—The lease shall be made good, and the farm stock'd, if we succeed.

Foi. I don't question your generosity, sir; and you need not doubt of success. If you have no more commands, sir, I'll be gone; I'm sure my lady is at her toilet, and can't dress till I come.—O dear, I'm sure that [Looking out] was Mrs. Marwood that went by in a mask; if she has seen me with you I'm sure she'll tell my lady. I'll make haste home and prevent her. Your servant, sir. B'w'ye, Waitwell.

[Exit.

Wait. Sir Rowland, if you please. The jade's so pert upon her preferment, she forgets herself.

Mir. Come, sir, will you endeavour to forget yourself, and transform into sir Rowland?

Wait. Why, sir, it will be impossible I should remember myself. [Exit Mirabell] Married, knighted, and attended, all in one day 'tis enough to make any man forget himself. The difficulty will be how to recover my acquaintance and familiarity with my former self; and fall from my transformation to a reformation into Waitwell. Nay, I shan't be quite the same Waitwell neither—for now I remember, I'm married, and can't be my own again.

Ay, there's my grief; that's the sad change of life;

To lose my title, and yet keep my wife. [Exit.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—A Room in LADY WISHFORT'S House.

LADY WISHFORT at her Toilet, PEG waiting.

Lady W. Merciful, no news of Foible yet?

Peg. No, madam.

Lady W. I have no more patience—If I have not fretted myself till I am pale again, there's no veracity in me. Fetch me the red—the red, do you hear? An arrant ash-colour, as I'm a person. Look you how this wench stirs! why dost thou not fetch me a little red? didst thou not hear me, mopus?

Peg. The red ratafia, does your ladyship mean, or the cherry-brandy?

Lady W. Ratafia, fool! no, fool, not the ratafia, fool—Grant me patience! I mean the Spanish paper, idiot; complexion. Darling paint, paint, paint; dost thou understand that, changeling, dangling thy hands like bobbins before thee? why dost thou not stir, puppet? thou wooden thing upon wires.

Peg. Lord, madam, your ladyship is so impatient—I cannot come at the paint, madam; Mrs. Foible has lock'd it up, and carried the key with her.

Lady W. Plague take you both—Fetch me the cherry-brandy then. [Exit Peg] I'm as pale and as faint, I look like Mrs. Qualmsick, the curate's wife, that's always breeding—Wench, come, come, wench; what art thou doing, sipping? tasting? save thee, dost thou not know the bottle.

Enter PEG, with a Bottle and China Cup.

Peg. Madam, I was looking for a cup.

Lady W. A cup, save thee; and what a cup hast thou brought! dost thou take me for a fairy, to drink out of an acorn? why didst thou not bring thy thimble? hast thou ne'er a brass thimble clinking in thy pocket with a bit of nutmeg? I warrant thee. Come, fill, fill—So—again. See who that is. [One knocks] Set down the bottle first.—Here, here, under the table—What, wouldst thou go with the bottle in thy hand, like a tapster? [Exit Peg] As I'm a person, this wench has lived in an inn upon the road, before she came to me.

Enter PEG.

No Foible yet?

Peg. No, madam, Mrs. Marwood.

Lady W. O Marwood, let her come in. Come in, good Marwood.

Enter MRS. MARWOOD.

Mrs. M. I'm surprised to find your ladyship in dishabille at this time of day,

Lady W. Foible's a lost thing; has been abroad since morning, and never heard of since.

Mrs. M. I saw her but now, as I came mask'd through the park, in conference with Mirabell.

Lady W. With Mirabell! you call my blood into my face, with mentioning that traitor. She durst not have the confidence. I sent her to negotiate an affair, in which, if I'm detected, I'm undone. If that wheedling villain has wrought upon Foible to detect me, I'm ruin'd. Oh my dear friend, I'm a wretch of wretches if I'm detected.

Mrs. M. O madam, you cannot suspect Mrs. Foible's integrity.

Lady W. O, he carries poison in his tongue that would corrupt integrity itself. If she has given him an opportunity, she has as good as put her integrity into his hands. Ah! dear Marwood, what's integrity to an opportunity?—Hark! I hear her—Dear friend, retire into my closet, that I may examine her with more freedom—You'll pardon me, dear friend, I can make bold with you—There are books over the chimney—Quarles and Pryn, and the Short View of the Stage, with Bunyan's works, to entertain you. [Exit Mrs. Marwood] Go, you thing, and send her in. [Exit Peg.]

Enter FOIBLE.

Lady W. O Foible, where hast thou been? what hast thou been doing?

Foi. Madam, I have seen the party.

Lady W. But what hast thou done?

Foi. Nay, 'tis your ladyship has done, and are to do; I have only promised. But a man so enamour'd—so transported! well, if worshipping of pictures be a sin—poor sir Rowland, I say.

Lady W. The miniature has been counted like—But hast thou not betray'd me, Foible? Hast thou not detected me to that faithless Mirabell?—What hadst thou to do with him in the park? answer me, has he got nothing out of thee?

Foi. So, mischief has been before-hand with me; what shall I say? [Aside] Alas, madam, could I help it, if I met that confident thing? was I in fault? If you had heard how he used me, and all upon your ladyship's account, I'm sure you would not suspect my fidelity. Nay, if that had been the worst, I could have borne: but he had a fling at your ladyship too; and then I could not hold: but I faith I gave him his own.

Lady W. Me! what did the filthy fellow say?

Foi. O madam; 'tis a shame to say what he said—With his taunts and fleers, tossing up his nose. Humph, says he, what, you are hatching some plot, says he, you are so early abroad, or catering, says he, ferreting for some disbanded officer, I warrant—Half-pay is but thin subsistence, says he—Well, what pension does your lady propose? Let me see, says he, what, she must come down pretty deep now, she's superannuated, says he, and—

Lady W. Odds my life, I'll have him—I'll have him murder'd. I'll have him poison'd. Where does he eat? I'll marry a drawer, to have him poison'd in his wine.

Foi. Poison him! poisoning's too good for him. Starve him, madam, starve him; marry sir Rowland, and get him disinherited. O you would bless yourself, to hear what he said.

Lady W. A villain! superannuated!

Foi. Humph, says he, I hear you are laying designs against me too, says he, and Mrs. Millamant is to marry my uncle; he does not suspect a word of your ladyship; but, says he, I'll fit you for that; I warrant you, says he: I'll hamper you for that, says he, you and your old frippery too, says he, I'll handle you—

Lady W. Audacious villain! handle me! would he durst?—Frippery! old frippery! Was there ever such a foul-mouth'd fellow? I'll be married to-morrow, I'll be contracted to-night.

Foi. The sooner the better, madam.

Lady W. Will sir Rowland be here, say'st thou?—when, Foible?

Foi. Incontinently, madam. No new sheriff's wife expects the return of her husband after knighthood, with that impatience in which sir Rowland burns for the dear hour of kissing your ladyship's hand after dinner.

Lady W. Frippery! superannuated frippery! I'll frippery the villain; I'll reduce him to frippery and rags; a tatterdemalion—I hope to see him hung with tatters, like a Long-lane pent-house, or a gibbet thief. A slander-mouth'd railer: I warrant the spendthrift prodigal is in debt as much as the million lottery, or the whole court upon a birth-day. I'll spoil his credit with his tailor. Yes, he shall have my niece with her fortune, he shall.

Foi. He! I hope to see him lodge in Ludgate<sup>1)</sup> first, and angle into Blackfriars for brass farthings, with an old mitten<sup>2)</sup>.

Lady W. Ay, dear Foible; thank thee for that, dear Foible. He has put me out of all patience. I shall never recompose my features, to receive sir Rowland with any economy of face. The wretch has fretted me, that I am absolutely decay'd. Look, Foible.

Foi. Your ladyship has frown'd a little too rashly, indeed, madam. There are some cracks discernable in the white varnish.

Lady W. Let me see the glass—Cracks, say'st thou? why I am arrantly flay'd—I look like an old peel'd wall. Thou must repair me, Foible, before sir Rowland comes; or I shall never keep up to my picture.

Foi. I warrant you, madam; a little art once made your picture like you; and now a little of the same art must make you like your picture. Your picture must sit for you, madam.

Lady W. But art thou sure sir Rowland will not fail to come? or will he not fail when he does come? will he be importunate, Foible, and push? for if he should not be importunate—I shall never break decorums—I shall die with confusion, if I am forced to advance—Oh no, I can never advance—I shall swoon if he should expect advances. No, I hope sir Rowland is better bred, than to put a lady to the necessity of breaking her forms. I won't be too coy, neither.—I won't give him despair—But a little disdain is not amiss: a little scorn is alluring.

Foi. A little scorn becomes your ladyship.

Lady W. Yes, but tenderness becomes me best—You see that picture has a—sort of a—ha, Foible? a swimmingness in the eyes—Yes, I'll look so—My niece affects it; but she wants features. Is sir Rowland handsome? Let my toilet be removed—I'll dress above. I'll receive sir Rowland here. Is he handsome? Don't answer me. I won't know; I'll be surprised, I'll be taken by surprise.

Foi. By storm, madam; sir Rowland's a brisk man.

Lady W. Is he? O then he'll importune, if he's a brisk man. I have a mortal terror at the apprehension. Let my things be removed, good Foible. [Exit.

Enter MRS. FAINALL.

Mrs. F. O Foible, I have been in a fright, lest I should come too late. That devil, Marwood, saw you in the park with Mirabell, and I'm afraid will discover it to my lady.

Foi. Discover what, madam?

Mrs. F. Nay, nay, put not on that strange face, I am privy to the whole design, and know that Waitwell, to whom thou wert this morning married, is to personate Mirabell's uncle, and as such, winning my lady, to involve her in those difficulties from which Mirabell only must release her, by his making his conditions to have my cousin and her fortune left to her own disposal.

Foi. O dear madam, I beg your pardon. It was not my confidence in your ladyship that was deficient; but I thought the former good correspondence between your ladyship and Mr. Mirabell might have hinder'd his communicating this secret.

Mrs. F. Dear Foible, forget that.

Foi. O dear madam, Mr. Mirabell is such a sweet winning gentleman—But your ladyship is the pattern of generosity. Sweet lady, to be so good! Mr. Mirabell cannot choose but be grateful. I find your ladyship has his heart still. Now, madam, I can safely tell your ladyship our success. Mrs. Marwood had told my lady; but I warrant I managed myself. I turn'd it all for the better. I told my lady that Mr. Mirabell rail'd at her. I laid horrid things to his charge, I'll vow; and my lady is so incensed, that she'll be contracted to sir Rowland to-night, she says.—I warrant I work'd her up, that he may have her for asking for, as they say of a Welsh maidenhead,

Mrs. F. O rare Foible!

Foi. Madam, I beg your ladyship to acquaint Mr. Mirabell of his success. I would be seen as little as possible to speak to him; besides, I believe madam Marwood watches me; she has a penchant; but I know Mr.

1) Ludgate prison.

2) Woollen-glove or stocking. That is, she hopes to see him confined in Ludgate-prison, and letting down an old stocking tied to the end of a stick, begging for the charity of persons passing below in Black-friars; at the present day the prisoners in Fleet prison, which looks out upon Fleet market, are seen begging for the "poor confined debtors who have nothing to live upon."

Mirabell can't abide her. [Calls] John— remove my lady's toilet. Madam, your servant. My lady is so impatient, I fear she'll come for me, if I stay.

Mrs. F. I'll go with you up the back stairs, lest I should meet her. [Exeunt.]

Enter MRS. MARWOOD.

Mrs. Mar. Indeed, Mrs. Engine, is it thus with you? Are you become a go-between of this importance? Yes, I shall watch you. Why this wench is the passe-partout, a very master-key to every body's strong box. My friend Fainall, have you carried it so swimmingly? I thought there was something in it; but it seems 'tis over with you. Your loathing is not from a want of appetite then, but from a surfeit: else you could never be so cool to fall from a principal to be an assistant; to procure for him! a pattern of generosity, that I confess. Well, Mr. Fainall, you have met with your match. O man, man! Woman, woman! The devil's an ass: if I were a painter, I would draw him like an idiot, a driveller with a bib and bells. Man should have his head and horns, and woman the rest of him. Poor simple fiend! madam Marwood has a penchant, but he can't abide her 'Twere better for him you had not been his confessor in that affair, without you could have kept his counsel closer. I shall not prove another pattern of generosity—he has not obliged me to that with those excesses of himself; and now I'll have none of him. Here comes the good lady, panting ripe; with a heart full of hope, and a head full of care, like any chemist upon the day of projection.

Enter LADY WISHFORT.

Lady W. O dear Marwood, what shall I say for this rude forgetfulness? But my dear friend is all goodness.

Mrs. Mar. No apologies, dear madam. I have been very well entertained.

Lady W. As I'm a person, I am in a very chaos to think I should so forget myself; but I have such an olio of affairs, really I know not what to do. [Calls] Foible!—I expect my nephew, sir Wilful, every moment too.—Why, Foible!—He means to travel for improvement.

Mrs. Mar. Methinks sir Wilful should rather think of marrying than travelling at his years. I hear he is turned of forty.

Lady W. O he's in less danger of being spoiled by his travels. I am against my nephew's marrying too young. It will be time enough when he comes back, and has acquired discretion to choose for himself.

Mrs. Mar. Methinks Mrs. Millamant and he would make a very fit match. He may travel afterwards. 'Tis a thing very usual with young gentlemen.

Lady W. I promise you I have thought on't; and, since 'tis your judgment, I'll think on't again. I assure you I will; I value your judgment extremely. On my word, I'll propose it.

Enter FOIBLE.

Come, come, Foible. I had forgot my nephew will be here before dinner. I must make haste.

Foi. Witwould and Mr. Petulant are come to dine with your ladyship.

Lady W. O dear, I can't appear till I am dress'd. Dear Marwood, shall I be free with you again, and beg you to entertain 'em? I'll make all imaginable haste. Dear friend, excuse me. [Exeunt Lady Wishfort and Foible.]

Enter MRS. MILLAMANT and MINCING.

Mrs. Mill. Sure never any thing was so unbred as that odious man. Marwood, your servant.

Mrs. Mar. You have a colour: what's the matter?

Mrs. Mill. That horrid fellow, Petulant, has provoked me into a flame. I have broke my fan. Mincing, lend me yours. Is not all the powder out of my hair?

Mrs. Mar. No. What has he done?

Mrs. Mill. Nay, he has done nothing; he has only talk'd—nay, he has said nothing neither; but he has contradicted every thing that has been said. For my part, I thought Witwould and he would have quarrell'd.

Min. I vow, mem, I thought once they would have fit<sup>1</sup>).

Mrs. Mill. Well, 'tis a lamentable thing, I swear, that one has not the liberty of choosing one's acquaintance as one does one's clothes.

Mrs. Mar. If we had that liberty, we should be as weary of one set of acquaintance, though never so good, as we are of one suit, though never so fine. A fool and a doily stuff would now and then find days of grace, and be worn for variety.

Mrs. Mill. I could consent to wear 'em, if they would wear alike; but fools never wear out. They are such drap-de-berry things! without one could give 'em to one's chamber-maid after a day or two.

Mrs. Mar. 'Twere better so indeed. Or what think you of the play-house? A fine gay glossy fool should be given there, like a new masking-habit after the masquerade is over, and we have done with the disguise. For a fool's visit is always a disguise; and never admitted by a woman of wit, but to blind her affair with a lover of sense. If you would but appear barefaced now, and own Mirabell, you might as easily put off Petulant and Witwould, as your hood and scarf. And indeed 'tis time, for the town has found it: the secret is grown too big for the pretence: 'tis like Mrs. Primly's great belly; she may lace it down before, but it burnishes on her hips. Indeed, Millamant, you can no more conceal it than my lady Strammel can her face, that goodly face, which, in defiance of her Rhenish-wine tea, will not be comprehended in a mask.

Mrs. Mill. I'll take my death, Marwood, you are more censorious than a decay'd beauty, or a discarded toast. Mincing, tell the men they may come up. My aunt is not dressing here; their folly is less provoking than your malice. [Exit Mincing] The town has found it! what has it found? That Mirabell loves me is no more a secret, than it is a secret, that you discover'd it to my aunt, or than the reason why you discovered it is a secret.

1. Fought. Fit is the vulgar participle of fight.

Mrs. Mar. You are nettled.

Mrs. Mill. You're mistaken. Ridiculous!

Mrs. Mar. Indeed, my dear, you'll tear another fan if you don't mitigate those violent airs.

Mrs. Mill. Oh, silly! Ha, ha, ha! I could laugh immoderately. Poor Mirabell! His constancy to me has quite destroyed his complaisance for all the world beside. I swear I never enjoined it him, to be so coy: if I had the vanity to think he would obey me, I would command him to show more gallantry. 'Tis hardly well-bred to be so particular on one hand, and so insensible on the other. But I despair to prevail, and so let him follow his own way. Ha, ha, ha! Pardon me, dear creature, I must laugh, ha, ha, ha! though I grant you 'tis a little barbarous, ha, ha, ha!

Mrs. Mar. What pity 'tis, so much fine raillery, and deliver'd with so significant gesture, should be so unhappily directed to miscarry!

Mrs. Mill. Dear creature, I ask your pardon. I swear I did not mind you.

Mrs. Mar. Mr. Mirabell and you both may think a thing impossible, when I shall tell him by telling you—

Mrs. Mill. O dear, what? for 'tis the same thing, if I hear it. Ha, ha, ha!

Mrs. Mar. That I detest him, hate him, madam.

Mrs. Mill. O madam! why, so do I. And yet the creature loves me; ha, ha, ha! How can one forbear laughing to think of it—I am a Sybil if I am not amazed to think what he can see in me. I'll take my death, I think you are handsomer, and within a year or two as young. If you could but stay for me, I should overtake you. But that cannot be. Well, that thought makes me melancholic. Now I'll be sad.

Mrs. Mar. Your merry note may be changed sooner than you think.

Mrs. Mill. D'ye say so? Then I'm resolved I'll have a song to keep up my spirits.

Enter MINCING.

Min. The gentlemen stay but to comb, madam; and will wait on you.

Enter PETULANT and WITWOULD.

Mrs. Mill. Is your animosity composed, gentlemen?

Wit. Raillery, raillery, madam; we have no animosity; we hit off a little wit now and then, but no animosity. The falling-out of wits, is like the falling-out of lovers. We agree in the main, like treble and bass. Ha, Petulant!

Pet. Ay, in the main. But when I have a humour to contradict—

Wit. Ay, when he has a humour to contradict, then I contradict too. What, I know my cue. Then we contradict one another like two battledores; for contradictions beget one another like Jews.

Pet. If he says black's black—If I have a humour to say 'tis blue—Let that pass; all's one for that. If I have a humour to prove it, it must be granted.

Wit. Not positively must—But it may—it may.

Pet. Yes, it positively must, upon proof positive.

Wit. Ay, upon proof positive it must; but upon proof presumptive it only may. That's a logical distinction now, madam.

Mrs. Mar. I perceive your debates are of importance, and very learnedly handled.

Pet. Importance is one thing, and learning's another; but a debate's a debate, that I assure you.

Wit. Petulant's an enemy to learning; he relies altogether on his parts.

Pet. No, I'm no enemy to learning; it hurts not me.

Mrs. Mar. That's a sign indeed 'tis no enemy to you.

Pet. No, no, 'tis no enemy to any body, but them that have it.

Mrs. Mill. Well, an illiterate man's my aversion. I wonder at the impudence of an illiterate man, to offer to make love.

Wit. That I confess I wonder at too.

Mrs. Mill. Ah! to marry an ignorant! that can hardly read or write.

Pet. Why should a man be any further from being married though he can't read, than he is from being hang'd. The ordinary's paid for setting the psalm, and the parish priest for reading the ceremony. And for the rest which is to follow, in both cases, a man may do it without book; so all's one for that.

Mrs. Mill. D'ye hear the creature? Lord, here's company, I'll be gone.

[Exit Mrs. Millamant and Mincing.]

Enter SIR WILFUL WITWOULD in a Riding-dress, and Footman.

Wit. In the name of Bartholomew and his fair, what have we here?

Mrs. Mar. 'Tis your brother, I fancy. Don't you know him?

Wit. Not I. Yes, I think it is he. I've almost forgot him; I have not seen him since the Revolution.

Foot. Sir, my lady's dressing. Here's company; if you please to walk in, in the meantime.

Sir W. Dressing! What, 'tis but morning here I warrant with you in London; we should count it towards afternoon in our parts, down in Shropshire. Why then belike my aunt hasn't dined yet. Ha, friend?

Foot. Your aunt, sir?

Sir W. My aunt, sir? yes, my aunt, sir, and your lady, sir; your lady is my aunt, sir. Why, what, dost thou not know me, friend? Why then send somebody hither that does. How long hast thou lived with thy lady, fellow, ha?

Foot. A week, sir; longer than any in the house, except my lady's woman.

Sir W. Why then belike thou dost not know thy lady, if thou seest her; ha, friend!

Foot. Why truly, sir, I cannot safely swear to her face in a morning, before she is dress'd. 'Tis like I may give a shrewd guess at her by this time.

Sir W. Well, pr'ythee, try what thou can'st do; if thou canst not guess, inquire her out; dost hear, fellow? and tell her, her nephew, sir Wilful Witwould, is in the house.

Foot. I shall, sir.

Sir W. Hold ye, hear me, friend; a word with you in your ear: pr'ythee, who are these gallants?

Foot. Really, sir, I can't tell; here come so many here, 'tis hard to know 'em all. [Exit.]

Sir W. Oons, this fellow knows less than a starling; I don't think a'knows his own name.

Mrs. Mar. Mr. Witwould, your brother is not behind-hand in forgetfulness: I fancy he has forgot you too.

Wit. I hope so. The deuce take him that remembers first, I say.

Sir W. Save you, gentlemen and lady.

Mrs. Mar. For shame, Mr. Witwould; why won't you speak to him? And you, sir.

Wit. Petulant, speak.

Pet. It seems as if you had come a journey, sir; hem, hem. [Surveying him round.]

Sir W. Very likely, sir, that it may seem so.

Pet. No offence, I hope, sir.

Sir W. May be not, sir; thereafter, as 'tis meant, sir.

Wit. Smoke the boots, the boots; Petulant, the boots. Ha, ha, ha!

Pet. Sir, I presume upon the information of your boots.

Sir W. Why, 'tis like you may, sir: if you are not satisfied with the information of my boots, sir, if you will step to the stable, you may inquire further of my horse, sir.

Pet. Your horse, sir! your horse is an ass, sir!

Sir W. Do you speak by way of offence, sir?

Mrs. Mar. The gentleman's merry, that's all, sir—'Slife, we shall have a quarrel betwixt an horse and ass, before they find one another out.—You must not take any thing amiss from your friends, sir. You are among your friends, here, though it may be you don't know it. If I am not mistaken, you are sir Wilsful Witwould.

Sir W. Right, lady; I am sir Wilsful Witwould, so I write myself; no offence to any body, I hope; and nephew to the lady Wishfort of this mansion.

Mrs. Mar. Don't you know this gentleman, sir?

Sir W. Hum! What, sure 'tis not—yea, by'r lady but 'tis.—'Sheart, I know not whether 'tis or no.—Yea but 'tis, by the wrekin. Brother Anthony! what, Tony, i'faith! what, dost thou not know me? By'r lady, nor I thee, thou art so belaced, and so beperiwig'd. 'Sheart why dost not speak? art thou o'erjoyed?

Wit. Odso, brother, is it you? your servant, brother.

Sir W. Your servant! why yours, sir.

Wit. No offence, I hope, brother.

Sir W. 'Sheart, sir, but there is, and much offence. A plague! is this your inns-o'court breeding, not to know your friends and your relations, your elders, and your betters?

Wit. Why, brother Wilsful of Salop, you may be as short as a Shrewsbury cake, if you please. But I tell you 'tis not modish to know relations in town. 'Tis not the fashion here; 'tis not indeed, dear brother.

Sir W. The fashion's a fool; and you're a fop, dear brother. 'Sheart, I've suspected this; by'r lady, I conjectured you were a fop, since you began to change the style of your letters, and write in a scrap of paper, gilt round the edges, no bigger than a subpoena.<sup>1)</sup> I might expect this when you left off honoured brother; and hoping you are in good health, and so forth.—To begin with a Rat me, knight, I'm so sick of a last night's debauch—Ods heart, and then tell a familiar tale of a cock and a bull, and a wench and a bottle, and so conclude. You could write news before you were out of your time, when you lived with honest Pimplenose, the attorney of Furnival's Inn, you could entreat to be remembered then to your friends round the Wrekin.

Pet. 'Slife, Witwould, were you ever an attorney's clerk, of the family of the Furnivals? Ha, ha, ha!

Wit. Ay, ay, but that was but for awhile. Not long, not long; pshaw, I was not in my own power then. An orphan, and this fellow was my guardian; ay, ay, I was glad to consent to that, man, to come to London. He had the disposal of me then. If I had not agreed to that, I might have been bound 'prentice to a feltmaker in Shrewsbury; this fellow would have bound me to a maker of felts.

Sir W. 'Sheart, and better than be bound to a maker of fops; where, I suppose, you have served your time; and now you may set up for yourself.

Mrs. Mar. You intend to travel, sir, as I'm informed.

Sir W. Belike I may, madam. I may chance to sail upon the salt seas, if my mind hold.

Pet. And the wind serve.

Sir W. Serve or not serve, I shan't ask licence of you, sir; nor the weather-cock your companion. I direct my discourse to the lady, sir. 'Tis like my aunt may have told you, madam; yes, I have settled my concerns, I may say now, and am minded to see foreign parts.

Mrs. Mar. I thought you had designed for France at all adventures.

Sir W. I can't tell that; 'tis like I may, and 'tis like I may not. I am somewhat dainty in making a resolution, because when I make it I keep it. I don't stand shill I, shall I, then; if I say't, I'll do't: but I have thoughts to tarry a small matter in town, to learn somewhat of your lingo first; before I cross the seas. I'd gladly have a spice of your French, as they say, whereby to hold discourse in foreign countries.

Mrs. Mar. Here's an academy in town for that, and dancing, and curious accomplishments, calculated purely for the use of grown gentlemen.

Sir W. Is there? 'tis like there may.

Mrs. Mar. No doubt you will return very much improved.

Wit. Yes, refined like a Dutch skipper from a whale-fishing.

Enter LADY WISHFORT and FAINALL.

Lady W. Nephew, you are welcome.

Sir W. Aunt, your servant.

Fain. Sir Wilsful, your most faithful servant.

Sir W. Cousin Fainall, give me your hand.

Lady W. Cousin Witwould, your servant; Mr. Petulant, your servant. Nephew, you are welcome again. Will you drink any thing after your journey, nephew, before you eat? dinner's almost ready.

Sir W. I'm very well, I thank you, aunt; however, I thank you for your courteous offer.

'Sheart, I was afraid you would have been in the fashion too, and have remembered to have forgot your relations. Here's your cousin Tony; belike I mayn't call him brother, for fear of offence.

Lady W. O, he's a railer, nephew; my cousin's a wit; and your great wits always rally their best friends to choose. When you have been abroad, nephew, you'll understand railery better.

[Fainall and Mrs. Marwood talk apart.]

Sir W. Why then let him hold his tongue in the mean time, and rail when that day comes.

Enter MINCING.

Min. Mem, I am come to acquaint your la'ship that dinner is impatient.

Sir W. Impatient? why then belike it won't stay till I pull off my boots. Sweetheart, can you help me to a pair of slippers? My man's with his horses I warrant.

Lady W. Fie, fie, nephew, you would not pull off your boots here; go down into the hall; dinner shall stay for you. [Exeunt Mincing and Sir Wilfull] My nephew's a little unbred, you'll pardon him, madam. Gentlemen, will you walk? Marwood?

Mrs. Mar. I'll follow you, madam, before sir Wilful is ready.

[Exeunt Lady Wishful, Petulant and Wilwoud.]

Fain. Why then Foible's a procuress; an errant, rank, match-making procuress. And I it seems am a husband, a rank husband; and my wife a very errant, rank wife, all in the way of the world. 'Sdeath! to be out-witted, out-jilted, out-matrimony'd—and be out-stripp'd by my wife; 'tis scurvy wedlock.

Mrs. Mar. Then shake it off: you have often wish'd for an opportunity to part; and now you have it. But first prevent their plot—the half of Millamant's fortune is too considerable to be parted with, to a foe, to Mirabell.

Fain. Ay, that had been mine, had you not made that fond discovery; that had been forfeited, had they been married. My wife had added lustre to my dishonour by that increase of fortune. I could have worn 'em tipt with gold, though my forehead had been furnish'd like a deputy-lieutenant's hall.

Mrs. Mar. They may prove a cap of maintenance to you still, if you can away with your wife. And she's no worse than when you had her—I dare swear she had given up her game before she was married.

Fain. Hum! that may be.

Mrs. Mar. You married her to keep you; and if you can contrive to have her keep you better than you expected, why should you not keep her longer than you intended?

Fain. The means, the means.

Mrs. Mar. Discover to my lady your wife's conduct; threaten to part with her. My lady loves her, and will come to any composition to save her reputation. Take the opportunity of breaking it, just upon the discovery of this imposture. My lady will be enraged beyond bounds, and sacrifice niece and fortune, and all, at that conjuncture. And let me alone to keep her warm; if she should flag in her part, I will not fail to prompt her.

Fain. This has an appearance.

Mrs. Mar. I'm sorry I hinted to my lady to endeavour a match between Millamant and sir Wilful; that may be an obstacle.

Fain. O, for that matter leave me to manage him; I'll disable him for that; he will drink like a Dane: 'after dinner, I'll set his hand in.

Mrs. Mar. Well, how do you stand affected towards your lady?

Fain. Why, faith, I'm thinking of it. Let me see—I am married already; so that's over—my wife has play'd the jade with me—well, that's over too—I never loved her, or if I had, why that would have been over too by this time—jealous of her I cannot be, for I am certain; so there's an end of jealousy. VVearry of her, I am and shall be—no, there's no end of that; no, no, that were too much to hope. Thus far concerning my repose. Now for my reputation—as to my own, I married not for it; so that's out of the question. And as to my part in my wife's—why she had parted with hers before; so bringing none to me, she can take none from me: 'tis against all rule of play, that I should lose to one, who has not wherewithal to stake.

Mrs. Mar. Besides you forget, marriage is honourable.

Fain. Hum! faith, and that's well thought on. Marriage is honourable, as you say; and if so, wherefore should cuckoldom be a discredit, being derived from so honourable a root?

Mrs. Mar. Nay, I know not; if the root be honourable, why not the branches?

Fain. So, so, why this point's clear—well, how do we proceed?

Mrs. Mar. I will contrive a letter which shall be deliver'd to my lady at the time when that rascal who is to act sir Rowland is with her. It shall come as from an unknown hand—for the less I appear to know of the truth, the better I can play the incendiary. Besides, I would not have Foible provoked if I could help it, because you know she knows some passages—nay, I expect all will come out—but let the mine be sprung first, and then I care not if I am discover'd.

Fain. If the worst come to the worst, I'll turn my wife to grass: I have already a deed of settlement of the best part of her estate, which I wheedled out of her; and that you shall partake at least.

Mrs. Mar. I hope you are convinced that I hate Mirabell now; you'll be no more jealous.

Fain. Jealous! no, by this kiss, let husbands be jealous; but let the lower still believe: or if he doubt; let it be only to endear his pleasure, and prepare the joy that follows, when he proves his mistress true. But let husbands' doubts convert to endless jealousy; or if they have belief, let it corrupt to superstition, and blind credulity. I am single, and will herd no more with 'em. True, I wear the badge, but I'll disown the order. And since I take my leave of 'em, I care not if I leave 'em a common motto to their common crest.

All husbands must, or pain, or shame endure;

The wise too jealous are, fools too secure.

[Exeunt.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—The same.

Enter LADY WISHFORT and FOIBLE.

Lady W. Is sir Rowland coming, say'st thou, Foible? and are things in order?

Foi. Yes, madam. I have put wax-lights in the sconces, and placed the footmen in a row in the hall, in their best liveries, with the coachman and postilion to fill up the equipage.

Lady W. Have you pulvill'd the coachman and postilion, that they may not stink of the stable, when sir Rowland comes by?

Foi. Yes, madam.

Lady W. And are the dancers and the music ready, that he may be entertain'd in all points with correspondence to his passion?

Foi. All is ready, madam.

Lady W. And—well—and how do I look, Foible?

Foi. Most killing well, madam.

Lady W. Well, and how shall I receive him? in what figure shall I give his heart the first impression? There is a great deal in the first impression. Shall I sit?—No, I won't sit—I'll walk—ay, I'll walk from the door upon his entrance; and then turn full upon him—no, that will be too sudden. I'll lie—ay, I'll lie down—I'll receive him in my little dressing-room. There's a couch—yes, yes, I'll give the first impression on a couch—I won't lie neither, but loll and lean upon one elbow, with one foot a little dangling off, jogging in a thoughtful way; yes, and then as soon as he appears, start, ay, start and be surprised, and rise to meet him in a pretty disorder—yes—O, nothing is more alluring than a levee from a couch in some confusion—It shows the foot to advantage, and furnishes with blushes, and re-composing airs beyond comparison. Hark! there's a coach.

Foi. 'Tis he, madam.

Lady W. O dear, has my nephew made his addresses to Millamant? I order'd him.

Foi. Sir VVilfull is set in to drinking, madam, in the parlour.

Lady W. Odds my life, I'll send him to her. Call her down, Foible; bring her hither. I'll send him as I go—when they are together, then come to me, Foible, that I may not be too long alone with sir Rowland. [Exit.

Enter MRS. MILLAMANT and MRS. FAINALL.

Foi. Madam, I staid here, to tell your ladyship that Mr. Mirabell has waited this half hour for an opportunity to talk with you. Though my lady's orders were to leave you and sir VVilfull together. Shall I tell Mr. Mirabell that you are at leisure?

Mrs. Mill. No—what would the dear man have? I am thoughtful, and would amuse myself. Bid him come another time.

There never yet was woman made,
Nor shall, but to be curs'd.

[Repeating and walking about.]
That's hard!

Mrs. F. You are very fond of sir John Suckling to-day, Millamant, and the poets.

Mrs. Mill. He? ay, and filthy verses, so I am.

Foi. Sir VVilfull is coming, madam. Shall I send Mr. Mirabell away?

Mrs. Mill. Ay, if you please, Foible, send him away, or send him hither, just as you will, dear Foible. I think I'll see him: shall I? ay, let the wretch come—Thyrsis a youth of the inspired train.

[Repeating.]

—Dear Fainall, entertain sir VVilfull; thou hast philosophy to undergo a fool; thou art married and hast patience; I would confer with my own thoughts.

Mrs. F. I am obliged to you, that you would make me your proxy in this affair; but I have business of my own.

Enter SIR WILFULL.

Mrs. F. O sir VVilfull, you are come at the critical instant. There's your mistress up to the ears in love and contemplation; pursue your point, now or never.

Sir W. Yes, my aunt will have it so: I would gladly have been encouraged with a bottle or two, because I'm somewhat wary at first, before I am acquainted;—but I hope, after a time, I shall break my mind—that is, upon further acquaintance. [This while Millamant walks about repeating to herself] So for the present, cousin, I'll take my leave. If so be you'll be so kind to make my excuse, I'll return to my company.

Mrs. F. O fie, sir VVilfull! what, you must not be daunted.

Sir W. Daunted, no, that's not it, it is not so much for that; for if so be that I set on't, I'll do't. But only for the present, 'tis sufficient till further acquaintance, that's all—your servant.

Mrs. F. Nay, I'll swear you shall never lose so favourable an opportunity, if I can help it. I'll leave you together, and lock the door.

[Exit Mrs. Fainall and Foible.]

Sir W. Nay, nay, cousin, I have forgot my gloves. What d'ye do? 'Sheart, a'has lock'd the door indeed, I think; nay, cousin Fainall, open the door; pshaw, what a vixen trick is this!—Nay, now a'has seen me too—Cousin, I made bold to pass through as it were—I think this door's enchanted.

Mrs. Mill. [Repeating]

I pr'ythee spare me, gentle boy,

Press me no more for that slight toy.

Sir W. Anan? cousin, your servant.

Mrs. Mill. That foolish trifle of a heart—
Sir VVilfull!

Sir W. Yes—your servant. No offence. I hope, cousin?

Mrs. Mill. [Repeating]

I swear it will not do its part,

Though thou dost thine, employ'st thy power and art.

—Natural, easy Suckling!

Sir W. Anan? Suckling? No such suckling neither, cousin, nor stripling: I thank heaven, I'm no minor.

Mrs. Mill. Ah rustic, ruder than Gothic.

Sir W. Well, well, I shall understand your lingo one of these days, cousin; in the mean while, I must answer in plain English.

Mrs. Mill. Have you any business with me, sir VVilfull?

Sir W. Not at present, cousin. Yes, I made bold to see, to come and know if that how you were disposed to fetch a walk this evening;

if so be that I might not be troublesome, I would have sought a walk with you.

Mrs. Mill. A walk? what then?

Sir W. Nay, nothing; only for the walk's sake, that's all.

Mrs. Mill. I nauseate walking; 'tis a country diversion; I loathe the country, and every thing that relates to it.

Sir W. Indeed! bah! look ye, look ye, you do? nay, 'tis like you may: here are choice of pastimes here in town, as plays and the like, that must be confess'd indeed.

Mrs. Mill. Ah l'étourdi! I hate the town too.

Sir W. Dear heart, that's much—bah! that you should hate 'em both! bah! 'tis like you may; there are some can't relish the town, and others can't away with the country, 'tis like you may be one of those, cousin.

Mrs. Mill. Ha, ha, ha! Yes, 'tis like I may. You have nothing further to say to me?

Sir W. Not at present, cousin. 'Tis like, when I have an opportunity to be more private, I may break my mind in some measure. I conjecture you partly guess; however, that's as time shall try: but spare to speak and spare to speed, as they say.

Mrs. Mill. If it is of no great importance, sir Wilfull, you will oblige me by leaving me. I have just now a little business.

Sir W. Enough, enough, cousin: yes, yes, all at ease; when you're disposed. Now's as well as another time; and another time as well as now. All's one for that. Yes, yes, if your concerns call you, there's no haste; it will keep cold, as they say—cousin, your servant. I think this door's lock'd.

Mrs. Mill. You may go this way, sir.

Sir W. Your servant: then, with your leave, I'll return to my company. [Exit.]

Mrs. Mill. Ay, ay; ha, ha, ha!

Like Phoebus sung the no less am'rous boy.

Enter MIRABELL.

Mir. Like Daphne she, as lovely and as coy.—Do you lock yourself up from me, to make my search more curious? Or is this pretty artifice contrived, to signify that here the chase must end, and my pursuit be crown'd, for you can fly no further?

Mrs. Mill. Vanity! no, I'll fly and be follow'd to the last moment; though I am upon the very verge of matrimony, I expect you should solicit me as much as if I were wavering at the grate of a monastery, with one foot over the threshold. I'll be solicited to the very last, nay, and afterwards.

Mir. What, after the last?

Mrs. Mill. O, I should think I was poor, and had nothing to bestow, if I were reduced to an inglorious ease; and freed from the agreeable fatigues of solicitation.

Mir. But do not you know, that when favours are conferr'd upon instant and tedious solicitation, that they diminish in their value, and that both the giver loses the grace, and the receiver lessens his pleasure?

Mrs. Mill. It may be in things of common application; but never sure in love. O, I hate a lover, that can dare to think he draws a moment's air, independent on the bounty of his mistress. There is not so impudent a thing in nature, as the saucy look of an assured man, confident of success. The pedantic arrogance of a very husband has not so pragmatical an air. Ah! I'll never marry, unless I am first made sure of my will and pleasure.

Mir. Would you have 'em both before marriage? Or will you be contented with only the first now, and stay for the other till after grace?

Mrs. Mill. Ah, don't be impertinent. My dear liberty, shall I leave thee? My faithful solitude, my darling contemplation, must I bid you then adieu? Ay, adieu, my morning thoughts, agreeable wakings, indolent slumbers, ye douceurs, ye sommeils du matin, adieu! I can't do't, 'tis more than impossible: positively, Mirabell, I'll lie a-bed in a morning as long as I please.

Mir. Then I'll get up in a morning as early as I please.

Mrs. Mill. Ah! idle creature, get up when you will; and d'ye hear, I won't be called names after I'm married; positively I won't be called names.

Mir. Names!

Mrs. Mill. Ay, as wife, spouse, my dear, joy, jewel, love, sweetheart, and the rest of that nauseous cant, in which men and their wives are so fulsomely familiar; I shall never bear that. Good Mirabell, don't let us be familiar or fond, nor kiss before folks, like my lady Fadler and sir Francis: nor go in public together the first Sunday in a new chariot, to provoke eyes and whispers; and then never be seen there together again; as if we were proud of one another the first week, and ashamed of one another ever after. Let us never visit together, nor go to a play together, but let us be very strange and well bred: let us be as strange as if we had been married a great while; and as well bred as if we were not married at all.

Mir. Have you any more conditions to offer? hitherto your demands are pretty reasonable.

Mrs. Mill. Trifles, as liberty to pay and receive visits to and from whom I please; to write and receive letters, without interrogatories or wry faces on your part; to wear what I please; and choose conversation with regard only to my own taste; to have no obligation upon me to converse with wit that I don't like; because they are your acquaintance; or to be intimate with fools, because they may be your relations. Come to dinner when I please, dine in my dressing-room when I'm out of humour, without giving a reason. To have my closet inviolate; to be sole empress of my tea-table, which you must never presume to approach without first asking leave. And lastly, wherever I am, you shall always knock at the door before you come in. These articles subscribed, if I continue to endure you a little longer, I may by degrees dwindle into a wife.

Mir. Your bill of fare is something advanced in this latter account. Well, have I liberty to offer conditions, that when you are dwindled into a wife, I may not be beyond measure enlarged into a husband?

Mill. You have free leave; propose your utmost; speak, and spare not.

Mir. I thank you. Imprimis then, I covenant that your acquaintance be general; that you admit no sworn confidant, or intimate of your own sex; no she friend to screen her affairs under your countenance, and tempt you to make trial of a mutual secrecy. No decoy-duck to wheedle you a fop-scrambling to the play in a mask; then bring you home in a pretended fright, when you think you shall be found out; and rail at me for missing the play, and disappointing the frolic which you had to pick me up and prove my constancy.

Mrs. Mill. Detestable inprimis! I go to the play in a mask!

Mir. Item, I article that you continue to like your own face, as long as I shall: and while it passes current with me, that you endeavour not to new coin it. To which end, together with all vizards for the day, I prohibit all masks for the night, made of oil'd-skins, and I know not what—hog's bones, hare's-gall, pig-water, and the marrow of a roasted cat. In short, I forbid all commerce with the gentlewoman in VVhat-d'ye-call-it court. Item, I shut my doors against all procuresses with baskets, and pennyworths of muslin, China, fans, etc.—Item, when you shall be breeding—

Mrs. Mill. Ah! name it not.

Mir. I denounce against all straight-lacing, squeezing for a shape, till you mould my boy's head like a sugarloaf, and instead of a man-child, make me father to a crooked-billet. Lastly, to the dominion of the tea-table I submit; but with proviso, that you exceed not in your province; but restrain yourself to native and simple tea-table drinks, as tea, chocolate, and coffee. As likewise to genuine and authorized tea-table talk—such as mending of fashions, spoiling reputations, railing at absent friends, and so forth—But that on no account you encroach upon the men's prerogative, and presume to drink healths, or toast fellows; for prevention of which I banish all foreign forces, all auxiliaries to the tea-table, as orange-brandy, all anniseed, cinnamon, citron, and Barbadoes-waters, together with ratafia, and the most noble spirit of clary.—But for cowslip-wine, poppy-water, and all dormitives, those I allow.—These provisos admitted, in other things I may prove a tractable and complying husband.

Mrs. Mill. O horrid provisos! filthy strong waters! I toast fellows, odious men! I hate your odious provisos.

Mir. Then we're agreed. Shall I kiss your hand upon the contract? And here comes one to be a witness to the sealing of the deed.

Enter Mrs. FAINALL.

Mrs. Mill. Fainall, what shall I do? shall I have him? I think I must have him.

Mrs. F. Ay, ay, take him, take him; what should you do?

Mrs. Mill. VVell then—I'll take my death I'm in a horrid fright—Fainall, I shall never say it—well—I think—I'll endure you.

Mrs. F. Fie, fie, have him, have him, and tell him so in plain terms: for I am sure you have a mind to him.

Mrs. Mill. Are you? I think I have—and the horrid man looks as if he thought so too—well, you ridiculous thing you, I'll have you—I won't be kiss'd, nor I won't be thank'd —here, kiss my hand though—so hold your tongue now, don't say a word.

Mrs. F. Mirabell, there's a necessity for your obedience; you have neither time to talk nor stay. My mother is coming; and in my conscience if she should see you, would fall into fits, and may be not recover time enough to return to sir Rowland, who, as Foible tells me, is in a fair way to succeed. Therefore spare your ecstasies for another occasion, and slip down the back-stairs, where Foible waits to consult you.

Mrs. Mill. Ay, go, go. In the mean time, I'll suppose you have said something to please me.

Mir. I am all obedience. [E.rit.]

Mrs. F. Yonder's sir VVilfull drunk! and so noisy, that my mother has been forced to leave sir Rowland to appease him; but he answers her only with singing and drinking—what they may have done by this time I know not; but Petulant and he were upon quarrelling as I came by.

Mrs. Mill. VVell, if Mirabell should not make a good husband, I am a lost thing; for I find I love him violently.

Mrs. F. So it seems; for you mind not what's said to you.—If you doubt him, you had better take up with sir VVilfull.

Mrs. Mill. How can you name that superannuated lubber? foh!

Enter VVITWOULD from drinking.

Mrs. F. So, is the fray made up, that you have left 'em?

VVit. Left 'em? I could stay no longer—I have laugh'd like ten christenings—I am tipsy with laughing—If I had staid any longer, I should have burst—I must have been let out and pierced in the sides, like an unsized camel—yes, yes, the fray is composed; my lady came in like a noli prosequi, and stop'd the proceedings.

Mrs. Mill. VVhat was the dispute?

VVit. That's the jest; there was no dispute. They could neither of 'em speak for rage; and so fell a sputtering at one another, like two roasting apples.

Enter PETULANT, drunk.

Now, Petulant, all's over, all's well; gad, my head begins to whim it about—why dost thou not speak? Thou art both as drunk and as mute as a fish.

Pet. Look you, Mrs. Millamant—if you can love me, dear nymph—say it—and that's the conclusion—pass on, or pass off, that's all.

VVit. Thou hast utter'd volumes, folios, in less than decimo sexto, my dear Lacedemonian. Sirrah, Petulant, thou art an epitomizer of words.

Pet. VVitwould—you are an annihilator of sense.

VVit. Thou art a retailer of phrases; and dost deal in remnants of remnants, like a maker of pincushions—thou art in truth (metaphorically speaking) a speaker of short-hand.

Pet. Thou art (without a figure) just one half of an ass, and Baldwin yonder, thy half-brother, is the rest—a gemini of asses split, would make just four of you.

Mrs. Mill. VVhat was the quarrel?

Pet. There was no quarrel—there might have been a quarrel.

Wit. If there had been words enow between 'em to have express'd provocation, they had gone together by the ears like a pair of castanets.

Pet. You were the quarrel.

Mrs. Mill. Me!

Pet. If I have the humour to quarrel, I can make less matters conclude premises,—if you are not handsome, what then, if I have a humour to prove it?—if I shall have my reward, say so; if not, fight for your face the next time yourself—I'll go sleep.

Wit. Do, wrap thyself up like a woodlouse, and dream revenge—and hear me, if thou canst learn to write by to-morrow morning, pen me a challenge—I'll carry it for thee.

Pet. Carry your mistress's monkey a spider,—go flea dogs, and read romances—I'll go to bed to my maid. [Exit.

Mrs. F. He's horridly drunk—how came you all in this pickle?

Wit. A plot, a plot, to get rid of the knight,—Your husband's advice; but he sneak'd off.

Enter SIR WVILFULL, drunk, and LADY WVISHFORT.

Lady W. Out upon't, out upon't! at years of discretion, and comport yourself at this rantipole rate!

Sir W. No offence, aunt.

Lady W. Offence? as I'm a person, I'm ashamed of you—fogh! how you stink of wine! d'ye think my niece will ever endure such a Borachio? you're an absolute Borachio.

Sir W. Borachio!

Lady W. At a time when you should commence an amour, and put your bes foot foremost—

Sir W. 'Sheart, an you grutge me your liquor, make a bill—give me more drink, and take my purse. [Sings.

Pr'ythee fill me the glass
Till it laugh in my face,
With ale that is potent and mellow;
He that whines for a lass
Is an ignorant ass,
For a bumper has not its fellow.

But if you would have me marry my cousin, say the word, and I'll do't—WVilfull will do't, that's the word,—WVilfull will do't, that's my crest—my motto I have forgot.

Lady W. My nephew's a little overtaken, cousin—but 'tis with drinking your health—O' my word, you are obliged to him—

Sir W. In vino veritas, aunt: if I drunk your health to day, cousin,—I am a Borachio. But if you have a mind to be married, say the word, and send for the piper; WVilfull will do't. If not, dust it away, and let's have t'other round—Tony, ods-heart, where's Tony?—Tony's an honest fellow, but he spits after a bumper, and that's a fault. [Sings.

We'll drink, and we'll never ha' done, boys.
Put the glass then around with the sun, boys.
Let Apollo's example invite us;
For he's drunk ev'ry night,
And that makes him so bright,
That he's able next morning to light us.

The sun's a good pimple, an honest soaker, he has a cellar at your Antipodes. If I travel, aunt, I touch at your Antipodes—your Antipodes are a good rascally sort of topsy-turvy fellows; if I had a bumper I'd stand upon my head and drink a health to 'em.—A match or no match, cousin with the hard name?—Aunt, WVilfull will do't.

Mrs. Mill. Your pardon, madam, I can stay no longer—sir WVilfull grows very powerful. I shall be overcome if I stay. Come, cousin.

[Exeunt Mrs. Millamant and Mrs. Fainall.

Lady W. He would poison a tallow-chandler and his family. Beastly creature, I know not what to do with him.—Travel quoth a! ay, travel, travel, get thee gone, get thee gone, get thee but far enough, to the Saracens, or the Tartars, or the Turks—for thou art not fit to live in a Christian commonwealth, thou beastly pagan.

Sir W. Turks! no; no Turks, aunt; your Turks are infidels, and believe not in the grape. Your Mahometan, your Musselman is a dry stinkard—No offence, aunt. My map says that your Turk is not so honest a man as your Christian—I cannot find by the map that your Musty is orthodox—whereby it is a plain case, that orthodox is a hard word, aunt, and [Sings.

To drink is a Christian diversion,
Unknown to the Turk or the Persian:
Let Mahometan fools
Live by heathenish rules,
And be damn'd over tea-cups and coffee,
But let British lads sing,
Crown a health to the king,
And a fig for your sultan and Sophi.

Enter FOIBLE, and whispers LADY WVISHFORT.

Eh, Tony!

Lady W. Sir Rowland impatient? good lack! what shall I do with this beastly tumbrill?—go lie down and sleep, you sot—or, as I'm a person, I'll have you bastinadoed with broomsticks. Call up the wenches with broomsticks.

Sir W. Abey? wenches, where are the wenches?

Lady W. Dear cousin WVitwould, get him away, and you will bind me to you inviolably. I have an affair of moment that invades me with some precipitation—you will oblige me to all futurity.

Wit. Come, knight—plague on him, I don't know what to say to him—will you go to a cock-match?

Sir W. With a wench, Tony?

Wit. Horrible! he has a breath like a bagpipe—Ay, ay, come will you march, my Salopian?

Sir W. Lead on, little Tony—I'll follow thee, my Anthony, my Tanthony; sirrah, thou shalt be my Tantony, and I'll be thy pig.

—And a fig for your sultan and Sophi.

[Exeunt Sir WVilfull, WVitwould, and Foible.

Lady W. This will never do. It will never make a match—at least before he has been abroad.

Enter WAITWELL, disguised as for SIR ROWLAND.

Dear sir Rowland, I am confounded with confusion at the retrospection of my own rudeness.—I have more pardons to ask than the pope distributes in the year of jubilee. But I hope where there is likely to be so near an alliance, we may unbend the severity of decorum—and dispense with a little ceremony.

Wait. My impatience, madam, is the effect of my transport; and till I have the possession of your adorable person, I am tantalized on the rack; and do but hang, madam, on the tenter of expectation.

Lady W. You have excess of gallantry, sir Rowland; and press things to a conclusion, with a most prevailing vehemence—But a day or two, for decency of marriage.

Wait. For decency of funeral, madam. The delay will break my heart—or if that should fail, I shall be poison'd. My nephew will get an inkling of my designs and poison me,—and I would willingly starve him before I die—I would gladly go out of the world with that satisfaction.—That would be some comfort to me, if I could but live so long as to be revenged on that unnatural viper.

Lady W. Is he so unnatural, say you? truly I would contribute much both to the saving of your life, and the accomplishment of your revenge.—Not that I respect myself; though he has been a perfidious wretch to me.

Wait. Perfidious to you!

Lady W. O sir Rowland, the hours that he has died away at my feet, the tears that he has shed, the oaths that he has sworn, the palpitations that he has felt, the trances and tremblings, the ardours and the ecstasies, the kneelings and the risings, the heart-heavings and the hand-gripings, the pangs and the pathetic regards of his protesting eyes! Oh, no memory can register.

Wait. What, my rival! is the rebel my rival? a'dies.

Lady W. No, don't kill him at once, sir Rowland; starve him gradually, inch by inch.

Wait. I'll do't. In three weeks he shall be barefoot; in a month out at knees with begging an alms—he shall starve upward and upward, till he has nothing living but his head, and then go out like a candle's end upon a saveall.<sup>1)</sup>

Lady W. Well, sir Rowland, you have the way—you are no novice in the labyrinth of love—you have the clue—But as I am a person, sir Rowland, you must not attribute my yielding to any sinister appetite, or indigestion of widowhood; nor impute my complacency to any lethargy of continence—I hope you do not think me prone to any iteration of nuptials.

Wait. Far be it from me—

Lady W. If you do, I protest I must recede, or think that I have made a prostitution of decorums; but in the vehemence of compassion, and to save the life of a person of so much importance—

Wait. I esteem it so—

Lady W. Or else you wrong my condescension.

Wait. I do not, I do not—

Lady W. Indeed you do.

Wait. I do not, fair shrine of virtue.

Lady W. If you think the least scruple of carnality was an ingredient—<sup>1)</sup> Lichtkuecht.

Wait. Dear madam, no. You are all camphire and frankincense, all chastity and odour.

Lady W. Or that—

Enter FOIBLE.

Foi. Madam, the dancers are ready, and there's one with a letter, who must deliver it into your own hands.

Lady W. Sir Rowland, will you give me leave? think favourably, judge candidly, and conclude you have found a person who would suffer racks in honour's cause, dear sir Rowland, and will wait on you incessantly. [Exit.

Wait. Fie, fie!—What a slavery have I undergone! Spouse, hast thou any cordial? I want spirits.

Foi. What a washy rogue art thou to pant thus for a quarter of an hour's lying and swearing to a fine lady!

Wait. O, she is the antidote to desire. By this hand, I'd rather be a chairman in the dog-days—than act sir Rowland till this time to-morrow.

Enter LADY WISHFORT, with a Letter.

Lady W. Call in the dancers;—sir Rowland, we'll sit, if you please, and see the entertainment. [Dance.] Now with your permission, sir Rowland, I will peruse my letter—I would open it in your presence, because I would not make you uneasy. If it should make you uneasy I would burn it—speak if it does—but you may see, the superscription is like a woman's hand.

Foi. By heaven! Mrs. Marwood's. I know it. My heart aches—get it from her. [To him.

Wait. A woman's hand? No, madam, that's no woman's hand, I see that already. That's somebody whose throat must be cut.

Lady W. Nay, sir Rowland, since you give me a proof of your passion by your jealousy, I promise you I'll make a return, by a frank communication—You shall see it—we'll open it together—look you here. [Reads.]—Madam, though unknown to you.—Look you there, 'tis from nobody that I know.—I have that honour for your character, that I think myself obliged to let you know you are abused. He who pretends to be sir Rowland is a cheat and a rascal—O heavens! what's this?

Foi. Unfortunate, all's ruin'd!

Wait. How, how! let me see, let me see—reading, A rascal and disguised, and suborn'd for that imposture—O villany! O villany!—By the contrivance of—

Lady W. I shall faint, I shall die, ho!

Foi. Say 'tis your nephew's hand.—Quickly, his plot, swear it, swear it.

Wait. Here's a villain! madam; don't you perceive it, don't you see it?

Lady W. Too well, too well. I have seen too much.

Wait. I told you at first I knew the hand—A woman's hand? The rascal writes a sort of a large hand; your Roman hand—I saw there was a throat to be cut presently. If he were my son, as he is my nephew, I'd pistol him.

Foi. O treachery! But are you sure, sir Rowland, it is his writing?

Wait. Sure? Am I here? Do I live? Do I love this pearl of India? I have twenty letters in my pocket from him, in the same character.

Lady W. How!

Foi. O what luck it is, sir Rowland, that you were present at this juncture! this was the business that brought Mr. Mirabell disguised to madam Millamant this afternoon. I thought something was contriving, when he stole by me and would have hid his face.

Lady W. How, how!—I heard the villain was in the house indeed; and now I remember, my niece went away abruptly, when sir W. Wilfull was to have made his addresses.

Foi. Then, then, madam, Mr. Mirabell waited for her in her chamber; but I would not tell your ladyship, to discompose you when you were to receive sir Rowland.

Wait. Enough, his date is short.

Foi. No, good sir Rowland, don't incur the law.

Wait. Law! I care not for law. I can but die, and 'tis in a good cause—My lady shall be satisfied of my truth and innocence, though it cost me my life.

Lady W. No, dear sir Rowland, don't fight; if you should be killed I must never show my face; or hang'd—O consider my reputation, sir Rowland—No, you shan't fight—I'll go in and examine my niece; I'll make her confess. I conjure you, sir Rowland, by all your love, not to fight.

Wait. I am charm'd, madam; I obey. But some proof you must let me give you;—I'll go for a black box, which contains the writings of my whole estate, and deliver that into your hands.

Lady W. Ay, dear sir Rowland, that will be some comfort; bring the black box.

Wait. And may I presume to bring a contract to be sign'd this night? May I hope so far?

Lady W. Bring what you will; but come alive, pray come alive. O this is a happy discovery.

Wait. Dead or alive I'll come—and married we will be in spite of treachery. Come, my buxom widow:

Ere long you shall substantial proof receive
That I'm an arrant knight—

Foi. Or arrant knave.

[Exeunt.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—The same.

Enter LADY WISHFORT and FOIBLE.

Lady W. Out of my house, out of my house, thou viper, thou serpent, that I have foster'd; thou bosom traitress, that I raised from nothing—Begone, begone, begone, go, go—That I took from washing of old gauze and weaving of dead hair, with a bleak blue nose, over a chaffing-dish of starved embers, and dining behind a traverse-rag, in a shop no bigger than a bird-cage,—go, go, starve again, do, do.

Foi. Dear madam, I'll beg pardon on my knees.

Lady W. Away, out, out, go set up for yourself again—do, drive a trade, do, with your three-pennyworth of small ware, flaunting upon a pack-thread, under a brandyseller's bulk, or against a dead wall by a ballad-mon-

ger. Go, hang out an old frisoner-gorget, with a yard of yellow colberteen again; do; an old gnaw'd mask, two rows of pins, and a child's fiddle; a glass necklace, with the beads broken, and a quilted nightcap with one ear. Go, go, drive a trade.—These were your commodities, you treacherous trull; this was the merchandize you dealt in, when I took you into my house, placed you next myself, and made you governante of my whole family. You have forgot this, have you, now you have feathered your nest?

Foi. No, no, dear madam. Do but bear me, have but a moment's patience—I'll confess all. Mr. Mirabell seduced me; I am not the first that he has wheedled with his dissembling tongue; your ladyship's own wisdom has been deluded by him, then how should I, a poor ignorant, defend myself? O madam, if you knew but what he promised me, and how he assured me your ladyship should come to no damage—or else the wealth of the Indies should not have bribed me to conspire against so good, so sweet, so kind a lady as you have been to me.

Lady W. No damage! What, to betray me, and marry me to a cast serving-man? No damage! O thou frontless impudence!

Foi. Pray do but hear me, madam! he could not marry your ladyship, madam—no, indeed, his marriage was to have been void in law; for he was married to me first, to secure your ladyship. Yes, indeed, I inquired of the law in that case before I would meddle or make.

Lady W. What, then I have been your property, have I? I have been convenient to you, it seems,—while you were catering for Mirabell, I have been broker for you? This exceeds all precedent; I am brought to fine uses, to become a hotcher of secondhand marriages between Abigails and Andrews! I'll couple you. Yes, I'll baste you together, you and your Philander. I'll Duke's-place you, as I'm a person. Your turtle is in custody already: you shall coo in the same cage, if there be a constable or warrant in the parish. [Exit.]

Foi. O that ever I was born! O that I was ever married!—a bride, ay, I shall be a Bridewell bride, oh!

Enter MRS. FAINALL.

Mrs. F. Poor Foible, what's the matter?

Foi. O madam, my lady's gone for a constable; I shall be had to a justice, and put to Bridewell to beat hemp; poor Waitwell's gone to prison already.

Mrs. F. Have a good heart, Foible; Mirabell's gone to give security for him. This is all Marwood's and my husband's doing.

Foi. Yes, yes, I know it, madam; she was in my lady's closet, and overheard all that you said to me before dinner. She sent the letter to my lady; and that missing effect, Mr. Fainall laid this plot to arrest Waitwell, when he pretended to go for the papers; and in the mean time Mrs. Marwood declared all to my lady.

Mrs. F. Was there no mention made of me in the letter?—My mother does not suspect my being in the confederacy; I fancy Marwood has not told her, though she has told my husband.

Foi. Yes, madam; but my lady did not see that part: we stifled the letter before she read so far. Has that mischievous devil told Mr. Fainall of your ladyship then?

Mrs. F. Ay, all's out; my affair with Mirabell, every thing discovered. This is the last day of our living together, that's my comfort.

Foi. Indeed! madam; and so 'tis a comfort if you knew all—he has been even with your ladyship; which I could have told you long enough since, but I love to keep peace and quietness by my good will: I had rather bring friends together, than set them at distance. But Mrs. Marwood and he are nearer related than ever their parents thought for.

Mrs. F. Say'st thou so, Foible? Canst thou prove this?

Foi. I can take my oath of it, madam, so can Mrs. Mincing; we have had many a fair word from madam Marwood, to conceal something that passed in our chamber one evening when we were at Hyde-park;—and we were thought to have gone a walking: but we went up unawares—though we were sworn to secrecy too; madam Marwood took a book and swore us both upon it: but it was but a book of poems. So long as it was not a Bible oath, we may break it with a safe conscience.

Mrs. F. This discovery is the most opportune thing I could wish—Now, Mincing!

Enter MINCING.

Min. My lady would speak with Mrs. Foible, mem. Mr. Mirabell is with her; he has set your spouse at liberty, Mrs. Foible, and would have you hide yourself in my lady's closet, till my old lady's anger is abated. O, my old lady is in a perilous passion, at something Mr. Fainall has said; he swears, and my old lady cries. There's a fearful hurricane, I vow. He says, mem, how that he'll have my lady's fortune made over to him, or he'll be divorced.

Mrs. F. Does your lady or Mirabell know that?
